Strasser's second ground for dismissing the indictment, that it is too vague and uncertain to inform him of the charge against him, is also without merit. Rule 7(c), F. R. Crim. P., sets forth requirements that the indictment "shall be a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged." These requirements have here been met. Strasser is named as a defendant and the "defendants" are charged with conspiracy and attempt to monopolize. There are allegations of sufficient facts to show an agreement among the defendants to acquire control and monopoly and to restrain trade in the manufacture and distribution of ladies blouses. There is no requirement that overt acts be charged in the indictment, Nash v. United States, 229 U. S. 373, nor is defendant entitled to know what evidence will be presented against him. Strasser apparently is under the impression that he is entitled to a detailed pleading of evidence since he argues that he is entitled to know what he did to effect the conspiracy, with whom he conspired, when or where he conspired or performed an act or acts in furtherance of the conspiracy, how the prices were agreed upon, the territories allocated, the agreements negotiated, the policing accomplished, and how the public was affected. The answers to all of these questions would involve disclosing the Government's evidence and such disclosure need not be made in an indictment.

It is true that Strasser, after being described as a defendant, is mentioned only twice by name in the indictment, but, to paraphrase the language of the court in Las Vegas Merchant Plumbers Ass'n v. United States [1954 Trade Cases ¶67,673], 9 Cir., 210 F. 2d 732, 750, the charge against Strasser does not rest merely on these specific references.

[Duplicity]

Strasser's final contention is that the indictment must be dismissed because all three counts are duplicitous. He argues that, although each count charges one conspiracy starting about 1949 and continuing up to and including the date of the return of the indictment, the terms of the indictment reveal that "several distinct agreements are alleged in each count rendering those counts duplicitous." It is true that the terms of the indictment do show that more than one agreement was involved, but this does not render the indictment duplicitous. The plan to stabilize the blouse industry is alleged to have been arrived at in 1949. The fact that Slate Belt, in 1953, broke away from Greater and entered into independent agreements with National and the ILGWU in no way detracts from the continuation of the conspiracy, nor does the realignment of Slate Belt with Greater in 1955 necessitate the conclusion that another separate conspiracy was then formed. It may be that Slate Belt withdrew from the conspiracy in 1953, but it does not necessarily follow that the conspiracy ended at that time. In 1955, when Slate Belt once more associated itself with Greater, this could have been merely an act in furtherance of the conspiracy from which Slate Belt never withdrew, or Slate Belt's rejoining the conspiracy which it had earlier abandoned. If it is the former, the conspiracy could well have continued from 1949 to the date of the return of the indictment, and the allegations in the indictment are sufficient. If the 1955 reassociation was a rejoining of a pre-existing conspiracy from which Slate Belt had withdrawn, the indictment still stands. "The rule is clear that one who joins an existing conspiracy takes it as it is, and is therefore held accountable for the prior conduct of co-conspirators." United States v. Sansone, 2 Cir., 231 F. 2d 887, 893, cert. denied 351 U. S. 987; United States v. Kessler, 2 Cir., 253 F. 2d 290, 291.

[Continuing Conspiracy]

The charge in count 1 is a conspiracy to restrain trade, and the charge in count 2 is a conspiracy to monopolize. Each count alleges a single continuing conspiracy which need not be broken up into several conspiracies merely because there were other agreements entered into in order to effectuate the conspiracy. A single conspiracy may even embrace several related conspiracies, Nye & Nissen v. United States, 9 Cir., 168 F. 2d 846, 850, aff'd 336 U. S. 613; United States v. Coplon, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 88 F. Supp. 912, 914, rev'd on other grounds, 185 F. 2d 629; although the agreement between Slate Belt and Greater may not necessarily have been a related conspiracy, as pointed out above. The allegations against defendant Strasser are quite clear and can provide ample protection against double jeopardy if that should be attempted.

Defendant Strasser's motion to dismiss the indictment is denied.

II. Motions for Severance

[Prejudice]

Defendants Local 25 and Kreindler have moved for a severance of defendant Strasser from themselves and the other defendants in the case, or, in the alternative, for a severance of the moving defendants from Strasser and the other defendants. Each of the other defendants has joined in this motion. The basis for the plea for the severance of Strasser is a claim of prejudice on account of unsavory company that he is alleged to keep. He allegedly has been closely connected wth extremely notorious criminals and racketeers so that his participation in the trial would tar the defendants throughout the litigation because of the jury's abhorrence of racketeers. Local 25 claims, and not without justification, that because of the efforts of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, the union members have come to enjoy a higher standard of living than they theretofore realized and the sweatshop has been largely eliminated and that Local 25 consequently enjoys a high reputation. Local 25 claims that Strasser has been brought into this case so that the Government could counteract the effect of this high reputation by proclaiming the case to be an assault on racketeering, as well as an attack on business arrangements alleged to violate the Sherman Act. It is because the suggestion of racketeering is present that Local 25 complains that it will not be able to receive a fair and unbiased verdict on the antitrust issues.

In support of its argument that this case is an attempt to convict a racketeer, Local 25 has attached to its affidavit articles which appeared in the city's leading newspapers on the day that the indictment was returned and the following day all of which highlighted the claim that Strasser had underworld connections. In each article there was a statement, attributed either to the Attorney General of the United States or to a Justice Department official, to the effect that the antitrust laws were now going to be used to attack racketeering and union abuses. Defendant claims that because of such publicity the Government has > "sought to inject a prejudicial and irrelevant issue of 'racketeering' into the trial of an important antitrust controversy."

It is, of course, highly regrettable if the publicity surrounding the indictment stressed heavily facts which have no place in the case. I am, however, unable to say that defendants cannot receive a fair trial merely because of the publicity immediately following the indictment, limited in time to one evening and one morning. No case has been cited and none has been found where a severance has been granted because of prejudice against one of the defendants, in the absence of a highly inflammatory incriminating statement made by that defendant. Compare United States v. Lebron, 2 Cir., 222 F. 2d 531, 535, cert. denied 350 U. S. 876, with United States v. Haupt, 7 Cir., 136 F. 2d 661, 673-674.

No defendant makes a stronger case for a severance than Local 25.

[Severance Denied]

If a severance were granted, the necessity of relitigating the issues would prejudice the Government, particularly in view of the fact that an antitrust case so often takes a long time to try. In addition, the defendants at the second trial would have the advantage of knowing in advance exactly what evidence the Government expected to offer against them.

The motions for a severance are denied.

III. Motions under Rules 16 and 17(c)

All of the defendants, with the exception of defendant Strasser, have moved under Rules 16 and 17(c) for the relief hereinafter described.

1. Defendants Local 25 and Kreindler seek, under Rule 16,

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

"to inspect and copy or photograph, all books, records, documents and papers relative to the indictment belonging to defendant Local 25 or defendant Kreindler or obtained by the Government by seizure or process,"

and, under Rule 17(c),

"to inspect and copy or photograph, books, records, documents and papers designated in a subpoena duces tecum served on the plaintiff on May 14, 1959, to wit: all books, records, documents and papers that are relative to the indictment and of evidentiary character, other than those furnished by defendant Local 25 or defendant Kriendler to the Government and those obtained by the Government by seizure or process";

2. Defendant Slate Belt seeks, under Rule 16,

"to inspect, make extracts from, copy or photograph any and all books, records, documents, minutes, reports, checks, check vouchers, check stubs or any other writing relative to the indictment heretofore obtained from others by or in the name of the Government from any source whatever,"

and, under Rule 17(c),

"to inspect, make extracts from, copy or photograph any and all books, records, documents and papers described in a Subpoena Duces Tecum * * * which were obtained from any and all sources, persons, corporations, associations, or otherwise, and are in the custody and control of the Government or any of its attorneys or agents, which bear, tend to bear upon, or relate to each of the crimes alleged in the indictment, the means allegedly used to effectuate the same, and the consequences alleged therein to have resulted therefrom, and are of an evidentiary character, excepting only such of the foregoing written material which defendant has been permitted to inspect or copy pursuant to an order granted in response to the request for relief [under Rule 16]";

3. Defendants Greater, Clemenza, and Cabin seek, under Rule 16:

"1. Corporate documents and reports, bulletins, minutes since January 1, 1949.

2. Agreements, contracts, arrangements, correspondence, memoranda and writings relating to labor, contractors, manufacturers, jobbers or associations thereof, and

3. All correspondence and other writings from January 1, 1953 relating to, (a) the manufacture, production and prices of blouses, (b) price schedules or agreements and requests or attempts to deviate therefrom, and (c) registration and designation of contractors, manufacturers or jobbers and attempts to deviate therefrom,

4. All correspondence and other writing from January 1, 1950 relating to (a) enforcement, fines, sanctions, or other action; (b) disputes including proceedings before the Impartial Chairman and attempts to enforce his decisions; attempts or efforts to induce membership in any association or to adhere to its rules or practices,

5. All books, records or documents showing (commencing January 1, 1953): membership lists, names, addresses, official capacity, and terms of the officers, records of income and disbursements and other financial arrangements."

and under Rule 17(c):

"all books, records, documents and papers obtained by Government counsel, other than those belonging to the said defendants or those obtained by the Government by seizure or process, which (a) are relative to or resulted in the indictment and (b) will be offered as evidence on the trial of the defendants or any of them, under said indictment; excluding, however, documents heretofore obtained by said defendants, such as copies of agreements to which the defendant Greater Blouse is a party."

4. Defendants National and Rosenthal seek, under Rule 16:

"to inspect, make extracts from, copy or photograph any and all books, records, documents, minutes, reports, checks, check vouchers, check stubs, or any other writing heretofore obtained from others by seizure or process by or in the name of the United States of America from any source whatever, particularly such as were obtained by said seizure or process from any and all persons, corporations and organizations named herein as defendants or co-conspirators as well as from all other persons, corporations and organizations described but not named herein as co-conspirators which may in any way, degree or extent relate to, reflect or record acts, conduct, transactions, occasions, statements and payments referred to or alleged in the indictment which bear or tend to bear upon the public offenses alleged in Counts One, Two or Three, respectively, in the indictment, the means allegedly used to effectuate the alleged unlawful conspiracies and attempt and/or

and, under Rule 17(c):

"to inspect, make extracts from, copy or photograph any and all books, records, documents and papers described in a Subpoena Duces Tecum, a copy whereof is hereunto annexed, served on the United States Attorney and on said 'Attorneys, Department of Justice' on the 14th day of May, 1959, and which were obtained from any and all sources, persons, corporations, associations or otherwise and are in the custody and control of the United States of America or any of its said attorneys or agents which bear, tend to bear upon, or relate to each of the crimes alleged in the indictment, the means allegedly used to effectuate the same and the consequences alleged therein to have resulted therefrom, excepting only such of the foregoing written material, which said defendants have been permitted to inspect or copy pursuant to an Order granted in response to the request for relief under Rule 16."

[Fishing Expedition]

I have deliberately included the text of these motions to indicate the broad and thorough exploration that defendants seek of all the documents in the possession of the Government. Merely because the motions seek broad discovery, however, it does not necessarily follow, as the Government argues, that they are designed to permit the oft condemned fishing expedition. This case involves a conspiracy charge against nine defendants and it is essential in a case of this type that "each have an opportunity to examine before trial documents which may be introduced against him but which he has never before seen." United States v. Cohen, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 15 F. R. D. 269, 273.

I also reject the Government's argument that the practice of using Rule 17(c) as an additional means of discovery was "prohibited by the Supreme Court in Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,818], 341 U. S. 214, 220." See United States v. Cohen, supra. As I read the Bowman Dairy case, "the Court reasoned that if a subpoena is directed towards a good-faith effort to obtain evidence there is no reason why such evidence may not be reached under Rule 17(c), even though not obtainable under Rule 16." United States v. Gross & Kiley, D. C. S. D. N .Y., C. 155-333, June 9, 1959.

["Dragnet Character" of Motions]

Rule 16 deals with inspection and copying of items "obtained from or belonging to the defendant or obtained from others by seizure or by process, upon a showing that the items sought may be material to the preparation of [the] defense and that the request is reasonable." The right granted by this Rule is conditioned upon a showing of materiality and reasonableness. The right of discovery granted by Rule 17(c) deals with material "obtained by the Government by solicitation or voluntarily from third persons," see Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U. S. at page 221, and "material which has been in the Government's possession from the time of its origin." United States v. Cohen, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 15 F. R. D. 269, 271, supra. Nevertheless all of the motions made under Rule 17(c) must be denied because of their dragnet character. As I said in the Cohen case at page 273,

"If defendants insist upon proceeding with catch-all descriptions they must at least list the evidentiary documents that are available to them elsewhere and exclude them from those demanded of the United States Attorney."

Here defendants must at least list the documents that are available to them which come within the classes mentioned in the indictment.

[Materiality and Reasonableness]

The motions of the defendants under Rule 16 ask for items that seem to fall within it except that the defendants have made no specific showing of materiality and reasonableness. The issue therefore is whether such a specific showing is always a prerequisite to discovery under Rule 16. I hold that it is not. In a case of this type, where the documents in the possession of the Government, obtained through seizure or process, are too numerous for the defendants to identify, it is impossible to make a showing that they are material and that the request is reasonable. This is especially true where the defendants may not even know what documentary proof the Government has in its possession and where most of the evidence offered at trial by the Government is likely to consist of such documentary proof. See Bowman Dairy Co.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

v. United States, 341 U. S. 214, 219, supra, where the Supreme Court declared that Rule 16 gives "discovery as to documents and other materials otherwise beyond the reach of the defendants which, as in the instant case, might be numerous and difficult to identify."

I do not mean to say that merely because the Government obtained the documents in question by seizure or process they are therefore presumed to be material, cf. United States v. Parr, D. C. S. D. Tex., 17 F. R. D. 512, appeal dismissed 225 F. 2d 329, aff'd 351 U. S. 513, since documents could be seized and prove immaterial to the charge in the indictment, but in an earlier motion in this case, when an order was entered impounding the documents obtained by subpoena, the Government conceded that the "papers, documents, books and records are essential for the preparation and trial of the above captioned cause." If these items were essential for the preparation of the prosecution's case they are surely material to the preparation of the defense. I also find that the request is reasonable since inspection by the defendants is the "only way the defendant[s] can reach such materials so as to inform [themselves]." Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U. S. 214, 219, supra.

The Government has offered "to produce all documents which it may use in the trial of this case" and argues that this is the maximum to which defendants are entitled. This argument, however, overlooks the fact that Rule 16 grants production and inspection of documents not merely to help a defendant understand the prosecution's case but to help the defendant in the preparation of his defense. The fact that much of the material consists of documents which belong to third parties whose interests may be adverse to the moving defendants is not persuasive for denying the motion. Many of these documents will be introduced at trial anyway, if they are relevant, and the fact that they were obtained by seizure or process would minimize any inference of voluntary aid to the Government. I also reject the Government's argument that much of the material "could be of no practical value to the defendants in the preparation of their defense." Such a value judgment is one that should be made not by the prosecution but by the defendants alone. Of course, documents which bear no relation to the indictment or are privileged need not be produced.

[Documents Provided Voluntarily]

The motion of defendant Slate Belt under Rule 16 requests items obtained from others both voluntarily and by seizure or process. Rule 16 cannot be used for the purpose of getting documents obtained from others voluntarily so that it will be granted only to the extent of documents obtained from others by seizure or process.

[Ruling]

The motions under Rule 16 are granted except where specifically denied above. The motions under Rule 17(c) are denied.

IV. Defendants' Motions for Bills of Particulars

[Seeking Government's Evidence]

The nine defendants have made five separate motions for bills of particulars and the requests cover sixty-three legal pages. Many of the requests seek the detailed evidence which the Government will offer and the theory on which the case will be tried. On the other hand some of the requests are reasonable and seek particulars necessary for the preparation of the defense in view of the fact that the indictment covers ten years and involves thousands of people. The difficulty in ruling on such requests lies in the fact that the precedents furnish little help since each case must be judged by its special factual situation. The principles to be applied in a decision of this type have been well stated, see United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 41 F. Supp. 347, 348; United States v. The Metropolitan Leather & Find. Ass'n [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,367], D. C. S. D. N. Y., 82 F. Supp. 449, 453, and I will attempt to balance the interest of the Government in non-disclosure of evidence against the interest of defendants in being able to prepare their defense.

[Rulings on Specific Requests]

I shall take up the motion of Local 25 and Kreindler. I shall here refer to the paragraphs in the indictment to which the requests are respectively addressed.

Paragraph 15. The names and addresses of the unnamed co-conspirators are asked. The indictment charges no specific acts by any unnamed conspirators and enough are named to identify the conspiracies.

Paragraph 22. These items are denied except for the item to which the Government consents. The paragraph to which these requests are addressed is purely descriptive, detailing the trade and commerce involved. It is clear without the further description which is asked.

Paragraphs 26, 27, 28 and 29. The Government agrees to furnish item 1 of paragraph 27 and item 1 of paragraph 28. The requested particulars as to periods of time are unnecessary since it is clear that the indictment here speaks only as of its date. Where the indictment alleges that National represents a majority of the jobbers, defendants are entitled to know how many jobbers the Government claims exist and how many it claims are represented by National. The allegation in paragraph 29 that certain contracts set the pattern for the labor contracts in the entire blouse industry is an important part of the indictment and defendants are entitled to a statement of the area referred to in the term "the entire blouse industry."

Paragraph 32. Item 1 requests particulars as to the identity of the persons who acted for each defendant and the periods of defendants' participation. These are proper and must be furnished.

The particulars requested under item 2 with respect to the character of the conspiracy as a series of separate conspiracies or a continuing one are furnished by paragraph 33 of the indictment, where it states that the combination and conspiracy has consisted of a continuing agreement and concert of action.

Paragraph 33. Defendants are entitled to the usual particulars with respect to an agreement as requested in items 1 and 2.

Item 3, however, asks not only for the perfectly proper substance of any implied agreement, but also asks for the identity of the acts or documents from which it was implied and the names of the persons who performed such acts. This seems to me to be a request for a statement of the direct evidence upon which the Government will rely as circumstantial evidence of an implied agreement. It is a clear case of a request for the opponent's evidence, and is denied.

Item 4 asks for a characterization of the continuing agreement as to whether it had any terms or purposes other than those set forth in the indictment. Defendants can determine the matter of terms from the written instruments or statements of the substance of oral agreements furnished in accordance with this memorandum. So far as purposes other than those set forth are concerned, the matter is unimportant. Item 4 is denied.

Paragraph 34. Item 1 is evidently a request for an expansion of the expression "among others" in the statement that the combination and conspiracy has been effectuated by various means and methods including, among others, the following: To grant this request would require the Government practically to turn over to defendants all of the Government's evidence in advance of trial. It is denied.

Item 2 asks with respect to each "agreement", "plan" and "contract" referred to in paragraph 34, all of the particulars asked with respect to the agreements referred to in paragraph 33 and this request under item 2 in paragraph 34 is disposed of as was the corresponding request with respect to paragraph 33.

Item 3 seems to be a duplication of material required by item 2 and is denied.

Item 4 seeks the parts of the various agreements which are in furtherance of the continuing agreement or concert of action alleged in paragraph 33. This request is denied on the authority of United States v. Cohen, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 113 F. Supp. 955 and 15 F. R. D. 269, supra. This applies to both subdivisions (a) and (b).

Items 5 and 6 are not within the province of a bill of particulars. The particulars requested form no part of the Government's case.

Items 7(a) and 7(b) ask in substance for a specification of the ways, other than "negotiating, entering into and enforcing the agreements" to which Local 25 was a party, referred to in paragraph 34, in which defendants Local 25 and Kreindler participated in the alleged contining agreement and concert of action. This is only another way of stating item 1 and is likewise denied.

Item 8(a) asks with respect to the second subdivision of paragraph 34, a statement of means and methods by which an alleged plan to stabilize the blouse industry was evolved and, among other things, the act or acts by which defendants Greater, National and Local 25 are claimed to have participated in evolving the plan. The alleged plan to stabilize the blouse industry seems to me very much like an agreement and I think that defendants are entitled to the same information with respect to it that I have permitted in the case of the agreements referred to in paragraph 33 and the part of 34 thus far treated.

Item 8(b) asks for a statement of the prices to be paid the contractors which were fixed by the 1953 agreement referred to in paragraph 34 and the area in which each price was so fixed. Since a copy of the agreement must be furnished under a previous ruling of mine with respect to paragraph 34, an answer to item 8(b) would be a duplication.

Item 9 is unintelligible and is denied.

Items 10(a) and 10(b) are in substance the particulars as to the way in which defendants Local 25 and National conducted and participated in a "campaign" to force action by non-member jobbers and manufacturers. Such matters do not lend themselves to precise statement as do allegations as to agreements and, to require the particulars asked, would force the Government to detail evidence which, presumably, would be largely circumstantial. They are denied.

Item 11 must be treated as was 8(b).

Items 12(a) and 12(b) must be treated as were items 10(a) and 10(b).

The allegations respecting defendant Strasser's participation are so general that I am disposed to take a more liberal attitude toward item 12(c). That requests a statement of where, when, how and by what act or acts and at whose request defendant Strasser "was instrumental" in arranging Slate Belt's reaffiliation with Greater. Such a statement, except for "at whose request" must be given. There is no allegation in the indictment that defendant Strasser acted at anyone's request.

Item 12(d) is denied for the same reason that prompted the denial of "at whose request".

Item 13(a) is denied as dealing with comparatively unimportant matters.

Item 13(b) deals with more important matters and the indictment in this respect is extremely broad. It is treated as was 12(c) above.

Item 13(c) is denied as dealing with unalleged matter.

Item 13(d) is denied for the same reason and item 13(e) consequently becomes moot.

Item 13(f) is denied as dealing with unalleged matter.

Item 14 subdivisions (a), (b) and (d) are subject to one or both of the objections that they deal with unalleged matter or, like item 10, with matter which does not lend itself to precise statement.

Item 14(c) asks specification of the persons forced to make certain payments, the persons to whom the payments were made, when and where the payments were made, the moneys paid and the contracts on account of which such moneys were paid. These particulars closely approach in character the familiar type form of details as to agreements and must be supplied.

Paragraph 35. Item 1 is denied for the same reason as paragraph 34 item 1.

Item 2, with the later stated exception, is granted for the reason stated with respect to item 14(c) of paragraph 34. The Government need not state what prices it claims the manufacturers and jobbers would have paid in the absence of the conspiracy. That is a matter which does not lend itself to precise statement.

Item 3(a). These requests would be appropriate as interrogatories in a civil case. While it is true that requests for particulars in criminal cases must fulfill to some extent the function of interrogatories, these requests for the Government's views as to reasons why a given cause had an alleged effect are too far away from the traditional office of a bill of particulars to be granted.

Item 3(b), as I construe it, asks for details of instances where manufacturers and jobbers have been prevented from working with contractors of their own choosing. The indictment does not allege that there were any such instances—merely that they were not able to work with contractors of their own choosing. Perhaps the Government will rely on inferences without specific instances. Nevertheless evidence of such instances would be admissible as well under the allegation and defendants are entitled to such information as will permit effective preparation. Subdivision (b) is therefore granted.

What I have said with respect to item 3(a) applies as well to item 4(a).

What I have said with respect to item 3(b) applies as well to items 4(b), 5 and 6.

Item 7(a) is denied for much the same reason as item 3(a).

Item 7(b) is denied. Unlike item 3(b) it does not seek instances and the matter alleged in the indictment does not lend itself to precise statement.

Second and Third Counts Generally. Item 1. The relevant market is sufficiently stated in the indictment. This item is denied.

Items 2 and 3 are denied for the same reasons as item 3(a) of paragraph 34.

Paragraph 38. Defendants request the same particulars as with respect to paragraph 32 and the request is treated as paragraph 32 was.

Paragraphs 40 and 41 ask the same particulars as paragraph 34 item 1 and paragraph 35 item 1 respectively and the requests are disposed of in the same manner.

Paragraph 44 is disposed of as was paragraph 38 for the same reason.

Paragraph 45 is disposed of as were paragraphs 40 and 41 for the same reason.

Paragraph 46 item 1 asks a more particular statement of the "portion" of production controlled and the period during which control has accrued. Defendants are entitled to have the statement as to control expanded as requested. Just what they want as to dates is hard to gather but the Government will be required to give the date prior to the date of the indictment on which control accrued to the members of the conspiracy.

Item 2 asks particulars as to the "manner" of control of defendants Local 25 and Kreindler. It is enough to say that the indictment contains no allegation of control by these defendants apart from the other conspirators. It is denied.

[Further Particulars]

With respect to any matter concerning which the Government shall state in its bill of particulars that its knowledge or information is incomplete, the Government will state whatever knowledge and information it may have and furnish each defendant further particulars within ten days after it shall have obtained further knowledge or information.

[Resubmission]

The foregoing rulings will supply a large part of the information requested by other defendants. Insofar as particulars are asked by other defendants which have not been specifically granted or denied above, inspection indicates that counsel for the Government and the respective requesting defendants can apply the principles upon which the above rulings have been made and reach the result which I would have reached had I passed upon them. Insofar as this proves impossible the matter may be resubmitted to me.

V. Motion for Leave to Make Further Motions

[Motion Deadline]

Defendants move for leave to make further motions with respect to this indictment, after the Government's compliance with any requirement of this decision concerning bills of particulars and discovery and inspection, and at any time before trial. Judge Palmieri fixed May 7, 1959, as the last day for making motions and this was extended to May 14, 1959 by Judge Murphy. The motions just disposed of were made within the time so fixed. The time to make motions has expired and no cogent reason has been advanced why I should grant further permission at this time. I disagree with defendants' contention that Rule 12(b)(2) F. R. Crim. P. which provides that "failure of the indictment * * * to charge an offense shall be noticed by the court at any time during the pendency of the proceeding" permits defendants to disregard a direction of the court that such motions in advance of trial shall be made on or prior to a certain date.

Settle order on notice.

Case No. 1338 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Export and Import Control—Price Fixing.—Exporters of Japanese wire nails were each prohibited by a consent decree from (1) agreeing with any other person to fix prices at which importers sell such nails in the United States, and (2) agreeing with any importer to fix prices at which any other importer buys such nails. Also, the importers were each prohibited from agreeing with the other importers or with any other person to fix prices at which importers either buy or sell Japanese wire nails.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.718, 2011.181, 3015.20.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Practices Prohibited—Export and Import Control—Allocation of Markets and Customers.—Exporters of Japanese wire nails to the United States were each prohibited by a consent decree from agreeing with any other person to allocate sales territories in the United States among importers. Also, importers of such nails into the United States were each prohibited from agreeing with the other importers or with any other person to allocate sales territories in the United States.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.468, 2005.718.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Export and Import Control—Sale Control.—Exporters of Japanese wire nails to the United States were each prohibited by a consent decree from agreeing with any importer to determine the amount of such nails to be sold in the United States. Also, the importers were each prohibited from agreeing with any other person to determine the amounts to be sold in the United States or in any sales territory therein.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.718, 2005.760.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Export and Import Control—Discriminations.—Exporters of Japanese wire nails to the United States were each prohibited by a consent decree from discriminating in the sale of such nails in favor of defendant-importers by making available to them quantities, prices, or terms and conditions of sale which were not available to other importers. Also, the importers were each prohibited from purchasing such nails from any defendant-exporter with knowledge that it was discriminating among importers in violation of the decree.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.630, 2005.718.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Export and Import Control—Exclusive Dealing.—Importers of Japanese wire nails to the United States were each prohibited by a consent decree from accepting an exclusive or semi-exclusive arrangement for the purchase or sale of such nails.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.690.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Export and Import Control—Refusal to Deal.—Exporters of Japanese wire nails to the United States were each prohibited by a consent decree from (1) agreeing with any importer to determine which exporters in Japan should be permitted or not permitted to sell to importers, and to hinder or prevent any importer from buying or selling Japanese wire nails, (2) agreeing with any other person to designate which persons would be permitted to act as importers, and (3) refusing, in furtherance of certain agreements prohibited by the decree, to sell to importers financially able to purchase Japanese wire nails. Also, the importers were each prohibited from (1) agreeing with any other person to determine which persons should buy or distribute such nails in the United States and to hinder or prevent any person from buying or selling such nails in the United States and (2) urging or suggesting to any Japanese rod-maker, nail-maker, or exporter that he refuse to sell to any person in the United States.

Final Judgment

George B. Harris, District Judge [In full text]: The Plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on April 25, 1957, and the defendants signatory hereto having appeared through their respective attorneys herein and having filed their answers denying the substantive allegations of the complaint; the parties signatory hereto through their respective attorneys having consented to the entry of this Final Judgment without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without any admission by any party hereto with respect to any such issue;

Now, Therefore, before the taking of any testimony and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein and upon the consent of the parties hereto, it is hereby Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed, as follows:

[I]

[Jurisdiction]

This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and of the parties signatory hereto. The complaint states claims for relief against the defendants signatory hereto under Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, as amended, and under Section 73 of the Act of Congress of August 27, 1894, c. 349, 28 Stat. 509, as amended, entitled "An Act To reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government and for other purposes," commonly known as the Wilson Tariff Act.

II

[Definitions]

As used herein:

(A) "Japanese wire nails" means bright common nails, bright smooth box nails, bright casing nails, and bright finishing nails manufactured in Japan by Japanese nail-makers;

(B) "Person" means an individual, partnership, firm, association, corporation, or any other legal entity;

(C) "Importers" means persons engaged in the business of purchasing or acquiring nails from Japanese nail-makers or exporters for resale to wholesalers located on the West Coast of the United States; a Japanese exporter who is engaged in the activity of selling nails in the United States directly to such wholesalers is an importer with respect to such sales;

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

(D) "Japanese exporters" mean persons and their agents, subsidiaries or affiliates in the United States, who arrange for the export of Japanese wire nails to importers;

(E) "Japanese rod-makers" means steel mills located in Japan which manufacture wire rod from which Japanese wire nails are made;

(F) "Japanese nail-makers" means nail manufacturers located in Japan who manufacture wire nails from wire rod purchased from Japanese rod-makers;

(G) "Defendant importers" means defendants R. P. Oldham Company, Winter Wolff & Co., Inc., Thos. D. Stevenson & Sons, Inc., Balfour Guthrie & Co., Limited, and John P. Herber & Company, Inc.;

(H) "Defendant exporters" means Kinoshita and Co., Ltd., U. S. A., the Nissho California Corporation, Mitsubishi International Corporation, Ataka New York, Inc., Sumitomo Shoji Kaisha, Ltd., Daiichi Bussan Kaisha, Ltd., and Mitsui Bussan Kaisha, Ltd.

III

[Applicability]

The provisions of this Final Judgment applicable to the defendants shall apply to the defendants signatory hereto and to their successors, assigns, affiliates, subsidiaries, officers, directors, servants, employees, and agents, and to all persons in active concert or participation with such a defendant who receive actual notice of this Final Judgment by personal service or otherwise.

IV

[Prohibited Agreements—Exporters]

Each defendant exporter signatory hereto is enjoined and restrained from directly or indirectly entering into, adhering to or claiming any rights under any agreement or understanding, or in concert with any other person maintaining any plan or program:

(A) To allocate sales territories in the United States among importers with respect to Japanese wire nails;

(B) To fix, establish or stabilize prices at which importers sell Japanese wire nails in the United States;

(C) To select or designate what person or persons should be permitted to act as an importer or as importers.

For the purpose of this Section IV only, a defendant exporter and its parent Japanese corporation, or a defendant exporter and any Japanese business firm affiliated with it for whom it regularly acts as agent or representative in the sale and distribution of Japanese wire nails in the United States shall be deemed to be a single person, provided that nothing contained in this paragraph shall make a defendant exporter liable for any separate act of such Japanese parent or affiliated business firm.

V

[Discriminating Against Importers]

Each defendant exporter signatory hereto is enjoined and restrained from:

(A) Entering into, participating in or enforcing any contract, agreement or understanding with any importer:

(1) To select or determine what importers should be permitted or not permitted to buy Japanese wire nails;

(2) to select or determine what exporters in Japan should be permitted or not permitted to sell Japanese wire nails to importers;

(3) to hinder, restrict, limit or prevent any importer from buying or selling Japanese wire nails;

(4) to determine or fix the amount of Japanese wire nails to be sold in the United States;

(5) to fix, establish or stabilize prices at which any other importer buys Japanese wire nails;

(B) Discriminating in the sale of Japanese wire nails in favor of defendant importers against other importers by making available to the former quantities, prices or terms and conditions of sale not available to the latter.

(C) For the purpose of furthering, directly or indirectly, any agreement or understanding prohibited by Section IV or by subsection V(A) of this Final Judgment:

(1) Refusing to sell Japanese wire nails, to the extent they are available, to any importer financially able to purchase such nails; and

(2) Discriminating in the sale or in the terms and conditions of sale of Japanese wire nails among importers.

VI

[Prohibited Agreement—Importers]

Each defendant importer signatory hereto is enjoined and restrained from entering into, adhering to, maintaining or furthering directly or indirectly, or claiming any rights under, any agreement, understanding, plan, program or common course of action among themselves or with any other person:

(A) To select or determine what persons shoud buy or distribute Japanese wire nails in the United States;

(B) To hinder, restrict, limit or prevent any person from buying or selling Japanese wire nails in the United States;

(C) To allocate sales territories in the United States with respect to Japanese wire nails;

(D) To fix, establish or stabilize prices at which importers buy Japanese wire nails;

(E) To fix, establish or stabilize prices at which importers sell Japanese wire nails; and

(F) To determine or fix the amount of Japanese wire nails to be sold in the United States or in any sales territory in the United States.

VII

[Refusal to Sell—Exclusive Dealing]

Each defendant importer signatory hereto is enjoined and restrained from:

(A) Urging or suggesting, directly or indirectly, to any Japanese rod-maker, Japanese nail-maker, or Japanese exporter that such rod-maker, nail-maker or exporter refuse to sell wire rods or wire nails to any person or group of persons in the United States;

(B) Accepting any exclusive or semi-exclusive agency or other exclusive or semi-exclusive arrangement for the purchase or sale of Japanese wire nails; and

(C) Purchasing any Japanese wire nails from any defendant exporter, knowing that such exporter is not complying with subsection B of Section V hereof.

VIII

[Notice of Judgment]

Within 30 days after the entry of this Final Judgment, defendant Kinoshita and Co., Ltd., U. S. A. shall mail a copy thereof to each of the persons listed in Appendix I hereto [not reproduced].

IX

For the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to defendants made to their principal office, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege:

(A) Access, during office hours of defendants, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of defendants relating to any matters contained in this Final Judgment.

(B) Subject to the reasonable convenience of defendants and without restraint or interference from defendants, to interview officers or employees of defendants, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters.

Upon such written request, defendants shall submit such reports in writing with respect to the matters contained in this Final Judgment as may from time to time be necessary to the enforcement of this Final Judgment.

No information obtained by the means permitted in this Section IX shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department of Justice except in the course of legal proceedings in which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment or as otherwise required by law.

X

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction is retained by this Court for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this Final Judgment to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this Final Judgment, for the amendment or modification of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith, and for the punishment of violations thereof.

[¶ 69,456] United States v. Ford Motor Company.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Criminal No. 807-58. Dated April 30, 1959.

Case No. 1409 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Sufficiency of Allegations of Indictment—Motion for Bill of Particulars—Evidentiary Matters—Matters Within Defendant's Own Knowledge—Overt Acts.—An automobile manufacturer charged with conspiring to fix the prices at which its dealers sold parts and accessories in the Washington, D. C., metropolitan area was granted a request for particulars as to whether the alleged conspiracy was express or implied, oral or written, since it was entitled to know the "nature of the offense." The Government could disclose that without revealing any of its evidentiary material. All of the manufacturer's other requests, however, were denied on the ground that they called for a disclosure of evidentiary matter. The manufacturer sought particulars as to (1) the formation of the alleged conspiracy, (2) its own entrance into the alleged conspiracy, (3) the means and methods allegedly employed by it in carrying out the claimed conspiracy, and (4) the period of time in which it allegedly continued in the conspiracy. In situations involving widespread conspiracies, there could be a need for a disclosure of dates, places, and persons involved. Here, however, the situation was not one dealing with branches of corporations spread throughout the country; instead, the alleged conspiracy was small as to the number of parties and size of the area involved. Thus, certain of the information sought was within the defendant's own knowledge or could be readily ascertained by investigation. While a defendant is presumed innocent and thus ignorant of the crime charged, that presumption was not changed by requiring the manufacturer to take notice of its own business activities. The court also noted that since proof of overt acts is unnecessary in a conspiracy action, any disclosure thereof would be a revelation of the Government's evidence.

Memorandum Opinion

[Indictment]

Edward A. Tamm, District Judge [In full text]: The indictment returned in this case on September 3, 1958, named this defendant and seventeen others with having violated Section 3 of Title 15, United States Code, this section being a portion of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. All other defendants have previously entered pleas of nolo contendere and are now out of this case as defendants but remain as co-conspirators.

[Bill of Particulars]

The defendant Ford Motor Company has filed a motion for a bill of particulars pursuant to Rule 7(f) (Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure) relating to Count Three of the indictment in this case, this defendant having been named in Count Three only. Its requests for particulars, of which there are seven, may be classified under four main groups; namely, particulars as to the formation of the alleged conspiracy, particulars as to the entrance of this defendant into the alleged conspiracy, the means and methods employed by this defendant in carrying out the alleged conspiracy, and the period of time in which this defendant allegedly continued in the conspiracy.

[Government's Opposition]

The Government, in its opposition to the foregoing motion, states: (1) that all requests should be denied because they call for a disclosure of evidentiary material; (2) that requests 1, 1a, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7a and 7b should be denied for these are matters which are peculiarly or equally within the knowledge of the defendant or which it has equal opportunity to discover; (3) that the information sought by requests 3, 4, 5, and 7a are, in effect, requests asking for particulars of overt acts in pursuance of the conspiracy and that the Government should not be required to furnish these, and (4) that the information sought by requests 7, 7a and 7b may be obtained from a reading of the indictment itself.

[Nature of Act Charged]

Request 1 of the defendant is as follows:

"(1) Specify the nature of the agreement or conspiracy alleged in Count Three, i.e., whether express or implied, oral or written.

(a) If express, specify the time, place and circumstances of the formation of the alleged agreement and the names of all persons who are claimed to have joined in its formation.

(b) If implied, specify each act allegedly performed by any defendant, including the names of all persons alleged to have performed such act, from which the formation or existence of the alleged agreement is inferred or implied.

(c) To the extent written, identify all documents alleged to embody or set forth the terms of the alleged agreement, specifying the dates and parties to all such documents.

(d) To the extent oral, specify the time, place and names of persons participating in each conversation through which the alleged agreement is claimed to have been formed and the substance of what was said."

[Evidentiary Material Sought]

The defendant has cited authority for the proposition that it has the right to know the nature of the act complained of (United States v. Balaban, 26 F. Supp. 491; United States v. Allegheny Retail Druggists Assn. [1952 Trade Cases ¶ 67,274], 12 F. R. D. 249; United States v. MacLeod Bureau, 6 F. R. D. 590), that is, whether it was express or implied, oral or written. It would seem to be fair and consistent with the purpose of a bill of particulars that the defendant be informed of the nature of the offense. The Government could disclose this without revealing any of its evidentiary material. Of course, it does not follow that requests 1(a) through 1(d) should be granted, as this would be a disclosure of the evidence upon which the Government intends to rely. The defendant does have some authority that evidentiary material may be disclosed when justice necessitates it, United States v. Balaban, 26 F. Supp. 491, but this Court does not believe that justice necessitates the disclosure of evidence in this case, and such disclosure would follow if requests 1(a) through 1(d) were granted.

Finally, once the defendant is made aware of the nature of the offense, it would seem that such other particulars as it desires would be matters which it has in its own knowledge, or to which it has access.

Request number 2 asks for,

"the time, place and the names of the officers, or employees through whom it is claimed that defendant Ford Motor Company entered into the alleged agreement or conspiracy. State the names of all other persons who were present at such time and place."

[Size of Conspiracy Charged]

The Government has pointed out, quite correctly, that this alleged conspiracy—both in the number of parties comprising it and area size—is small, by comparison, to many of the factual situations revealed in the cases cited by the defendant where such information was divulged. This case, however, is not a situation that deals with branches of corporations that are spread throughout the country or even over a few states. In such a situation as the latter, it could possibly be understood that there could be a need or showing for names, times and places in order to apprise the defendants of what they should know. The belief of the Court in this case is best expressed by the following:

"A corporation can act only through its officers and agents, and appellant company at all times knew the names of its officers, agents, and employees. It also knew the scope of the authority of each of such persons. The names and various acts of such persons were peculiarly within the knowledge of appellant company. The trial court did not abuse its discretion, and the motion for a bill of particulars was properly overruled." Zito v. United States, 64 F. 2d 772-3.

Request number 3 is directed to paragraphs 30(b) and 30(e) of the indictment. Paragraph 30 of the indictment states the substantial terms of the combination and conspiracy, parts (b) and (e) thereof being two of the terms. Part (b) is:

"To sell Ford parts and accessories to purchasers classified by defendant Ford dealers as authorized wholesale purchasers at the suggested wholesale list prices established by the Ford Motor Company."

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Part (e) is:

"To utilize a Ford Parts Identification Card Program for the purpose of insuring that only persons classified as authorized wholesale purchasers would be permitted to purchase parts at the suggested wholesale list prices established by the Ford Motor Company."

In connection with these two sub-paragraphs, the defendant desires to know:

"The time, place and nature of each act allegedly performed by the Ford Motor Company, including the names of officers and employees through whom it is alleged to have acted, in connection with the alleged classification of purchasers of parts and accessories from defendant dealers and the alleged utilization of a Ford Parts Identification Card Program in this regard."

Requests four and five are similar to request three, except that request four refers to paragraph 30(d) and deals with the "alleged establishment of a uniform maximum discount in the sale of parts and accessories to insurance companies by defendant dealers," and request number five refers to paragraphs 30(b), (c) and (f) and deals with

"the alleged agreement that defendant dealers would sell parts and accessories only at suggested list prices and grant no discounts from such prices, except in sales to insurance companies, in which case no discounts in excess of 15 per cent of the retail list price would be granted."

[Matters Within Defendant's Own Knowledge]

It seems to be quite obvious to this Court that this information which the defendant desires is within its own knowledge, or is readily ascertainable. The defendant relies upon the case of United States v. Smith, 16 F. R. D. 372, among others. In the Smith case, Judge Whittaker stated:

"Nor is it any answer to a motion for a bill of particulars to say: 'The defendant knows what he did, and, therefore, has all the information necessary.' This argument could be valid only if the defendant be presumed to be guilty. For only if he is presumed guilty could he know the facts and details of the crime. Instead of being presumed guilty, he is presumed to be innocent. Being presumed to be innocent, it must be assumed 'that he is ignorant of the facts on which the pleader founds his charges.' [Citing cases] This conclusion seems to me to be elementary, fundamental and inescapable." (Italics supplied by that Court)

The wisdom of the reasoning of the Court in the above cited case is not questioned; however, the case of United States v. Greater Pittsburgh Linen Supply Assn., et al. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,725], 10 F. R. D. 585, seems to be more appropriate in this case. At page 586 of that case, there is the following:

"Moreover, most of the data requested should be within the knowledge of the defendants and of the Association, or its officers and agents, to whom each defendant member has or should have access; or it should be found among the records of the Association, which each member should be able to examine. From the detail already appearing in the indictment, no defendant should be prejudicially surprised if inquiry is made with reasonable diligence among the members of this Association.

"Whether the Association or its members participated in the conspiracy as charged in the indictment is peculiarly within their knowledge. If defendants did not so conspire, they can readily defend against the charge so made."

[Indictment as Basis for Defendant's Own Investigation]

This Court does not believe that the effect of the presumption of innocence is changed by requiring the defendant to take notice of its own business activities, investigate and ascertain from such investigation, the information which it seeks in requests three, four and five. Also, there appears to be sufficient detail in the indictment to serve as a basis upon which the defendant may investigate and determine the information by itself which it seeks through these three requests.

Request number six asks for the "means and method by which it is claimed that the conspiracy or agreement alleged in Count Three was carried out or sought to be carried out."

The language of the Court in the case of United States v. Van Wagenensager, 34 F. Supp. 735, is particularly appropriate in regard to this request. In that case, the defendants were charged with a conspiracy to violate the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. The Court states at page 735:

> "The demands for particulars can be classed as requiring the time and place of the formation of the conspiracy; all acts of the co-conspirators tending to connect each of them to the alleged conspiracy and the names of those stated in the indictment as being 'to the Grand Jurors unknown,' * * * The Government is not compelled, either by indictment or bill of particulars, to define the specific means employed in committing the offense. Moreover, I do not see how the Government could comply with the demands as framed, without injurious disclosure of its evidence."

The last request of the defendant, number seven, seeks information as to "whether it is claimed that defendant Ford Motor Company participated in the alleged carrying out or continuation of the agreement or conspiracy charged in Count Three." If the answer is in the affirmative, it then desires to know (a) the time, place and nature of each alleged act or participation, or act from which such participation is inferred, along with the names of officers and employees through whom the acts were allegedly performed, and (b) the period of such participation.

Part (a) of this request must be denied upon the same grounds as requests three, four and five were denied. Part (b) relating to the period of participation may obviously be obtained from a reading of the indictment, as the Government has already pointed out.

[Overt Acts]

One remaining point should be made, and that is, that in a case of this type, overt acts need not be alleged or furnished. To require a disclosure of overt acts would be a revelation of the evidence upon which the Government intends to rely. Also, the crime charged is a conspiracy—nothing else. In the case of United States v. MacLeod Bureau, et al., 6 F. R. D. 590, 592, the defendants were indicted for violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. The Court, in treating the motions for bills of particulars, stated:

> "Particulars should not be required as to matters made clear in the indictment, nor matters which are not necessary to be proved by the Government in order to gain a conviction. Thus in the present case, it is unnecessary for the Government to prove any overt act was committed by the defendants or any of them in carrying out their alleged conspiracies. Such overt acts are merely evidence and the government should not be called upon to supply the defendants with its evidence so as to unduly limit the government's proof. United States v. General Electric Company, D. C., 40 F. Supp. 627."

[Motion Denied in Part]

This Court also feels that all the requests, except number one, should be denied on the ground that they call for a disclosure of evidentiary matter. True, the defendant has cited authority to the effect that when justice necessitates it, the information requested by way of a bill of particulars will be furnished even if it requires the disclosure of evidentiary material. This Court in this case does not believe that justice requires a disclosure of the material requested by the defendant nor has any sufficient basis for such disclosure been advanced by the defendant.

Counsel will submit the necessary order to effectuate the rulings of this memorandum opinion.

ment questionnaires seeking information relating to economic factors and competitive forces in the industry were not privileged from discovery. As to the "lawyers' work product" privilege, no "new" invasion of the "thoughts" of the Government's attorneys would result, since the questions contained in the questionnaires had already been revealed and the only "work" to be protected was the largely clerical task of circulating and receiving the questionnaires. Further, production was sought only as to writings of witnesses and no attempt was made to examine any statement, memoranda, or note prepared by any attorney. In addition, the Government had allegedly sent the questionnaires to more than 1500 companies of unknown identity; therefore, it was not a case where the moving party knew the specific witnesses and could interview them itself. As to the alleged absence of "good cause" for the production of the replies, that objection is interdependent with the claim of "privilege," that is, when the "privilege" claim is weak, the required showing of good cause is lessened.

Also, there was no merit in the Government's claim of the "so-called informer's privilege." The function of that privilege is to prevent reprisals against persons who have reported violations of law. Here, the writings sought related only to the question of whether present market conditions warranted modification of the consent decree. Hence, the companies which answered the Government's questionnaires, thereby reporting on the volume and operations of their businesses, did not "inform" in any ordinary sense of that term.

Memorandum of Decision on Defendants' Motion to Produce

[Replies to Government "Questionnaires" Sought]

HOFFMAN, District Judge [In full text]: The defendants, petitioners for modification of a consent decree previously entered in government antitrust proceedings, have moved under Rule 34, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, for the production of

> "copies of all writings from any person, firm or corporation . . . received by the plaintiff [government] in answer to questionnaires or inquiries of the plaintiff. . . ."

Copies of the questionnaires and inquiries are appended to the motion.

[Government Opposition]

The plaintiff resists the motion upon three grounds. First, it is argued that the writings sought are privileged from discovery as the work product of the lawyer within the meaning of the opinion in Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495 (1946). Second, the plaintiff submits that the defendants have failed to show good cause for production as required by Rule 34. Third, it is claimed that the communications are privileged as information supplied to a law enforcement agency of the government.

[Good Cause—Privilege of Lawyer's "Work Product"]

The first two grounds of objection are related. Under the principles laid down in the Hickman case, the privilege of the lawyer's files is not absolute. If good cause is shown, disclosure may be compelled even though the attorney's privacy is thereby invaded. 329 U. S., at 512. The questions of the work-product privilege and good cause may therefore be considered together.

The crux of this qualified privilege is the protection of the lawyer's mental processes, his strategy, and his legal theories evolved in preparation for trial, free from unnecessary intrusion by the opposing party. This protection does not extend to all information supplied to the attorney at his request. "A party clearly cannot refuse to answer interrogatories on the ground that the information sought is solely within the knowledge of his attorney." Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495, at 504 (1946). Statements or reports made in the ordinary course of business and not in preparation for trial do not embody the lawyer's opinions, tactics, or conclusions, and accordingly they do not enjoy the privilege afforded the attorney's work. Speaking of such cases, Professor Moore observes:

> "The Supreme Court decision clearly authorizes, if it does not require, these holdings. The policy against invasion of 'the files and the mental impressions of an attorney' is not applicable, and, that absent, the Court made it clear that discovery is to be liberally allowed and that 'either party may compel the other to disgorge whatever facts he has in his possession.'" [4 Moore, Federal Practice 1135-36 (2d ed. 1950)]

[No "New" Invasion]

Here the written statements sought were concededly obtained in preparation for trial. But it does not appear that production would involve any new or substantial invasion of the thoughts of plaintiff's attorneys. The questionnaires and inquiries which elicited the written responses at issue have already been revealed to the defendants. Compilations of the information contained in the various answers were disclosed in part in the materials previously submitted to support the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment.

[Witnesses' Writings Only]

The motion to produce is confined to writings by the witnesses, and no attempt is made to examine any statement, memoranda, or note prepared by any attorney. In this respect the situation differs from that before the Court in the Hickman case itself, where the moving party made a broad demand for statements prepared by the lawyer, for his private memoranda containing facts learned by him, and for his recollection of oral interviews with witnesses. Since the defendants have limited their motion to statements in writing prepared and supplied by the witnesses, it is unnecessary to decide upon the scope of the privilege in protecting reports and memoranda prepared by agents other than the attorney himself.

[Clerical Tasks]

The information here at issue can be called the lawyer's work product only in a qualified and attenuated sense. The privacy of counsel's mental processes is not at stake. Since the questions asked by the plaintiff have already been disclosed, the only "work" of the plaintiff to be protected are the largely clerical tasks of circulation and receipt of the questionnaires.

[Protracted Cases—Full Disclosure]

The trial of this case promises to be complex and protracted. The information sought by the defendants relates to economic conditions, the state of the market, and competitive forces in the meat and related foods industry. Such compilations of data can be adequately appraised and weighed only if their foundations can be tested. In such a case, the policy of full disclosure must control if litigation is to be manageable. The Report of the Committee on Procedure in Anti-Trust and Other Protracted Cases, adopted by the Judicial Conference of the United States and reported at 13 F. R. D. 62-84, states:

> "Unless it is impossible for some compelling reason, the parties to these cases should be required to exchange prior to trial copies of proposed exhibits. The advantages of such exchange in preventing delay and volume of record in the trial are obvious. Before such a case is called for trial each side should be advised fully as to the material which his opponent proposes to offer. [13 F. R. D., at 69]

As noted by the Supreme Court,

> "The deposition-discovery procedure simply advances the stage at which the disclosure can be compelled from the time of trial to the period preceding it, thus reducing the possibility of surprise." Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495, at 507.

[Difficulty of Acquiring Information]

This is not a case where specific witnesses with personal knowledge are equally known to the moving party, who could interview them himself. It is stated that a vast number of companies, in excess of 1500, received the questionnaires sent by the government, but their identities are not known. The case is therefore unlike United States v. Deere & Co. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,572], 9 F. R. D. 523 (D. Minn. 1949), where the government's questionnaire was sent to the defendant's own dealers. To compel these defendants to send a duplicate questionnaire would be time-consuming and expensive, and would not provide a sound basis for analyzing the statistical results of the plaintiff's survey or assaying its probative force.

[Relevance]

In the course of the Hickman opinion, the Court observed:

> "Where relevant and non-privileged facts remain hidden in an attorney's file and where production of those facts is essential to the preparation of one's case, discovery may properly be had. Such written statements and documents might, under certain circumstances, be admissible in evidence or give clues as to the existence or location of relevant facts. Or they might be useful for purposes of impeachment or corroboration. And production might be justified where the witnesses are no longer available or can be reached only with difficulty. Were production of written statements and documents to be precluded under such circumstances, the liberal ideals of the deposition-discovery portions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure would be stripped of much of their meaning. But the general policy against invading the privacy of an attorney's course of preparation is so well recognized and so essential to an orderly working of our system of legal procedure that a burden rests on the one who would invade that privacy to establish adequate reasons to justify production through a subpoena or court order. That burden, we believe, is necessarily implicit in the rules as now constituted." [329 U. S., at 511-12]

[Balancing Competing Interests]

Here the information requested is relevant and undoubtedly useful to the defendants in preparation for trial. It is not privileged as a communication from client to attorney. The privilege of the lawyer's work product and the showing of good cause sufficient to overcome it are interdependent, and when, as here, the factors supporting the claim of privilege are weak, the requisite showing of good cause is correspondingly lessened. There is disagreement among the lower courts on questions of this sort. Compare Durkin v. Pet Milk Co., 14 F. R. D. 385 (W. D. Ark. 1953), allowing production, with United States v. Deere & Co. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,572], 9 F. R. D. 523 (D. Minn. 1949), denying discovery. But neither decision is directly in point. In the last analysis, the determination must rest upon the balance struck in the particulars of a concrete case between the competing interests of full disclosure and protection for the fruits of the lawyer's labor. In the light of the importance of the information to the merits of the litigation, the difficulties confronting defendants' efforts to acquire the needed information for themselves, and the relatively inconsequential prejudice to the plaintiff, the objection to the motion on this ground must be overruled.

["Informer's Privilege"]

The plaintiff's claim of the so-called informer's privilege also lacks merit. The function of that privilege is principally to prevent reprisals and recrimination against persons who have reported violations of law to an appropriate law enforcement agency. As stated in Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53 (1957):

> "The scope of the privilege is limited by its underlying purpose. Thus, where the disclosure of the contents of a communication will not tend to reveal the identity of an informer, the contents are not privileged. Likewise, once the identity of the informer has been disclosed to those who would have cause to resent the communication, the privilege is no longer applicable." [353 U. S., at 60]

[Companies Did Not "Inform"]

Extending the logic of this reasoning, the privilege has no application where the information supplied does not relate to the commission of some unlawful act or is not of the kind to excite resentment. Here the fact of commission of an offense was established by consent a number of years ago. The statements at issue relate not to that fact, but to the question whether market conditions today warrant modification of the decree. The companies which supplied the statements reported on the volume and operations of their businesses, and did not "inform" in any ordinary meaning of that term.

Referring again to the opinion in the Roviaro case, supra, the Supreme Court teaches that no absolute privilege can be claimed:

> "We believe that no fixed rule with respect to disclosure is justifiable. The problem is one that calls for balancing the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the individual's right to prepare his defense. Whether a proper balance renders nondisclosure erroneous must depend on the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors." [353 U. S., at 62]

[Government Secrecy—No General Right]

The government enjoys no general right to withhold information from an opposing litigant. Secrecy must be predicated upon the specific claim of some privilege based upon considerations peculiar to the operations of government or the government must conform to the rules governing private parties. Mitchell v. Bass, 252 F. 2d 513 (8 Cir. 1958); Durkin v. Pet Milk Co., 14 F. R. D. 385 (W. D. Ark. 1953).

> "Likewise, it does not rest well with the government to insist upon withholding such information merely on the theory that disclosure would have an untoward effect on the government's case from the point of view of a litigant." Fowkes v. Dravo Corporation, 5 F. R. D. 51 (E. D. Pa. 1945).

[Discovery Granted]

The defendants' motion will accordingly be granted.

[¶ 69,458] United States v. The Procter & Gamble Company, et al.

In the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. Civil Action No. 1196-52. Filed August 14, 1959.

Case No. 1150 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Suit for Injunctive Relief —Use of Grand Jury Process to Elicit Evidence in Civil Case—Continuation of Grand Jury Proceedings After Decision Not to Seek Indictment—Misuse of Grand Jury Process. —The Government's production of witnesses before a grand jury after the United States Attorney General had decided not to ask for the return of an indictment constituted a misuse of the grand jury process. In U. S. v. Procter & Gamble Co., 1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,046, the United States Supreme Court referred to the use of "criminal procedures to elicit evidence in a civil case" as a "flouting of the policy of the law." Thus, a belief of a prosecuting official that he was acting according to law in continuing the grand jury proceedings after the decision not to seek an indictment "in nowise derogates from the fact that this use by the Government of the Grand Jury, a solely criminal instrumentality, for a purpose which had been decided to be of a purely civil character, was clearly a misuse, and thus an abuse, of the law."

As to the Government's contention that the Attorney General's decision did not suffice to terminate the use of the grand jury as a "criminal procedure," there was no suggestion that the grand jury here was a "runaway" grand jury. Further, the complexity of antitrust cases virtually requires the Government's control of the grand jury proceedings. Since a determination by the Attorney General controls his subordinates and practically controls the grand jury, any further procedure with the grand jury, after his decision not to seek an indictment, was either insubordinate or illegal. Also, it was immaterial that the subpoenas for the witnesses called thereafter had been issued prior to the decision not to proceed criminally, since that decision terminated the right of the Department of Justice to take testimony under those subpoenas.

Opinion II on Use of Grand Jury Transcript

[Decision Not to Seek Indictment—Continuation of Grand Jury Proceedings]

HARTSHORNE, District Judge [In full text]: In accordance with the opinion of this Court, filed June 9, 1959 [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,385], directing the Department of Justice to answer the Special Interrogatories filed by defendants herein concerning the Grand Jury investigation which preceded the institution of this civil case, plaintiff, over objection, filed answers thereto, indicating in substance that on November 14, 1952, the then Attorney General decided not to ask for the return of an indictment by the Grand Jury, upon the basis of the evidence previously taken before that body. Defendants accordingly asked this Court to find that there had been an abuse of the Grand Jury process, within the meaning of the opinion of the United States Supreme Court filed in this cause June 2, 1958 [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,046] (356 U. S. 677, 683), by the Government's production of certain witnesses before the Grand Jury on and after November 14, 1952.

[Absence of Intent to Violate Law]

Plaintiff still claims that, despite the above facts, this Court should not find that there has been any such abuse of process, because the Department of Justice did not knowingly intend to violate the law, and because the mere decision by the Attorney General of the United States not to use the Grand Jury proceedings for criminal purposes did not itself bring such proceedings to a halt, and the testimony thereafter taken by the Government before the Grand Jury was under subpoenas issued some time previously.

The above contentions by plaintiff Government seem based upon a misunderstanding of the United States Supreme Court's above opinion, in alluding to the prosecution's "flouting of the policy of the law", p. 683, "when the criminal procedure is subverted", p. 684, by the Government's "using criminal procedures to elicit evidence in a civil case", p. 683, in taking evidence before a Grand Jury—a purely criminal procedure —when it had no intention of using such evidence in other than a purely civil case. Obviously what the Supreme Court had in mind in alluding to this flouting of the law and subversion of the criminal procedure was the misuse of a purely criminal instrumentality, the Grand Jury, in bringing a purely civil proceeding. This misuse or abuse therefore occurred whether the action of the Government official in charge of same was knowingly unlawful, or, on the contrary, was based in fact upon his belief that in so doing he was acting according to law. In fact, as this Court's earlier opinion shows, it had doubtless been the long continued practice and belief of the United States Department of Justice, before the filing of the above opinion of the United States Supreme Court in this case, that it had the legal right to use the Grand Jury for civil purposes, at least if at the start it had a possible criminal purpose in mind. On the other hand, this belief of this official in nowise derogates from the fact that this use by the Government of the Grand Jury, a solely criminal instrumentality, for a purpose which had been decided to be of a purely civil character, was clearly a misuse, and thus an abuse, of the law.

[Termination of "Criminal Procedure"—Sufficiency of Attorney General's Decision]

We turn to the second contention of the Department of Justice, that its decision on November 14, 1952 not to proceed criminally, upon the basis of the testimony previously taken before the Grand Jury, did not suffice to terminate the use of the Grand Jury as a criminal procedure, and that therefore the testimony taken thereafter was properly taken as the continued use of criminal procedure. It is, of course, possible for such a situation to occur, as by a "runaway" Grand Jury, a situation to which this Court also alluded in its previous opinion in this regard. Here, however, the Government does not so much as intimate that any such situation existed, and, of course, must admit that, as the former opinion says, in an antitrust case its complexity "virtually requires the careful, long continued control of the Grand Jury proceedings by the Government itself." Thus a determination by the Attorney General of the United States, which, of course, controls his subordinates, in turn practically controls the Grand Jury. Hence any further procedure by the subordinates with the Grand Jury is therefore either insubordinate, of which there is no claim, or illegal, in the light of the above opinion of the United States Supreme Court. Nor is it material that the subpoenas for the witnesses, called after November 14, 1952, had been issued previously thereto. The right of the Department of Justice to proceed under these subpoenas to take further testimony had been terminated by the action of the Attorney General.

[Objection Overruled]

Plaintiff's objection to the finding of this Court that in this cause there had been a flouting of the policy of the law and a subversion or abuse of the Grand Jury process is overruled, and an order may be entered accordingly.

In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Civil Action No. 21,743. Filed September 23, 1959.

Case No. 1311 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Television Broadcasting Industry—Practices Enjoined—Coercion—Network's Acquisition of Ownership Interest in Television Broadcasting Stations.—A radio and television manufacturer and its subsidiary, a radio and television network, in a civil action charging them with conspiring to obtain ownership of very high frequency television broadcasting stations in five of the eight largest markets in the United States by unlawfully using the network's power to grant or withhold network affiliation, were each prohibited by a consent decree from coercing any person to sell any ownership in any station by terminating, or refusing to enter into, a network affiliation agreement with any other station controlled by that same person. Unless notice was given to the Government (thereby affording it an opportunity to apply to the court for a determination of whether or not coercion has been used), the defendants were also enjoined from (1) acquiring any substantial ownership interest in any station in any one of seven market areas, or (2) representing stations in their sale of non-network advertising to national advertisers. In an area where they had allegedly acquired radio and television broadcasting facilities by coercion, the defendants were prohibited from acquiring any ownership interest in any television broadcasting station for the duration of the decree, and any ownership interest in any standard (radio) broadcasting station for a period of five years from the entry of the judgment.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.575, 2005.785, 2005.833.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Consent Decree—Specific Relief—Divestment of Interest in Television Broadcasting Stations.—A radio and television manufacturer and its subsidiary, a radio and television network, were ordered by a consent decree to sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of all right, title, and interest in a television broadcasting station and a standard (radio) broadcasting station which the network had allegedly obtained by coercion. The decree also provided that the disposition should be to a person or persons not controlled directly or indirectly by either defendant and in which neither of them had any substantial ownership interest. The decree further provided for the giving of written notice to the Government of the proposed disposition.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8301.10.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Consent Decree—Duration of Decree.—A consent decree entered against a radio and television manufacturer and its subsidiary, a radio and television network, provided for the termination of the decree nine years after the network's compliance with a divestment provision of the decree, but in no event earlier than ten years from the date of the entry of the consent judgment.

Final Judgment

[Consent Decree]

KIRKPATRICK, District Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on December 4, 1956; the defendants having filed their answer to the complaint, denying the substantive allegations thereof; the Supreme Court of the United States having rendered its opinion with respect to the third, fourth and fifth defenses raised by defendants' answer, as reported in United States v. Radio Corporation of America, et al. [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,284], 358 U. S. 334 (1959); and plaintiff and the defendants by their respective attorneys having severally consented to the entry of this Final Judgment without trial or finding on any issue of fact herein, without adjudication by this Final Judgment of any issue of law herein, and without this Final Judgment constituting evidence or an admission by either of them in respect to any such issues;

Now, Therefore, before any testimony has been taken, without trial or finding on any issue of fact herein, without adjudication by this Final Judgment of any issue of law herein, and upon consent of the parties as aforesaid, it is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed, as follows:

I.

[Jurisdiction]

The Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this action and of the parties hereto. Defendants having agreed, solely in order to permit entry of this Final Judgment, to waive the defense asserted by them that the complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted, the Court adjudges that the complaint states claims upon which relief may be granted against the defendants under Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, as amended.

II.

[Definitions]

As used in this Final Judgment:

(A) "Person" means any individual, partnership, corporation, association or other legal entity;

(B) "NBC" means the defendant National Broadcasting Company, Inc.;

(C) "RCA" means the defendant Radio Corporation of America;

(D) "WRCV-TV" and "WRCV" mean, respectively, the television and the standard broadcast stations presently owned by NBC in Philadelphia;

(E) "NBC network affiliation agreement" means an agreement between NBC and the owner of a television broadcast station for affiliation of the station with the television network of NBC;

(F) "Broadcast station" means a station licensed by the Federal Communications Commission in the television or standard broadcast band transmitting signals intended to be received by the general public;

(G) "National spot representation" means representation of a television broadcast station (other than such a station owned directly or indirectly by NBC or RCA) in sales by such station of nonnetwork advertising to national advertisers;

(H) "Television network" means an organization which provides interconnection with, and a national program service to, television broadcast stations not owned by such organization and which sells advertising time to national advertisers in connection with such programs; and

(I) "Market area" means a metropolitan area as defined by the United States Bureau of the Budget in its publication dated June 1959 entitled "Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas"; if new issues of such publication replace the June 1959 issue, the most recent issue shall be used. To determine the population rank of a market area, the population statistics in the most recent issue of "Survey of Buying Power", a publication of the magazine "Sales Management", shall be used. A broadcast station shall be considered to be in a market area if the transmitter of such station is located within a radius of twenty-five miles from the main post office of the principal city in such area.

III.

[Applicability]

The provisions of this Final Judgment applicable to either defendant shall apply to such defendant and to each of its subsidiaries, officers, directors, employees, agents, successors and assigns, and to all other persons in active concert or participation with either such defendant who receive actual notice of this Final Judgment by personal service or otherwise.

IV.

[Coercion—Acquisitions]

NBC, and RCA during any period of time when it directly or indirectly controls or has a substantial ownership interest in a television network, are each enjoined and restrained from:

(A) Coercing or attempting to coerce any person to sell or otherwise transfer any ownership interest in any broadcast station to either defendant, or to any person directly or indirectly controlled by either defendant or in which either defendant directly or indirectly has a substantial ownership interest, by terminating or threatening to terminate or refusing or threatening to refuse to enter into, an NBC network affiliation agreement with any other television broadcast station controlled by the same person or in which such person has a substantial ownership interest;

(B) Acquiring directly or indirectly any substantial ownership interest in any television broadcast station in the market area of New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, Detroit, Boston, San Francisco, or Pittsburgh, unless

(1) defendants shall have given written notice of the proposed acquisition to plaintiff, affording plaintiff opportunity to apply to this Court within thirty days after such notice for a determination by the Court as provided in clause (2) hereof, and

(2) if plaintiff shall have so applied, the Court shall have determined that the consent of the other party to the proposed acquisition was not obtained by acts or conduct of NBC or RCA relating in any way to the negotiations for the proposed acquisition, which acts or conduct constitute either (a) an unreasonable restraint of trade (as to which issue plaintiff shall have the burden of proof) or (b) a violation of subsection (A) of this Section IV (as to which issue the defendants shall have the burden of proof);

Provided, however, that the shifting of a television broadcast station from one channel of the television broadcast band to another channel in the same market area, when such shifting results from a change in allocations by the Federal Communications Commission, shall not be deemed to be the acquiring of an ownership interest in a television broadcast station within the meaning of this subsection (B); and, Provided further, that any party hereto may at any time upon ten days' written notice to the other parties apply to this Court for a modification of the list of the seven market areas specified in this subsection (B), when the list specified, with Philadelphia included, no longer represents the first eight market areas in the United States in terms of population of the respective areas; and

(C) Undertaking the national spot representation of any television broadcast station other than those listed on Exhibit A hereto unless

(1) defendants shall have given written notice of the proposed spot representation to plaintiff, affording plaintiff opportunity to apply to this Court within thirty days after such notice for a determination by the Court as provided in clause (2) hereof, and

(2) if plaintiff shall have so applied, the Court shall have determined that NBC has not coerced the owner of such station to engage NBC for the national spot representation of the station by terminating or threatening to terminate or refusing or threatening to refuse to enter into, an NBC network affiliation agreement with the station sought to be represented or with any other television broadcast station controlled by such owner or in which such owner has a substantial ownership interest, defendants having the burden of proof.

V.

[Divestment Ordered]

Defendants are ordered and directed, on or before December 31, 1962, to sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of all right, title and interest in WRCV-TV and WRCV to a person or persons not controlled directly or indirectly by either defendant and in which neither defendant has any substantial ownership interest.

Such disposition, if accomplished by exchange, shall be an exchange for a station or stations not in the Philadelphia market area and such exchange shall not be effected unless

(1) defendants shall have given written notice of the proposed exchange to plaintiff, affording plaintiff opportunity to apply to this Court within thirty days after such notice for a determination by the Court as provided in clause (2) hereof, and

(2) if plaintiff shall have so applied, the Court shall have determined that the consent of the other party to the proposed exchange was not obtained by acts or conduct of NBC or RCA relating in any way to the negotiations for the proposed exchange, which acts or conduct constitute either (a) an unreasonable restraint of trade (as to which issue plaintiff shall have the burden of proof) or (b) a violation of subsection (A) of Section IV of this Final Judgment (as to which issue the defendants shall have the burden of proof).

If such disposition is accomplished otherwise than by exchange, defendants shall give plaintiff written notice of such proposed disposition at least thirty days prior to filing with the Federal Communications Commission any application for the Commission's consent to such disposition.

NBC and RCA are prohibited from acquiring any ownership interest in any television broadcast station in the Philadelphia market area until this Final Judgment shall terminate and be of no further force and effect.

NBC and RCA are prohibited, for a period of five years from and after the date of entry of this Final Judgment, from acquiring any ownership interest in any standard broadcast station in the Philadelphia market area. Any such acquisition after five years from the date of entry of this Final Judgment shall be subject to the procedure provided in subsection (B) of Section IV of this Final Judgment for acquisition of television broadcast stations in certain market areas.

VI.

[Federal Communications Commission]

Nothing contained in this Final Judgment shall be construed to require this Court to pass upon any transaction of acquisition or exchange by the defendants or any undertaking by them of national spot representation except to the extent expressly stated in subsections (B) and (C) of Section IV and in Section V of this Final Judgment.

Defendants shall not apply to the Federal Communications Commission for consent to any exchange or acquisition subject to the provisions of subsection (B) of Section IV or of Section V of this Final Judgment until after expiration of the time within which plaintiff may apply to this Court for a determination as provided therein or, if plaintiff so applies, until after such determination shall have been rendered by this Court. In the event of an appeal from any determination rendered by this Court pursuant to subsections (B) or (C) of Section IV or Section V of this Final Judgment, defendants shall not, during the pendency of such appeal, consummate the exchange or acquisition involved or undertake the national spot representation involved.

[Compliance]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in Charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to either defendant made to its principal office, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege, (a) reasonable access during the office hours of such defendant to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of such defendant relating to any matters contained in this Final Judgment; and (b) subject to the reasonable convenience of such defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers or employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters. Either defendant, upon the written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in Charge of the Antitrust Division, and upon reasonable notice made to its principal office, shall submit such written reports with respect to any of the matters contained in this Final Judgment as from time to time may be necessary for the enforcement of this Final Judgment. No information obtained by the means provided in this Section VII shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Executive Branch of the United States, except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

VIII.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this Final Judgment, and no one else, to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders or directions as may be necessary or appropriate in relation to the construction of or carrying out of this Final Judgment, for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, and for the purpose of the enforcement of compliance therewith and the punishment of violations thereof.

IX.

[Duration of Decree]

This Final Judgment, and each and every provision hereof, shall terminate and be of no further force and effect nine years after the date upon which NBC finally disposes of all right, title and interest in WRCV-TV and WRCV, but in no event earlier than ten years after the date of entry of this Final Judgment.

tisement of merchandise for sale at "cost plus 5%" or "wholesale plus 10%" does not violate the Utah Unfair Practices Act where the retailer admittedly uses the terms "cost" and "wholesale" to include operating cost markups. Cost is defined by the Act as the retailer's invoice cost, plus freight, cartage, and a markup of 6% in the absence of proof of a lesser proportionate cost of doing business. Also, the minimum lawful "wholesale price" to a retailer would necessarily be the "cost to the wholesaler" as defined by the Act. Hence, the advertisements are not violative of the Act so long as the terms "cost" and "wholesale" include the defined elements.

However, this sort of advertising, although technically lawful under the Unfair Practices Act (because of that Act's unusual definitions), is not so protected under 76-4-1, Utah Code Annotated, 1953 ("Advertising Offenses" provisions of the Utah Penal Code).

Unfair Practices Act—Deceptive Advertising

QUESTIONS

1. Does the advertisement, offer or sale by a retail merchant of his merchandise at "cost plus 5%" or "wholesale plus 10%" violate the Unfair Practices Act where the merchant admittedly uses the terms "cost" and "wholesale" in the sense of invoice cost plus cost of selling of approximately 25-35% in the former and invoice cost plus 0-15% operating cost markup in the latter?

2. Does such advertisement violate the provisions of Section 76-4-1, U. C. A. 1953, pertaining to false, deceptive and misleading advertising?

CONCLUSIONS

1. No.
2. Yes.

[Definitions]

We are asked to give an opinion to the above questions based upon a "legal definition" of the terms "cost" and "wholesale" which this office would be willing to defend. Insofar as the Unfair Practices Act of this state is concerned, the term "cost" is explicitly defined as it is used therein.

The pertinent provisions of Section 13-5-7, U. C. A. 1953, as amended, are as follows:

"13-5-7(a). It is hereby declared that any advertising, offer to sell, or sale of merchandise, either by retailers or wholesalers, at less than cost as defined in this act . . . . is declared to be a violation of this act."

"13-5-7(b) 2. When used in this act, the term 'cost to the wholesaler' shall mean the invoice cost of the merchandise to the wholesaler or the replacement cost of the merchandise to the wholesaler, whichever is lower; less all trade discounts except customary discounts for cash; to which shall be added:

(a) Freight charges not otherwise included in the invoice cost or the replacement cost of the merchandise as herein set forth, and (b) cartage to the retail outlet if done or paid for by the wholesaler, which cartage cost, in the absence of proof of a lesser cost, shall be deemed to be three-fourths of one per cent of the cost to the wholesaler as herein set forth after adding thereto freight charges but before adding thereto cartage.

"3. When used in this act, the term 'cost to the retailer' shall mean the invoice cost of the merchandise to the retailer within thirty days prior to the date of sale, or the date of offering for sale, or the replacement cost of the merchandise to the retailer, whichever is lower; less all trade discounts except customary discounts for cash; to which shall be added:

"(a) Freight charges not otherwise included in the invoice cost or the replacement cost of the merchandise as herein set forth, and (b) cartage to the retail outlet if done or paid for by the retailer, which cartage cost, in the absence of proof of a lesser cost, shall be deemed to be three-fourths of one per cent of the cost to the retailer as herein defined after adding thereto freight charges but before adding thereto cartage and markup, and a markup to cover a proportionate part of the cost of doing business, which markup, in the absence of proof of a lesser cost, shall be six per cent of the cost to the retailer as herein set forth after adding thereto freight charges and cartage, but before adding thereto a markup."

["Cost"]

It will be noted that a violation of the act occurs only when merchandise is advertised, offered or sold at a price less than cost which is defined as the retailer's invoice cost plus freight and cartage, as applicable, plus a markup of 6% in the absence of proof of a lesser proportionate cost of doing business. Thus, in the sense that "cost" is defined in the act itself, an advertisement, offer or sale of merchandise at "cost plus 5%" is not violative of the act so long as the term "cost" in fact includes the defined elements. Where words are defined in a particular statute, and it is clear that the Legislature intended to give to such words a different meaning than the one generally and ordinarily given to such words, the statutory definition is the one to be applied. Creameries of America, Inc. v. Industrial Commission et al., 98 Utah 571, 102 P. 2d 300; Fox v. Standard Oil Company, 294 U. S. 87, 55 S. Ct. 333, 79 L. Ed. 780. There can be no argument that a sale by a retailer at his "cost," as defined in 13-5-7(b)(3), would consist of all the elements of a lawful sale under the statute. The addition of 5% to that "cost" in any advertisement, offer or sale cannot deprive the transaction of its basic validity under this particular enactment. In fact, a sale at "cost" under this statute would be entirely lawful.

["Wholesale"]

The term "wholesale" is not defined by the act insofar as it comprises a portion of the retailer's cost. Webster's New International Dictionary, 2d Edition, defines "wholesale" as "Sale of goods by the piece or in large quantity;—distinguished from retail." The term "wholesale" or the selling in or by unbroken parcels is distinguished from "retail" or dividing into smaller quantities and selling direct to consumers. Continental Baking Co. v. Campbell, 176 Okla. 218, 55 P. 2d 114.

As the above definitions indicate, the term "wholesale" denotes a sale of goods in gross to retailers to sell to consumers. These sales are based upon a consideration —the "wholesale price"—which has been defined as "the price fixed on merchandise by one who buys in large quantities of the producers or manufacturers, and who sells the same to jobbers or retail dealers." Fawkner v. Lew Smith Wall Paper Co., 88 Iowa 169, 55 N. W. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 230. Thus, under our Unfair Practices Act, the minimum lawful lawful "wholesale price" to a retailer would necessarily be the "cost to the wholesaler" as defined in 13-5-7(b)(2). It necessarily follows that advertisements, offers or sales at "wholesale plus 10%" ("wholesale" and "wholesale price" being synonymous when used to denote the consideration paid by the retailer) do not violate the Act when the sales price to the consumer does, in fact, include the essential elements of the "cost to the retailer" as defined therein. It is apparent that such an advertisement, offer or sale is not, in and of itself, a violation of the law. The violation occurs only when the term "wholesale plus 10%" is actually less than the "cost to the retailer" as defined by the act.

[Utah Penal Code—Advertising Offenses]

We, therefore, conclude that an advertisement, offer or sale at "cost plus 5%" or "wholesale plus 10%" does not, as such, violate the Unfair Practices Act. Only the facts surrounding such advertisement, offer or sale are determinative of this question. We feel, however, that this sort of advertising, though technically lawful under the Unfair Practices Act, because of the unusual definitions contained therein, is not so protected under Section 76-4-1, U. C. A. 1953, as herewith set forth:

> "Every person, whether acting on his own behalf or on behalf of another, who, with intent to sell or in any way dispose of real or personal property, choses in action, merchandise, service or anything or any nature whatsoever offered by such person, directly or indirectly, to the public for sale, use or distribution, or with intent to increase the consumption thereof, or to induce any member of the public to enter into any obligation relating thereto, or to acquire title thereto, or any interest therein, publishes, disseminates, circulates, or causes to be published, disseminated or circulated, or who in any manner places, or causes to be placed, before the public in this state, by any newspaper, magazine, book, pamphlet, circular, letter, handbill, placard, poster or other publication, or by any billboard, sign, card, label or window sign, showcase or window display, or by any other advertising device, or by public outcry or proclamation, or by telephone or radio, or in any other manner whatever, an advertisement regarding such property or service so offered to the public, which advertisement shall contain any statement, representation or assertion concerning such property or service, or concerning any circumstance or matter of fact connected in any way, directly or indirectly, with a proposed sale, performance or disposition thereof, which statement, representation or assertion is false in any respect, or which is deceptive or misleading, and which is known, or by the exercise of reasonable care could be known to be false, deceptive or misleading, to the person publishing, disseminating, circulating or placing before the public such advertisement, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

"Cost" as commonly defined is the amount or equivalent paid, or given or charged, or engaged to be paid or given for anything bought or taken in barter or for service rendered; charge; price. Webster's New International Dictionary, 2d Edition. The word "cost" ordinarily indicates price or part of it paid by the buyer to the seller as consideration for the sale of goods or that which has to be given for a thing in order to procure it, especially, the price paid. City Ice Delivery Co. v. U. S., C. A. N. C., 176 F. 2d 347, 352. And it has been held that "cost price" to an importer is one thing, to the jobber another, to a retailer another, and to the purchaser from the retailer still another. It is said to be what is actually paid or promised to be paid for an article. As applied to a retail stock of goods, it usually has reference to the cost at wholesale. Sylvester v. Ammons, 126 Iowa 140, 101 N. W. 782, 785. Thus in the ordinary sense that the term "cost" is used, it obviously means the price paid for the goods by the seller himself. And certainly that is the impression and inducement intended by "membership" retail outlets advertising merchandise at "cost plus 5%" in order to obtain a more favorable bargaining position with the buying public. It is certain also that true advertising as "cost plus operating cost of 25-35% plus 5%" would be injurious to these firms in their bargaining inducement and is, therefore, avoided by the deceptive art of semantics.

The usual and ordinary meaning of the word "cost", as it refers to a retail merchant's stock in trade for sale, does not include his operational cost markup, and it is our opinion that the advertising media of "cost plus 5%" is deceptive and misleading, and is known to be so, by those employing its use when "cost" is understood by the seller to include his operational cost markup, but cannot be reasonably so interpreted by the average purchaser.

Even more misleading and deceptive, indeed even false, is advertising proclaiming the purchaser's price to be "wholesale plus 10%" when, in fact, only a small portion of the merchandise is actually marked at invoice price, or wholesale as previously defined, and the balance of the merchandise is marked upwards to as much as 15% above invoice, and the purchaser pays a blanket 10% above the combined marked prices of his purchased goods. We believe the term "wholesale," commonly understood and legally defined as the price fixed by the wholesaler and paid by the retailer, is false, deceptive and misleading and is known to be so, when used in advertising media calling for a sale price of "wholesale plus 10%" when, in actuality, the customer pays nearer 12-15% above the merchant's wholesale price. And, as in the next preceding paragraph concerning "cost," should it be claimed that the term "wholesale" is used in the sense of meaning "wholesale plus operational cost markup," contrary to the usual and common understanding of the word, it must be held that such use is deceptive and misleading under the provisions of 76-4-1, U. C. A. 1953. See Ritholz v. City of Salt Lake, 3 U. 2d 385, 284 P. 2d 702, 706.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. Civil Action No. 49 C-1071. Dated October 2, 1959. Final judgment filed November 17, 1959.

Case No. 987 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisition—Vertical Integration (Supplier Corporation's Acquisition of Stock in Customer Corporation)—Injunctive Relief Against Unlawful Acquisition.—Where a chemical company's acquisition, holding, and use of 23 per cent (63,000,000 shares) of the stock of an automobile manufacturer violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act (prior to its amendment in 1950), the judgment (1) ordered the chemical company to divest itself of the right to vote any of the shares (such shares would be voted by the stockholders of the chemical company, with certain exceptions), (2) prohibited the chemical company and two security holding companies (which held stock in the chemical company and were interrelated through stock ownership and by other means) from acquiring any additional stock interest in the automobile manufacturer and from attempting to influence such manufacturer in any way, (3) prohibited the two security holding companies from voting any of the shares of stock that would otherwise be voted by them as stockholders of the chemical company (the portion of such shares that were allocable to the two companies was sterilized along with 535,500 shares of stock of the automobile manufacturer which one of the companies owned), (4) ordered that no officer or director of the chemical company or the two security holding companies be permitted (a) to vote any stock of the automobile manufacturer, either in accordance with the "pass-through" described in (1) above or otherwise, or (b) to serve as an officer or director of the automobile manufacturer, (5) prohibited the automobile manufacturer from having as an employee any employee of the chemical company or the two security holding companies, (6) ordered the cancellation of any requirements contract and all preferential trade arrangements or understanding between the chemical company and the automobile manufacturer and prohibited them from entering into any such arrangements or embarking on joint commercial ventures as long as the chemical company owned the automobile manufacturer's stock.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisition—Vertical Integration (Supplier Corporation's Acquisition of Stock in Customer Corporation)—Injunctive Relief Against Unlawful Acquisition—Divestiture of Stock or Divestiture of Stock Voting Rights.—A chemical company, which violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act by acquiring, holding, and using 23 per cent (63,000,000 shares) of the stock of an automobile manufacturer, was not required to distribute such stock to its shareholders, and two security holding companies (which held stock in the chemical company and were interrelated through stock ownership and by other means) were not required to sell, through a trustee, the automobile manufacturer's stock which would be distributed to them as stockholders of the chemical company.

In view of Internal Revenue Service rulings and state income taxes, the tax impact of such a distribution on individual stockholders of the chemical company would be enormous and the tax impact on corporations forced to sell, such as the two security holding companies, would also be great. Such a distribution and sale would also have a serious impact on the market value of the stock of the automobile manufacturer and the stock of the chemical company. Evidence consisting of data regarding a variety of security offerings, charts of stock movements and the flow of investment funds, and the testimony of economists without practical experience or management responsibility cannot overcome the weight of testimony of men of wide experience and great responsibility for investing funds and marketing securities. There would be a serious risk that the sales caused by such a distribution would depress the market value of the two stocks and cause substantial losses to the many thousands of direct or indirect holders of such stock who could not conceivably be called guilty persons or even persons aware of any illegality. Also, such a distribution and sale would seriously handicap the automobile manufacturer in doing any common stock financing, to its possible detriment and the injury of its stockholders. In conclusion, the court ruled that such a distribution and sale would be unnecessarily harsh and punitive, and that there was an effective means of preventing any possible control of the automobile manufacturer by divesting the chemical company of the votes on such shares.

There was nothing in the record which would support the conclusion that the company's possession of the bare legal title to the manufacturer's stock, stripped of its right to vote and of its right to representation on the board of the manufacturer, would create any possibility that the stock would have any influence on the practices and policies of the manufacturer or could be used in any way that would be inconsistent with the mandate of the Supreme Court when it reviewed the legality of the acquisition. It was not necessary to divest the bare legal title in order to remove and to guard against the probability of restraint or monopolization of trade. While the stock was not held solely for investment and did not therefore come within the exemption to Section 7 of the Act, the divestiture and ancillary injunctive provisions of the judgment would be effective to assure that such stock would be held solely for investment.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisition—Vertical Integration (Supplier Corporation's Acquisition of Stock in Customer Corporation)—Injunctive Relief Against Unlawful Acquisition—Divestiture of Voting Rights—Representation on Board—Interlocking Directorates—Divestiture of Legal Title to Stock.—Where a chemical company's acquisition, holding, and use of 23 per cent (63,000,000 shares) of the stock of an automobile manufacturer violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act, the court's final judgment ordered a divestiture of the voting rights of those shares, such divestiture to be accomplished by passing through the vote on such shares pro rata to the stockholders of the chemical company. The pass-through vote would not be exercised on any shares allocable to anyone who was an officer or director of the company, and the limitation was extended as well to members of the family of any such officer or director residing in the same household with him. Also, this same group was prohibited from voting any other shares of the manufacturer's stock. Furthermore, the judgment divested the stock of any right to representation on the board of the manufacturer and enjoined both the company and the manufacturer from having any common officers and directors or employees.

With respect to two security holding companies, the court ruled that because of their substantial stock interest in the chemical company and because of the long-standing close relationship between these two companies and the management of the chemical company, injunctive provisions substantially similar to those that were entered against the chemical company should be directed against them to guard against any possibility that they might acquire stock in the manufacturer or attempt to influence or control the manufacturer. The shareholders of the two companies were prohibited from voting their allocable portion of the chemical company's shares of stock of the manufacturer. The vote was not passed through to the shareholders of the two companies, and the judgment precluded any person from exercising the pass-through vote or from voting any of the manufacturer's stock who was at the time of any meeting of the manufacturer an officer or director of either of the two companies or a member of the immediate family of such officer or director and living in his household. The court found it unnecessary, in view of the above prohibitions and others, to divest the chemical company of its bare legal title to the stock.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4209, 4209.385.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisition—Vertical Integration (Supplier Corporation's Acquisition of Stock in Customer Corporation)—Injunctive Relief Against Unlawful Acquisition—Acquisition of Additional Stock—Trade Between Two Corporations—Requirements Contracts—Joint Commercial Ventures.—Where a chemical company's acquisition, holding, and use of 23 per cent (63,000,000 shares) of the stock of an automobile manufacturer violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act, the court's final judgment prohibited the chemical company from acquiring any additional stock in the manufacturer. However, the company was permitted to retain such shares as it receives by virtue of stock dividends or in the exercise of rights extended with respect to its present holdings. The voting rights on shares so received would be subject to a vote pass-through in the same manner as the shares presently held by the company.

The court rejected the contention that injunctive provisions relating to trade between the two companies were unnecessary and perhaps improper in framing a decree to cure a violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act. In view of the finding that only a probability that the company's stock interest in the manufacturer was likely to result in a restraint of the manufacturer's purchases of automotive finishes and fabrics, the court was not satisfied that provisions of the character and scope proposed by the Government were necessary. However, the court was of the opinion that such provisions were appropriate. The judgment ordered the cancellation of all requirements contracts, exclusive patent arrangements, or arrangements relating to preferential use of discoveries and enjoined the companies from embarking upon joint commercial ventures. Such provisions would remain in effect so long as the company holds any stock in the manufacturer, except that a period of three years should be sufficient insofar as the ban against requirements contracts is concerned. A ban of any longer duration would appear to be an unwarranted and unnecessary interference with the manufacturer's right to purchase from suppliers on terms and conditions that it is able to secure. After the three-year period, requirements contracts would be permitted, provided that they do not extend over a period longer than a single calendar or automobile model year. While there was no evidence of the slightest impropriety in the company's conduct of its trade relations with the manufacturer and other automobile manufacturers, the judgment prohibited the company from giving the manufacturer preferential access to any of its products or from selling to the manufacturer on terms more favorable than those made available to competitors of the manufacturer so long as the company owned any stock in the manufacturer.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4209.400, 4209.500, 4209.750, 4209.785.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Stock Acquisition—Injunctive Relief Against Unlawful Vertical Acquisition—Contingent Modification of Judgment—Administrative or Legislative Change in Tax Policy.—A chemical company which violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act by acquiring 23 per cent of the stock of an automobile manufacturer was not required to distribute the stock to its shareholders because of the enormous tax consequences of such a distribution. However, any party could apply to the court for a modification of the judgment in the event that (1) the judgment proved inadequate to remedy the violation of the Clayton Act, or (2) legislation should be enacted, or there should be a change in the regulations or rulings of the Internal Revenue Service, which "would substantially and significantly ameliorate the existing inequitable and burdensome tax consequences" of such a distribution to the chemical company's stockholders. In its opinion, the court noted that such a distribution was not necessary to remedy the effects of the acquisition which were offensive to the statute, in view of other provisions of the judgment, but that such a distribution would leave a more simplified structure from the corporate standpoint.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4209; Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8233.325.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Suits for Injunctive Relief—Unlawful Stock Acquisitions under Clayton Act, Section 7—Injunctive Decrees—Permissive Provisions—Restricted Right to Sell Unlawfully Acquired Stock.—A chemical company which violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act by acquiring 23 per cent of the stock of an automobile manufacturer was authorized, by a final judgment (which ordered a divestiture of all rights in the stock except the bare legal title, the right to receive dividends, the right to participate in the distribution of assets upon dissolution, and any rights reserved to it under the judgment), to sell or otherwise dispose of, for its own account, all or any part of that stock. However, if any single disposition consisted of more than 50,000 shares, or if the shares to be disposed of, plus the number of shares disposed of in the preceding 12 month period, exceeded 200,000 shares, then prior notice had to be given to the Attorney General. If the Attorney General should interpose an objection, then the disposition of the stock would not be consummated until first approved by the court.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8233.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Suits for Injunctive Relief—Unlawful Stock Acquisitions under Clayton Act, Section 7—Injunctive Decrees—Divestiture as Mandatory Relief.—In determining the appropriate relief to eliminate the effects of a chemical company's acquisition of 23 per cent of an automobile manufacturer's stock in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, the court rejected the Government's contention that, by virtue of Section 11 of the Clayton Act, it was mandatory that the court order a divestiture that would deprive the chemical company of every aspect of ownership of the acquired stock, including even the bare legal title thereto. It was not disputed that the jurisdiction of the court to hear and decide a case arising under Section 7 of the Clayton Act, and to frame a final judgment in such a case, was derived from Section 15 of the Clayton Act. That section is identical in form with Section 4 of the Sherman Act, which confers equity jurisdiction on district courts to hear and decide suits for injunctive relief under that statute. The discretion conferred on a court of equity by Section 4 is not confined or restricted by any requirement that divestiture is a mandatory remedy. Further, the words of Section 11 provide no support for the suggestion that it was intended to have any limiting effect upon the jurisdiction exercised by a district court under Section 15. The particular sentence on which the Government relied is directed entirely to the procedure to be followed by an administrative agency in enforcing the provisions of the Clayton Act and does not even refer to the authority of district courts under Section 15. It is hardly to be supposed that, if Congress had intended to limit the historic equity jurisdiction of the district courts to frame judgments, it would have done so in a section which does not refer to those courts, or that it would have used words which required the alleged limitation to be derived entirely from inference or implication.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4209.625; Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8221.100, 8233; 8801.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Suits for Injunctive Relief—Unlawful Stock Acquisitions Under Clayton Act, Section 7—Court's Power to Grant Relief Against "Acquired" Corporation Which Had Not Violated Antitrust Laws.—In determining the appropriate relief to eliminate the effects of a chemical company's acquisition of 23 per cent (63,000,000 shares) of the stock of an automobile manufacturer in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, the district court held that a court of equity has the power to grant, against the corporation whose stock had been acquired (the automobile manufacturer), such relief as might be necessary and appropriate in the public interest to eliminate the effects of the acquisition which were offensive to Section 7 of the Clayton Act. In so ruling, the court rejected the manufacturer's contention that, since it had not violated the antitrust laws, the court was without the power to grant any relief against it, and that the granting of such relief would violate fundamental constitutional principles of due process. The authority of the court was derived from Section 15 of the Clayton Act, which clothed it with all of the historic powers of a court of equity. Further, the United States Supreme Court has held that district courts are given "large discretion to model their judgments to fit the exigencies of the particular case." Thus, the fact that the manufacturer had not violated Section 7 was a relevant consideration in determining the nature of the relief that might be granted, but that fact did not lead to the conclusion that the court was powerless to grant any relief against the manufacturer.

For the same reason, the court rejected the contentions of a third and fourth company (the third owned stock in the chemical company and the fourth owned stock in both the chemical company and the third company) that no relief could be granted against them because no cause of action had been asserted against them. In the exercise of its authority under Section 15, the court could enter a judgment which directly and substantially affected their rights and interests, even though they had not been found guilty of any violation of law. It followed, therefore, that it could grant certain kinds of ancillary relief against them, not because they had violated the law, but because the granting of such relief was an appropriate and necessary exercise of the power of the court to frame a judgment which would effectively dissipate the consequences of the unlawful stock acquisitions. However, in prohibiting one of the companies from voting shares of the manufacturer which it owned, the court noted that it was not satisfied that it was within its authority to prohibit the voting of such shares since it was not alleged nor shown that these shares were acquired or held in violation of the section.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4209; Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8233.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Suits for Injunctive Relief—Unlawful Stock Acquisitions Under Clayton Act, Section 7—Court's Power to Grant Relief Against Stockholders Who Were Not Parties to Action.—In determining the appropriate relief to eliminate the effects of a chemical company's acquisition of 23 per cent of an automobile manufacturer's stock in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, the court held that stockholders of a third company, who also owned stock in the chemical company, would be indispensable parties if the relief sought by the Government were to be granted directly against them, and that, since they were not parties, that relief could not be granted. None of the parties before the court had authority to speak for those stockholders. It is only as to corporate matters that a corporation is normally regarded as a representative of its shareholders. Here, the Government sought relief that touched the individual interests of those stockholders and not relief concerned with matters that were corporate in their character. Furthermore, the relief requested by the Government would discriminate between that group of stockholders and other stockholders of the chemical company and the third company, which disqualified the corporations as representatives of that group. The court also noted that some of those stockholders were originally named as defendants, but were dismissed during the course of the trial in chief, in some instances with the consent of the Government. There was no appeal from the dismissals that were made without the Government's consent. Further, at no time during the hearing on relief did the Government attempt to bring them before the court, although it was on notice of the contention that, if any relief were to be granted against them, they were indispensable parties and were entitled to notice and representation.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4209; Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8233.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Suits for Injunctive Relief—Unlawful Stock Acquisitions Under Clayton Act, Section 7—Scope of Injunctive Relief—Factors Considered.—In determining the appropriate relief to eliminate the effects of a chemical company's acquisition of 23 per cent of an automobile manufacturer's stock in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, the court noted that its primary duty was to devise a judgment that would effectively guard against the probability of restraint or monopolization which had been found to exist, but that, in performing that duty, there were other considerations that should not be ignored. The property interests involved were immense. The chemical company, which had more than 230,000 direct or beneficial stock owners, owned 63,000,000 shares of the automobile manufacturer's stock with a market value of more than $3,500,000,000. There were more than 700,000 owners of the manufacturer's stock. Under no theory could the stockholders of those companies be said to have participated in any violation or improper conduct. Moreover, the Government itself could not escape responsibility for the plight of those stockholders, since it had waited some thirty years after the acquisition before bringing the action. Therefore, it should recognize that stockholders who purchased the chemical company's stock in those intervening years had every reason to believe that its holding of the manufacturer's stock was entirely legal and proper. The primary purpose of the judgment was remedial and not punitive. Thus, while the private interests of the stockholders could not outweigh the public interest in a judgment that would effectively dissipate the unlawful effects of the acquisition, that primary public purpose should be achieved, so far as possible, without inflicting unnecessary injury upon innocent stockholders.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

As to the effect that the judgment might have upon the lawful interests of the corporate defendants, that was a matter to be considered in framing the judgment, but it was far less important than the interests of the many thousands of stockholders whose interests were directly involved. As to the question of whether the acts found to have violated the law "could reasonably have been thought permissible" at the time they were committed, and the fact there was no fraudulent or improper conduct on the part of the officers and directors of both companies and no "overreaching" of any kind, those facts did not mitigate or qualify the duty of the court to frame a decree that would effectively guard against the unlawful effects of the acquisition.

Memorandum

[Unlawful Stock Acquisitions—Appropriate Relief]

WALTER J. LABUY, District Judge [In full text]: On June 3, 1957, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the acquisition by E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Company of approximately 63,000,000 shares of common stock of General Motors Corporation violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act. It remanded the case to this Court "for a determination after further hearing of the equitable relief necessary and appropriate in the public interest to eliminate the effects of the acquisition offensive to the statute." ([1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,723] 353 U. S. 586, 607.) The decision of the Supreme Court reversed the prior determination of this Court that the acquisition of stock of General Motors by du Pont did not violate Section 7 of the Clayton Act but did not review or reverse the findings of this Court that there had been no violation by any of the defendants of Sections 1 or 2 of the Sherman Act.

[Parties]

The defendants now before the Court, in addition to du Pont, include General Motors Corporation, Christiana Securities Company which owns 12,199,200 shares of du Pont common stock, and Delaware Realty and Investment Company which owns 1,217,920 shares of du Pont common stock and 49,000 shares of common stock of Christiana. Christiana and Delaware's motion for dismissal of the appeal as to them was denied by the Supreme Court, with the direction that they be retained as parties "pending determination by the District Court of the relief to be granted." [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,723] (353 U. S. 586, 608.)

The Court appointed Andrew J. Dallstream amicus curiae to represent the interests of the stockholders of du Pont, and Manual E. Cowen amicus curiae to represent the interests of the stockholders of General Motors. Both are among the leading members of the Illinois bar. Mr. Dallstream is a past president of the Chicago Bar Association and a lawyer with vast experience in the field of corporate law and finance. Mr. Cowen is a Master of the United States District Court of the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, and has had wide experience in corporate law. The order appointing the amici curiae provides that they study the various plans proposed by the litigants and conduct the necessary investigation in order to present plans and make recommendations to the Court.

On September 25, 1957 the Court held a pre-trial conference to determine the mode of procedure following the mandate of the Supreme Court. On October 25, 1957 the Government submitted its proposed final judgment. On May 14, 1958 du Pont filed its proposed final judgment. In June 1958 General Motors filed its objections to the final judgment proposed by the Government, but did not offer a form of decree. In August 1958 each of the amici curiae submitted proposed final judgments and detailed comments on the plans submitted. Prior to the trial which commenced on February 16, 1959, the parties took numerous depositions and submitted interrogatories.

Christiana and Delaware filed a motion to strike certain provisions affecting them from the final judgment proposed by the Government. The motion was argued orally before trial, briefs were filed, and the matter taken under advisement.

[Government's Proposed Judgment]

The Government's proposed judgment provides, in substance, (a) that du Pont, Christiana and Delaware deliver to a trustee to be appointed by the Court certificates representing the shares of General Motors stock held by them; (b) that the trustee deliver to each du Pont stockholder of record, other than Christiana and Delaware (Christiana owns 535,000 shares of General Motors and Delaware owns none)*, notices of meetings of stockholders of General Motors and proxies authorizing such stockholders to vote the shares of General Motors stock held by the trustee pro rata according to their holdings of the shares of du Pont stock, including the stock to be deposited by Christiana and Delaware; (c) that du Pont declare annually for ten years a dividend of one-tenth of the shares of General Motors stock held by it, or 6,300,000 shares per annum (there are about 1.38 shares of General Motors common stock allocable to each share of du Pont); (d) that the trustee sell the General Motors shares comprised in such dividends allocable to Christiana and Delaware and to persons who are stockholders of Delaware (approximately 2,000,000 shares per annum), within twelve months after receipt; (e) that du Pont, Christiana and Delaware be enjoined from acquiring any General Motors stock or exercising any control or influence over General Motors; (f) that du Pont and General Motors be ordered to terminate any agreement between them which provides (1) that General Motors purchase any specified percentage of its requirements of any product of du Pont, (2) that either grant to the other any exclusive patent rights, and (3) that General Motors grant to du Pont a first or preferential right to manufacture or sell any chemical discovery made by General Motors; (g) that General Motors and du Pont be enjoined from having any joint enterprise; and (h) that General Motors on the one hand, and du Pont, Christiana and Delaware on the other, be enjoined from having any common officer or director.

The Government proposal also provides that stockholders of du Pont (other than Christiana and Delaware, and persons who are stockholders of Delaware), will have the option to fill out any fractions of shares received as dividends into full shares by purchasing fractions out of the shares owned by Christiana, Delaware and persons who are stockholders of Delaware held by the trustee and, further, that the stockholders of du Pont (other than Christiana, Delaware and persons who are stockholders of Delaware) are to be given fifteen-day options to purchase the shares owned by Christiana, Delaware and the stockholders of Delaware required to be sold annually by the trustee, all at an unspecified price or prices. Also, the trustee is given the right to apply to the Court to postpone any annual sale if, in his judgment, reasonable market conditions did not prevail, provided that such sales did take place before the end of the ten-year period. The proposed judgment further provides that reasonable market conditions shall not be deemed to exist if the price which can be realized at the time by the trustee is not sufficiently high to reflect the fair value and true worth of the stock. The proposed decree also provides that the trustee may, in his own discretion, sell in any one year more shares of stock than the shares received by Christiana, Delaware and persons who are stockholders of Delaware as a dividend for that year from du Pont.

[Tax Rulings]

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue ruled that under the Government's proposed judgment the annual dividends payable by du Pont in shares of General Motors stock would be taxable as ordinary income to the extent of du Pont's current earnings and accumulated earnings and profits. In the case of individual stockholders the Commissioner ruled that the amount of the dividend would be the fair market value (at the time of the hearing it ranged from $46 to $48 per share, and is now around $55 per share)* of the General Motors shares at the time of each annual distribution. In the case of tax paying corporate shareholders the amount of the dividend would be the lesser of the fair market value of the shares or du Pont's tax basis which is approximately $2.09 per share of General Motors. Such corporate shareholders would be taxed at the regular corporate rate after allowance of the dividends received deduction which would result in an effective rate of approximately 7.8% on the amount of the dividend received. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue also ruled that gain on the sales of General Motors stock required under the Government's proposed judgment would be taxable to Christiana, Delaware and the stockholders of Delaware at the capital gains rate of 25%.

The position of du Pont is that the proposed Government decree would bring about disastrous tax consequences to stockholders of du Pont, and that the sales of General Motors stock by the trustee, the additional sales by du Pont stockholders which will be made to raise money with which to pay taxes, and the sales by existing holders of General Motors stock, would drastically reduce the market price of General Motors stock and cause disastrous losses to thousands of people who were innocent of any illegal act, that there would be also a drastic reduction in the market value of shares of du Pont stock, that there would be an adverse effect on General Motors itself and, possibly, an adverse effect on the whole stock market and the economy. Du Pont further took the position that it was unnecessary to require the divestiture of the legal title as proposed by the Government and that it was sufficient to divest du Pont of the votes on the General Motors shares owned by it and to "pass through" such votes to the ultimate stockholders of du Pont, Christiana and Delaware.

The decree proposed by du Pont provides for such a "pass through" of the vote. It also enjoins du Pont from acquiring any General Motors stock, except such stock as might be distributed in respect of the General Motors stock held by it or as might be acquired by the exercise of rights. It also enjoins du Pont from having as a director, officer or employee any person who is at the same time an officer or employee of General Motors, and provided that no person who is a director, officer or employee of du Pont may serve as a director of General Motors without the approval of the Court.

[Position of Christiana and Delaware]

Christiana and Delaware filed comments on the Government proposal, taking substantially the same position as du Pont, but also taking the position that the Court was without power to grant relief against them, because no violation of the statute had been alleged in the complaint or found against them. Christiana and Delaware, however, consented to the decree proposed by du Pont so far as it required them to "pass through" to their stockholders the votes on the General Motors stock received from du Pont or, in the case of Delaware, from Christiana.

* Thus, individuals would be taxed at rates from 20% to 91%, less dividend received credit, on the value of the shares received.

[Position of General Motors]

General Motors filed its objections to the final judgment proposed by the Government. It also urged that it was not a party subject to the order of the Court and could not be ordered to do even the ministerial things proposed in the Government's decree.

[Proposals of Amici Curiae]

The amici curiae filed separate comments which criticized certain features of the Government proposal and the du Pont proposal. The plans of the amici contained provisions for "passing through" the vote on the General Motors shares held by du Pont to the ultimate stockholders of du Pont, Christiana and Delaware. They also provided for an injunction against du Pont, Christiana and Delaware on the one hand, and General Motors on the other, having any common director, officer or employee.

The plans filed by both amici provided that no one who was an officer or director of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware, or spouse, or person living in his household, should exercise any "passed through" voting rights.

The plan filed by amicus Dallstream extended this prohibition to anyone employed by du Pont in selling automotive finishes or fabrics to General Motors. The plan filed by amicus Cowen extended the prohibition to any person who for a period of ten years prior to the decree had been an officer or director of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware. The plan filed by amicus Dallstream had an additional provision, similar to the injunction proposed in the Government plan regarding trade relations between du Pont and General Motors.

Both plans of the amici referred to possible federal legislation granting relief from income tax on the shares of General Motors distributed as a dividend pursuant to Court order and providing for application to the Court in such event for an amended plan. A bill providing for tax relief was introduced in Congress in 1958 and has been reintroduced during the current session, S. 200. The bill relieves from income tax any distributions made pursuant to a court order in an antitrust case. It is similar in theory to legislation which gave tax relief in the case of dispositions ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission pursuant to the Public Utility Holding Company Act and in the case of dispositions ordered by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System pursuant to the Bank Holding Company Act. While S. 200 provided for relief from the income tax on dividends, it would not grant relief from the capital gains tax on sales made pursuant to Court order. Other bills giving somewhat different forms of tax relief in antitrust cases were introduced in both houses of Congress before the first session of the 86th Congress closed, but no law was passed at the session.

[Proposed Creation of New Class of Stock]

The Dallstream proposal contains a program which has been termed in this proceeding a "takedown." In brief, under the takedown program du Pont would create a new class of common stock known as "du Pont Special Common" which would have no rights in the General Motors stock or its proceeds held by du Pont. The stockholders would be permitted to apply to the court from time to time for permission to exchange their present du Pont Common for a like number of shares of du Pont Special Common plus their allocable portion of General Motors shares owned by du Pont. Pursuant to order of the court the parties requested the Internal Revenue Service to issue a ruling as to the tax consequences of the provision for takedown. It was originally assumed by amicus Dallstream that the takedown plan would have essentially the same income tax consequences as a distribution made in accordance with the Government's proposal. However, the Internal Revenue Service has ruled otherwise in some respects. The particular merit of the takedown plan is that each du Pont shareholder could select the time at which to apply to the court for approval of an application to take down his allocable General Motors shares. Thus, each shareholder would have an opportunity over a period of years to select a time at which the takedown might be accomplished with the least unfavorable tax consequences. The ruling as issued by the Internal Revenue Service would permit the timing advantage as described above. The ruling as issued would, however, deny to corporate stockholders the 85% deduction for dividends received, and to other stockholders the $50 exclusion and 4% credit against tax for dividends received, with respect to the receipt of General Motors shares taken down.

[Request for Amendment of Tax Regulations]

Amicus Dallstream is filing with the Internal Revenue Service and the Treasury Department a request that the income tax regulations be amended to specifically provide that such intercorporate deduction be applicable to corporations, and that such $50 dividend exclusion and dividend credit be applicable to other taxpayers, who are allowed to take down, on the ground that such regulations as now construed violate the express provisions of the statute. It is urged by amicus Dallstream that the ruling as respects denial of the dividend relief provisions expresses an opinion in direct opposition to the established cases. Whether the regulations are so changed or not, or the ruling of the Department is ultimately sustained or overruled, nevertheless the takedown provision has further obvious advantages under the ruling now handed down which are not available if the Government plan were to be adopted.

First, any present or future purchaser of du Pont stock can exercise the takedown provision, if approved by the court, paying a tax on only the lessor of (a) the fair market value of the General Motors shares taken down, or (b) the excess of the sum of the fair market values at time of takedown of the General Motors shares and of the new du Pont Special Common received over his tax basis for the old du Pont Common surrendered. Recent purchasers of du Pont Common Stock who have a high cost could take down with very little tax cost by reason of that limitation.

Second, new purchasers of present du Pont stock exercising the right of takedown prior to any increase in market value would be able to take down the stock without tax consequences. For this reason, it can reasonably be expected that, in addition to the normal market, security dealers would engage in arbitrage transactions in du Pont and General Motors stock, which would create additional buying demand and would stimulate utilization of the takedown program.

Third, in the case of individual stockholders who die, assuming takedown was exercised by their estates shortly after death, the takedown would be without any or only nominal tax consequences; so that in the course of one generation most of the stock held by individuals might be expected to be exchanged under the takedown program.

Fourth, the so-called built-in tax liability to purchasers in the event of the adoption of the Government plan described by many experts as likely to have depressing market consequences upon du Pont, would under the takedown plan, be limited solely to a tax on appreciation in value after the date of purchase.

[No Change in Government's Position]

The Government filed a memorandum replying to the criticisms of its proposed judgment by the other parties and by the amici.* The memorandum of the Government offered no change in its proposed judgment but it did make certain suggestions as to how its proposed judgment might be modified. These suggestions included (a) an expansion of the period required for execution of the plan from 10 years to 20 years, (b) the distribution by du Pont of the General Motors stock in lieu of all or part of its regular cash dividend, and (c) the distribution by du Pont in one dividend of all the General Motors shares held by it. It appeared, however, that the Government's discussion of these suggestions was not intended to indicate that the Government was prepared to modify its plan in accordance with the suggestions or would consent to any such modification. At a later point in the hearing the chief counsel for the Government stated that he had no authority to propose or to consent to any change in the Government's proposed judgment.

[Courts "Equity" Power—Clayton Act, Section 15]

Questions have been raised with respect to the power of this Court to grant relief

* Along with its memorandum the Government filed a study by Alfred Boni, President of Boni, Watkins, Jason & Co., economic and management consultants of New York City, regarding the effect on the market prices of General Motors stock and du Pont stock if the Government proposed decree were put into effect. This study was not offered or received in evidence. Mr. Boni testified in the hearings, and portions of the study were put in evidence as exhibits through him.

against General Motors, Christiana, Delaware and the stockholders of Delaware, which should be considered at the threshold of this opinion.

[General Motors—Absence of Antitrust Violation]

General Motors contends that, since the Supreme Court has not found that it has violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act or any other provision of the antitrust laws, this Court is without power to grant any relief against it and argues that if the Court should grant relief it would violate fundamental constitutional principles of due process. The authorities cited by General Motors do not sustain this broad proposition. The fact that General Motors has not violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act is a relevant consideration in determining the nature of the relief that might be granted against General Motors but that fact does not lead to the conclusion that this Court is powerless to grant any relief against General Motors. The authority of the Court in this case is derived from Section 15 of the Clayton Act which clothes the Court with all the historical powers of a court of equity. The Supreme Court has held that in framing equitable decrees under the antitrust laws District Courts are given "large discretion to model their judgments to fit the exigencies of the particular case." The Court is of the opinion that in a proceeding under Section 7 of the Clayton Act in which it has been found that the acquisition of stock by one corporation in another violates the statute, a court of equity has power to grant such relief against the corporation whose stock has been acquired as may be necessary and appropriate in the public interest to eliminate the effects of the acquisition which have been held to be offensive to the statute. For this reason the Court concludes that the Court has the power to grant the kind of relief against General Motors which is provided for in later passages of this opinion. In the hearing on relief General Motors participated fully, cross-examining witnesses presented by other parties and presenting witnesses of its own, so that its procedural rights have been fully protected.

[Christiana and Delaware—Absence of "Cause of Action"]

The' contentions made by Christiana and Delaware raise a somewhat different problem. In support of their motion to strike the portions of the Government's proposed judgment which request relief as against them these corporations argue that the granting of relief against a party must be based upon a cause of action justifying relief, that no cause of action under the Clayton Act has been asserted against Christiana and Delaware and that the relief proposed against them cannot be granted on the basis of the Government's cause of action against du Pont. The Government on the other hand, relies on the proposition that relief may be had against any party to an antitrust action where dissipation of the effects of violation of the antitrust laws requires such relief. * The Government also relies upon the Supreme Court's action in denying the motion of Christiana and Delaware to dismiss the appeal and retaining them as parties pending a determination of the relief that should be granted. A review of the authorities cited in support of these opposing legal contentions indicates that none of them deals with a situation that is comparable to the one now before the Court.

["Broad Discretion"]

As in the case of General Motors, the answer to this question may be found in the broad discretion which is conferred upon the Court by Section 15 of the Clayton Act. Christiana and Delaware are parties and the Supreme Court has held that they are properly before the Court. It cannot be disputed that under Section 15 this Court possesses the authority to enter an order with respect to General Motors stock now owned by du Pont as may be appropriate and necessary to remedy the violation of the statute which the Supreme Court has found to exist. In the exercise of its authority the Court could enter a judgment which directly and substantially affects the rights and interests of Christiana and Delaware even though they have not been found guilty of violating any law. It follows, in my opinion, that this Court may grant certain kinds of ancillary relief against these two corporations, not because they have violated the statute but because the granting of the relief is an appropriate and necessary exercise of the power of this Court to frame a judgment which will effectively dissipate the consequences of the stock acquisition found to be unlawful. This is particularly true in the instant case where the absence of power to grant any kind of relief against Christiana and Delaware might leave the Court in a position where to discharge its duty it would be necessary to frame a decree which would entail harsh consequences to a large number of innocent parties and would therefore to that degree be against the public interest and also offensive to justice.

* The Government also argued that in fact relief against Christiana and Delaware is necessary in this case because of the stock relationship existing between the two companies and the du Pont Company. In this connection it also adverts to the finding made by this Court in its opinion after the trial in chief that the du Pont family "controls" the management of the du Pont Company.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Limited Power as to Christiana and Delaware]

The fact that the two corporations have not violated Section 7 should be taken into consideration in determining the nature and extent of relief that may be granted against them. Doubtless there are forms of relief which this Court should not, or perhaps could not, grant against Christiana and Delaware in view of the fact that they have not been found to have violated the antitrust laws. But this does not justify the broad conclusion that the Court has no power whatever to grant any relief that might affect the interests of the two corporations. The Court therefore concludes that it has power to grant the relief against Christiana and Delaware provided for later in this opinion.

[Delaware Stockholders—Non-parties to Action]

The stockholders of Delaware who are also stockholders of du Pont are in a different position from either General Motors or Christiana and Delaware. They are not parties and are not before the Court. Some of these stockholders were originally named as defendants but were dismissed during the course of the trial in chief, in some instances with the consent of the Government. The Government did not appeal from the dismissals that were made without its consent. At no time during the course of the hearing on relief did the Government attempt to bring these shareholders before the Court either by resort to the procedures available to it under Rules 23 of the Rules of Civil Procedure or by other method, although the Government was on notice that the defendants contended that if any relief were to be granted against these shareholders they were indispensable parties and as such were entitled to notice and representation.

None of the parties before the Court has authority to speak for these stockholders. In view of the nature of the relief requested against these stockholders by the Government neither du Pont nor Delaware can be regarded as a representative of this particular group of stockholders. The Government seeks relief that touches the individual interests of these stockholders and not relief concerned with matters that are corporate in their character and it is only as to corporate matters that a corporation is normally regarded as representative of its shareholders. Furthermore, the relief requested by the Government would discriminate between this particular group of stockholders and other stockholders of both du Pont and Delaware. There is therefore a potential conflict of interest between this particular group of stockholders and the other stockholders of Delaware and du Pont which disqualifies the corporations as representatives of this particular group of stockholders. Baltimore, C. & A. Ry. v. Godeffroy, 182 Fed. 525 (4th Cir. 1910) and cases cited therein. In these circumstances the Court holds that the stockholders of Delaware who are also stockholders of du Pont would be indispensable parties if the relief sought by the Government were to be granted directly against them and that since they are not parties that relief cannot be granted.

[Guarding Against "Probability" of Restraint or Monopolization]

Under the mandate of the Supreme Court it is the responsibility of this Court to frame a judgment which will eliminate the effects of du Pont's acquisition of stock of General Motors which are offensive to the statute. The effect of the acquisition which the Supreme Court found to be offensive to the statute was the "reasonable probability" that the acquisition might result in restraint or monopolization of the market for automotive fabrics and finishes. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,723] 353 U. S. 586, 595, 607. Accordingly, the problem before this Court is one of devising a judgment that will effectively guard against the probability of restraint or monopolization which the Supreme Court found to exist.

["Immense" Property Interests Involved]

The primary duty of the Court is therefore clear. But in the performance of this duty, particularly as it may involve a choice among different remedial measures that will be equally effective to achieve the statutory purposes, there are certain other considerations that should not be ignored. The property interests involved are immense. The 63,000,000 shares of General Motors owned by du Pont have a current market value of over $3,500,000,000. Any judgment that this Court may enter with respect to this stock will affect the interests of hundreds of thousands of persons in addition to the interests of the four corporations who are before the Court as parties. The record shows that at the time of the hearing there were over 230,000 individuals who were either direct or beneficial owners of du Pont stock. General Motors has more than 700,000 stockholders of record. Christiana has approximately 4,000 stockholders. Substantial amounts of the stock of all three of the corporations are owned by educational, religious and charitable organizations. In framing a judgment the Court should take into account the interests of all of these stockholders.

[Innocence of Stockholders—Government's Delay]

The effect that a judgment in this case may have upon the lawful interests of the corporate defendants in their separate corporate capacities is of course a matter which the Court should consider in framing a judgment, but in the circumstances of this case it appears to the Court far less important than the interests of the many thousands of stockholders whose rights are directly involved. Under no theory can these stockholders be said to have participated in any violation or engaged in any improper conduct. Moreover, the Government itself cannot escape responsibility for the plight of these stockholders. At the time of the acquisition there existed a very small fraction of the present number of stockholders of the corporations involved. It waited some thirty years after the acquisition occurred before bringing this action. It should, therefore, recognize that stockholders who purchased du Pont in those intervening years had every reason to believe that du Pont's holding of General Motors was entirely proper and legal.

It was with these considerations in mind at the beginning of the hearing on February 16, 1959, this Court stated:

> "The primary problems to be resolved through this trial is for the Court to promulgate a decree which will remedy the violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, without penalizing those who may become the innocent victims of this case, the stockholders and the beneficiaries in various trusts and institutions.
> "Equity and justice demand that the decree protect the interests of this group lest they become the casualties of this litigation, for under no reasonable theory can they be accused of violating any provision of the antitrust laws.
> "To redress a violation of law in this case is fairly simple, but to do it without punishing innocent people is the big problem here. During the delay of over thirty years before filing this lawsuit, the rights of over a million stockholders of these corporations have intervened, which greatly aggravates the Court's problem."

[Remedial Purpose of Judgment]

This does not mean that the private interests of the stockholders can outweigh the public interest in a judgment that will effectively dissipate the effects of the acquisition found to be unlawful. But it does mean that in the opinion of this Court the primary public purpose should be achieved so far as possible without inflicting unnecessary injury upon innocent stockholders in the various corporations involved. The purpose of the judgment should be remedial and not punitive. Hartford Empire v. United States [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,319], 323 U. S. 386, 409; United States v. National Lead Co. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,575], 332 U. S. 319. No harsh and oppressive consequences should be visited upon the stockholders unless it can be shown on the facts that these results are inescapable if a decree is to be framed that will comply with the mandate of the Supreme Court. The cases leave no doubt that these are considerations which the Court should weigh in the framing of its final judgment. United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 185.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Compare Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. United States [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,837], 341 U. S. 593, 604.

[Reasonable Belief as to Legality of Acts]

The defendants have suggested that in framing the judgment the Court should properly take into account that the question whether there was a violation of law was reasonably in doubt at the time of the challenged act. United States v. United Shoe Machinery Corp. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,436], 110 F. Supp. 295, 348 (D. Mass. 1953), aff'd. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,755], 347 U. S. 521. It is true that the Supreme Court has recognized that in framing an antitrust judgment it is proper to consider whether the acts found to have violated the law "could reasonably have been thought permissible" at the time they were committed. United States v. Gypsum Co., 340 U. S. 76, 89-90; F. T. C. v. National Lead Co. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,629], 352 [U. S.] 419, 429. Although the Court believes that there might be cases in which this consideration would be of importance, the fact remains that in this case the Supreme Court has found the acquisition to be unlawful. The Court therefore approaches the problem on the assumption that the appropriate relief is that which is necessary to eliminate the effects of the acquisition offensive to the statute, notwithstanding that the acquisition might reasonably have been believed to be permissible when made.

[No Improper Conduct]

In its opinion the Supreme Court recognized the fact that all concerned in high executive posts in both du Pont and General Motors "acted honorably and fairly each in the honest conviction that his actions were in the best interests of his own company and without any design to overreach anyone, including du Pont's competitors." [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,723] 353 U. S. 586. The Supreme Court thus accepted the detailed findings of this Court to the effect that in the commercial relations between du Pont and General Motors there was no fraudulent or improper conduct on the part of the officers and directors of both companies, and no overreaching of any kind. Here again, however, the Court concludes that these facts do not in any way mitigate or qualify the duty of this Court to frame a decree that will effectively remove and guard against the effects of the acquisition of the stock which have been held to be offensive to the statute.

[Divestiture as Mandatory Remedy]

Before referring to the evidence which was adduced at the hearing on relief there is another basic question which requires consideration.

The Government contends that in one important respect this Court has no discretion in the framing of its decree. It is the position of the Government that the Court must order a divestiture that will deprive du Pont of every aspect of ownership including even the bare legal title to the stock. If this contention is sound the question whether divestiture is in fact necessary in order to eliminate the effects offensive to the statute becomes immaterial because divestiture is a mandatory remedy even if some other form of relief would be equally effective, or even more effective, to remove the illegal consequences of the acquisition. By the same token, the fact that divestiture would inflict serious injury upon persons who were innocent of any wrongdoing would be immaterial. On this view of the matter the Court would possess discretion only as to the time and method of divestiture.

[Section 11 as Restriction on Court's Equity Powers]

The Government bases this argument primarily on the provisions of Section 11 of the Clayton Act which prescribe the procedure to be followed by the Federal Trade Commission and other administrative agencies in enforcing the provisions of the Clayton Act. No court has ever construed or applied Section 11 of the Clayton Act in the sense contended for by the Government. On the contrary it has been held that divestiture is not a necessary remedy under Section 7 and that measures other than divestiture may satisfy the requirements of the statute. American Crystal Sugar Co. v. Cuban Sugar Co. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,735] 152 F. Supp. 387 (S. D. N. Y. 1957), aff'd [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,155], 259 F. 2d 524 (2d Cir. 1958).

It is not disputed that the jurisdiction of this Court to hear and to decide a case arising under Section 7 of the Clayton Act and to frame a final judgment in such a case is derived from Section 15 of that Act. Indeed it was this section which the Government invoked when it filed its complaint. It cannot be denied that Section 15 is identical in form with Section 4 of the Sherman Act which confers equity jurisdiction on district courts to hear and decide suits for injunctive relief under that statute. It has long been held that under Section 4 a district court has the traditional powers of a court of chancery. There can be no doubt that in cases arising under the Sherman Act the discretion conferred on a court of equity by Section 4 is not confined or restricted by any requirement that divestiture of ownership is a mandatory remedy. Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. United States [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,837] 341 U. S. 593, 603; United States v. Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Co., 96 F. Supp. 356, 358. The question raised by the Government's contention is therefore whether Section 11 of the Clayton Act reads into Section 15 of that statute a restriction on the court's exercise of discretion which is not explicitly provided for in Section 15 and which is admittedly not imposed by the provisions of Section 4 of the Sherman Act.

The words of Section 11 provide no support for the suggestion that it was intended to have any limiting effect upon the jurisdiction exercised by the District Court under Section 15. The Court finds it unnecessary to decide whether Section 11 imposes upon the regulatory agencies a mandatory duty to order divestiture in every case in which it is found that stock has been acquired in violation of Section 7. The parties have taken conflicting views on this question. The defendants have pointed to certain cases which they contend indicate that the regulatory agencies have not construed Section 11 as requiring mandatory divestiture of ownership. See particularly I. C. C. v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., 183 I. C. C. 165, and New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co. Control, I. C. C. Finance Docket No. 17883 (report dated April 10, 1958, and order dated August 26, 1958). They have also referred to certain consent orders entered in F. T. C. proceedings, In the Matter of the Vendo Company, FTC Dkt. No. 6646 (1957); In the Matter of International Paper Co., FTC Dkt. No. 6676 (1957); In the Matter of Scoville Mfg. Co., FTC Dkt. No. 6427 (1956).

But even if it is assumed that Section 11 restricts the discretion of the regulatory agency it does not follow that the section similarly restricts the equity powers conferred on a district court by Section 15.

The particular sentence in Section 11 on which the Government relies is directed entirely to the procedure to be followed by an administrative agency in enforcing the provisions of the Clayton Act and does not even refer to the authority of the district courts under Section 15. Indeed the section as a whole does not refer in any way to the jurisdiction exercised by a district court under Section 15. To the extent that it deals with judicial power at all it refers to the powers of a circuit court of appeals to enforce or to review an order entered by an administrative agency. In this connection it is significant that the power given to a court of appeals when it reviews an order of an administrative agency is a broad power to enter a judgment "affirming, modifying or setting aside" the order of that agency. It is hardly to be supposed that if Congress had intended to limit the historic equity jurisdiction of the district courts to frame judgments it would have done so in a section which does not refer to those courts or that it would have used words which required the alleged limitation to be derived entirely from inference or implication.

The Government attempts to support its construction of Section 15 by reference to certain statements made in the Congressional debates when the Clayton Act was passed. These statements which are not directed to the relationship between Sections 15 and 11 or to the particular point now under consideration are not persuasive or even relevant. They are entitled to no weight as against the statements in the reports of the committees recommending passage of the Clayton Act which make it clear that Section 15 was intended to confer upon the courts the same kind of equitable jurisdiction to enforce the Clayton Act that they possessed and exercised under Section 4 of the Sherman Act in cases arising under that statute. S. Rep. No. 698, 63rd Cong., 2d Sess. pp. 17 and 50 (1914), and H. Rep. 627, 63rd Cong., 2d Sess. p. 21 (1914).

To adopt the interpretation of Section 11 advanced by the Government would lead to an extraordinary result. In terms of the present case it would mean that although the Court has no choice but to order divestiture in a proceeding under Section 7 of the Clayton Act, which involves only a probability of restraint or monopolization, it would have complete choice of remedies and would be under no mandatory duty to divest if there had been a violation of the Sherman Act rather than the Clayton Act and the Court had found either that du Pont's stock interest in General Motors was a combination or conspiracy that had restrained trade in violation of Section 1 or that du Pont had used its stock interest to achieve a monopoly position in violation of Section 2. Such a distinction in the powers of an equity court would be arbitrary and illogical and the Court finds nothing in Sections 11 and 15 to suggest that it was intended by Congress. Indeed the legislative reports cited above strongly indicate the contrary.

The Government also takes the position that the opinion of the Supreme Court in this case shows that divestiture is a mandatory remedy. The Court finds nothing in the language of the Supreme Court that appears to support this contention. Instead the Court speaks of the "large discretion" possessed by a district court to model its judgment "to meet the exigencies of the particular case." (353 U. S. 608) These words would hardly be appropriate if the Supreme Court had intended to hold that this Court was under a mandatory duty to order divestiture.

Under Section 15 this Court has unqualified authority to order complete divestiture if it decides that in the particular circumstances involved that is an appropriate remedy and is required to achieve the purposes of the statute. But it is not compelled to direct divestiture or to direct any particular form of divestiture if it determines that there is an alternative form of relief. In the exercise of its authority under Section 15 the Court has the authority to adopt a form of relief other than divestiture, or to order divestiture of some but not all of the incidents of ownership if it decides on the facts that these alternatives are more equitable and will effectively carry out the direction of the Supreme Court to eliminate the effects of the acquisition offensive to the statute.

In this connection the Court observes that in many instances both the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission have consented to the entry of judgments under Section 7 of the Clayton Act which have not called for divestiture of the stock or assets acquired in violation of that section. See, e. g., United States v. Schenley Industries, Inc., CCH [1957] Trade Cases, Para. 68,664 (D. Del. 1957); United States v. General Shoe Corp., CCH [1956] Trade Cases, Para. 68,271 (D. Tenn. 1956); In the Matter of Union Bag & Paper Co., FTC Dkt. No. 6391 (1957); and United States v. Hilton Hotels Corp., CCH [1956] Trade Cases, Para. 68,253 (N. D. Ill., 1956). Furthermore, so far as this Court is aware, this is the first case in the period of over 40 years during which the Clayton Act has been law in which the Government has advanced the contention that a district court acting under Section 15 of the Clayton Act lacks the traditional authority of a court of equity and must order divestiture upon a finding of a violation of Section 7.

The Government presented its evidence on twelve hearing days between February 17 and March 16, 1959. The defendants and the amici presented their evidence on twelve hearing days between March 16 and April 1. The Government presented its rebuttal on four hearing days, April 6, 7, 8 and 9. The Court then gave the Government twenty days to file a brief, and the defendants twenty days thereafter, the amici ten days thereafter, and the Government ten days thereafter to reply, so that the case was submitted to the Court in June, 1959.

[Tax Impact—Avoidance]

In considering the decree proposed by the Government, an important factor is the impact of taxes. The Government attorneys displayed their sensitivity on this point by introducing testimony regarding devices whereby individual stockholders of du Pont might seek to avoid the tax impact.

A member of an accounting firm testified, over objection, that stockholders might form corporations of various types to which they would transfer their shares of du Pont. Such corporations would then receive the General Motors shares distributed by du Pont as dividends under the Government proposed decree and, under some of the devices retain them and, under other devices, in turn, distribute the shares as dividends. These devices, if valid, would tend to minimize the taxes. However, it appeared that Government counsel had discussed the devices with lawyers in the Internal Revenue Service and there was doubt whether the Internal Revenue Service would recognize such devices as having substance. Further, Government counsel refused to state whether or not they would accept such devices from an antitrust standpoint or would attack them under the antitrust laws. The Court does not think that such devices can be seriously considered unless and until they are tendered as a plan acceptable to the Government and have been ruled on from a tax standpoint by the Internal Revenue Service.

The defendants moved to strike this testimony as to domestic law as inadmissible. It would be in an ordinary lawsuit, but in this kind of proceeding it is informative to the Court, and the motion was denied.

Under the ruling of the Internal Revenue Service (Amicus Dallstream Ex. 2) there can be no avoiding the conclusion that the tax impact by reason of the distributions of 63,000,000 shares of General Motors stock by du Pont will be crushing in the case of individuals and trusts. They will be taxed at rates varying from 20% to 91% (less dividend received credits) by the Federal Government on the receipt of shares having a current market value of $45 or $55 per share. Whatever the value, or whatever the rate, these individuals will lose a large portion of their investment in General Motors through du Pont. In many instances there will also be state income taxes imposed. Many du Pont stockholders reside in the following states, with the income tax rates indicated: California (1% to 6%), Delaware (1½% to 8%), Massachusetts (7.38%) and New York (2% to 10%).

[No Penal Sanctions]

No doubt there are investors who purchased du Pont having in mind that, while they were acquiring an interest in the leading company in the chemical industry, they were also acquiring shares of stock in the leading company in the automotive industry. It would be grossly unfair to impose such a penalty on thousands of innocent persons. Section 7 of the Clayton Act is not a "penal statute". This is simply a remedial section. It contains no penal sanctions such as there are relating to certain other sections of the antitrust laws.

[Survey—du Pont Stockholders]

There are approximately 185,000 stockholders of record of du Pont. There are, of course, in addition many others whose stock is held in the name of banks or brokerage firms or who are beneficiaries of trusts owning du Pont stock. All of these persons would be taxed on the same basis as if they were direct owners of du Pont stock. Testimony and exihibits were introduced by Dr. Benjamin Tepping of National Analysts, Inc., an independent statistical research organization. This organization conducted a survey of du Pont stockholders for the purpose of determining the tax-paying characteristics of such stockholders and of estimating the additional income taxes that would be payable if the Court were to accept the Government's proposal. The National Analysts' survey was conducted on the basis of probability sampling. This is a method of sampling by which on the basis of data obtained from a sample of the group under examination estimates can be made as to the result that would be obtained if a complete census of the entire group had been undertaken. The particular utility of probability sampling is that through the use of mathematical formulae the margin of error between the results of the sample and the results that would be obtained from a complete census can be ascertained.

Dr. Tepping was able to include within his survey the individual holders of some 16,000,000 shares of du Pont stock (out of a total of some 45,000,000 shares) and to estimate for such holders the effective rate of tax and the additional taxes that would be payable if the Government's proposed judgment were accepted by this Court. In addition Dr. Tepping stated as his expert opinion similar estimates for the owners of an additional 9,000,000 shares of du Pont stock, basing these estimates very largely upon an extension of the results obtained in the sample survey. His testimony, in summary, was that these two groups of individual owners of du Pont stock would pay income taxes at the rate of between 55% and 60% if the Government's proposal were accepted and that the additional income taxes payable by such owners upon receipt of the General Motors shares in accordance with the Government's plan would total as much as $1,000,000,000 over the ten year period if the General Motors stock were to have a value of approximately $50 a share and would total approximately $770,000,000 over the same period if the General Motors stock were to have a value of about $40 a share.

The Court is satisfied that the National Analysts' survey was conducted on an objective basis and that the procedures used were in accordance with accepted standards recognized in the field of statistical surveys. The evidence shows that care was taken to simplify the questionnaires used to the extent possible in light of the fact that the subject matter—Federal income tax—is inherently complicated. At the trial the Government moved to exclude the testimony of Dr. Tepping and the exhibits introduced by him on the ground that the underlying data constituted hearsay evidence. The Court overruled the motion and at the conclusion of the trial it was renewed by the Government.

If the issue before the Court were the precise amount of income taxes to be paid by the du Pont stockholders in the aggregate or by individual classes of du Pont stockholders, there might be merit to the Government's contentions. But that is not the issue. The court is satisfied that the estimates are sufficiently reliable to indicate the order of magnitude of the income taxes that would be occasioned by adoption of the Government's proposal. Accordingly, the Government's motion is overruled. In this connection the Court observes that in its reply brief with respect to this motion the Government states:

> "It has never been any secret throughout this proceeding that the proposed distribution of General Motors stock would be taxable to the stockholders. A bill has been introduced in the Congress concerning this matter. This is a matter of law so obvious that the Court is not even required to take judicial notice of it. If the only use to be made of these survey results were to allow the Court to consider them for whatever they are worth, the Government would not object."

The practical question before the Court is whether it will be better able or less able to frame a decree to carry out the mandate of the Supreme Court by excluding Dr. Tepping's testimony and evidence. To this question the Court believes there is but one answer. It cannot perceive how the interests of the Government can be prejudiced by acceptance of this testimony on the basis and for the purpose described above. Moreover, there is ample precedent for the use of such evidence. The magnitude of the taxes occasioned by the Government's proposal is certainly an important element in this case and all of the parties, including the Government, should be anxious to provide the Court with the best available information. The evident care and objectivity with which the survey was conducted, and which were not criticized by the Government's own statistical expert, assure a high degree of trustworthiness. The record discloses that various agencies of the Government itself have used surveys of this type and indeed have employed this same organization, National Analysts, Inc. Support is also found for the competence and trustworthiness of sample evidence in the following court decisions: United States v. Aluminum Company of America, 35 F. Supp. 820, 823-24 (S. D. N. Y. 1940); United States v. United Shoe Machinery Corp. [1953 Trade Cases ¶67,436], 110 F. Supp. 295, 305-06 (D. Mass. 1953); United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. [1953 Trade Cases ¶67,633], 118 F. Supp. 41 (D. Del. 1953); United States v. National Football League [1953 Trade Cases ¶67,614], 116 F. Supp. 319 (E. D. Pa. 1953); State Wholesale Grocers v. Great A. & P. Tea Co. [1957 Trade Cases ¶68,772], 154 F. Supp. 471 (N. D. Ill. 1957). It further appears that in only one recent case has such sample evidence been rejected and in that case certain survey findings offered by the Government were excluded because they utilized arbitrary methods and classifications not recognized in the industry under study. United States v. Brown Shoe Co., Inc., Civil No. 1527(3) (E. D. Mo. 1958). Neither of these objections has application to the survey of the National Analysts.

Mr. David M. Kennedy, Chairman of the Board of the Continental Illinois Bank and Trust Company of Chicago and also Chairman of its Trust Committee, presented an estimate that beneficiaries of trusts in its Trust Department holding du Pont stock were on the average in the 50% to 60% bracket. Mr. Thomas H. Beacom, Vice President in charge of the Trust Department of the First National Bank of Chicago, estimated that the beneficiaries of the trusts in his bank holding du Pont stock would be taxable at an average rate of 51.7%.

Whatever disagreement may be had with these estimates regarding the tax brackets of individual and trust beneficiary stockholders of du Pont, there can be no doubt that du Pont stock, selling for $200 a share or more (now $250 a share), is held in many instances by people of substantial income, and that the tax impact would be very serious as to them. Seventeen individual stockholders of du Pont and General Motors in various walks of life testified regarding their family holdings, their taxes and their intention as to selling or not in case the Government plan were put into effect, as summarized below:

It was assumed for the purpose of the above testimony that General Motors would have a market value of $40 per share when distributed. Most of the above stockholders expressed the opinion that they would not get the fair value of the shares which they would have to sell because of the race to get into the market.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

The shocking tax impact* would impel the Court not to order a distribution of General Motors stock by du Pont, if any other means of removing the effects offensive to the statute are available, and there are such means.

[Tax Legislation]

In case tax legislation, such as S. 200, were to pass, this tax result from ordering a distribution would, of course, be eliminated.

[Proposed Decree—Christiana and Delaware]

The Government proposed decree also calls for the sale by a trustee of the General Motors stock received through dividends by Christiana and Delaware, as well as the 535,500 shares of General Motors owned by Christiana. Christiana owns 12,199,200 shares of du Pont. Delaware owns 1,217,920 shares of du Pont and 49,000 shares of common stock of Christiana. Under the Government plan Christiana would receive 16,805,684 shares of General Motors and Delaware would receive 1,677,813 shares of General Motors. Accordingly, including the 535,500 shares owned by Christiana there would be sales of stock owned by the two corporations amounting to 19,018,997 shares. The tax base for such General Motors shares is $2.09 a share (except that for the 535,500 shares owned by Christiana it is $9.01 per share). Any proceeds of such sales in excess of those base figures per share would be subject to a capital gains tax of 25%. The market value of General Motors stock at the time of the hearings was $46 per share. If that figure were realized, the capital gains tax impact on Christiana would be $183,351,000 and on Delaware would be $17,831,000 or a total of $201,182,000. In addition, there would be dividend taxes of $3,021,000. Even if much less were realized, because of a decline in the market value of General Motors, the tax impact would still be staggering.

There are over 4,000 stockholders of Christiana and Delaware, including many charitable and educational institutions. (See Pages 51-52 for a list of many such institutions.) There is no finding of violation of any law against either Christiana or Delaware or their stockholders and, again, it would be unjust to impose this loss upon them. The Court is not aware of any proposed legislation which is receiving serious consideration in the Congress, designed to give relief from taxes on the gains from such sales. Consequently, the Court would not order the sale of shares owned or received by Christiana and Delaware, if there were any other means of eliminating the condition offensive to the statute. There are such means.

[Stretch-Out of Plan]

As previously stated, in its memorandum of September 26, 1958 the Government suggested a stretch-out of its plan over a twenty-year period as against a ten-year period. This would not change the tax impact on the individual shareholders of du Pont, but simply spread it out over a longer period. Nor would this change the tax impact on Christiana and Delaware and their stockholders of sales by the trustee. It would simply spread out the impact over a longer period.

[Single Distribution]

Also, the Government memorandum made the suggestion that du Pont might make a single distribution of the 63,000,000 shares of General Motors and pointed out that, under present tax laws, the total value of the General Motors shares would not be taxed to the recipients as a dividend, but only that portion representing the accumulated earnings and surplus of du Pont. Schedules were introduced by du Pont showing the tax impact of such a distribution on individuals and trust beneficiaries, and assuming a market value of $45 per share for General Motors stock. The total figure was $588,044,000. These figures would not indicate that a single distribution by du Pont would eliminate the severe tax impact of the Government proposed decree.

[Economic Consequences of Proposal]

The economic consequences of the Government proposed decree to be considered are the effect on the market price of General Motors common stock, on the market price of du Pont common stock, and on

* It was testified by Dr. Jacoby (whose testimony is discussed below) that as an economic matter the tax was a capital levy and that this penalty would not fall equally on shareholders of du Pont according to their holdings of shares of du Pont, but the penalty would be different on each, depending on the tax brackets of the various stockholders due to other income.

General Motors Corporation itself, that is, its ability to finance its operations during the ten-year period of the Government decree.

If there is a drastic decline in the market value of General Motors stock, this will affect the stockholders of du Pont who sell their General Motors shares to raise money to pay taxes, Christiana and Delaware and their stockholders through losses on the sale of their General Motors shares by the trustee, and existing stockholders of General Motors who feel forced to sell or who have General Motors pledged as collateral, or who have General Motors in portfolios which must be carried in their reports at market value.

If there is a drastic decline in the market value of du Pont common stock, this will have an impact on the stockholders of du Pont, both individuals and trustees, who feel forced to sell to avoid the problems and the tax consequences of constant receipt of General Motors shares as a dividend. It will also have a direct effect on Christiana and Delaware and their stockholders, and on other stockholders of du Pont who have the stock pledged or in portfolios which must be marked to the market.

If there is a drastic decline in the price of General Motors common stock, this could interfere with the ability of General Motors to do financing during the ten-year period of the Government proposed decree.

[Government Evidence—Types]

The Government called witnesses to give three types of testimony on this phase of the case designed to show that the Government's proposed decree would have little impact on the market prices of General Motors stock and du Pont stock.

One type of evidence was to the effect that there was considerable investment money coming into the market regularly. (The other two types which will be discussed later were (a) testimony of analysts and statisticians, and (b) testimony regarding offerings of securities of various types which had been made in recent years.) But there was no convincing evidence in this category that any substantial portion of this investment money would be directed to buying General Motors stock at the true value of the stock, if the Government decree were in effect.

[Investment Money Market]

Mr. John J. Scanlon, Treasurer of American Telephone & Telegraph Company, testified that the Bell System pension plans expected to invest $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year in equity securities, but that the trustee of the trusts had a policy of diversification, so that only a small amount of this would go into any one common stock.

Mr. Edward G. Kinloch, Manager of the Trust Investments Operations Department of General Electric Company, testified that 25% to 30% of the $75,000,000 to $80,000,000 invested annually by its pension trusts would go into equities, but only 4% of the money for equities would go into automotive stocks, and less than half of this into General Motors, even under present conditions. This would amount to less than $400,000 per annum. Mr. Kinloch also said that, if the trustee sales called for by the Government plan were to take place, he would be somewhat cautious and whether he would make any purchases of General Motors stock would depend on market conditions.

Dr. James J. O'Leary, Director of Economic Research of the Life Insurance Association of America, said that, according to a study he had made for a committee of the Senate, twenty-five life insurance companies, owning 85% of the common stocks held by insurance companies, made net purchases between January, 1953 and September, 1955 of only $7,700,000 of common stocks. He testified that the insurance companies had to diversify their common stock investments and, therefore, could put no great amount in any one stock. He also said that, assuming the Government proposal were put into effect, the insurance companies would be inclined to buy General Motors if that stock declined in price sufficiently.

Mr. Harold S. Oberg, Research Director of the National Association of Investment Companies, testified these companies made net purchases of over $1,000,000,000 in common stocks in 1958, but he did not know whether they purchased General Motors stock, and said they all had a policy of diversification so as to limit investments in any single stock.

Mr. Dudley A. Hall, of the Boston Management Research Company, testified as to investment of college endowment funds in common stocks, including Christiana, du Pont and General Motors, as shown by surveys of his Company. The surveys showed that the amount invested by colleges in these three companies' stocks had decreased substantially between June 30, 1957 and June 30, 1958.

Mr. George E. Johnston, Chairman of the Board of Equity Annuity Insurance Company, testified that although life insurance companies had over $101 billion dollars in total assets, they had invested less than 4% in common stocks. He said that the sale of variable annuities by life insurance companies might expand, but that depended on a pending case in the Supreme Court and on legislation;* and that, while funds behind variable annuities would be invested in common stocks, there would be a policy of diversification as between industries and as between companies within an industry.

Mr. Clarence Stanley, Vice President and Pension Coordinator of General Motors Corporation, testified that the General Motors pension trusts held only $5,330,000 of General Motors common stock, representing .68% of the combined assets of the trusts.

Mr. Vito Natrella, Chief Economist of the Trading Exchanges for the Securities and Exchange Commission, testified as to the large amounts of stocks in the hands of various types of investors. He said that his figures did not show that a particular institution would buy any particular stock at any particular time.

Dr. Roger F. Murray, Professor of Finance at the Columbia University Graduate School of Business, testified that pension funds would regularly invest 1⅔% of the money invested in equities in common stock of General Motors. However, this testimony must be considered against that of an active administrator of large pension funds, Mr. Kingsley Kunhardt, Vice President in charge of the Investment Department of Guaranty Trust Company of New York, administering 217 pension funds with assets of $2,000,000,000. Mr. Kunhardt, who testified for du Pont, said that Guaranty Trust Company would not put any fixed portion of pension funds into General Motors stock. He testified that if the Government plan were put into effect the trust company would be a buyer of General Motors stock for pension trusts only at a greatly reduced price.

Mr. Carrol Shanks, President of Prudential Life Insurance Company, testified that his company would like to get into the variable annuities business and was supporting legislation to that end, but that it would be fairly slow going and the money that would go into variable annuities would be diverted from other types of savings, among them direct stock purchases in the market.

Mr. Jack Morgan, Comptroller of the Savings and Profit Sharing Pension Fund for Sears, Roebuck & Co., said this fund now has assets of over $1,000,000,000, 10.6% of which are in common stocks but that the fund owned no General Motors stock.

Mr. Edward T. McCormick, President of the American Stock Exchange, testified that institutional investors should grow to be a very substantial factor in the market.

In its brief of April 29, 1959 and accompanying proposed findings, the Government contends that, if General Motors purchased stock for its bonus plan, savings plan and stock option plan from the trustee for Christiana and Delaware, this would absorb all the shares offered by the trustee and would not disturb the market. The Government points out that the General Motors stock purchased in recent years for the bonus plan has amounted to 1,000,000 shares per annum, that the trustee for the Savings Plan has purchased in the last three years about 1,000,000 shares of newly issued General Motors stock per annum, and that there are outstanding options under the option plan to purchase 368,859 shares, first exercisable September 18, 1959.

The buying of stock in the market for the bonus plan is already a factor in the market and to withdraw it from the market to shift it to purchases from the trustee for Christiana and Delaware would not add any new demand to offset the increased supply of General Motors stock which would be offered by the trustee and others as the result of the Government proposal.

As to purchases of General Motors stock for the savings plan, the Board of Directors of General Motors has chosen so far to have the trustee for the plan purchase newly issued shares from General Motors, which is a continuing source of capital funds to the Company. The Court doubts the propriety of attempting to dictate the financial policy of General Motors by reason of the finding of a violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act by du Pont.

* Since this testimony the Supreme Court of the United States has decided the case referred to adversely to the insurance companies, holding that sale of variable annuities would have to be registered with the S. E. C., under the Securities Act of 1933 and under the Investment Company Act of 1940, S. E. C. v. Variable Annuity Life Ins. Co., 359 U. S. 65, March 23, 1959.

The amount of stock for which options are outstanding is too insignificant in relation to the problem here to warrant discussion.

This type of evidence does not have any substantial probative force to indicate that any demand for General Motors stock would spring up to counterbalance the increased supply in the market which would be created directly and indirectly by the Government's proposed decree.

[Testimony of Statisticians and Analysts]

The second type of evidence adduced by the Government relating to the impact of the Government proposed decree on the market prices of General Motors and du Pont stocks was the testimony of statisticians and analysts in the academic or professional field. These men were Dr. Roger Murray of Columbia, previously referred to, Dr. Erwin Friend, Professor of Economics and Finance at the University of Pennsylvania and Mr. Alfred Boni, the author of the study filed with the Government memorandum of September 26, 1958. In rebuttal Mr. Paul L. Howell, an economist, also testified for the Government.

These men each testified that they had never been in the underwriting business and had no experience in the marketing of stocks or other securities. They placed their reliance on charts and statistics. But there were no charts and statistics relating to any situation remotely approaching the forced sale of 2,000,000 shares of General Motors stock every year for ten years, accompanied by other sales for tax purposes by recipients of General Motors stock as a dividend, and other sales by existing holders of General Motors stock. Nor did these charts or statistics encompass any market situation such as that relating to the du Pont stock under the Government plan where many present holders would decide to sell and take a capital gain rather than incur the ordinary income taxes on the General Motors stock to be distributed to them, and any potential individual purchaser of du Pont stock would be faced wtih buying a tax liability if he made the purchase.

Dr. Murray testified that he would defer to the judgment of investment bankers as to the price which the trustee would obtain for the General Motors stock. Dr. Friend agreed that there had never been anything in the past comparable to the sales contemplated by the Government plan. He also testified that an increase in supply in stock of 10% had in the past brought about a decline in price of roughly 5%, that an increase of 20% had been associated with price declines of between 10% and 15%. There was no testimony by Dr. Friend as to the effect of an increase in supply of 30%.

The Government plan provides for an increase in supply of 30%. Du Pont owns about 23% of General Motors outstanding common stock, making the present supply not more than 77% of the outstanding stock. 23%, the increase in supply following distribution by du Pont, is about 30% of the 77%, the existing supply.

Mr. Boni's testimony was devoted principally to asserting that "volume" of transactions in a stock did not have any co-relation to price movements in the stock. The fallacy of this testimony is that volume of transactions is not the same thing as increase in supply without an increase in demand. Furthermore, Mr. Boni's testimony was based solely on the assumption that the sales by the trustee under the Government plan would take place by several brokers to be employed by the trustee in the auction market on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange,* whereas the testimony of all the investment bankers was that the only practical way of making the sales would be in a secondary offering off the floor of a stock exchange by a nationwide syndicate of underwriters, including large underwriting houses not members of the New York Stock Exchange, and with a spread several times the amount of an ordinary stock exchange commission.

* There was testimony from an experienced broker to the effect that an attempt to sell 2,000,000 shares of General Motors on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange through brokers employed by the trustee would so disorganize the market that the specialists would call in floor members of the Board of Governors, and the Board of Governors would stop the sales and recommend that they be made through a secondary distribution off the floor.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Therefore, this type of testimony adduced by the Government has little or no weight as showing that the Government plan would have little or no impact on the market.

In particular, the Court was not persuaded by the testimony of Mr. Boni or Mr. Howell. The statistical tables from which the former drew his conclusions were prepared in a loose manner which could hardly be said to comply with accepted standards of statistical approach. His demeanor on the stand and his inability to give specific answers to the questions addressed to him left the Court with the conclusion that little or no reliance could be placed on his expert opinion. The opinions which Mr. Howell expressed in the course of the Government's rebuttal were completely unsupported by any evidence that he had studied the issues before the Court. While he stated those opinions freely, in view of their lack of foundation the Court cannot attach any weight to them.

[Statistics and Testimony—Offerings of Securities]

The third type of testimony introduced by the Government as to market impact of its plan was statistics and oral testimony relating to offerings of securities which had taken place in the recent past. There were three kinds of offerings referred to, (a) offerings of debt securities, (b) offerings of common stock by corporations to their own stockholders following the issuance of negotiable rights to subscribe to the stockholders at substantial discounts from the current market, and (c) secondary offerings of common stocks by others than the issuing corporations.

From the testimony it is clear that offerings of debt securities, even if convertible into common stock, have little or no relevance to the secondary offering which would have to be made by the trustee under the Government plan.

Also, from the testimony it seems plain that rights offerings by corporations to their own stockholders have little relevance because of the difference in the circumstances. In rights offerings the corporation is free to fix a subscription price substantially below the current market. Then the stockholder receiving the rights can sell the rights. The offering is made to a body of people already interested in the company. Anyone exercising a right can borrow from a bank 75% of the value of the stock, whereas under existing regulations on a secondary offering the purchaser can borrow only 10%. Further, in a rights offering the valuable mechanics of purchasing rights and exercising them and selling the stock so acquired is available to the underwriters, a process known as a "lay-off". This procedure has a stabilizing effect and is very helpful to the success of the operation. However, it is not deemed "stabilization" under present rules and underwriters can purchase such rights without reference to the stringent stabilizing rules of the Securities and Exchange Commission. The "lay-off" procedure is, of course, not available in a secondary offering.

There remains the testimony and statistics regarding large secondary offerings of common stock which have taken place in recent years. None of them is similar to what would take place under the Government plan. Only five (one being a series) need be discussed.

There was a secondary offering of Ford Motor Company common stock at $64.50 per share by a group of underwriters in the amount of about $650,000,000 by the Ford Foundation in 1956. Ford stock was not owned by the public at the time and was not listed on any exchange. Ford was a renowned company with a glamorous reputation. Although the Ford Foundation owned and retained substantially more stock, there was no threat of forced sales of this stock. As Winthrop C. Lenz, Vice President in charge of the Corporation Underwriting Division of Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., one of the managing underwriters, testified, investors felt that the Foundation would make further sales only under favorable circumstances.

A Government witness, Mr. Ralph C. Sheets, Vice President in charge of sales at Blyth & Co., testified regarding another secondary offering of Ford stock by the Ford Foundation on March 31, 1959. Blyth & Co. was one of the managing underwriters. It was brought out on cross-examination of Mr. Sheets that the market price of Ford stock was substantially less at the time of this secondary offering than the offering price under the offering previously referred to, whereas the industrial stock averages had increased substantially over the same period. It was also developed through Mr. Sheets that the second offering presented a more difficult selling job although much smaller ($113,000,000 against $650,000,000) than the first and had a larger spread for the underwriters and dealers—$2 a share as against $1.50; $2 being 3.54% of the offering price of $56.50. The second offering of Ford stock was considered successful, as was the first. The second offering was made at a particularly favorable time both from the standpoint of the general stock market and also from the standpoint of the sales and earnings of the Ford Motor Company, which were sharply up in the early part of this year.

There was a secondary offering of 1,278,833 shares of General Motors stock made by the Sloan Foundation in 1956 through a syndicate headed by Morgan, Stanley & Co. at $43.75 per share, and with a spread of $1.35 per share. Both Mr. Sumner B. Emerson, a partner of Morgan, Stanley & Co., and Mr. Lenz of Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, another member of the underwriting group, testified that the offering had a substantial adverse effect on the market price of General Motors. Schroeder Boulton, partner in charge of research of the New York investment house of Baker, Weeks & Co., a Government witness, testified that the Sloan secondary offering had caused a decline in market price and that, if repeated year after year, would have a much greater depressing effect. But, here again in the Sloan secondary offering of General Motors stock, there was no threat of additional forced selling of General Motors stock.

A series of secondary offerings referred to by the Government were the offerings of stock of Aluminium, Ltd., pursuant to a court decree of divestiture entered in 1951. These offerings were much smaller in amount than those involved here and they had a depressing effect on the market for Aluminium stock. Mr. Edward Townsend, Vice President and Director of First Boston Corporation, who managed the underwriting group, testified that the offerings had short-term market effects and that, in one or two of the offerings, they were disappointed with the after-market.

Dr. Friend also testified for the Government regarding the secondary offering of 1,800,000 shares of A. & P. stock at $44.50 per share on March 24, 1959. It was brought out on cross-examination that from some time before the offering was made or known about in the markets to the time of offering, i. e., from January to March 24, 1959, the market price of the A. & P. stock declined 15½% against the Dow Jones industrial average.

In this connection the Court would like to point out that the Government witnesses repeatedly referred to the fact that charts showed that the market prices of stock involved in offerings "recovered" after the offering. That is, of course, a small comfort to those stockholders whose stock was sold at the low prices on the offering or who felt compelled to sell on their own volition during the period of the offering. Furthermore, the sellers on the offerings are compelled to lose in addition the cost of the underwriting, i. e., the spread, which is substantial.

There were no other secondary offerings on which evidence was introduced which seem to have any real materiality.*

The circumstances surrounding these secondary offerings are not similar to the circumstances which would surround the execution of the Government proposal. In any event, in most instances the offerings did have a depressing effect on the market price of the stock involved. The second Ford offering is an exception, but the conditions under which it was made were extremely favorable and unlike those which would accompany the execution of the Government proposal.

The Court is of the opinion that this evidence gives no assurance that the execution of the Government proposal would not have a serious depressing effect on the market value of du Pont and General Motors stock and would not cause serious losses to those who sell such stocks for whatever reason during the period while the decree is being executed. To accept the responsibility of entering a decree such as the Government proposes, the Court must have reasonable assurance that serious adverse economic effects will not result.

This is apart from the impact of the taxes on innocent persons which the proposed Government decree would have under the present tax laws. The Government adduced no evidence as to what the economic impact might be in case the tax laws were amended along the lines of S. 200, making distributions exempt from taxation. Under such circumstances there would still be the impact of the forced sales by the trustee under the Government plan and the heavy taxes on Christiana and Delaware.

The Government called no witness who had responsibility in his business to invest large funds or to market large blocks of stock who testified that the Government plan would not have a serious market impact on the market for the stocks of General Motors and du Pont. Men of that type who were called by the Government either testified to the contrary on cross-examination or testified on other points. For example, the Government presented as witnesses Mr. Shanks, President of the Prudential Life Insurance Company, Mr. Townsend, of First Boston Corporation, Mr. Sheets, of Blyth & Company, and Mr. Weiss, of Bache & Company. All of these men had extensive practical experience in buying and selling securities and it is significant that the Government asked none of them to testify as to their opinion of the market consequences of the judgment proposed by the Government.

In contrast to the type of evidence introduced by the Government on this phase of the case, the defendants introduced the testimony of men charged with the responsibility of investing large funds and men of wide experience in the business of marketing large blocks of stocks and other securities. The defendants also called one economist.

[Defendants' Evidence]

The defendants introduced the testimony of Mr. Sumner B. Emerson, since 1936 a partner or officer in Morgan, Stanley & Co., one of the leading underwriting firms in the country. Mr. Emerson is in charge of handling underwritings of stock offerings and other securities underwritten and sold by his firm. His testimony was that the probable impact of the adoption and execution of the Government plan on the market price of the common stock of General Motors would be in the area of 20% to 25% below what the stock would sell for in the absence of such a plan. In making this estimate he took into consideration the periodic forced sales by the trustee and also other selling which would take place, particularly by stockholders of du Pont who received General Motors shares and had to pay ordinary income taxes on the value thereof at the time of receipt. He also thought that the figure of 20% to 25% might be exceeded in periods when the stock market was thin or tending downward.

Mr. Emerson assumed that sales by the trustee would be made through experienced underwriters, and sales by others would be scattered and disorganized. Those selling through underwriters would lose not only the reduction in market price but also the expense of the offering, i. e., the spread, estimated at $1.50 per share upward.

Mr. Emerson said that the offering and the situation surrounding it were without precedent, and that the market impact would be greater than that of any other offering of which he knew. Emerson further testified that it would not be feasible for the trustee to make the sales in the first 10 years under the limitations in the Government proposal. In other words, the trustee would not receive the fair value of the stock.

This witness also held the opinion that the adoption of the Government plan would have a serious impact on the market price of the common stock of the du Pont Company. He said there would be very heavy selling because of the heavy tax on the receipt by such stockholders of General Motors shares. For this purpose Emerson used a table he had had prepared showing the tax advantage of selling the du Pont stock and paying a capital gain tax, as against receiving the General Motors stock as a dividend on du Pont stock and paying ordinary income tax on its value. He estimated that 4,000,000 shares of du Pont would be offered for sale. He contrasted with this the annual volume in the last 2 years on the stock exchange, which was approximately 800,000 shares.

Emerson pointed out that there would not only be no increase in demand for du Pont stock but a decrease in demand, because individuals buying du Pont would be buying into a tax problem and trustees buying du Pont would be buying into a tax problem and an allocation problem. He said there would be some increased buying by corporations and institutions if the price decreased sufficiently.

Mr. Emerson estimated that, if the Government proposed decree became effective, du Pont stock would sell at least 25% under what it would otherwise sell for, and the decrease might be much larger. He said that this reduction in market value would be over and above the decrease in the market value of the stock of du Pont due to the distribution of the General Motors stock.

Mr. Emerson was also asked about the suggestion in the Government memorandum of September 26 that the General Motors stock be distributed by du Pont in lieu of cash dividends. He was of the opinion that this would increase the impact on the market price of General Motors because more General Motors would be sold by stockholders of du Pont who would otherwise have no cash income from du Pont. He estimated the impact in this case would be from 25% to 30%. He said it would increase the impact on the market price of du Pont stock, for people dislike a stock that pays no cash dividends. He estimated the impact under such a plan would be between 30% and 35%.*

Emerson was asked about the further suggestion in the Government's Reply Memorandum that the period for distribution and selling be stretched out to twenty years instead of ten. He thought the impact on General Motors stock would be less than under the ten-year plan, that is, 12% to 15%. He also estimated that such a plan would have an impact on the market value of du Pont stock of at least 15%.

Tabulations were introduced through Mr. Emerson showing the loss to Christiana which would result from the execution of the Government proposed decree, assuming various sales prices received by Christiana for General Motors stock. Taking prices estimated by Emerson, that is, after a market impact of 20% and 25%, the loss from the then current market value of $46 per share, including cost of selling and taxes, was $332,429,000 and $362,412,000, respectively. A similar tabulation for Delaware, but including additional loss on the asset value of Christiana shares owned by Delaware, was $140,870,000 and $153,566,000, respectively. The combined realized losses were shown on these tables for the two companies at $364,694,000 and $397,578,000, respectively. These figures are not the sum of the separate figures for the two companies but eliminate duplication which would occur from simply combining such figures.

To present the effect of the Government plan on Christiana and Delaware, further tabulations were introduced through Mr. Emerson giving pro forma income of Christiana based on reinvestment of the net proceeds of the sales of General Motors shares at a yield equal to the current yield on the Dow Jones industrials and contrasting that pro forma income with actual income for 1958. This showed a decrease of 26.8%. The same figure for Delaware showed a decrease of 26.6%. Similar tables were introduced showing the effect on the income of Christiana and Delaware in case a bill such as S. 200 were enacted. The decrease would not be dissimilar. It was 25% in the case of Christiana and 24.6% in the case of Delaware.

Not only do compilations from the lists of stockholders of Christiana, du Pont and General Motors show that many charitable and educational institutions own shares in these companies, but there are large holdings of this type which do not appear from the stock lists. The following information was introduced in evidence regarding the holdings of Harvard University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the University of Chicago, and, in the case of Christiana, by a group of colleges and universities as of recent dates:

Harvard (including Harvard Yenching Institute): 526 shares Christiana; 6,584 shares du Pont; 84,189 shares General Motors.

M. I. T.: 360 shares Christiana; 5,335 shares du Pont; 206,831 shares General Motors. These M. I. T. investments had a total market value as of December 31, 1958,

* If this sort of plan were adopted the du Pont Company would accumulate a vast amount of cash and there would be a problem of how to reinvest it. Mr. R. Russell Pippin, Treasurer of du Pont, testified that this would result in a cash accumulation of up to $2,835,000,000. He said that the company would have no use for this cash to fulfill its capital requirements in the chemical industry. He said the company had no skills to go into other lines of business. He thought that it would be unwise to turn part of the company into a huge investment trust. He compared this sum of $2,835,000,000 with the size of the largest investment trust in the country, i.e., Massachusetts Investors Trust, with assets of about $1,500,000,000. He also spoke of legal problems which might arise if du Pont acquired other companies or their securities.

of $16,454,491, representing 10.88% of M. I. T.'s investment portfolio (not including real estate). The market price for Christiana shares used in this computation was $14,100. Christiana stock is not listed on the New York Stock Exchange but is traded in the over-the-counter market.

University of Chicago: 150 shares Christiana; 4,460 shares du Pont; 21,815 shares General Motors.

A group of 14 tax-exempt institutions (excluding the University of Chicago's 150 shares) held 1,519 shares of Christiana on June 30, 1958. These would have a market value of $21,417,900, using the per share figure just stated. The total holdings in Christiana including Harvard, M. I. T. and Chicago have a market value of $36,025,500.

Mr. Dallstream, amicus curiae, questioned Mr. Emerson on features of his voluntary takedown proposal. Mr. Emerson was of the opinion that the present du Pont common stock would sell at a slightly lower market value than a combination of a du Pont Special Common and an allocable number of shares of General Motors. Mr. Emerson said there would be buying by arbitragers. He testified that certain classes of shareholders would find the takedown attractive, assuming the tax effects contended for by Dallstream—tax-free institutions, corporate stockholders, investment trusts and foreign holders. An arbitrager, David T. Skall, Vice President of A. G. Becker & Company, Chicago investment bankers, testified that the new du Pont Special Common would be more desirable than the old common because it would not be under the cloud of a possible future compulsory divestiture of General Motors stock by du Pont. He said that a corporate arbitrager would have a particular advantage under the tax laws in purchasing present du Pont common, taking down General Motors and selling the General Motors and the special du Pont.

Another experienced underwriter who testified for the defendants was Mr. Winthrop C. Lenz, a Vice President of Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner and Smith, Incorporated, and a partner of the predecessor partnership, in charge of the corporate buying department of the underwriting division. Merrill, Lynch is the largest brokerage firm in the country, the largest commodity firm, and one of the ten largest underwriting firms, with 126 offices in 108 cities. There were 71 partners prior to incorporation. The firm has 6,500 employees. It does 14.7% of the round-lot volume and 21.1% of the odd-lot volume on the New York Stock Exchange, and has between 325,000 and 350,000 active accounts. Lenz' firm was one of the managing underwriters of the Ford Motor Car secondaries.

He testified that, if the Government plan were put into effect, there would be a substantially adverse impact on the market price of General Motors common stock. Lenz' opinion was that, if the Government proposal were put into effect, General Motors stock would sell 20% to 30% below where it would otherwise sell, but without taking into account additional selling by holders of the existing 218,000,000 shares in the hands of the public, which he thought would be substantial. Lenz emphasized the problem of the selling which would be done by the existing holders of such shares. He pointed out that there were hundreds of thousands of such shareholders who would be very badly hurt, in his judgment, by the proposal if it were put into effect. He said his firm alone has on its books in its name for some 25,000 individuals 2,600,000 shares of General Motors and that, if the Government proposal were put into effect, the firm would have to inform the holders, would then be asked by them what they should do, and the firm would have to tell such holders that they should sell. Lenz also pointed out that, if 1% of the General Motors stock other than that owned by du Pont were sold, there would be another 2,000,000 shares on the market and, if 2% were sold, another 4,000,000 shares, and it would all be disorganized selling. Lenz testified that it would not be at all practicable to organize such stockholders for a single secondary offering as had been suggested by the Government witness, Dr. Friend. There were too many of them; such a secondary would be too expensive; and most of them would want to race into the market ahead of the others. Lenz said that the problem of selling by the existing General Motors shareholders may be the most difficult problem involved in the Government proposal.

Lenz thought that, if the plan were extended so that there was a 20-year period instead of a 10-year period, the impact on the same basis would be from 15% to 20%.

He was also asked to make an assumption that du Pont pay out the General Motors stock in lieu of its regular cash dividend. Lenz thought this would be worse and that the impact would be a decrease in market price of General Motors of between 25% and 35%. Lenz was asked what the effect would be if du Pont were required to make a single dividend of the General Motors stock. He thought that there would be many more sales of General Motors stock and a still greater depressing effect on the market.

Lenz thought that the Government plan would cause the sale of from 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 shares of du Pont. He said that, even if that amount were cut in half, it would still be difficult to dispose of such shares. He thought the market impact would be a decrease of around 25% to 30%. He could not see who would buy du Pont stock under such conditions, except for tax-free institutions and corporations which might buy at bargain prices.

Lenz estimated that the spread which the trustee for Christiana and Delaware would have to pay underwriters would be from $1.80 to $2 per share of General Motors, which would be a loss to Christiana and Delaware on top of the reduction in market price due to the Government proposal. Lenz said, if the trustee tried to make a sale and then withdrew it, it would be very difficult to revive buyer interest. It would appear that sales by the trustee would probably have to be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission under the Securities Act of 1933. Lenz did not think there would be too much difference in selling, whether the offering were registered or not, except that there would be less flexibility if registered.*

Lenz agreed with Emerson that the trustee would never realize a price, in the words of the Government proposal, "sufficiently high to reflect the fair value and true worth of the stock."

Lenz also gave his opinion as to the effect of the Government plan in case a bill such as S. 200 passed and the du Pont Company made one distribution of the 63,000,000 shares of General Motors, but where the trustee still sold shares going to Christiana and Delaware in ten equal annual installments. He estimated a 10% to 15% decrease in market price.

Mr. James R. Forgan, a partner of Glore, Forgan and Company, an investment banking firm in New York and Chicago, testified for General Motors. He is in charge of the operations of the New York office and has been in the business of marketing securities for nearly thirty years. He testified that, if the decree proposed by the Government were to be entered, the market for General Motors stock would be drastically depressed. He said that, in addition to the 2,000,000 shares a year to be sold by the trustee, another 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 shares a year would be sold by du Pont stockholders receiving General Motors stock and there would be further sales by existing General Motors stockholders.

Mr. Forgan testified there was no precedent for the situation which would be created by the Government proposal. He said it would be a unique situation in investment history. His opinion was that the trustee stock could only be sold under these conditions at a 30% discount from the existing market and that the stock would fall to that price immediately upon the Government plan becoming effective.

The defendants introduced the testimony of Mr. Ralph Lowell, President of The Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company and a member of the Finance Committee of John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company. The Trust Company has 4,400 trust and agency accounts with over $1,187,000,000 of assets. These trusts hold 467,357 shares of General Motors and 89,100 shares of du Pont. The Trust Company has many small accounts.

Mr. Lowell testified that, in case the Government plan were put into effect, the Trust Company would sell the du Pont stock held in most personal trusts because the Massachusetts law would require a trustee to treat General Motors stock received as a dividend as income, whereas the Trust Company would consider the distribution as principal. He said the Trust Company would do the same thing in the case of charitable trusts for a similar reason. He said the Trust Company had taken such action in the case of stock dividends by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. He said that extension of the period of the plan from 10 to 20 years would not change the action of the Trust Company.

* After the record was closed, the Government put before the Court correspondence between the Antitrust Division and a member of the staff of the Securities and Exchange Commission regarding methods of sale by the trustee. The correspondence was fragmentary. There were indications that conversations in addition to the correspondence must have taken place. The correspondence should not be given serious consideration under such circumstances. However, as indicated above, registration is not a very important factor in appraising the situation.

On this phase of the case Mr. David M. Kennedy, Chairman of the Board of the Continental Illinois Bank and Trust Company of Chicago and Chairman of its Trust Investment Committee, testified that the Trust Company has been a net seller of du Pont stock from the date of the Supreme Court decision, June 4, 1957, to February 19, 1959, and that most of the selling was done since the announcement of the Government proposal. He said that the net sales amounted to 16,715 shares. Mr. Kennedy also testified that there would be serious trust problems in connection with the receipt of General Motors stock as a dividend and this would cause protracted litigation. He said the Trust Company had held in 635 trusts 105,855 shares of du Pont stock, with a market value, at $217 a share, of $22,970,535, and that the Company held 845,323 shares of General Motors common in 1,221 trusts, with a market value, at $46 per share, of $38,884.858.

Mr. Beacom, Vice President in charge of the Trust Department of the First National Bank of Chicago, also testified on this phase of the case. He testified that the Bank held in 1,822 trusts 853,650 shares of General Motors of a market value, at $46 per share, of $39,267,900. There were 133,490 share of du Pont in 946 trusts with a total market value, at $230 a share, of $30,702,700. Mr. Beacom testified that the Government plan would adversely affect the value of both du Pont and General Motors stock. He emphasized that there would be no offset in demand against the additional supply which would go on the market. He thought there would be an avalanche of offerings of du Pont stock from trust institutions throughout the country. He said the Bank had come to the conclusion that the Government proposed decree would cost the accounts to which General Motors stock might be distributed as much as $10,000,000 to $12,000,000. Mr. Beacom also stressed the problems of allocation between principal and income in the trusts of the General Motors stock received as a dividend.

In rebuttal the Government called Mr. George B. Rogers, a lawyer with the First National Bank of Chicago, to bring out that there had been allocations to trusts of dividends in stock of other companies without difficulty in the past. But the size of the distributions was small compared to the distribution proposed under the Government decree and this evidence does not detract from the testimony of Messrs. Lowell, Kennedy and Beacom to the effect that there would probably be allocation difficulties for trustees and litigation with beneficiaries if the Government decree were put into effect.

The defendants introduced the testimony of two men whose business was the investment of insurance company funds. Mr. Charles F. Caley, Jr., Assistant Treasurer of Aetna Life Insurance Company and affiliated companies, in charge of making the original recommendations on the companies' investments in common stocks, testified. The Aetna Life Insurance Company has assets of $3,550,000,000, making it about seventh in the life insurance field. The affiliated companies have assets of $616,000,000, which make them fourth or fifth in the fire and casualty insurance business. The companies have about $240,000,000 in common stocks. They own 27,600 shares of du Pont and 50,205 shares of General Motors. Caley was of the opinion that the Government plan, if put into effect, would substantially lower the price of General Motors stock. He said his company would not buy in the early part of the 10-year period, except at "an absurdly low price." He said he did now know how far down the price of du Pont would go, and he would take the advice of investment bankers and brokers on that. Caley was asked what the situation would be if du Pont paid out the General Motors stock in lieu of cash dividends. He though the investment problem of the accumulated cash would be difficult and could easily cause trouble for du Pont with the Department of Justice.

Mr. John V. Herd was the other insurance executive who testified. He is Chief Executive Officer of the America Fore Insurance Group and a director of the America Fore Loyalty Group, a total of twelve companies in the fire and casualty insurance business, with assets in excess of $1,500,000,000. Herd is also a director of American Telephone and Telegraph Company, the Dominick Fund, an investment company, and the Hanover Bank, a New York City bank with a large trust department. He is a member of the Trust Committee of the Bank. The America Fore Group have $820,000,000 invested in common stocks, which Herd said was by far the largest investment in common stocks under any one insurance company management. The companies held 249,500 shares of General Motors as of the year-end, with the then market value of $12,350,250. The corresponding holding of du Pont was 123,300 shares, with a market value of $26,355.375. Herd testified that if the Government plan were adopted the market value of General Motors stock would be depressed, and also that his company would sell some of its General Motors stock. Herd said that the Government plan would take the blue chip luster from the General Motors stock.

Another financial expert called by the defendants was Mr. William B. Moses, Jr., a trustee of Massachusetts Investors Trust and a director of Massachusetts Growth Stock Fund, who administers the investment research department of both funds. Massachusetts Investors Trust is the largest open-end investment company in the country, with approximately 200,000 shareholders and assets of $1,500,000,000, almost entirely in common stocks. The Growth Fund has assets of $250,000,000 invested in common stocks believed to have substantial prospects for growth development. The Growth Stock Fund has about 69,000 stockholders. Moses said that Massachusetts Investors Trust owns 700,000 shares of General Motors with a market value of approximately $32,000,000, and that it had 112,000 shares of du Pont, with a value of about $25,000,000. He said the Growth Stock Fund held no General Motors, but had 17,000 shares of du Pont.

Moses held the view that the Government plan would depress the price of General Motors stock. He said he would recommend that the Massachusetts Investors Trust purchase additional General Motors in the price area of $35 or $40 a share, compared to the then current price of $46 per share. Moses thought the impact of sales by du Pont stockholders receiving General Motors shares would be greater than the impact of the trustee's sales. He thought the trustee would have to sell at a bargain level. Moses thought the Government plan would depress the price of du Pont stock, because stockholders would sell to avoid the tax, and that there would be very few wanting to buy the stock. He said he would recommend that his companies purchase du Pont if the price of the stock receded to about $160 a share, the price at the time of the hearing being about $230 a share.

Defendants called one economist not in the business of investing funds or marketing securities. He was Dr. Neil H. Jacoby, Dean of the Graduate School of Business Administration at the University of California. Dr. Jacoby served on the President's Council of Economic Advisors from 1953 to 1955. He was also American advisor to the Government of India, and the United States representative on the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. Dr. Jacoby testified on the basis of the economic factors which he found to be relevant that the Government plan would reduce the value of du Pont stock. He said that, if du Pont paid out General Motors stock in lieu of cash dividends, the consequences would be even more severe. He also testified that such a policy might well create other serious problems as to the ability of du Pont to invest the accumulated cash profitably and legally. The resulting problem in his opinion would be not only that of the du Pont management but also a concern of Government officials charged with enforcing the antitrust laws.

Dr. Jacoby also testified that adoption of the Government plan would materially affect the value of General Motors stock because of the substantial increase in supply without any compensating increase in demand.

Dr. Jacoby did not attempt to assess the stock market reactions that might influence the market prices of du Pont and General Motors stock. He recognized that such factors might serve to accentuate the effects which purely economic factors would have on the value of du Pont and General Motors stock. He also emphasized that, if unfavorable economic conditions should occur during the period covered by the Government plan, the economic consequences of the Government plan could be appreciably greater. He noted that unfavorable conditions of the kind described above had occurred in the past 10 years.

Mr. Moses, of Massachusetts Investors Trust, testified that General Motors had raised $700,000,000 through new financing during the past ten years and that the prospect is that General Motors would need still more money during the next ten years. He said that the Government proposal would hamper General Motors in its effort to raise money through the sale of common stock.* Emerson expressed the opinion that it would be a very difficult operation for General Motors to finance through the issuance of common stock during the period the Government decree was in effect. Lenz testified that the Government plan would make financing by General Motors through sale of its stock highly uneconomic and very difficult of accomplishment. Forgan held the view that, if the Government plan were in effect, the price at which General Motors could do financing through the sale of common stock would be so low that the Company would be ill advised to use that form of financing. He would advise General Motors against such an operation. He doubted whether an underwriting group could be formed under such circumstances. Jacoby thought the plan would handicap General Motors in raising equity capital.

While there is no evidence that the Government proposal would make it difficult for General Motors to do debt financing, the Government's witness, Mr. Shanks, President of Prudential Life Insurance Company, testified that a company could not do continuous debt financing without doing some equity financing as well and that the Government plan would pretty well prevent General Motors from equity financing.

Inability of General Motors to do equity financing might have a serious adverse effect on General Motors raising the capital needed to maintain its position in the industry.

The foregoing are economic effects the risk of which cannot be ignored in considering the desirability of the forced distribution and forced sale features of the Government proposal.

[Voting Control of General Motors]

In considering the type of decree which should be entered, evidence should be considered as to any possible voting control of General Motors by corporations or individuals affiliated with du Pont which might result from the decree.

No testimony was introduced in the relief hearings on this branch of the case. Instead, tabulations of various stockholdings in Delaware, Christiana, du Pont and General Motors and of du Pont family relationships were introduced. Such other evidence as there is on the subject is contained in the record of the original trial.

[Votes—"Pass Through" Plan]

The contentions of the Government regarding potential control of General Motors through the votes inhering in its common stock can most conveniently be discussed against the background of the du Pont plan. Under the du Pont plan the votes on the shares of General Motors stock owned by du Pont are passed through pro rata to the stockholders of du Pont, and the votes going to Christiana and Delaware are passed through successively to their ultimate stockholders. Although the du Pont plan does not provide for Christiana passing through the votes on the 535,500 shares of General Motors held by it, the discussion below assumes that such votes are passed through.

[Government Contention—Groupings]

The contention of the Government is that the General Motors stock allocable to Christiana, Delaware and the stockholders of Delaware should be sold because otherwise it can be assumed that certain groups of stockholders of du Pont, Christiana and Delaware would act in concert in exercising the votes on General Motors stock passed through to them. In the Government's memorandum of September 26, 1958, the contention was that individuals who were stockholders of Delaware would control General Motors as a group by use of the votes they would receive from du Pont, from Christiana and from Delaware under the du Pont plan, when such votes were added to the votes on their directly owned General Motors shares. From the evidence adduced at the trial it appears that the vote on approximately 1.8% of General Motors stock would come in the aggregate to the stockholders of Delaware (other than charities) in the event of the pass through of the votes, including the vote on directly held General Motors stock. In addition, the personal foundations directly related to this group, namely, Longwood Foundation, Inc., and the Carpenter Foundation, Inc., would exercise voting rights on somewhat in excess of 1,000,000 shares of the General Motors stock. Adding the two together, the resulting votes would represent slightly over 2% of the outstanding General Motors stock.

In its brief of April 29, 1959, and accompanying proposed findings, the Government contends that additional individuals, each having the name du Pont as some part of his name, should also be grouped with the stockholders of Delaware, and that certain corporations in which these individuals, and also stockholders of Delaware, own stock, or on whose boards they sit, should be placed in the group. The contention is that the votes which all these 65 persons now have and would receive on a pass-through would amount to about 8% of the total General Motors vote and that this is a controlling vote. There was no evidence adduced at the hearings as to the basis for the grouping other than statements of relationships, many of which are very remote, and statements of financial interests in companies such as the old 1899 du Pont Corporation.

To determine whether there is any basis for the groupings contended for by the Government, the genesis of the present-day stock interests of members of the "du Pont family" in du Pont, Christiana and Delaware, as shown by the record on the original trial, should be analyzed. The term "du Pont family," as now used by the Government, includes all lineal descendants (and their spouses) of Pierre S. du Pont de Nemours, a great-great-grandfather of the Pierre S. du Pont, who was a defendant in this case. However, as set forth in paragraph 7 of the amended complaint, the Government did not thereafter claim in the original trial a family grouping beyond the eight brothers and sisters of the defendant, Pierre S. du Pont, and their spouses and descendants.

It would seem to the Court that, regardless of whether there is basis for the latter grouping, the history of the Companies shows that there is no basis for combining in any group the remote relations consisting of the people first described, i. e., descendants of Pierre S. du Pont de Nemours, merely by reason of such descent, or persons simply because they had a financial interest in the old du Pont Company of 1899.

[Relevant History]

The relevant history starts in 1899 when the du Pont enterprise was first incorporated. The stockholders were individuals with the name du Pont although not in the families of the defendant Pierre S. du Pont or his eight brothers and sisters.

In 1902 the assets of the 1899 Corporation were sold out and were acquired by three cousins, two of whom had not theretofore been interested in the business, T. Coleman du Pont and Pierre S. du Pont, the new investors, and Alfred I. du Pont. These men formed a new corporation to which the business was transferred. The bulk of the stock, 72%, was acquired 36% by T. Coleman du Pont, 18% by Pierre S. du Pont, and 18% by Alfred I. du Pont. Following this sellout of the 1899 Company there was no basis for grouping its stockholders with defendant Pierre S. du Pont or his brothers and sisters, except for T. Coleman du Pont and Alfred I. du Pont.

This situation broke up in 1915 when the defendant, Pierre S. du Pont, and some of his brothers and brothers-in-law and certain associates formed another corporation which acquired the stock of T. Coleman du Pont. This corporation was the predecessor of Christiana. Substantially all of the du Pont stock now held by Christiana, about 27%, traces back to this transaction. Pierre S. du Pont, with his brothers and brothers-in-law, held a substantial majority of the stock of Christiana.

Following this transaction, which eliminated T. Coleman du Pont from the situation, there was a protracted and bitter litigation between the defendant, Pierre S. du Pont, and his cousin, Alfred I. du Pont. The defendant Pierre ultimately won out and Alfred I. du Pont then retired from any active participation in the affairs of the du Pont Company. Consequently, the Court is of the opinion that there is no basis for grouping relatives of Alfred I. du Pont or T. Coleman du Pont with the defendant Pierre S. du Pont and his brothers and sisters and their families.

The origin of Delaware traces to a transaction in 1924 in which the defendant Pierre S. du Pont conveyed to Delaware a substantial portion of his holdings in Christiana and du Pont and in consideration therefor received a substantial annuity for himself and his wife. The stock of Delaware was initially purchased in eight equal blocks by the families of his eight brothers and sisters. All of the Christiana and du Pont stock now held by Delaware was acquired in this transaction. As a result of this transaction and subsequent transactions, the stock of Christiana which was initially held in most part by defendant Pierre S. du Pont and the families of his brothers and sisters is now held as follows: 49,000 shares, about one-third, by Delaware, 24,453 shares by individuals who are stockholders of Delaware, and the balance by approximately 4,000 stockholders. This Christiana stock is actively traded in the over-the-counter market. Delaware holds, in addition to the 49,000 shares of Christiana common, 1,217,920 shares of du Pont common. The Delaware stock is, generally speaking, still held by the families of the brothers and sisters of the defendant Pierre S. du Pont—some 140 persons.

Substantial amounts of this Delaware and Christiana stock are not held directly in these families, but are in trusts for them at the Wilmington Trust Company. The Wilmington Trust Company has close ties with many members of these families through their holdings of Wilmington Trust Company stock and through their creation of these trusts in the Trust Company.

A majority of the officers and directors of both Christiana and Delaware come from such families and many of them are officers and directors of du Pont.

Counsel for Christiana and Delaware contend that there is no justification for assuming that the families of the brothers and sisters of defendant Pierre S. du Pont (who comprise the stockholders of Delaware and some additional individuals) and the Wilmington Trust Company would act in concert to vote their General Motors stock. They point to the fact that an analogous claim was made and disproved as to many of these same people in this case. It was charged that some of these people, through ownership of approximately 17% of the voting stock of U. S. Rubber, influenced the trade relations between du Pont, General Motors and U. S. Rubber, and that charge was disproved.

A corollary question on this branch of the case is whether, even if these people acted in concert, they would have sufficient voting rights under the "pass-through" of the du Pont plan to exercise any real control over General Motors. As set forth above, the stockholders of Delaware, other than public charities, would have a total of slightly in excess of 2% of the total General Motors votes. The tabulations now in evidence show that additional members of the eight families who are not direct or beneficial stockholders of Delaware would have an additional 1,263,806 votes, not including votes connected with trusts at Wilmington Trust Company. If these votes were combined with the votes of Delaware stockholders, the total would be about 2.5% of the General Motors total. Even if there were added in the additional votes which the Wilmington Trust Company would have from various sources, 9,513,311 (or 3.4%), the total per cent would increase to only about 5.9%. It seems doubtful that this is a sufficiently large number of votes to exercise any real control over General Motors.

[Question Need Not Be Decided]

However, the Court does not deem it necessary to decide this question because, as will be shown hereafter, it intends to direct a form of decree which will obviate the determination of the two questions whether these people would act in concert and whether, if they did, they would have control or influence.

The proposed Government decree (as supplemented by the Assistant Attorney General's letter to the Internal Revenue Service, dated March 13, 1958 (Amicus Dallstream Exhibit 2)) provides that the trustee for shares of General Motors stock distributed as dividends to Christiana and Delaware by du Pont, before selling the shares in the market, shall give fifteen-day options or rights to purchase such shares to other stockholders of du Pont. There is no specification regarding the price at which the shares may be purchased under such option or rights. It would seem that the price would have to be the market price in order that there be no unjustified taking of property from Christiana and Delaware and giving it to other stockholders of du Pont. But, if it is the market price, there would be no incentive to such other stockholders to purchase the shares since they receive many such shares as dividends and know that the trustee must make a general offering of General Motors shares and that the market price will be further depressed. Accordingly, it appears to the Court that the provision is without substance. It is apparently inserted to give the appearance that the offering by the trustee is similar to a rights offering by a corporation to its own stockholders. There is no such similarity.

The Government decree also provides that such trustee may in his discretion accelerate the time schedule for the sale of shares of General Motors allocable to Christiana, Delaware and the stockholders of Delaware by selling more than one-tenth in any one year. However, the trustee will not hold any stock for the accounts of these persons until the dividend is declared each year and paid to all stockholders of du Pont. Accordingly, there is no way he can accelerate the time schedule. The provision was apparently inserted to indicate that the trustee would have additional flexibility in making the sales, but it is meaningless.

Apparently also to indicate that the trustee would have flexibility in making sales of General Motors shares, the Government proposed decree provides:

> "If, in the judgment of the trustee, reasonable market conditions do not prevail over an appreciable and adequate portion of this one-year period, the trustee may petition the Court for an order extending this time for such additional part of the 10-year period as the Court may direct. In addition to such other circumstances as may be relevant, reasonable market conditions shall not be deemed to exist if the price which can be realized at the time by the trustee is not sufficiently high to reflect the fair value and true worth of the stock."

However, it was testified that the trustee could never realize during the ten-year period a price sufficiently high to reflect the fair value and true worth of the stock. Accordingly, this provision would make the Government proposed decree a virtual nullity unless the intent is that, at the end of the ten-year period, the trustee shall dump all of the approximately 20 million shares of General Motors then belonging to Christiana, Delaware and the stockholders of Delaware on the market at any price. The latter would not be a sensible proposal. However, the provision does indicate that the Government concedes that these shareholders of du Pont should not be penalized and should receive the fair value and true worth of the General Motors stock. The mechanics of accomplishing this desirable objective are simply faulty.

The provision for a trustee appointed by the Court and acting as a Court Officer to handle the marketing of 20,000,000 shares of stock over a ten-year period having a present value of approximately $1,000,000,000, seems to the Court to be singularly inappropriate. According to the Government witness Boni, who was called as an expert, the Court should lay out a program for its trustee. The trustee would have to exercise discretion about when to sell the stock. Boni then conceded that the trustee might have to call in underwriters to make a secondary offering, with whom the trustee would have to make a contract. The trustee would undoubtedly seek the advice of the Court in order to share his great responsibility. This Court does not believe that any court should be called upon to exercise such a function in the case of stock transactions of such complexity and magnitude.

[Nature of Relief—Problems]

The problems that arise with respect to the nature of the relief that should be granted fall into two categories: First, there is the question of what provision the judgment should make with respect to the 63,000,000 shares of General Motors stock owned by du Pont. Second, there is the question of what provisions the judgment should contain by way of injunctive relief in addition to the provisions that deal with the stock. The Court will deal with these problems separately.

[Stock—Two Categories]

In view of the Court's decision, the General Motors stock owned by du Pont should be considered in two categories:

1. The stock allocable to all stockholders of du Pont other than Christiana and Delaware—approximately 43,000,000 shares.

2. The stock allocable to Christiana and Delaware—approximately 20,000,000 shares.

[Shareholders of Delaware]

The Court has held earlier in this opinion that no relief can be granted against the shareholders of Delaware who are also shareholders of du Pont because they are indispensable parties and are not before the Court. Accordingly, no separate discussion of the shares of General Motors allocable to this group of stockholders of du Pont is necessary.

[Divestiture of Voting Rights—"Pass Through" Method]

Considering first the shares of stock of General Motors allocable to the stockholders of du Pont other than Christiana and Delaware, the Court has no doubt that the voting rights of these shares should be divested. The Court is of the opinion that this divestiture should be accomplished by passing through the vote on these shares to the stockholders of du Pont. The parties are in virtual agreement that this measure of relief is desirable and practical. The Government plan proposes this kind of divestiture of the voting rights pending the distribution and sale of the stock provided for by that plan. The plans submitted by du Pont and the amici also provide for divestiture of the voting rights.

Therefore, the final judgment should provide for this divestiture and should require both du Pont and General Motors to take whatever steps may be required to make the pass-through of the vote effective. The judgment should provide that the Court appoint a monitor whose duty it will be to supervise the effectiveness of the voting provisions of the judgment and to report to the Court. In this connection the judgment should also provide that the passed-through vote should not be exercised on any shares allocable to anyone who is an officer or director of the du Pont Company, since to do so would be inconsistent with the purposes of this divestiture. This limitation should extend as well to the members of the family of any such officer or director residing in the same household with him. In addition, the final judgment should also prohibit this same group from voting any other General Motors shares. These provisions taken together will assure that no officer or director of du Pont will be in any position to exercise a vote with respect to General Motors shares. They are in substantial accordance with the proposal made in the plan submitted by the amici. Divestiture of the voting rights on the General Motors shares should be effective as long as du Pont continues to hold legal title to those shares.

[Representation on Board—Interlocking Directorates]

It is also the opinion of the Court that the judgment should divest the General Motors stock owned by du Pont of any right to representation on the Board of General Motors. To this end the judgment should enjoin both du Pont and General Motors from having any common officers and directors or employees in substantially the form requested by the Government. Du Pont has proposed a form of judgment which would permit the Court to sanction interlocking directorates between the two companies, provided that the common directors did not participate in any discussions or decisions on the Board of General Motors relating to its commercial relations with du Pont. In the Court's opinion such a provision in the judgment would not be appropriate. The separation between the two Boards should be complete and should be accomplished by the resignation from the one Board or the other of any existing common directors within a reasonable time after the entry of the judgment, that time to be fixed by the terms of the judgment itself.

[No Divestiture of Legal Title]

This leaves for consideration the question of whether the judgment should also provide for the divestiture of du Pont's legal title to the General Motors stock, either in accordance with the plan proposed by the Government, some modification of that plan, or by some other method. With the voting rights of the stock divested, and with its right to representation on the Board of General Motors also divested, as provided for above, the possession of the legal title by du Pont will leave du Pont with the right

1) to receive dividends on the stock,

2) to share pro rata with other stockholders in the assets of General Motors in the event of liquidation,

3) to dispose of the legal title.

In this connection it should be noted that it is not disputed that for many years du Pont has passed on to its stockholders as dividends the amount of the dividends that it has received from General Motors less the amount of the intercorporate dividend tax. There is no suggestion that du Pont intends to modify or abandon this practice.

On the contrary, the testimony of the Treasurer of the du Pont Company shows that its financial projections for the future have been made on the assumption that this practice will continue. This discussion of the question of the right to receive dividends leads the Court to the conclusion that as a practical matter retention of the bare legal title to the stock by du Pont will leave it simply with the right to share pro rata in the assets of General Motors and the right to dispose of that legal title. Neither of these attributes of ownership would appear to raise any problem in the context of this case. Should a situation arise where either of these attributes took on significance it appears likely that the only action du Pont could take by reason of such attributes of ownership would encourage the enforcement of the antitrust laws and assist in carrying out the mandate of the Supreme Court.

The question then is whether with the legal title stripped of all of the incidents of ownership except those heretofore mentioned, the Court should also require divestiture of that legal title. The Court has heretofore held that it is not required, as a matter of law, to divest the bare legal title unless it finds on the facts that divestiture is required to eliminate the effects of the acquisition of the stock found to be offensive to the statute. The question is, therefore, whether the Court can find that in this case it is necessary to divest the bare legal title in order to remove and to guard against the probability of restraint or monopolization of trade which was the consequence the Supreme Court found to be offensive to the statute.

There is no evidence on which the Court could make such a finding. The Government did not offer any evidence that bears on this question, its principal reliance being on the legal argument that the Court is required, as a matter of law, to order divestiture of the legal title irrespective of whether that kind of divestiture was required in fact to guard against the unlawful consequence of the acquisition.* If the General Motors stock is stripped of its voting rights and of its right to representation on the Board of General Motors, as provided for above, no incidents or attributes of ownership are left with du Pont which could be used to influence the practices and policies of General Motors. General Motors would have no motive in these circumstances, arising either from fear of the exercise of the voting rights or resulting from the presence on its Board or on the committees of its Board of du Pont representatives or resulting from considerations of self-interest, to favor du Pont. It is well recognized that the normal and indeed the only way in which the holder of a substantial block of stock can influence the practices and the policies of the corporation is through the exercise or threatened exercise of voting rights or by representation on the Board of Directors. The Court is reinforced in this view by the fact that in the trial in chief and before the Supreme Court the Government relied primarily upon du Pont's voting rights and upon the participation of its representatives in the affairs of the Board of Directors of General Motors as the avenues and means which had been used or could be used by du Pont to influence the conduct of General Motors.

The Court has carefully considered whether it might be thought that if the voting rights of the General Motors stock should be distributed to the more than 200,000 shareholders of du Pont there is any reasonable possibility that those shareholders or any part of them (excluding from consideration Christiana and Delaware, which will be dealt with separately) could by voting cohesively or, as a group, influence General Motors to favor du Pont. The Government has made no showing that any such possibility exists and there is no basis in the record on which the Court could assume that anything of the kind could happen. The number of stockholders, the diversity of their interests and the unlikelihood that General Motors trade policies could be influenced by actions taken at stockholders' meetings militates against any such possibility. In addition the Court proposes, in a manner that will be stated hereafter, to provide by appropriate injunctive provisions against the remote possibility that the numerous stockholders of du Pont would nominate or elect a representative on the General Motors Board.

* Certain related contentions made by the Government as to the significance of the evidence it offered with respect to du Pont's trade relations with General Motors are discussed hereafter.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

In essence, therefore, what would be left in du Pont would be the most sterile kind of an investment. The Court notes in this connection that Section 7 of the Clayton Act expressly excludes from its operation "corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise" to bring about anti-competitive effects. There would thus appear to be a recognition on the part of Congress that the holding of stock does not in all instances carry with it the power to bring about consequences offensive to the statute. The Court recognizes that the Supreme Court has held that in the past du Pont has not held its stock in General Motors solely for investment. This Court is of the opinion, however, that the divestiture and ancillary injunctive provisions referred to hereafter will be effective to assure that hereafter General Motors stock will be held by du Pont solely for investment.

The Court has given no consideration to the question of whether the continued holding of General Motors shares under the conditions outlined above would be an attractive investment for du Pont. It goes without saying that a holding of a substantial investment of common stock, with the limitations and restrictions on such ownership to be imposed by the Court, is unusual. Du Pont will have no vote on the General Motors shares. It cannot have any representation on the General Motors Board. It passes through the dividends, minus the dividend tax, to its stockholders. Under these circumstances it is possible that the du Pont management would be motivated to dispose of the investment, or parts of it, from time to time when suitable occasions might arise. There would be nothing in the decree to prevent such dispositions.

In the circumstances, therefore, the Court finds that there is nothing in the record made in the hearing on relief or in the record in the trial in chief which would support, even by inference, the conclusion that du Pont's possession of the bare legal title to General Motors stock, stripped of its right to vote and of its right to representation on the Board of General Motors, would create any possibility that the stock would have any influence on the practices and policies of General Motors or could be used in any way that would be inconsistent with the mandate of the Supreme Court.

The question remains whether divestiture should be ordered even though it is not necessary in order to prevent the consequences condemned by the statute. It is in relation to this point that the Court is required to consider what the consequences of divestiture of the legal title would be to the shareholders of both du Pont and General Motors. On the record there can be no doubt that divestiture of the legal title would have serious adverse consequences to these stockholders. If the Government plan were to be adopted and the General Motors stock should be distributed by du Pont in addition to its usual cash dividends, the tax consequences would be extraordinarily severe and as explained above would in effect amount to a capital levy on the market value of the General Motors stock ranging in amount from 20% to 91%, and averaging perhaps 50-60% (less the dividends received credit), depending upon the tax brackets of individual stockholders.

That kind of distribution would also have adverse consequences on the market value of both General Motors and du Pont stock. The extent of those consequences is in dispute. This is a matter that cannot be measured with any degree of certainty. But the record satisfies the Court that there would be adverse consequences and that they would be substantial. Although much of the evidence offered by both sides was concerned with measuring the adverse consequences of the Government's proposed divestiture of legal title, there is no need for the Court to resolve the conflict in the evidence as to how severe those consequences would be. The Court is persuaded beyond any doubt that a judgment of the kind proposed by the Government would have very serious adverse consequences. In the circumstances, the Government is asking the Court to speculate with the property of innocent parties. It would be unreasonable and unjust for the Court to adopt measures which are certain to result in losses to innocent stockholders when the effects offensive to the statute can be eliminated by measures which will not result in such consequences. If the provisions of the decree, as outlined in this memorandum, should prove in the future to be inadequate to curb the violation, the door of the Court is open to the Government to petition for a modification of the judgment at any time.

If du Pont should discontinue completely its normal cash dividend and pay dividends entirely in the stock of General Motors for the ten year period required by the Government plan, these tax consequences would be mitigated. But, in these circumstances, the effect on the market value of General Motors stock would certainly be greater, since many more du Pont stockholders would doubtless be forced to sell in order to raise cash to pay taxes.

There is another point that deserves consideration in this connection. If du Pont should adopt this policy it seems certain that in the ten years involved the Company would accumulate an extraordinarily large amount of cash in excess of its needs for the normal development of its chemical business. In fact, the projections of the Company, which were the subject of testimony of its Treasurer and were not attacked by the Government, indicated that du Pont would accumulate an amount of approximately $2,500,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 in excess of its needs for anticipated growth. Assuming that du Pont could find useful employment for this amount of capital it seems clear that the result would be to increase enormously the power and economic position of the du Pont Company. Although the Court is aware that legally size alone does not violate the antitrust laws, the Court is of the opinion that in formulating an antitrust judgment it should not use its equitable powers in a way that seems certain to enhance the power and position of the du Pont Company and perhaps create new antitrust problems for both the Company and the Department of Justice in the future.

The Court has considered whether there might be modifications of the Government's plan or other forms of divestiture of the legal title which might reduce or mitigate these adverse consequences. The modifications of the Government's plan which were discussed in the hearing would not, in the opinion of the Court, remove these adverse consequences although they might mitigate their severity to some extent. For example, if the Government plan or any comparable arrangement should be adopted, the Court is satisfied that a longer period than ten years should be allowed for its execution. In its reply memorandum, the Government itself suggested that a period as long as twenty years might be appropriate. In this connection, the Court finds it significant that in the Aluminum case the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York allowed a ten year period for divestiture in a situation in which the problems of divestiture were less complicated and the dollar value of the property involved was substantially smaller than is the case here. Alternative methods were not suggested by any of the parties. The Court does not believe that there is any method of divesting legal title to the General Motors stock now held by du Pont which would not either impair the value of the property interests involved or impose severe tax consequences upon the stockholders of the du Pont Company.

Because divestiture of the legal title is not necessary to remove the consequences of the acquisition found to be offensive to the statute, the Court concludes that it would be unfair and repugnant to the principles of equity to impose injurious consequences upon the stockholders of du Pont and General Motors by requiring the divestiture of the legal title.

[Injunctive Provisions]

Two types of injunctive provisions appear to the Court as necessary in order to assure the effectiveness of the divestiture which the Court proposes to direct and to provide additional means of eliminating the effects offensive to the Clayton Act.

[Acquisitions of Additional Shares]

Certain of such injunctive provisions are in a sense ancillary to the divestiture order. As indicated above, du Pont and General Motors should have no common officers, directors or employees. Du Pont should be prohibited from acquiring any additional stock in General Motors substantially in the terms contemplated by Paragraph VIII of the Government's proposed judgment, except that it would seem fair to the stockholders of du Pont and in keeping with the investment character of du Pont's continued holding of General Motors shares to permit du Pont to retain such General Motors shares as it receives by virtue of stock dividends or in the exercise of rights extended with respect to its present holdings. The voting rights on any General Motors shares so received by du Pont should be subject to the pass-through in the same manner as the 63,000,000 shares presently held by du Pont. The amici curiae have suggested injunctive provisions which would prevent du Pont from bringing to bear influence on General Motors in any fashion either by nominating directors or by soliciting votes with respect to any General Motors matters. Such provisions are desirable and should be included in the final judgment. Furthermore, the judgment should provide that the voting rights of the General Motors shares which are to be passed through to the stockholders of du Pont may not be voted at any General Motors annual or special meeting in favor of any persons nominated, designated or held out in any way to be a representative of the du Pont Company or of its interests. Necessary provisions to this end directed to both du Pont and General Motors should therefore be included in the judgment.

[Trade Between Companies—Injunctive Provisions]

The second group of injunctive provisions to be considered relate directly to trade between du Pont and General Motors. Du Pont has taken the position that such provisions are unnecessary and perhaps improper in framing a decree to cure a violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act. As the Court has indicated earlier in this opinion its powers under Section 15 of the Clayton Act are exceedingly broad and extend to any activity or relationship which the Court believes must be effected in order to prevent or restrain violations of the Act. Accordingly, the Court specifically rejects the contention made by du Pont with respect to the appropriateness of injunctive provisions relating to trade between du Pont and General Motors.

In view of the fact that the Supreme Court found only a probability that du Pont's stock interest in General Motors was likely to result in a restraint of General Motors purchases of automotive fabrics and finishes, the Court is not satisfied that injunctive provisions relating to trade of the character and scope proposed by the Government are necessary. It believes, however, that in the circumstances they are appropriate and may well contribute to an elimination of the consequence offensive to the statute in accordance with the mandate of the Supreme Court.* Accordingly, provisions substantially along the lines of those suggested in Paragraph IX of the Government's proposed judgment should be incorporated in the final judgment. Such provisions will require termination of any requirements contracts, exclusive patent arrangements or arrangements relating to preferential use of discoveries which may exist between du Pont and General Motors. They will also prevent General Motors and du Pont from embarking upon joint commercial ventures. On the whole, such provisions should remain effective so long as du Pont holds any stock in General Motors, except that a period of three years after the effective date of the judgment should be sufficient insofar as the ban against requirements contracts is concerned. A ban of any longer duration would appear to be an unwarranted and unnecessary interference with General Motors right to purchase from its suppliers, including du Pont, on such terms and conditions as it is able to secure. Following the expiration of this three-year period, the parties should be permitted to enter into such requirements contracts as they desire, provided that no such contract may extend over a period longer than a single calendar or automobile model year.

At the hearing the Government sought to present in evidence a substantial number of documents reflecting efforts on the part of du Pont to sell various products to General Motors, to other automotive manufacturers and to suppliers to the automotive industry. Counsel for the Government conceded that the evidence they were offering reflected no restrictive or improper conduct. They further conceded that they were not attempting to show a violation of Section 7 with respect to any products other than automotive fabrics and finishes—the products covered by the Supreme Court's holding. The evidence, it appears, was offered on the ground that it was appropriate in a hearing on relief to consider the whole area of present and future trade relations. The Court agrees with this statement and believes that the injunctive provisions referred to above evidence a recognition of both present and future areas of trade relations between du Pont and General Motors.

* Although the Government asks for the termination of "existing" requirements contracts and preferential trade agreements of various kinds, there is no evidence that any agreements of this character are presently in effect between du Pont and General Motors or have been in effect for many years.

The Court excluded certain of the documents offered by the Government bearing on trade between du Pont and General Motors. These documents were presented as an offer of proof and submitted along with the record. The Court has had an opportunity to examine all of them. None of them suggests the slightest impropriety in du Pont's conduct of its trade relations with General Motors and other automotive manufacturers. As indicated above, the Court does not understand that the Government makes any such contention. Government counsel, in connection with the offer of these exhibits, suggested the possibility that if du Pont retained a financial stake in General Motors, even on behalf of its stockholders, du Pont would favor General Motors over other automotive manufacturers whenever du Pont developed new products useful in the automotive industry. The Court finds no support for this suggestion either in the evidence taken at the trial in chief or in the evidence received or offered at the hearing on relief. Nevertheless, the Court will direct that the injunctive provisions in the final judgment relating to trade prohibit du Pont from giving General Motors preferential access to any of its products or from selling to General Motors on terms more favorable than those made available to competitors of General Motors so long as du Pont owns any stock in General Motors.

[Christiana and Delaware—Divestiture]

Since du Pont is to retain the legal title to the General Motors shares owned by it there is no occasion to consider a sale of those shares that would be allocable to Christiana and Delaware in the event a divestment of the legal title to the shares were to be directed. The Court observes, however, that the sale contemplated by the Government's proposed judgment would have serious tax and economic consequences to the shareholders of both of these companies, which include many religious, charitable and educational organizations. Moreover, the record discloses that sales of the magnitude contemplated by the Government's proposed judgment would in all probability disrupt the market for General Motors stock and cause serious harm to the stockholders of that company. For these reasons the Court would not be constrained to order such sales unless it were satisfied that they were the only means of formulating a decree that would carry out the mandate of the Supreme Court.

There remains for consideration, however, whether the final judgment should contain any special provisions with respect to Christiana and Delaware. The Court is satisfied that because of their substantial stock interest in du Pont, and because of the long-standing close relationship between these two companies and the management of du Pont, injunctive provisions substantially similar to those that will be entered against du Pont should be directed to Christiana and Delaware to guard against any possibility that they might acquire stock in General Motors or attempt in any way to influence or control General Motors. Inasmuch as neither Christiana nor Delaware is engaged in industrial operations there appears to be no occasion to extend to them the injunctive provision which will operate on the trade relations between du Pont and General Motors.

[No "Pass Through"—Christiana and Delaware]

Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware have suggested that the latter two companies should not be permitted to vote any of the 63,000,000 shares of General Motors which they otherwise would be entitled to vote as stockholders of du Pont. Their proposal is that the vote be passed through in turn to the stockholders of Christiana and the stockholders of Delaware. If du Pont were to pass through to its stockholders the vote on the 63,000,000 General Motors shares which it owns Christiana would be entitled to vote approximately 16,805,684 shares of General Motors, and Delaware would be entitled to vote approximately 1,677,813 shares. Together Christiana and Delaware would be entitled to vote approximately 6½% of the outstanding General Motors common stock. The Government has contended that this number of shares should not be left in the hands of these two companies or distributed to their shareholders. The basis of this contention is that all of this stock, notwithstanding that it would be voted in varying amounts by some 4,000 shareholders of Christiana and some 200 shareholders of Delaware, would be voted as a block. In addition the Government asserts that some of these same shareholders own or would be able to vote additional amounts of General Motors stock so that as much as 8% of the outstanding General Motors stock would be voted as a block by people who have a substantial common stock interest in the du Pont Company. The Government further contends that such a block would constitute control of General Motors. Although the Government has made these contentions in support of its proposal to sell the General Motors stock that would be distributed to Christiana and Delaware under its proposal, it is reasonable to believe that the same contentions would be made against the efficacy of any proposal to pass through the vote on the General Motors shares owned by du Pont and allocable to Christiana and Delaware.

The Government has failed to establish by credible evidence either of the premises upon which the foregoing contentions rest. The Court is not persuaded that the General Motors shares allocable to Christiana and Delaware would be voted by their shareholders as a block. Nor is it persuaded that even if they were voted as a block they would pose any real threat that General Motors purchasing policy could be directed in a way that would favor du Pont. The Government at the hearing on relief made no effort to establish these propositions except to introduce elaborate and detailed schedules disclosing the manner in which the stock of Christiana and Delaware and du Pont was held by various stockholders of Christiana and Delaware. The Court accepts these schedules as proof that the shares are held as indicated therein. It does not believe, however, that the schedules even suggest that the owners of the stock would all vote their allocable General Motors shares in a block. No effort was made by the Government to show how even 8% of the stockholders of General Motors would go about influencing the management of that company to favor du Pont in its purchases.

This is a relief proceeding, however, and it is perhaps not incumbent upon the Government to provide the evidentiary basis for its apprehensions in the same detail as would be necessary to establish a violation of the law. The Court has determined therefore to reject the proposal that the vote be passed through to the stockholders of Christiana and Delaware and instead proposes to include provisions in the final judgment that will preclude the shareholders of Christiana and Delaware from voting their allocable portion of du Pont's 63,000,000 shares of General Motors. These shares will be sterilized and voted by no one, with the result that the 18,483,497 shares of General Motors stock allocable to Christiana and Delaware will not be voted at any General Motors annual or special meeting.

In view of the fact that Christiana and Delaware are to be precluded from voting any of their shares of General Motors stock it seems appropriate that their officers and directors, as well as the members of their immediate families living in their households, should be similarly precluded. Accordingly, as in the case of the officers and directors of du Pont, the final judgment will preclude any person from exercising the pass-through vote or from voting any General Motors stock, who is at the time of any annual or special meeting of General Motors an officer or director of Christiana or Delaware or a member of the immediate family of such officer or director and living in his household.

In this connection it should be noted that while under the Government plan 19,670,115 shares of General Motors stock would be sold and therefore the votes eliminated, nevertheless, the vote on 7,739,467 shares of General Motors stock, or 2.8%, would still be left at the end of the 10-year period with the very groups to which the Government has pointed. Indeed, at the beginning of the 10-year period the vote on 10,860,111 shares, or 3.9%, would be in such groups. In contrast, under the provisions of the judgment referred to above, the votes with respect to more than 20,000,000 shares of General Motors stock would be sterilized * and there would be left with the entire group as to which the Government has raised questions somewhat less than the 2.8% which would be left with them under the Government's plan. Furthermore, well over half of such votes would be voted by the descendants of the owners of the 1899 Company, including the Delaware Trust

* The Court, in proposing to preclude the officers and directors of du Pont, Christiana and Delaware from voting the General Motors shares which they presently hold, is actually sterilizing a substantial number of shares of General Motors stock which could be voted under the Government's proposal.

Company, who in the Court's view have only a very remote relationship to the matters involved in this litigation.

It would seem inappropriate to permit Christiana to continue to vote the 535,500 shares of General Motors stock which it owns and preclude it from voting any part of the 63,000,000 shares owned by du Pont. The Court is not entirely satisfied, however, that it is within its authority to affect Christiana's ownership of these 535,500 shares in any way since it has not been alleged by the Government that such shares were acquired or are held in violation of Section 7, and there is no basis in the record on which the Court could properly conclude that such shares have been so acquired or so held. The Court believes, however, that a sterilization of these shares would be appropriate and directs that such a provision be included in the final judgment unless Christiana wishes to present reasons why the provision should not be included. In that event the Court will give further consideration to the matter.

[Government Objections]

The Court has given careful consideration to the objections which the Government in its Reply Brief has made to any judgment which would fail to divest du Pont of the legal title to the General Motors stock and would leave du Pont with any financial interest in General Motors. The Government objects to such a judgment, first, because it "will permit a continuance of concentrated voting power of du Pont in General Motors by reason of the voting rights which would be acquired by the stockholders of Christiana, Delaware and the du Pont family." (Government Reply Brief, p. 12). The Government's second objection to such a judgment is that the "common financial interest between the defendants will continue to influence the commercial relations between du Pont and General Motors." (Government Reply Brief, p. 15).

The Court believes that the first of these objections is completely met by the provisions which the Court intends to include in the final judgment which will (1) sterilize all of the General Motors stock which, under the du Pont plan, would be voted by the stockholders of Christiana and Delaware, and (2) preclude the officers and directors of du Pont, Christiana and Delaware from exercising the voting rights on any General Motors stock, whether such stock is held directly or by the du Pont Company. These provisions will in fact do more to eliminate whatever "concentrated voting power" the stockholders of du Pont might have in General Motors than would be accomplished by the Government's plan itself. Insofar as voting power in General Motors is concerned, sterilization of the General Motors stock owned by, and allocable to, Christiana and Delaware will be just as effective as the sale of that stock in accordance with the Government's proposal. Moreover, while the Government's proposal would permit the officers and directors of du Pont and the members of their family to continue to vote any General Motors stock which they presently own and to exercise the voting rights of the General Motors stock they might receive in a distribution by du Pont, the Court proposes to enter a judgment which will preclude these persons from voting any General Motors stock.* In this connection, it is the Court's belief that the voting restrictions it proposes to impose upon the officers and directors of du Pont, Christiana and Delaware will be more effective than the prohibitions which the Government would impose upon persons who are shareholders of Delaware. It is the officers and directors of du Pont, Christiana and Delaware who would be likely to perpetuate any common control of du Pont and General Motors and they are the persons who should be precluded from voting General Motors stock. For the foregoing reasons the Court has concluded that the Government's first objection to a judgment that would leave the du Pont Company with a financial interest in General Motors has no application to the judgment which the Court proposes to enter, because that judgment will include safeguards against the continuance of any "concentrated voting power" in General Motors that will be more effective than the Government's own proposal.

With respect to the Government's second contention, there is no rational basis on which the Court could find that such common financial interest as will exist between du Pont and General Motors under the judgment proposed by the Court can be expected to influence the commercial relationships between the two companies in any way. In the first place, the judgment will contain stringent injunctions against du Pont and General Motors dealing with each other on a non-competitive or preferential basis. In this respect, the restrictions are more drastic than those proposed by the Government. The Court has no reason to believe that these restrictions will not be observed by the parties, and has every reason to expect that any failure to observe them will be brought to the Court's attention. In many instances where the antitrust laws have been violated, injunctive provisions of the kind which the Court proposes to enter are the sole remedies against further violations. On the whole, these remedies appear to have been effective and there is no reason to believe they will not be similarly effective in this case.

* Presumably the Government's plan would operate on some portion of this stock, i. e., that which is held by shareholders of Delaware who are also shareholders and officers or directors of du Pont. As the Court has found, however, it is without jurisdiction to order the relief proposed by the Government against the stockholders of Delaware.

In the second place, nothing in the record supports the view that in the particular circumstances of this case, du Pont's ownership of a bare legal title to the stock, unaccompanied by any voting rights or by any representation on the Board of General Motors, would or could have any effect on the commercial practices of General Motors. If General Motors were to have a continuing financial interest in du Pont rather than vice versa, the Court can appreciate that there might remain some incentive for General Motors to buy from du Pont in order to increase the latter's sales and profits. In that case, the owner of the financial interest would be making the buying decision and might be influenced to purchase from a company in which it held a substantial financial interest. In this case, however, the buying decision must be made by General Motors. It has no financial interest in du Pont and the Court is aware of no incentive which would operate to influence a General Motors employee to favor du Pont in any way.

The Court recognizes the force of the Government's argument that the Supreme Court's decision was not necessarily confined to the voting power which du Pont enjoyed in General Motors. The decision noted other factors which had operated, or might operate, in du Pont's favor as a supplier of General Motors. Upon analysis, however, it must be concluded that the ultimate source of all these avenues of influence is the voting power attached to du Pont's 63,000,000 shares of General Motors. Without that voting power, and without directors on the General Motors Board, du Pont is completely stripped of any potential power to penalize or reward the employees of General Motors in accordance with their demonstrated attitude toward du Pont's products. In the absence of this voting power, lines of communication, suggestions, established relationships and other attributes of ownership of which the Government complained are rendered impotent. These all may represent ways and means by which du Pont's will could be brought to bear on General Motors, but each springs from the voting power attached to the General Motors stock which du Pont owns; absent that voting power, these means are capable of accomplishing nothing.

The Government's principal concern appears to be that du Pont's continuing financial interest in General Motors will "force [it] to see that General Motors is the prime, if not the exclusive recipient of du Pont's research activities." (Govt. Reply Brief, p. 18) The Government does not suggest that there is any evidence that du Pont has favored General Motors over General Motors' competitors. Such a charge was made in the original complaint but was never proven and at the close of the trial in chief the Government did not even request the Court to make findings of fact that du Pont had so favored General Motors.* Needless to say, therefore, such a charge was not before the Supreme Court and played no part in that Court's determination that du Pont's stock interest in General Motors might result in monopolization of General Motors purchases of automotive fabrics and finishes in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act. And it is to be noted that in the hearing on relief the Government did not offer any evidence that du Pont had favored, or was favoring, or was likely to favor, General Motors in any way whatsoever. Indeed, in offering its evidence as to the course of trade relations between du Pont and General Motors, counsel for the Government specifically stated:

* The passage from the Supreme Court opinion quoted by the Government in its Reply Brief (p. 19) does not indicate any evidence of du Pont favoring General Motors. In stating that du Pont would try to supply General Motors with "the best," the Supreme Court was discussing the point that the trade dealings between du Pont and General Motors had been above-board and that there had been no overreaching of General Motors by du Pont.

> "Let it again be clearly understood that the Government suggests no improper conduct on the part of the companies by the introduction of this evidence."

The Court recognizes that it is empowered to, and should, in appropriate circumstances, enjoin restrictive conduct even though there is no proof that the parties have actually engaged in that particular type of conduct. International Salt Co. v. United States [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,635] 332 U. S. 392, 400 (1947). It is out of deference, therefore, to the Government's naked suggestion that du Pont might favor General Motors rather than on the basis of any proof that du Pont has favored General Motors, that the Court proposes to include in the final judgment provisions which will specifically prohibit du Pont from entering into preferential arrangements with General Motors and from offering any product or service to General Motors on terms and conditions more favorable than those offered to competitors of General Motors. The Court is of the opinion that such provisions will be adequate to forestall any trade favoritism of the kind which the Government has suggested but not proven.

To order a divestment of du Pont's title, with the resulting tax penalties and market implications which the Court has heretofore described, merely to eliminate the possibility that du Pont might favor General Motors, would in the Court's opinion constitute a serious abuse of discretion. Even if there were proof, either at the trial in chief or at the hearing on relief, that du Pont had followed a course of action of favoring General Motors over the latter's competitors, the Court would be loathe to direct a divestment of legal title until it had at least been demonstrated that injunctive provisions of the kind proposed by the Court would be ineffective. In the absence of any proof of such conduct, and in view of the fact that the Government alleged and failed to prove such conduct, the Court believes that the Government's apprehensions do not constitute an adequate basis for the divestiture order which it proposes.

["Takedown" Plan]

The takedown plan proposed by amicus Dallstream is ingenious and has merit. If the Court were persuaded that, in order to eliminate the effects offensive to the Clayton Act, it would be necessary to require the distribution of du Pont's legal title to the General Motors shares, the Court would give serious consideration to adopting the takedown plan. The plan, meritorious as it is, introduces complications into du Pont's capital structure. It also operates in different ways, and sometimes in a discriminatory manner, upon various categories of du Pont stockholders. Moreover, its adoption would impose an administrative burden upon this Court for many years to come. In the circumstances, therefore, since the Court has concluded that a distribution of du Pont's legal title to the General Motors shares is not necessary,* the Court believes that there is no justification at this time for involving du Pont and its shareholders in the complications of the takedown plan. It may be that the plan will have utility at some time in the future, particularly if a change in administrative or legislative policy were to produce the tax results contemplated by amicus Dallstream in recommending the plan. In such event any party may ask the Court to reexamine the plan in the light of circumstances then existing.

[Modification—Tax Legislation or Regulation]

The Court and the parties are aware of the pendency of bills previously referred to which, presumably, will be considered in the second session of the 86th Congress and which would, if enacted, substantially ameliorate the tax consequences of a distribution of du Pont's legal title to the General Motors shares. It is impossible, however, to foretell whether such legislation will be enacted and, if so, the form it will take. Quite possibly a change in policy on the part of the Internal Revenue Service might also affect the tax consequences of any such distribution. The Court should not be foreclosed from considering such new legislation or rulings nor should the parties be foreclosed from bringing them to the attention of the Court. While a distribution of the legal title to the General Motors shares by du Pont is not, in the opinion of the Court, at all necessary to remedy the effects offensive to the statute in view of the other provisions of the decree to be included, such a distribution would leave a more simplified structure from the corporate standpoint. Consequently, the final judgment should make specific provision for the possibility of such developments and should authorize any party to come before the Court and seek modification of the judgment in the light of any such developments.

* In recommending the takedown plan for the Court's consideration amicus Dallstream himself recognized that the plan was not "an essential ingredient in a program of appropriate and equitable relief." (Dallstream Report, August 1958, p. 115.)

Summary

The Court concludes that it has jurisdiction under Section 15 of the Clayton Act to order appropriate relief in this case not only against du Pont but also against General Motors, Christiana and Delaware; it is without power to order relief directly against the stockholders of Delaware who are also stockholders of du Pont because they are indispensable parties to any such relief and are not before the Court.

The Court has also concluded that under Section 15 of the Clayton Act it is not required to direct divestiture of the ownership of the 63,000,000 shares of General Motors acquired by du Pont in violation of the Clayton Act. Rather the Court has broad discretion under that section to order the relief it deems appropriate to eliminate the effects offensive to the Act and to do so consistent with the protection of the interests of all parties, including the shareholders of these four companies who are innocent of any wrongdoing.

The Government proposal is that the Court should order distribution by du Pont of the 63,000,000 shares of General Motors stock held by it in ten equal annual dividends and that the shares going to Christiana, Delaware and the stockholders of Delaware, a total of about 20,000,000, be delivered to a trustee and sold for their account within twelve months of receipt, about 2,000,000 shares a year. The 63,000,000 shares of General Motors stock have a current market value of over $3,500,000,000, and the 20,000,000 shares a market value of over $1,000,000,000.

The Internal Revenue Service has ruled that General Motors shares received as dividends by individuals and trusts would be taxed at the market value at the time of receipt as ordinary income, i. e., at rates from 20% to 91% (less dividends received credit). There would also be state income taxes in many cases. The Service has also ruled that the General Motors shares received by non-tax-exempt corporations would be taxed to them at the cost base on the books of du Pont, or at $2.09 per share and that, when sold by or for the account of such corporations, the gains over that base would be taxed at the capital gain rate of 25%. Thus, whatever market value the General Motors shares might have if the Government proposal went into effect, the tax impact on individual stockholders of du Pont would be enormous and the tax impact on corporations forced to sell, such as Christiana and Delaware, would also be great.

The Government decree would also have a serious impact on the market value of the stock of General Motors and of the stock of du Pont. The testimony adduced by the defendants, that of men of wide experience and great responsibility for investing funds and marketing securities, to that effect must be given great weight. The type of evidence introduced by the Government, consisting of data regarding a variety of security offerings, charts of stock movements and the flow of investment funds, and the testimony of economists without practical experience or management responsibility, cannot overcome the weight of such testimony. On the Government's own evidence, there would be a serious risk that the sales caused directly and indirectly by its proposed decree would depress the market value of the two stocks and cause substantial losses to the many thousands of direct or indirect holders of such stocks who cannot conceivably be called guilty persons or even persons aware of any illegality. The Court will not assume the responsibility of such risk.

Another factor that should be given some consideration is that the Government plan would seriously handicap General Motors from doing any common stock financing during the period of the plan, to its possible detriment and the injury of its stockholders.

The Court has concluded that the Government proposal is unnecessarily harsh and punitive and that there is an effective means of preventing any possible control of General Motors through use of the votes on the General Motors shares now held by du Pont either by du Pont or by persons whom the Government has any reasonable basis for claiming that they might act in concert. The effective means is to divest du Pont of the votes on such General Motors shares and pass such votes through pro rata to du Pont stockholders, and then to enjoin the exercise of such votes as lodge in Christiana and Delaware and in officers and directors of du Pont, Christiana and Delaware, their spouses and dependents. By this means at least as many votes by persons claimed by the Government to belong to a group will be taken from them as would be the case if the Government's proposed decree were put into effect. A decree to this effect will make it unnecessary for the Court to make a determination whether any of the groups of persons whom the Government claims would act in concert would do so or whether, if they did act in concert, they would have a sufficient number of votes to control or influence General Motors.

The Court is of the opinion that there is nothing in the record which would support even by inference the conclusion that du Pont's possession of the bare legal title to General Motors stock, stripped of its right to vote and of its right to representation on the Board of General Motors, would create any possibility that the stock would have any influence on the practices and policies of General Motors or could be used in any way that would be inconsistent with the mandate of the Supreme Court.

The essential features of the final judgment which the Court has decided upon have been indicated in some detail in the foregoing discussions. Without intending to limit or modify in any way the matters which the Court has heretofore discussed, the basic features of the final judgment which the Court proposes to enter are:

1. Du Pont will be divested of the right to vote any of the 63,000,000 shares of General Motors stock which it owns and such shares will be voted hereafter by the stockholders of du Pont with the exceptions noted below.

2. Injunctive provisions will prohibit du Pont, Christiana and Delaware from acquiring any additional stock interest in General Motors and from attempting to influence General Motors in any way.

3. Christiana and Delaware will be prohibited from voting any of the 63,000,000 shares of General Motors that would otherwise be voted by them as stockholders of du Pont and the portion of such shares that are allocable to Christiana and Delaware will be sterilized along with the 535,500 shares of General Motors which Christiana presently owns.

4. No officer or director of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware will be permitted to vote any General Motors stock, either in accordance with the pass-through described above or otherwise.

5. No officer or director of du Pont, Christiana and Delaware will be permitted to serve as an officer or director of General Motors, and General Motors will be prohibited from having as an employee any employee of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware.

6. All preferential trade arrangements or understandings between du Pont and General Motors will be cancelled, and they will be prohibited from entering into any such arrangements or embarking on joint commercial ventures so long as du Pont owns General Motors stock. Any existing requirements contracts between the two companies will be canceled and they will not be permitted to enter into any such contract for a period of three years following entry of the final judgment herein, after which period requirements contracts of not more than one year's duration will not be prohibited.

7. Provision will be made for a review and reconsideration of the terms of the final judgment in the event the provisions thereof should prove in the future to be inadequate to curb the violation, and in the event of an administrative or legislative change in tax policy which would significantly alter the tax consequences of a distribution of the General Motors stock owned by du Pont.

8. Appropriate provisions will be included for retention of jurisdiction by the Court and for enforcement of the terms of the judgment.

The above and foregoing opinion of the Court constitutes the Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law.

Final Judgment

WALTER J. LA BUY, District Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff having filed its complaint herein on June 30, 1949, and its amendments thereto on July 28, 1952 and January 16, 1953; all of the defendants having appeared and severally filed their answers to the amended complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof; this Court, on January 16, 1953, before the conclusion of the presentation of the plaintiff's case, having entered an order dismissing with prejudice the amended complaint as to certain individual defendants, and on February 16, 1953, at the close of the plaintiff's case, having entered an order dismissing without prejudice the amended complaint as to certain additional individual defendants, and on December 9, 1954, after trial, having entered a judgment herein dismissing this action as to all defendants; the plaintiff having appealed in certain respects from such judgment insofar as it applies to defendants E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company, General Motors Corporation, Christiana Securities Company and Delaware Realty and Investment Company; the Supreme Court of the United States having held that there was a violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act by defendant E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company, and having remanded this cause to this Court for a determination after further hearing of the equitable relief necessary and appropriate in the public interest to eliminate the effects offensive to the Clayton Act; this Court having held further hearings pursuant to the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States and having rendered an Opinion on October 2, 1959 which constitutes the Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,461];

Now, therefore, it is hereby Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed As Follows:

I

[Definitions]

For the purposes of this Judgment:

A. "Du Pont" means E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company; "General Motors" means General Motors Corporation; "Christiana" means Christiana Securities Company; "Delaware" means Delaware Realty and Investment Company.

B. "General Motors stock" means shares of General Motors stock of any class having voting rights.

C. "Du Pont stock" means shares of du Pont common stock having voting rights.

D. "General Motors stockholder" means any holder of record of General Motors stock.

E. "Du Pont stockholder" means any holder of record of du Pont stock.

[Prior Judgment Vacated in Part]

In conformity with the mandate of the Supreme Court, the Judgment of this Court of December 9, 1954, which dismissed the amended complaint finding no violation of Section 1 or Section 2 of the Sherman Act or Section 7 of the Clayton Act, is hereby vacated insofar as it adjudges du Pont not to have violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act, and it is hereby adjudicated that du Pont has violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act because, at the time of suit, there was a reasonable probability that its acquisition of General Motors stock was likely to result in the restraints condemned by that Section in the line of commerce consisting of automotive fabrics and finishes.

[Divestiture]

Du Pont and Christiana are each hereby directed to perform the acts and to take the steps provided for hereinafter in this Judgment to divest itself of all rights and interest in the General Motors stock which each owns except bare legal title, the right to receive dividends, the right to participate in the distribution of assets upon dissolution and any other right or interest which is reserved to them or either of them under the provisions of this Judgment. Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware are each hereby enjoined and restrained (i) from acquiring, directly or indirectly, any General Motors stock except such stock as may be distributed by General Motors with respect to General Motors stock held by them or as may be acquired by the exercise of rights issued with respect to such stock, provided that any stock so acquired shall be subject to all of the provisions of this Judgment in the same manner and to the same extent as if du Pont, Christiana or Delaware had owned such stock on the effective date of this Judgment; and (ii) from using or attempting to use, directly or indirectly, the stock ownership of du Pont or Christiana in General Motors, to influence or control General Motors in any manner whatsoever.

IV

[Common Directors and Employees]

A. General Motors is hereby enjoined and restrained from knowingly having as a director, officer, or employee any person who at any time after the expiration of ninety (90) days following the effective date of this Judgment has served as a director or officer of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware, and from knowingly having as an employee any person who is at the same time an employee of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware.

B. Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware are each hereby enjoined and restrained from knowingly having as a director, officer, or employee any person who at any time after the expiration of ninety (90) days following the effective date of this Judgment has served as a director or officer of General Motors, and from knowingly having as an employee any person who is at the same time an employee of General Motors.

C. Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware and their officers and directors are hereby enjoined and restrained from nominating any person for election as a director of General Motors or from proposing any person for a position as an officer of General Motors.

D. All persons who are required by the provisions of Paragraphs A or B of this Section IV to terminate their positions as directors, officers or employees of General Motors, du Pont, Christiana or Delaware are hereby enjoined and restrained from influencing or participating in the selection, nomination or election of persons to fill any of the vacancies created by resignations required by the provisions of Paragraphs A or B of this Section IV in the company with which such person has terminated his association.

E. General Motors, du Pont, Christiana and Delaware shall be allowed ninety (90) days following the effective date of this Judgment to effect compliance with the provisions of this Section IV, and within thirty (30) days thereafter shall file with this Court a report, and furnish a copy of such report to the Attorney General, setting forth the action taken to effect such compliance.

[Termination of Contracts]

A. Du Pont and General Motors shall cancel and terminate, within ninety (90) days following the effective date of this Judgment, and, so long as du Pont, Christiana or Delaware owns, directly or indirectly, any General Motors stock, du Pont and General Motors are enjoined and restrained from entering into, any contract, agreement, or understanding between them

(i) which requires General Motors to purchase from du Pont any specified percentage of its requirements of any product, provided that following the expiration of three (3) years from the effective date of this Judgment they may enter into such contracts if limited to a period not longer than one calendar year or one automobile model year, or

(ii) which grants to either du Pont or General Motors exclusive patent rights or grants to du Pont preferential rights to manufacture or sell any chemical discovery made by General Motors.

B. Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware are each enjoined and restrained so long as du Pont, Christiana or Delaware owns, directly or indirectly, any General Motors stock from entering into or continuing any agreement, understanding or arrangement with General Motors for ownership or operation of any commercial, manufacturing or other business enterprise and from knowingly holding stock in any such enterprise in which General Motors holds stock, and General Motors is enjoined and restrained during such period from entering into or continuing any such agreement, understanding or arrangement with du Pont, Christiana or Delaware and from knowingly holding stock in any commercial, manufacturing or other business enterprise in which du Pont, Christiana or Delaware holds stock.

C. Du Pont is hereby enjoined and restrained, so long as du Pont, Christiana or Delaware owns, directly or indirectly, any General Motors stock, from dealing with General Motors with respect to any product developed by du Pont or any patent, process or discovery owned by du Pont or as to which du Pont has any proprietary interest, on terms or conditions more favorable than those on which du Pont is willing to deal with competitors of General Motors.

D. General Motors is hereby enjoined and restrained, so long as du Pont, Christiana or Delaware owns, directly or indirectly, any stock in General Motors, from dealing with du Pont with respect to any product developed by General Motors or any patent, process or discovery owned by General Motors or as to which General Motors has any proprietary interest, on terms or conditions more favorable than those on which General Motors is willing to deal with competitors of du Pont.

VI

[Exercise of Voting Rights Prohibited]

A. Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware, and all persons who are directors or officers of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware, and the members of the family of any such director or officer who reside in the same household with him, are each hereby enjoined and restrained from exercising, directly or indirectly, voting rights in respect of General Motors stock which they or any of them hold of record or have the power to vote or the power to direct the vote, or would have the power to vote under the provisions of Section VII of this Judgment, and from attempting to influence, directly or indirectly, any person in any manner with respect to exercising voting rights in respect of any General Motors stock, provided however that nothing in this Paragraph shall prevent du Pont from performing acts required to be performed by the provisions of Section VII of this Judgment.

B. Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware are each hereby directed to give General Motors notice, promptly after the record date for each annual or special meeting of the stockholders of General Motors or other occasion on which General Motors stockholders are entitled to vote, of the names of the record holders, as of such record date, of the General Motors stock which is not to be voted in compliance with the provisions of Paragraph A of this Section VI together with an identification of the shares of General Motors stock held of record by them that are subject to such provisions. Except as provided in Section VII of this Judgment, or unless otherwise directed by this Court or any other court of competent jurisdiction, General Motors is hereby directed to disqualify any record holder of General Motors stock named in such notice from voting, either in person or by proxy, the shares of General Motors stock identified therein, at the annual or special meeting or other occasion for which such notice was given. General Motors shall be entitled to rely exclusively in complying with this Section VI upon the notices to be furnished to it by du Pont, Christiana and Delaware.

C. The provisions of this Section VI shall remain effective so long as du Pont, Christiana or Delaware owns, directly or indirectly, any General Motors stock.

["Pass Through" of Voting Rights]

A. The voting rights of the General Motors stock held by du Pont, or which may be acquired by du Pont in accordance with the provisions of Section III of this Judgment, shall be exercised in the manner provided in this Section VII by the du Pont stockholders as of the record date for the determination of General Motors stockholders entitled to vote except as prohibited by Paragraph A of Section VI of this Judgment and except that such voting rights shall not be exercised in favor of the election of any person nominated or designated by, or held out in any way to be a representative of, du Pont.

B. The number of shares of General Motors stock held by du Pont to be voted by each du Pont stockholder entitled to exercise such voting rights shall be determined, as of the record date for the determination of General Motors stockholders entitled to vote, as follows:

> The number of shares of General Motors stock held by du Pont at such date shall be divided by the number of shares of all du Pont stock outstanding and which would be entitled to vote at a meeting of du Pont stockholders as of such date, and each du Pont stockholder entitled to exercise the voting rights of the General Motors stock held by du Pont shall be entitled to vote the number of General Motors shares determined by multiplying the quotient by the number of shares of du Pont stock owned of record by such stockholder at such date.

C. The following steps shall be taken prior to each annual or special meeting of General Motors stockholders and prior to any other occasion on which General Motors stockholders are entitled to vote:

(1) Du Pont shall execute such instruments and take such other steps as may be necessary to authorize each du Pont stockholder who is entitled to vote the General Motors stock held by du Pont at the said meeting of the stockholders of General Motors, or other occasion, to vote in the manner hereinafter provided in this Section VII, the number of shares of General Motors stock held by du Pont as determined for each such stockholder in accordance with Paragraph B above, and du Pont shall furnish to General Motors evidence of such authorization in form satisfactory to General Motors.

(2) Du Pont shall arrange to furnish, at its own expense, to each such stockholder a copy of the Notice of Meeting, Proxy Statement, proxy or proxies (which will represent such number of shares of General Motors stock as are determined for each such stockholder in accordance with Paragraph B above and shall be modified or supplemented in such manner as to empower each such stockholder freely and effectively to exercise the voting rights with respect to such shares of General Motors stock), and other proxy soliciting material prepared by General Motors for distribution to its stockholders in connection with any annual or special meeting or any other occasion on which General Motors stockholders are entitled to vote; shall arrange to furnish, at its own expense, to its stockholders such material as has been prepared by any person or group of persons making a solicitation of General Motors stockholders under and subject to applicable regulations of the Securities and Exchange Commission so as to achieve among du Pont stockholders substantially the same coverage as will be achieved among General Motors stockholders by the person or group of persons making such solicitation; shall arrange to inform each such stockholder of the approximate number of shares of General Motors stock which the holder of each share of du Pont stock is entitled to vote hereunder as such proxy holder; and shall arrange to notify each such stockholder of his right, in accordance with the provisions of this Section VII, to vote as such proxy holder and the means of exercising such right. The aggregate number of shares of General Motors stock evidenced by such proxies shall be voted to the last full share.

(3) Du Pont shall also arrange to furnish each such stockholder, at or prior to the time it furnishes the proxy soliciting material for each annual meeting of the stockholders of General Motors, a copy of the latest Annual Report of General Motors.

(4) Copies of all such material shall be furnished by du Pont to the Department of Justice at the same time as it is transmitted to stockholders of du Pont.

D. Anything to the contrary in this Judgment notwithstanding, if it shall appear to General Motors that the provisions of Paragraph A of Section VI may result in impeding the carrying out of any proposed corporate action required by law or by the certificate of incorporation or by-laws of General Motors to be approved by a vote of a specified portion of the outstanding General Motors stock entitled to vote, General Motors may apply to this Court for appropriate relief, after due notice and opportunity for hearing thereon, whereby the General Motors stock which, but for the prohibitions of said Paragraph A, could be voted by Christiana and Delaware as du Pont stockholders, may be represented and voted in respect of such proposed corporate action under such regulations and provisions as the Court shall specify; provided, however, that in no event shall any of the persons prohibited from voting General Motors stock by said Paragraph A be permitted to exercise any discretion as to how such stock shall be voted.

E. Du Pont and General Motors are each hereby directed to take all necessary and appropriate action to facilitate the exercise of voting rights of the General Motors stock owned by du Pont in accordance with the provisions of Sections VI and VII of this Judgment, which Sections shall not apply with respect to any annual or special meeting of General Motors held within one hundred and twenty (120) days from the effective date of this Judgment. In the event that General Motors deems it necessary to call a special meeting of stockholders within such one hundred and twenty (120) day period, the Department of Justice shall be given notice thereof and be informed of the purpose therefor at least twenty (20) days in advance of such meeting.

F. Within thirty (30) days from the effective date of this Judgment the Court will appoint a Monitor of the voting provisions of this Judgment. It shall be the duty of the Monitor to observe the operation of such provisions and to report to the Court following each General Motors annual or special meeting, or other occasion on which General Motors stockholders are entitled to vote, copies of which report shall be made available to the parties hereto. Du Pont, Christiana, Delaware and General Motors are required to cooperate with the Monitor in the execution of his duties. No information obtained by the Monitor in the execution of his duties hereunder shall be disclosed except to the extent necessary in the preparation and submission of the reports to the Court provided for above and upon written request of the Attorney General of the United States or his authorized representative. The Monitor shall provide all parties hereto with copies of all information submitted in response to such requests. No information obtained by means provided in this Paragraph F shall be divulged by any party, or by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department, except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States of America is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this Judgment or as otherwise required by law.

G. The expenses incurred by General Motors in carrying out the voting provisions of this Judgment shall, when approved by this Court, be paid by du Pont. The Monitor shall be entitled to receive reasonable compensation for services rendered hereunder and to reimbursement for reasonable and necessary expenses incurred in connection therewith, which compensation and reimbursement shall be fixed and allowed by this Court from time to time, and when approved by the Court shall be paid by du Pont.

VIII

[Sale of Stock Permitted]

Du Pont and Christiana shall each be authorized at any time or from time to time to sell or otherwise dispose of, for its own account, all or any part of the General Motors stock held by each of them provided, however, that du Pont or Christiana, as the case may be, shall prior to any disposition notify the Attorney General of the terms and conditions of the disposition including the identity of the prospective purchaser or transferee if known, except that prior notification shall not be required for any single disposition of fifty thousand (50,000) shares or less of General Motors stock unless the number of shares to be disposed of plus the number of shares disposed of in the preceding twelve-month period exceeds two hundred thousand (200,000) shares of General Motors stock, and provided further that in the event the Attorney General interposes an objection such disposition shall not be consummated until first approved by this Court after reasonable notice to all parties. No information as to any proposed disposition supplied to the Attorney General pursuant to this Section VIII shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department except in connection with proceedings to which the United States of America is a party in which objection is made to such disposition or as otherwise required by law.

IX

[Contingent Modification—Tax Legislation]

In the event that legislation should be enacted (for example, as is now provided with respect to distributions required under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, as amended, or the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956), or there should be a change in regulations or rulings of the Internal Revenue Service, which would substantially and significantly ameliorate the existing inequitable and burdensome tax consequences to du Pont stockholders attendant upon a distribution or other disposition of General Motors shares to du Pont stockholders, so as to make feasible and equitable a program or programs for such a distribution or disposition, or if the provisions of this Judgment should prove inadequate to remedy the violation of the Clayton Act, any party hereto may apply to this Court for modification of this Judgment in light of the circumstances then existing.

[Written Consent of Officers and Directors]

A. Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware are each hereby directed to secure from its respective directors and officers written consents to be bound by the voting provisions of this Judgment, such consents to be executed by each such director and officer and by each member of his family residing in the same household with him who holds power to vote or to direct the vote of any du Pont or General Motors stock and to be submitted to du Pont, Christiana or Delaware, as the case may be, and filed with this Court, within one hundred and twenty (120) days following the effective date of this Judgment, and within thirty (30) days following the initial election of a director or officer, and within thirty (30) days after the occurrence of an event which requires a consent to be executed and submitted on behalf of a member of the family of a director or officer in accordance with the provisions of this Paragraph.

B. Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware are each hereby enjoined and restrained from having as a director or officer any person who fails to file consents executed by him and by the members of his family living in the same household with him in accordance with the provisions of Paragraph A of this Section X.

C. Du Pont, Christiana and Delaware are each hereby directed to provide a copy of this Judgment to each of its respective directors and officers and to each adult member of the family of each such director and officer residing in the same household with him within ninety (90) days following the effective date of this Judgment and within thirty (30) days following the initial election of a director or officer.

D. Du Pont and General Motors are each hereby directed to provide a copy of this Judgment to each of their respective subsidiaries within thirty (30) days following the effective date of this Judgment.

XI

For the purpose of securing compliance with this Judgment and for no other purpose, and subject to any legally recognized privilege, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall be permitted, upon written request of the Attorney General or of the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice as to time and subject matter to du Pont, Christiana or Delaware at their respective principal offices, (1) to inspect during office hours all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda, and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware relating to any provisions of this Judgment, during which time counsel for du Pont, Christiana or Delaware, as the case may be, may be present; and (2) subject to the reasonable convenience of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware, and without restraint or interference from them, to interview regarding any such provisions any officer or employee of du Pont, Christiana or Delaware, who, together with du Pont, Christiana or Delaware, as the case may be, may have counsel present. The Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division may apply to this Court from time to time for an order, upon good cause shown and after due notice and opportunity for hearing thereon, authorizing similar inspection of records and documents of General Motors and/or similar interviewing of officers and employees of General Motors, for such purposes and within such limits as may then be reasonably necessary to enforcement of this Judgment.

B. The Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division may apply to this Court from time to time for an order, upon good cause shown and after due notice and opportunity for hearing thereon, requiring any defendant to submit in writing such report or reports with respect to matters contained in this Judgment as may then be reasonably necessary to enforcement of this Judgment.

C. No information obtained by means provided in this Section XI shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Department, except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States of America is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this Judgment or as otherwise required by law.

XII

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction is retained in order to enable any party hereto or any person enjoined or restrained hereby to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this Judgment, for the modification or termination of this Judgment or any of the provisions thereof, or for the enforcement of compliance therewith and punishment of any violations thereof, and for the purpose of determining and assessing proper costs and allowances in this cause.

The effective date of this Judgment shall be 12:01 A. M., November 18, 1959.

[¶ 69,462] State Wholesale Grocers, et al. v. The Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, et al.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. No. 56C418. Dated September 8, 1959.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Damages for Antitrust Violations—Promotional Allowances in Violation of Price Discrimination Law—Class Actions—Intervention of Others After Trial on Issue of Liability.—Twenty retail grocers and two wholesale grocers, having established that suppliers of food products violated Section 2(d) of the Clayton Act by paying for advertising in a grocery chain's magazine without making such payments available to the chain's competitors on "proportionally equal terms," were permitted to bring into the action, under Rule 23(a)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (providing for "spurious class actions"), other retail and wholesale grocers "similarly situated." The intervention was not untimely, since the joining of additional parties plaintiff at any earlier stage of the case might have delayed the orderly and expeditious fashion in which the liability issue was tried. Here, with the separation of the liability and damage issues for purposes of trial, Rule 23(a)(3) afforded an excellent mechanism whereby a handful of persons tested the legality of the suppliers' activities for all persons similarly situated. That activity having been branded as unlawful, the time was ripe for the intervention of all wronged parties.

As to the grocers' right to bring the class action, the two classes were adequately identified. The "retail class" consisted of retailers in the area who, during the pertinent period, resold the suppliers' products in competition with the favored retailer's stores, and to whom proportionately equal treatment was not made available. The "wholesaler class" consisted of wholesale grocers in the same area who, during that period, sold the suppliers' products to members of the retailer class. Differences between members of either class were insignificant, so long as there was a question of fact or law that was common to all members of the class. Further, the requirement of "common relief," which does not mean "joint relief," was satisfied by the charge that the same, but separate, action by defendants of equal standing (suppliers who had favored one customer over others) violated the same section of a statute, and that the unlawful action of each defendant damaged each of several plaintiffs in separate, different amounts. Also, the grocers adequately represented the members of the two classes for whom the action was brought.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9005.20.

For the plaintiffs: Marks, Marks & Kaplan, and Libit, Lindauer & Henry, all of Chicago, Ill.

For the defendants: Thomas R. Mulroy of Hopkins, Sutter, Owen, Mulroy & Wentz; Miller, Gorham, Wescott & Adams; and McBride, Baker, Weinke & Schlosser, all of Chicago, Ill.

Memorandum and Order

[Price Discrimination Action—Remand]

CAMPBELL, Chief Judge [In full text]: On remand of this case from the Court of Appeals, plaintiffs have moved for a ruling on the so-called "spurious class" suit issue left undecided both by this Court and the Court of Appeals. State Wholesale Grocers v. The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, D. C., N. D. Ill., E. D., [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,772], 154 F. Supp. 471; C. A., 7 Cir., [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,089], 258 F. 2d 831. Since the pertinent facts appear in each of these reported decisions, I shall not repeat them in detail here.

["Spurious Class Suit"]

Plaintiffs consist of twenty retail grocers and two wholesale grocers located in the Chicago Metropolitan Area. They seek to bring into this action the retail and wholesale grocers similarly situated who accept their invitation to join. Defendants, General Foods Corporation, Hunt Foods, Inc., and Morton Salt Company oppose the propriety of the class suit contending (1) that plaintiffs have not shown that they are entitled to bring a spurious class suit and, (2) in the alternative, that it is too late at this stage of the instant proceeding for the intervention of additional parties plaintiff.

Rule 23(a)(3) of the Federal Rules Civil Procedure, which governs spurious class suits, provides as follows:

> "a. Representation. If persons constituting a class are so numerous as to make it impracticable to bring them all before the court, such of them, one or more, as will fairly insure the adequate representation of all may, on behalf of all, sue or be sued, when the character of the right sought to be enforced for or against the class is
> "(3) several, and there is a common question of law or fact affecting the several rights and a common relief is sought."

Whether Plaintiffs are Entitled to Bring a Class Suit

[Classes Defined]

Defendants contend that neither the retail grocer nor the wholesale grocer class has been adequately identified. I do not agree. As to the plaintiff retailers, I think it has been clearly established that the class consists of retail grocers situated in the Chicago Metropolitan Area who, during the period pertinent to this suit, resold products of the defendant suppliers in competition with at least one store of the favored retailer, A. & P., and to whom proportionately equal treatment was not made available. The wholesaler class consists of all wholesale grocers situated in the same area who, during that period, sold the defendant suppliers' products to members of the retailer class. I attach little significance to the fact that there may be certain differences between the various members of either class so long as there is a question of fact or law common to all members within that particular class.

[Common Relief]

The propriety of the class suit is also challenged on the ground that common relief is not sought against the defendants. Counsel for defendants interpret the requirement of "common relief" as provided in Rule 23(a)(3) to mean that the claims of the plaintiffs must emanate from the same original source, citing Kainz v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 7 Cir. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,221], 194 F. 2d 737, in support of their position. Defendants take the position that inasmuch as it is not claimed here that the three defendant suppliers have joined or acted together, the several claims of the plaintiffs emanate from three, separate and distinct sources, thus destroying the element of common relief.

A reading of the pertinent portion of the Court of Appeals' opinion in the Kainz case, supra, might prove helpful. In rejecting the contention that the phrase "common relief" means "joint relief", as that phrase is used in Rule 23(a)(3), the court stated, at page 743 of 194 F. 2d:

> "* * * 'Common relief' for persons having separate causes of action who may recover only several judgments, it seems to us, must mean, in order to give life to the purpose of the rule, relief emanating from the same original source, either by way of grant, contract, tort or statute, where the claims of all beneficiaries flow from the same fountain but are allowed not in a joint judgment but in several judgments. Strictly speaking, this may not be common relief in many senses, but it is separate relief for each growing out of a common source of right to recover. The same character of right to recover exists in several; in that sense, when there are common issues of fact and law, we think, the relief is common within the meaning of the rule. To hold otherwise is to destroy the so-called spurious class entirely, for, if the relief to be recovered by several members of the class in separate judgments must be a common or joint judgment, then the whole provision is meaningless. The rule clearly contemplates, we think, relief in the form of separate similar judgments, emanating from the same source in law and grounded upon common questions of fact."

In view of the language of the Kainz case, I think the Rule is satisfied where, as here, it is charged that the same, but separate, action by defendants of equal standing (that is, suppliers who have favored one customer over others) violated the same section of a statute, and that the unlawful action of each defendant damaged each of several plaintiffs in separate, different amounts.

Defendants also urge the Court to hold that the plaintiffs do not adequately represent the members of either of the two classes for whom ths suit is brought. An examination of the entire record of this case convinces me that this contention is without merit.

Whether the Proposed Intervention Is Untimely

It is argued that intervention at this point of the instant proceeding would be untimely since it comes at a time more than 3½ years after the suit was instituted and 2½ years after the proofs have been closed on the issue of liability. Defendants contend that it would be fundamentally unfair to them to allow intervention at this juncture of the case and caution that objectional procedural consequences might develop if such a practice is permitted.

Of course, defendants' contentions might be true in most cases. In the instant case, however, the issues of liability and damages were separated for purposes of trial. Trial of the issue of liability has been concluded. There is, at least, one element of the liability facet of this case which remains for decision. I think it clear that the joining of additional parties plaintiff at any earlier stage of the present case would have at that time served no useful purpose and might well have hampered, or at least delayed, the orderly and expeditious fashion in which the issue of liability was tried. With the separation of the issues of liability and damages for purposes of trial, Rule 23(a)(3) afforded the Court, as well as the parties, with an excellent mechanism whereby a handful of persons with a standing sufficient to complain might, on behalf of all such persons similarly situated, test the legality of the defendants' activity which affected all such persons. That activity having been branded as unlawful by the Court of Appeals, the time is now ripe for the intervention of all wronged parties.

[Speeding Up Trials]

A rule of procedure must possess a certain quality of usefulness. With respect to the Rule under consideration, it should, if nothing else, serve to speed up trials such as the instant suit, while at the same time avoid multiplicity of suits. Intervention of additional parties plaintiff before or during the trial of liability would have appreciably delayed the submission of that issue for decision and would have nullified one of the purposes for which the Rule was adopted. I think Judge Lindley's comments in the Kainz case, supra, with respect to Rule 20(a) and Rule 23 (a)(3), are particularly apropos here. He said at page 744 of 194 F. 2d:

> "We fully appreciate the difficulty encountered by trial courts in attempting to give to these two rules the force we have attributed to them. Both, interpreted as we feel they must be, are innovations at odds with earlier ideas of proper law and equity practices. It was once axiomatic that multifariousness of claims was to be avoided and that multiplicity of parties could be permitted only in cases far afield from those of the so-termed spurious class. The latter, obviously, has unity only as an expedient invented and introduced into modern practice for the purpose of reducing multiplicity of suits and speeding up trials. We know the invention has novelty; whether it possesses also the other quality sought, utility, is not yet fully proved. However, sensing as we do that these novel insertions into our rules of procedure were inspired by certain specific supposedly beneficent purposes, it is our duty to give them effect. Perhaps in a case such as this, where each of the parties is entitled to a jury trial, where the transactions are voluminous, complex and intricate and the possible parties so numerous as to be beyond possibility of retention in the memory of any trier of the facts, it may eventuate that the expedient provided is not efficacious in improving practice and procedure. But that possibility does not authorize us so to interpret the rules as to nullify them."

I think the entire procedure employed in this case demonstrates most effectively that Rule 23(a)(3) possesses the quality for which Judge Lindley was searching; that is, the quality of utility. Defendants' conduct has been put to test and has been found unlawful. The facts elicited to test defendants' activity, as distinguished from the facts which establish the present plaintiffs' standing to complain, while being common to all present plaintiffs, should be common to all plaintiffs seeking to intervene. The latter must establish their standing to complain (that is, their membership in the class) and, like the present plaintiffs, the amount of their individual damages. That this comes at a date so long after the suit was instituted and the issue of liability tried is immaterial especially in view of the fact that most of this time was consumed in establishing the illegality of defendants' conduct before the Court of Appeals.

Intervention at this time, admittedly, presents its problems. However, I cannot concede that the Court, with the aid of able and experienced counsel, lacks the necessary tools to cope with them. It is no secret that the calendar of this court is already overcrowded. To force all plaintiffs who seek to intervene to file a new action, with its accompanying gamut of pre-trial discovery, would necessarily overburden the individual calendar of the particular judge of this court to whom it would be assigned, not to mention the fact that said action might later, perhaps, be consolidated with the instant one. At the same time, I cannot perceive how the defendants' rights would be prejudiced by intervention. If it shall later appear that any of those rights might be put in jeopardy, the resources of the court would be available to protect them. In summation, I think the procedures utilized in the instant case demonstrate most effectively the proper employment of the Rules and the tools available to a trial court. While I do not attempt to conclude that these procedures should be followed in every case such as this, since each case must be judged by its own peculiar facts, I do conclude that those procedures were most appropriate in the instant suit.

[Other Issues]

I am not unmindful that there is at least one issue that remains for decision. This issue, if decided in defendants' favor, would completely dispose of this suit. The other issues that may remain for decision might either bar some plaintiffs' rights if decided favorably to defendants or further define each class. It should be noted that what has been said in this memorandum shall be without prejudice to such of the issues as remain for the Court's decision.

[Ruling—Pre-trial Conference]

For the reasons stated, the class suit issue is decided in plaintiffs' favor and the cause is set for pre-trial conference on September 28, 1959, 4. P. M., for the purpose of setting a reasonable date within which additional plaintiffs must intervene or be barred.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement—Contempt—Affidavits Describing Persons Who Allegedly Made "Unfair" Sales—Discrepancy Between Description and Actual Appearance of Defendant's Sales Personnel.—A plaintiff in a fair trade enforcement action was denied a motion to punish a defendant for alleged violations of an injunction where the defendant denied the charges and claimed that there was a wide discrepancy between the three persons comprising the sales personnel of its store and the descriptions given, in the plaintiff's moving affidavits, of the persons who allegedly made the "unfair trade sales." The court, after viewing and interrogating the defendant's sales personnel, agreed with the defendant's contentions that the plaintiff's affidavits must, of necessity, be considered false.

[Fair Trade Action—Contempt]

LORETO, Justice [In full text]: Motion to punish defendant for contempt for violating the injunctive provision in a judgment entered November 12, 1958, which prohibited defendant from selling retail drugs, toiletries, below fair trade prices established by the manufacturer or distributor. The motion is opposed by defendant who denies the charges made, claiming, in addition, that there are only three persons in attendance in its store and that the description of these sales persons in the affidavits of the shoppers, submitted in support of the motion, does not reasonably correspond with the actual appearance, size and weight of any of its sales force. This court, under the circumstances, cannot resolve the matter on the papers submitted. Testimony must be taken concerning the disputed issues. Accordingly, the matter is respectfully referred to Hon. Jacob Marks, official referee, to take proof of the parties on the issues raised and to report to the court with his recommendations. Pending the coming in of the report, the final disposition of this motion will be held in abeyance.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Contempt Denied—False Affidavits]

The order and the opinion herein dated September 2, 1959, are recalled and said order is hereby rescinded. They are at variance with the decision rendered after argument on the record. The attorney for the defendant has called this error to the attention of the court and the attorney for the plaintiff. It occurred by reason of the fact that when the file reached chambers after processing by the clerk's office and finally came to the court's attention for disposition several weeks had elapsed. A great volume of the summer motion and ex parte work in the meantime had been the subject of hearings, study and disposition by the court. As there was no notation in the file of the court's prior disposition of the motion and the court did not have particular recollection of it, the motion was considered solely upon the affidavits, which raise an issue that the court referred for determination by said order. That issue had been resolved by the court. On the argument of the motion, the defendant's attorney claimed that there was a wide discrepancy between the only three persons who comprise the personnel of the defendant's store serving customers and the description given in the moving affidavits of the persons whom plaintiff asserted made the unfair trade sales at the defendant's store. Defendant's attorney urged that those affidavits must, of necessity, be considered false and that therefore the motion should be denied. He presented those persons whom the court viewed and interrogated. The plaintiff's attorney took the position that such action was irrelevant to the determination of the motion before the court (S. M. p. 7). The court agreed with the contention of the attorney for the defendant and upon the affidavits submitted, as well as the record then made in court and from the bench denied the motion. That decision should have been entered in an order. The stenographic minutes of the argument and hearing not before the court at the time the order of September 2, 1959, was made and entered, are now made part of the record. Plaintiff's motion is denied. Submit order on notice.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Defenses—Price Violations by Enforcing Party.—An owner of a retail pharmacy, in a fair trade enforcement action against a defendant who had allegedly violated fair trade contracts, was denied a temporary injunction where the defendant did not deny selling below fair trade prices, but claimed that the plaintiff was doing the same thing and did not, therefore, come into court with clean hands. In De Candido v. Wagonfeld, 1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,443, it was held that price violations by a plaintiff constituted a valid defense.

[Fair Trade Action—Defenses]

CAPOZZOLI, Justice [In full text]: Motion for temporary injunction is denied. Plaintiff, a retail pharmacy store owner, seeks to enforce the fair trade contracts against defendant. He claims that defendant had continued to violate said contracts even after notice and by this motion seeks a temporary injunction. Defendant does not deny plaintiff's claim of selling below the contract price, but resists this motion on the grounds that plaintiff is doing the same thing and therefore does not come before the court with clean hands. In a decision recently handed down by Mr. Justice Hofstadter (De Candido v. Wagonfeld [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,443], published N. Y. L. J., August 21, 1959, on the front page) it was held a valid defense that plaintiff also sold the products of the manufacturers listed in the complaint at prices less than the alleged fair trade prices mentioned therein. Therefore, the drastic relief requested by plaintiff is denied. His remedy is by a prompt trial of the issues involved.

[Fair Trade Action]

LORETO, Justice [In full text]: Plaintiff moves for a temporary injunction in enforcement of the Feld-Crawford Act. He has made a clear case for the relief sought as the moving affidavits show repeated and continual unlawful price cutting by defendant's sales clerks. The defenses alleged, in wholly conclusory fashion, are without merit and incapable of defeating plaintiff's application. The circumstance that plaintiff's place of business is in a residential district and defendant's store is located in a manufacturing area more than a mile away from plaintiff's pharmacy does not defeat plaintiff's right to obtain a temporary injunction. Accordingly, the motion is granted. Settle order which shall also provide for a bond in the sum of $500 and an early trial.

Fair Trade—Defenses to Enforcement Action—Inability to Sell Products at Fair Trade Prices.—A fair trader was granted a preliminary injunction prohibiting the sale of its products below fair trade prices where its allegations of the alleged violations were corroborated by the defendant's statements, in its brief and opposing affidavits, that it could not sell the fair trader's products at the fair trade prices. The fact that the defendant could not do business except by violating the fair trader's rights is no reason why a preliminary injunction should not be granted.

Fair Trade—Defenses to Enforcement Action—Lack of Enforcement—Delay Induced by Defendant's Assurances That It Would Adhere to Fair Trade Prices.—A fair trader's motion for a preliminary injunction was not defeated by the defendant's assertion that the fair trader had been guilty of delay in seeking relief. It was established that any such delay was induced by the defendant's assurances, subsequent to the institution of the action, that it would adhere to the fair trade prices.

Memorandum

[Fair Trade Action]

MURPHY, District Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction is granted. Its allegations that defendant is violating § 369-b of the General Business Law of the State of New York, in that defendant is selling plaintiff's products below their fair trade prices, is amply supported, and in fact corroborated by defendant in its brief and opposing affidavit where it is stated that defendant cannot sell plaintiff's products at their fair trade prices.

That defendant cannot do business except by violating plaintiff's rights is no reason why a preliminary injunction should not be granted.

[Delay]

As to the asserted delay of plaintiff in seeking this relief it is fairly established by plaintiff's affidavits and oral argument that any such delay was invited and occasioned by defendant's assurances subsequent to the institution of this suit that it would discontinue its infringing acts and adhere to the schedule of fair trade prices. Any apparent laches on the part of plaintiff was therefore induced by defendant's representations upon which it invited plaintiff to rely.

[Injunction Granted]

Accordingly, the injunction will issue.

Combinations and Conspiracies—State Antitrust Laws—Contracts in Restraint of Trade—Salesman's Agreement Not to Compete with Former Employer—Validity—Reasonableness As to Time and Territory.—A company engaged in the selling of fluorescent and incandescent light bulbs and tubes was entitled to a temporary injunction enforcing a salesman's agreement not to compete with the company, for a period of one year after the termination of his employment, within the particular New York counties in which he had formerly sold for the company. However, it was not entitled to a temporary injunction enforcing the salesman's agreement that he would not, for a similar period, solicit any of the company's customers. That provision appeared to restrain him from selling, in his particular line, in any territory in the United States in which the company did business. To that extent, the provision might be found void and unenforceable as a contract in restraint of trade and in violation of the New York antitrust law.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Nevertheless, upon a trial of the action, the other provisions of the employment contract, particularly the provision which restricted the salesman's activities within the particular territory in which he had formerly sold for the company, might well be found valid and enforceable. Also, the injunction would not deprive the salesman of the right to earn a livelihood, since he was then employed as a sales manager for the entire State of New York and the territory covered by the injunction covered only a small portion of that area.

[Contracts In Restraint of Trade—Restrictive Employment Contract]

HUDSON, Justice [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: The plaintiff has instituted this action against the defendant for a permanent injunction restraining the defendant for a period of one year ending November 11, 1959 from entering the employ or service of the Industrial Electronics Corporation, a competitor of the plaintiff, or any other rival concern engaged in the same line of business as the plaintiff.

[Temporary Restraining Order Sought]

Plaintiff further seeks a temporary restraining order so enjoining the defendant pending the trial of the action.

[Damages Sought]

Plaintiff also seeks to recover damages for any loss sustained by reason of the alleged violation of the contract between the parties relating to the employment of the defendant by plaintiff as well as such other and further relief as to the Court may seem just and proper.

On instituting the action, the plaintiff brought on, by order to show cause, an application for a temporary injunction restraining the defendant from entering into or continuing in the employ or service or otherwise acting in aid of the business of the Industrial Electronics Corporation or any other rival concern engaged in the same kind of business as the plaintiff, pending the trial.

[Employment Contract]

The defendant made a cross motion pursuant to Rule 106, subdivision 4 of the Rules of Civil Practice for the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint on the ground that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Annexed to the plaintiff's complaint and made a part thereof were the contracts between the parties designated as "sales representative contract", Exhibit 1 being dated November 9, 1953 and Exhibit 2 being dated April 24, 1956. It is alleged that Exhibit 2 superseded Exhibit 1 as of the date thereof. It is undisputed that the defendant was in the employ of the plaintiff as salesman from 1953 up to the month of November, 1958; that during such time the defendant was the exclusive sales representative of the plaintiff within the counties of Oswego, Jefferson, St. Lawrence, Lewis, Clinton, Hamilton, Essex and Franklin and parts of Herkimer and Oneida Counties. As such exclusive sales representative, the defendant was entitled to commissions upon all orders for its products sold and shipped into the exclusive sales territory set apart for the defendant under the contract. Specific provision for the payment of compensation was contained in the contract subject to the right reserved to the plaintiff under certain conditions to make changes in the schedule of commissions, payments, bonus payments and prices to be charged. Any such change, however, was required to apply generally to all sales representatives of the company. The contract provided that the term of employment covered by the contract was one year but that the same would be considered to continue in full force and effect unless either party notified the other to the contrary within thirty (30) days of the expiration date of such contract or that such contract could be terminated by either party at any time by giving to the other ninety (90) days' notice of the intention to so terminate it. The right was also reserved to the company to terminate the contract for certain specific violations of the terms of employment without notice.

[Restrictions]

Under the provisions of paragraph 11 of the contract, a restriction was placed upon and accepted by the sales representative, of employment in competition with the plaintiff for a period of one (1) year after the termination of his employment. The sales representative also acknowledged the secret and confidential nature of certain customer's lists, information and knowledge of the company's business. Paragraph 11 of said contract reads as follows:

"11. The parties recognize that the Sales Representative, through his association with the business of the Company, has come into possession of important information and knowledge of the Company's business, including customers lists, or that he may be expected to do so in the future, and the Sales Representative agrees that such information and customers lists are of a secret and confidential nature. The Sales Representative will, under no circumstances, make any such information or knowledge available to any individual, firm or corporation other than the Company. The Sales Representative further agrees that during the term of his employment hereunder and for a period of one (1) year after the termination thereof for any reason whatsoever he will not in any way, directly or indirectly, solicit, divert, take away or attempt to solicit, divert or take away any of the present customers of the Company or any customers of the Company who shall become such during the term of his employment, or seek to cause any such customer to refrain from patronizing the Company or assist any other person or persons so to do during the same period. The Sales Representative further agrees that during the period of one (1) year following the termination of his employment hereunder for any cause whatsoever, he will not within the territory assigned to him at such termination and any other territory which may have been assigned to him prior to such termination become employed by, or active on behalf of any person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of selling or distributing any of the products sold by the Company during the course of his employment, and that he will not in any way engage in competition with the Company within said territory."

[Termination—Retention of Customer List]

Many of the facts pertinent to a consideration of the motions presently before the Court are not seriously disputed. It appears from the moving papers, and I believe is undisputed, that the defendant terminated his employment November 11, 1958, by letter addressed to the plaintiff on that date. He retained the list of customers which had been turned over to him by the plaintiff at the time of his employment together with the names of such other customers acquired by him during the period of his employment by the plaintiff, claiming that such list of customers belonged to him as his own personal property and refused to turn the same over. The defendant entered the employ of the Industrial Electronics Corporation, a direct competitor of the plaintiff in November, 1958 and as an employee of Industrial Electronics Corporation, solicited a large number of the former customers of the plaintiff whom he had solicited and serviced during his employment by the plaintiff. Although it does not appear in the moving papers, it was conceded by the defendant upon the argument of the motion, that his employment by the Industrial Electronics Corporation was not in the capacity of a sales representative or salesman in the sense that he had formerly been employed by the plaintiff but rather that he had been employed by Industrial Electronics Corporation as their New York State Sales Manager. In such capacity he was in charge of salesmen over the entire State of New York including the territory in which he had had exclusive representation as sales representative for the plaintiff. It appears from the moving papers and was not disputed that the defendant solicited former customers of the plaintiff and did so in company with a salesman of the Industrial Electronics Corporation whom he was training to solicit business in such territory and whom he introduced to his former customers of the plaintiff as qualified to supply them with the products manufactured and sold by the plaintiff and the Industrial Electronics Corporation. The products in question are fluorescent and incandescent light bulbs and tubes used almost entirely by commercial and industrial concerns and being sold under a long life guaranty.

[Cross Motion to Dismiss]

I will first take up the defendant's cross motion to dismiss the plaintiff's complaint inasmuch as a determination of such motion in favor of the defendant would make a determination of the plaintiff's motion unnecessary.

The defendant urges that the contract annexed to the complaint is unenforcible and void for the reason that it is indefinite, uncertain and lacking in mutuality and in any event is unenforcible and void as being in restraint of trade and in violation of section 340 of the General Business Law. * * *

I will next consider the contention of the defendant that the contract is unenforcible as being in restraint of trade, contrary to public policy, and in violation of section 340 of the General Business Law.

[Scope of Restriction]

While it may well be that upon a trial of this action, it will be found that the provisions of paragraph 11 of the contract, Exhibit 2, annexed to the complaint which reads as follows:

> "The Sales Representative further agrees that during the term of his employment hereunder and for a period of one (1) year after the termination thereof for any reason whatsoever he will not in any way, directly or indirectly, solicit, divert, take away or attempt to solicit, divert or take away any of the present customers of the Company or any customers of the Company who shall become such during the term of his employment, or seek to cause any such customer to refrain from patronizing the Company or assist any other person or persons so to do during the same period."

are too broad in their scope because they would appear to restrain the defendant from engaging as a salesman in his particular line of business in any territory in the United States in which the plaintiff does business and, to such extent, would be unenforcible, nevertheless, the other provisions of paragraph 11 of the contract might well be found, upon such trial, to be enforcible as between the parties particularly the provision thereof which restricts the employment of the defendant within the territory assigned to him under the contract for a period of one (1) year after the termination of his employment thereunder. In my opinion the authorities recognize the enforceability of contracts of employment which are reasonably limited as to the time limit of the restriction and the area covered by the restriction.

McCall Co. v. Wright, [198 N. Y. 143]; Todd Protectograph Co. v. Hirschberg, 100 Misc. 418, 165 N. Y. S. 906; Sec. 340, General Business Law.

[Contract Not Unlawful]

I do not feel that the contract provision in question is contrary to public policy or in restraint of trade and, therefore, in violation of section 340 of the General Business Law. The defendant's motion to dismiss the plaintiff's complaint under Rule 106, subdivision 4 is denied.

[Temporary Injunction]

I will next consider the application of the plaintiff for a temporary injunction. As I have previously pointed out, the defendant entered the employ of the plaintiff in 1953 and continued in such employ until November, 1958. The terms of his employment were covered by the contracts, Exhibits 1 and 2, annexed to the complaint. The exclusive territory granted to the defendant under the provisions of both contracts was clearly and definitely set forth. No claim of breach of contract has been made by the defendant. Both contracts specifically provide that the sales representatives agreed that information and knowledge of the company's business, including customers' lists are of a secret and confidential nature. The contract, Exhibit 2, under which the defendant was employed for the last two and a half years contains the specific provision that he would not, for a period following the termination of his employment, become employed by or active on behalf of one engaged in the business of selling or distributing products of his employer within the territory assigned to him under the contract. He also agreed to give ninety (90) days' notice of the termination of his employment and to surrender any list of customers which had been turned over to him including any customers obtained by him thereafter. It is contended by the plaintiff that such actions on the part of the defendant constitute a breach of the contract by him and it was not disputed that the defendant did violate those provisions of the contract. The moving papers set forth specific instances wherein the defendant did solicit many of the customers whom he serviced on behalf of the plaintiff during his employment in the territory exclusively reserved to him under his employment contract and such solicitation occurred almost immediately following the termination of his employment with plaintiff. This was not denied by the defendant.

It appears to the court that the action of the defendant comes clearly within the equitable principles laid down in McCall Company v. Wright, supra, and the many cases which have followed the pertinent general principles of law laid down thereunder. See also,

Foster et al. v. White, 248 A. D. 451, affd. 273 N. Y. 596; Clark Paper & Mfg. Co. v. Stenacher, [236 N. Y. 312]; Todd Protectograph Co. v. Hirschberg, supra.

[Competing in Specific Territory Enjoined]

As I have previously indicated, I do not believe that the plaintiff is entitled to any injunctive relief of a temporary nature to enforce the provisions of paragraph 11 of the contract, Exhibit 2, annexed to the complaint which provides that he shall not for a period of one year after the termination of the contract, solicit, divert, take away or attempt so to do any of the present customers of the company, or any customers who shall become such during the term of his employment. I do believe, however, that the plaintiff is entitled to a temporary injunction pending the trial of this action in respect to that portion of paragraph 11 of the contract, Exhibit 2, annexed to the complaint, which reads as follows:

"The Sales Representative further agrees that during the period of one (1) year following the termination of his employment hereunder for any cause whatsoever, he will not within the territory assigned to him at such termination and any other territory which may have been assigned to him prior to such termination become employed by, or active on behalf of any person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of selling or distribution of any of the products sold by the Company during the course of his employment, and that he will not in any way engage in competition with the Company . . . within said territory."

[Unreported Decisions]

In coming to this conclusion, I am not unmindful of two decisions of the Special Term, which as far as I have been able to ascertain have not been reported. One was submitted by the defendant, entitled "Duro-Test Corporation v. Edward H. Ward". This action was instituted in the Supreme Court of Cayuga County. The defendant therein moved to dismiss the complaint and the Special Term, Hon. James C. O'Brien, Justice, under date of October 8, 1958, held that the contract was too broad in its terms and was unenforcible. The other was submitted by the plaintiff, entitled "Duro-Test Corporation v. George A. Slawsky". This action was instituted in Supreme Court, Albany County. Justice Harry E. Schirick, under date of April 18, 1958, upon an application for a temporary injunction restraining the defendant from continuing in the employ of the Industrial Electronics Corporation, held that under the same or a very similar contract to the one involved herein and under similar circumstances, a court of equity would grant injunctive relief. It should be noted that Judge Schirick restricted the effect of the temporary injunction to the territory embraced in the counties in which the employee had been given an exclusive territory under the contract. Justice O'Brien's memorandum decision does not indicate the factual background which was before him upon the motion to dismiss the complaint and I am unable to determine whether the same circumstances existed there as do here. The provisions of the contract are not set forth.

[Trial Required]

I believe in the present case that the facts and circumstances presented by the moving papers and conceded upon the oral argument of counsel, present facts which require a trial of the issues. It may well be upon such a trial, that the complaint may not be sustained. It seems to me, however, that under the reasoning of Justice Schirick, upon the application before him, that a temporary injunction should be granted under the facts here presented covering only the territory assigned to the defendant in paragraph "4" of the contract dated April 24, 1956. The granting of the temporary injunction herein will not deprive the defendant of any right to earn a livelihood as it appears without dispute that he is presently employed as the sales manager for the entire State of New York for the Industrial Electronics Corporation. The territory covered by the injunctive relief constitutes a very small portion of the State.

[Temporary Injunction Granted]

The motion for temporary injunction is granted without costs. Order accordingly.

Wisconsin Antitrust Laws

Combinations and Conspiracies—Contracts in Restraint of Trade—Salesman's Agreement Not to Compete with Employer—Reasonableness as to Time and Territory.—A company engaged in the selling of gasoline and oil through service stations and tank car deliveries was properly granted an injunction enforcing an employment contract by which a salesman agreed that he would not "re-enter the gasoline and petroleum business in Milwaukee county for a space of two (2) years" after the termination of his employment. It is the rule in Wisconsin that such restrictive covenants in employment contracts should be reasonably necessary for the protection of the legitimate interests of the employer and, at the same time, should not be oppressive and harsh on the employee or injurious to the interests of the general public. Reasonableness as to time depends upon the period required to obliterate, in the minds of the employer's customers, the identification formed during the period of the employee's work. Here, two years was not an unreasonable length of time. As to the territorial restriction, it was limited to a single county in which the employer did 75 per cent of its business. That restriction was no broader than was reasonably necessary. Further, the covenant was not unduly harsh or oppressive on the employee. Considering his contention that he had high blood pressure and limited schooling, the court noted that the employee's health did not require that he must engage only in the sale of petroleum products in Milwaukee county. Further, there was no economic depression making jobs scarce. In addition, the restriction was reasonable with respect to the interest of the general public, since it did not create any shortage of employees, or of that type of service, and did not stifle competition or create a monopoly.

[Contracts in Restraint of Trade—Restrictive Employment Contracts]

Suit by Lakeside Oil Co. for an injunction against the defendant, Harold H. Slutsky, a former employee, to enforce the restrictive covenant of his employment contract not to compete after the term of employment directly or indirectly with the plaintiff for a period of two years in Milwaukee county. The defendant appeals from the judgment granting the injunction.

Slutsky started to work for the plaintiff as a gasoline and oil salesman on April 4, 1957 under a written contract dated March 30, 1957. The contract provided it could be terminated on ten days' notice by either party and "in the event your employment is terminated with this company you agree not to re-enter the gasoline and petroleum business in Milwaukee county for a space of two (2) years, either directly or indirectly".

Prior to his employment with the plaintiff Slutsky had no experience in the gasoline and petroleum business. He had previously worked as a clerk and for fourteen years had operated a grocery store. Because of his high blood pressure he could not physically exert himself and was advised by his doctor to sell the grocery store.

Slutsky's primary duties with the plaintiff were to secure new customers and service them. He developed his own customers for fuel oil or gas to industrial and residential users. Some leads he received from the plaintiff. He received on-the-job training and had access to the plaintiff's sales or delivery records. Excepting for a few months he was the only full time salesman employed by the plaintiff. During his employment Slutsky secured, according to his testimony, about 7 industrial accounts and some 30 to 40 domestic customers and made sales in Milwaukee, Waukesha and Dane counties. No special knowledge of gasoline or fuel oil was required in the selling. Customers were obtained primarily upon the basis of the defendant's personal salesmanship and the faith and trust the defendant could engender in the customer. The president of the plaintiff never met or saw the majority of the new customers acquired by the defendant.

The business of the plaintiff was competitive and there was very little difference in the products or the prices. Seventy-five percent (75 percent) of the plaintiff's business was done in Milwaukee county, where it sold gas through 4 service stations to the retail trade and through tank car deliveries to commercial accounts and fuel oil to domestic and industrial users. Customers of the plaintiff were not always steady and the contacts with them were sporadic.

After working 15 months Slutsky decided to go into business for himself. He gave as his reason his high blood pressure. The defendant voluntarily terminated his employment on August 31, 1958, pursuant to a proper notice given to the plaintiff. Some time the following month the defenant with Helmut Dreyfuss incorporated the Marquette Oil Company for the purpose of engaging in the business of selling petroleum products. This company started business in Milwaukee county on October 1, 1958. The defendant was originally a stockholder, a director and officer of the company and was to receive $150 per week while working. He invested $2,500 in capital stock and loaned the company $12,500. Dreyfuss did likewise. The wives of Dreyfuss and the defendant were also officers.

On October 10, 1958 a temporary injunction was issued by the trial court and after a trial a permanent injunction was entered on March 3, 1959. After the issuance of the temporary injunction the defendant apparently ceased being a director, officer and stockholder of the Marquette Oil Company but has a contract to repurchase his stock. Additional facts will be stated in the opinion.

HALLOWS, Justice [In full text]: Slutsky contends the contract constitutes a general restraint of trade and is therefore illegal under sec 133.01, stats. In Pulp Wood Company v. Green Bay Paper & Fiber Company (1914), 157 Wis. 604, 147 N. W. 1058, this court discussed the "rule of reason" applicable to cases within the general purview of this section and pointed out that the validity of a particular contract depended upon the facts and the incident to which competition was restricted or trade obstructed. The case of State v. Lewis & Leidersdorf (1930), 201 Wis. 543, 230 N. W. 692, cited by the defendant, applies to an entirely different set of facts and is not in point here. This contract on its face is not illegal under sec. 133.01, stats.

[Reasonable Restraints]

Contracts not to compete after a term of employment being in the general class of contracts in restraint of trade may be illegal if the restraint is unreasonable. Restatement of Contracts, secs. 514 and 515. But a contract by an employee not to compete with his employer after a term of employment within such territory and during such time as may be reasonably necessary for the protection of the employer without imposing undue hardship on the employee is a reasonable restraint. Restatement of Contracts, sec. 516; 36 Amer. Jur., Monopolies, sec. 78, p. 554; Eureka Laundry Company v. Long (1911), 146 Wis. 205, 131 N. W. 412; 28 Amer. Jur., Injunctions, sec. 105, p. 604.

[Wisconsin Statute]

In 1957 the legislature enacted sec. 103.465, stats., which provided that a covenant by an employee not to compete with his employer after the term of his employment within a specified territory and during a specified time is lawful and enforceable if the restrictions imposed are reasonably necessary for the protection of the employer. This section also provides that such restrictive covenant imposing an unreasonable restraint is void and unenforceable even as to so much of the covenant or performance as would be a reasonable restraint. Prior to the passage of this section this court held in Fullerton Lumber Company v. Torborg (1954), 270 Wis. 133, 70 N. W. 2d 585, that such a contract imposing an unreasonable restraint would be enforced to the extent that such restraint was reasonable. The rationale was that when the terms of a restrictive covenant were not otherwise invalid only the excess of territory or time was contrary to public policy and unenforceable. The rule respecting the unenforceability of unreasonable restraints not to compete laid down in the Torborg case has been changed by sec. 103.465, stats., 1957.

However, this section does not change the prior law of what constitute unreasonable restraints because the section only requires the restrictions as to time and place to be reasonably necessary for the protection of the employer. If such a contract is void for other reasons, such as public policy, or sec. 113.01(1), stats., or creates an undue hardship upon the employee a court of equity will not enforce it.

[Wisconsin Rule]

Contracts not to compete after a term of employment have been the subject matter of much litigation in the United States. There is a multitude of cases collected in the various text books and especially enlightening annotations are to be found in 9 A. L. R. 1456, 20 A. L. R. 861, 29 A. L. R. 1331, 52 A. L. R. 1362 and 41 A. L. R. 2d 15. However phrased the rule requires that a restrictive covenant not to compete after a term of employment should be reasonably necessary for the protection of the legitimate interests of the employer and at the same time should not be oppressive and harsh on the employee or injurious to the interests of the general public. This is the rule in Wisconsin. Eureka Laundry Company v. Long, supra; Milwaukee Linen Supply Company v. Ring (1933), 210 Wis. 467, 246 N. W. 567.

[Protection of Employer—Necessity for Restriction]

The first question to be determined under the rule is whether there is a need for any restriction of the activities of the defendant for the protection of the plaintiff. An employer is not entitled to be protected against legitimate and ordinary competition of the type that a stranger could give. There must be some additional special facts and circumstances which render the restrictive covenant reasonably necessary for the protection of the employer's business. Many cases have found such special facts in the nature of the relationship between the employee and the customers of the employer. This opinion has the customer contact theory. See Anno. 41 A. L. R. 2d 15. If under this theory the most important single asset of most businesses is their stock of customers the protection of this asset is the legitimate interest of the employer.

Here Slutsky was hired as a salesman to develop customers for the plaintiff. The mere opportunity of Slutsky to become acquainted with the customers would not determine a reasonable necessity, but Slutsky's personal relationship with the customers, whom he obtained by his own prsonality and salesmanship and whom, in most cases, the plaintiff did not know personally, amounted to such control or influence that Slutsky would be able to take such customers away from the plaintiff. Slutsky not only developed the customers but he also serviced them. The plaintiff's business is highly competitive; there is very little or no variation in price or difference in the products sold. Sales made by Slutsky were due not to price or the fact they involved the plaintiff's product but to the customers' confidence in Slutsky or his personal relationship with the customers. To his customers Slutsky was identified with the plaintiff's business. This was due in part because he was the main contact with the customers; the sales took place primarily at the customer's home or place of business. He was no mere order-taker but a salesman with some authority and standing. Under such circumstances the plaintiff has a great need for protection from the competition of his former employee. Some or most of these elements were recognized in Eureka Laundry Company v. Long, supra, and Fullerton Lumber Company v. Torborg, supra.

[Trade Secrets—Special Knowledge]

The defendant argues he did not become the possessor of trade secrets or acquire any special knowledge so as to be in a position to damage the plaintiff. This argument is generally advanced in cases involving an employee's breach of his affirmative promise to work for the employer and no covenant not to compete exists. In such cases the question is the damage caused by the defendant by the breach of his affirmative promise. That is not the case here. If Slutsky had possessed technical trade secrets that fact would be an additional ground for the necessity of protecting the plaintiff. The defendant, however, does retain the advantage of some special knowledge of the source of supply, methods of distribution and of the names and special needs of the plaintiff's customers. He had access to the records of the plaintiff and received on-the-job training. Slutsky knew nothing about the petroleum products industry when he was hired by the plaintiff. Undoubtedly he believed that he had acquired enough skill and experience in the plaintiff's type of business during his 15 months of employment to enable him to start a competing business for himself. This is not a suit to enjoin Slutsky from using ordinary business methods or generally obtainable information or his talents as a salesman.

[Reasonableness as to Time—Two Years]

Slutsky was paid to develop customers for the plaintiff. He should not now be allowed to take such customers away from the plaintiff without giving his former employer a reasonable chance to keep them. This raises the question of whether the restriction of two years is reasonable. Reasonableness in this respect depends upon the period of time required to obliterate in the minds of the plaintiff's customers the identification formed during the period of the defendant's employment. After what period of time will a customer cease to be influenced in regard to the plaintiff's business by the personal relationship with Slutsky? An analysis of the cases on this point indicates that when an employee's contacts with the customers are regular and frequent a shorter period of time is needed by the employer than when, as here, the contacts are made at relatively long intervals. The plaintiff's customers did not buy fuel oil to heat their homes daily, weekly or monthly but generally on a heating season basis. In Eureka Laundry Company v. Long, supra, a two year restraint was held reasonable for a route salesman making frequent and regular customer contacts. Many cases have held two years to be reasonable under such circumstances. See cases in Anno. 41 A. L. R. 2d 15, at 179. Two years under the facts of this case cannot be held to be an unreasonable length of time in which to allow the plaintiff to protect his business from the defendant.

[Reasonableness as to Territory—One County]

The next question is whether the restraint is reasonable as to territory. Slutsky made sales in Milwaukee, Waukesha and Dane counties. Seventy-five percent (75 percent) of the plaintiff's business is done in Milwaukee county. Restriction is limited to Milwaukee county and does not include other territory in which the plaintiff does business and in which Slutsky was active. The restriction is confined to the area where Slutsky principally operated. It was stated by this court in Wisconsin Ice & Coal Company v. Lueth (1933), 213 Wis. 42, 250 N. W. 819, that such a restriction would be proper if limited to such territory as constituted the field of the employee's activities but could go no further. On the facts of that case it was held that the restriction involved was broader than was called for by the necessities of the case. Considering the area of the plaintiff's business, and especially the area of the defendant's activities, the nature of the products and the other facts this restriction is not broader than is reasonably necessary.

[Effect on Salesman]

The defendant contends that the enforcement of the covenant would cause serious and harmful consequences to the defendant because of his high blood pressure and his limited schooling. Testimony is clear that the defendant can engage in any business which does not require strenuous physical effort. The defendant is not prevented from engaging as a salesman or as a proprietor of a business or in any other occupation which does not require physical effort. Slutsky's health does not require that he must engage only in the sale of petroleum products in Milwaukee county. Slutsky is a high school graduate and a successful salesman. He has managed to acquire ownership of his home and some income-producing real estate. At age 40, and even without a college education, there is no great hardship on him to use his talents as a salesman in other fields of endeavor.

In determining the harshness of a restrictive covenant on an employee this court can take judicial notice of present prevailing conditions of employment and the special training of the defendant for the specific occupation. Milwaukee Linen Supply Com- pany v. Ring, supra. Here the defendant has only 15 months' experience in this business, all of which he acquired in the employment of the plaintiff. He brought no special knowledge, trade secrets or experience in the industry to the plaintiff. What he has learned he has learned from his employment by the plaintiff. Neither are we in an economic depression when jobs are scarce. While the keeping of his promise may be inconvenient to the defendant and may now be undesirable from his standpoint it is not unduly harsh or oppressive on him in relation to the relatively greater harm to the employer if the covenant is not enforced.

[Public Interest]

In considering the reasonableness in respect to the interest of the general public there must be weighed the interest of the public in having access to the employee's particular services during the time and in the area restricted with the benefits that accrue to the public from such restrictive covenants in creating opportunities for employment. Employment opportunities are a concern of the general public. Likewise this contract does not create any shortage of employees or of this type of service or stifle competition or create a monopoly. The plaintiff is a small company. For most of the time the defendant worked for the plaintiff he was the sole salesman. Whether the defendant competes or does not compete with the plaintiff will have no effect on the public generally. The enforcement of this covenant will not create any danger that the defendant might become a public charge. He has ability as a salesman, in which occupation he can support himself and his family without causing damage to the plaintiff, which he agreed not to do.

The plaintiff [sic] contends the findings and conclusions are not supported by the evidence. It is true that the finding as to the exact number of accounts which the defendant developed is not sustained by the evidence. However, the record does establish the defendant developed 30 to 40 residential accounts and 7 industrial and commercial accounts. This appears to be a partial list. The exact number of customers is not material in this case. The discrepancy in the finding is unimportant and can be disregarded. Lambertson v. Lambertson (1921), 175 Wis. 398, 184 N. W. 708; sec. 274.37, stats. The other findings objected to are either supported by the evidence or are reasonable inferences which the trial court could draw from the evidence before it.

[Threatened Injury—Remedy at Law]

The last contention of the defendant is that the plaintiff failed to plead and prove that his injury is irreparable and that there is no adequate remedy at law. However, the complaint alleges that irreparable damage will accrue from the breach of the contract by the defendant and the damage from such breach is impossible to determine. It is true that the plaintiff proved no actual damage with the exception of the loss of one account. It is reasonable to assume that actual damage was prevented because a temporary injunction was granted within 10 days after the defendant's company commenced business. In seeking an injunction it is not necessary to prove that the defendant has suffiered irreparable damage but only that he is likely to suffer such damage. The remedy at law may be inadequate because of the difficulty or impossibility of measuring the damages. Butterick Publishing Company v. Rose (1910), 141 Wis. 533, 124 N. W. 647. These rules are well established and fundamental in equity jurisprudence.

The purpose of an injunction is to prevent damage, not to compensate for it. The defendant agreed not to cause any damage to the plaintiff. Such damage is threatened and would be irreparable in its very nature. A court of equity would grant it special relief in such a case.

By the Court. Judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. September Term and Session, 1959. Nos. 12470, 12471. Dated September 30, 1959.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Damages Recoverable for Antitrust Violations—Defense of Conspiratorial Patent Infringement Action—Defense Attorneys' Fees as Part of "Damages" to Be Trebled Under Antitrust Laws.—A tractor cab company and one of its officers, having successfully defended a patent infringement suit which had been instituted against them as a part of a conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws, and having successfully prosecuted a counterclaim based on the plaintiff's antitrust violation, were entitled to the inclusion of attorneys' fees incurred by them in the defense of the infringement action as an element of the compensatory damages which they sustained by reason of the plaintiff's antitrust violation. Thus, their attorneys' fees of $28,244.31, along with their other damages, would be trebled under Section 4 of the Clayton Act. The trial court had awarded those fees under Title 35 of the United States Code, § 285 (providing for reasonable attorneys' fees to the prevailing party in "exceptional" patent cases), and had specifically declined to include the fees as an element of the damages to be trebled under the antitrust laws; however, the usual bases for awarding attorneys' fees in patent cases, bad faith or inequitable or unconscionable conduct, were absent. On the other hand, the trial court's reference to the plaintiff's "use" of the patent, in the finding that the case was "exceptional," could have had reference only to the plaintiff's antitrust violation.

The court also sustained both the fact and the amount of the trial court's separate award of $25,000 in attorneys' fees to the defendants for the prosecution of their antitrust counterclaim. The plaintiff contended that the award was "grossly disproportionate to the amount of compensatory damages proved—$27,611.35," and the defendants, itemizing in excess of 3700 hours expended by their attorneys on the antitrust action, and arguing that the present court had previously computed fees for experienced trial lawyers in Chicago at $40.00 per hour, contended that the award was inadequate. Observing that the "result" might be properly taken into consideration in fixing attorneys' fees, and that the result "should be measured by the amount of damages found," the court concluded that there had been no abuse of the trial court's discretion.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.725.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Damages for Violations of Antitrust Laws—Damages Recoverable—Measure of Damages—Loss of "Potential Sales"—Accountant's Computations.—Antitrust counterclaimants, having been awarded $27,611.35 as compensatory damages for a plaintiff's antitrust violations, including $20,169.00 awarded for the loss of "potential sales" to two companies which stopped doing business with them as a result of patent infringement notices sent by the plaintiff pursuant to a conspiracy, were not entitled to a remand of the cause for a re-computation of the damages to include losses from other "potential sales." Loss of profits from the interruption of an established business may be recovered where the plaintiff makes it reasonably certain, by competent proof, what the amount of his loss actually was. Thus, damages may not be determined by mere speculation or guess, but it is sufficient if the evidence shows the extent of the damages as a matter of "just and reasonable inference, although the result is only approximate." Here, the defendants first calculated the average number of units sold per dealer. That calculation, which was based on sales made at a time when they sold directly to dealers (684 in number) and had no distributors, was applied to a later period when the defendants had distributors serving 17,450 dealers. "Estimated potential sales" were then calculated by applying the "annual percentage growth in tractor population in the United States." After calculating the "total estimated profits," the defendants' accountant then subtracted "realized profits" and arrived at the figure of $1,284,203.93, profits that allegedly "could have been realized on the estimated potential sales except for the antitrust violations" of the plaintiff. The trial court found that theory of computing "estimated potential sales" to be unrealistic, noting that it assumed certain climatic conditions, the absence of "peaks and valleys in annual sales," and continuous handling of their product, by their dealers and distributors, throughout the years involved. The reviewing court agreed that the theory did not meet the standard of "just and reasonable inference."

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.400.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Damages Recoverable for Antitrust Violations—Elements Which Must Be Established—Proximate Cause—Sufficiency of Proof.—A tractor cab company and one of its officers, having successfully asserted an antitrust counterclaim in a patent infringement action, were not entitled to have the cause remanded for re-computation of the damages to include losses "attributable" to a "working arrangement" under which they operated as suppliers manufacturing parts for one of the patentee's licensees. There was no preponderance of the evidence to show that the patentee and its licensees, through any conspiratorial act, had caused the defendants' losses arising out of that working arrangement.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9009.350, 9011.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Antitrust Law Violations as Defenses—Unlawful Patent Licensing Agreement—Treble Damage Counterclaim by Alleged Party to Conspiracy.—A tractor cab company and one of its officers, in a treble damage counterclaim charging a patentee with conspiring to violate the antitrust laws, were not estopped from denying the validity of the patent in question or from asserting the plaintiff's violation of the antitrust laws because, contrary to the patentee's assertion, they had not brought themselves "under the cloak of the group license" which was apparently conceded to be a violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The trial court found that the defendants entered into a "working arrangement" with one of the patentee's licensees, but that they operated only as suppliers manufacturing parts for that licensee and did not become licensees under the disputed patent nor parties to the conspiracy.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9041.155.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Antitrust Counterclaim in Patent Infringement Action—Counterclaimants' Costs of Suit—Attorneys' Fees as "Costs"—Transcript of Trial—Unidentified Photostats.—In a patent infringement action in which the defendants successfully prosecuted a counterclaim based on the patentee's antitrust violations, the court rejected the plaintiff's contention that attorneys' fees, under Section 4 of the Clayton Act (providing for the recovery of treble damages and "the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee"), are meant to be included as an item in the usual "costs" taxed against the unsuccessful litigant. Also, there was no abuse of discretion in the trial court's allowance of costs for a copy of the transcript of the trial and for certain unidentified photostats. Further, the trial court properly rejected the plaintiff's contention that the major portion of the costs were attributable to a period in the litigation in which he had no interest.

[Patent Infringement Action—Antitrust Counterclaim]

KNOCH, Circuit Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: This action was originally brought April 14, 1950, by Clyde E. Clapper and Lee Flora for infringement of Clapper Patent No. 2,452,834 (Hot Air Deflector for Tractors) and Flora Patent No. 2,461,974 (Enclosure for Tractors). The original defendants, The Original Tractor Cab Company (hereinafter called "Original") and Stanley Williams (its president and a director) joined licensees of Clapper and Flora as cross-defendants.[1] Original and Williams counterclaimed for misuse of patents and violation of the anti-trust laws.

[Settlement]

By settlement in December 1954, Flora dismissed his claim for patent infringement and defendants agreed not to proceed against him or the cross-defendants under the counterclaim.

[Amended Complaint]

Clapper then filed an amended complaint setting up five causes of action, three of which Clapper allowed to be dismissed. Only one seems to be pursued in this Court: the claim of patent infringement.

[Trial Court's Ruling]

The District Court found the Clapper patent invalid, dismissed the claim for unfair competition, found no breach of contract by defendants, held that the settlement of December 1954 did not discharge Clapper from liability under the counterclaim and awarded defendants attorneys' fees incurred in connection with both the patent and the anti-trust phases of the case, as well as damages for anti-trust violation.

Clapper, appealed, relying on the following alleged errors in the Trial Court's rulings and judgment:

"(1) Exclusion of Plaintiff's Exhibits 199 and 200 relating to the settlement of Dec. 14, 1954.

"(2) Denying Plaintiff's Motion to Dismiss Defendants' Counterclaim since such cross action should have been released and dismissed by the settlement of Dec. 14, 1954.

"(3) Adjudicating the Clapper patent invalid.

"(4) Awarding defendants attorneys' fees for prosecution of the patent defense phase of the case based upon its being an exceptional case.

"(5) Denying Plaintiff's Motion under Rule 37(b)(2), F. R. C. P., to discipline and penalize defendants for failure to comply with the Court's orders with respect to the production of documents and discovery under Rule 34.

"(6) Awarding defendants damage under their counterclaim for antitrust violation when no damage was proved which was the proximate cause of any alleged violation.

"(7) Making a separate award of attorneys' fees to defendants for prosecution of the antitrust phase of the case when no damage was proved which was the proximate cause of the alleged violation.

"(8) Refusing to consider defendant Williams' breach of the contract made with plaintiff Clapper.

"(9) Awarding Defendants' costs in the case."

[Damages—Attorneys' Fees]

Defendants assert that the District Court erred in failing to include attorneys' fees, awarded for defense of the patent infringement action, as a part of the compensatory damages to be trebled under section 4 of the Clayton Act. They argue that the patent infringement action was filed as part of the conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws. They contend further that the District Court erred in failing to include damages for loss of potential sales and in awarding attorneys' fees at less than a sum proportionate to the skill and time involved. Their position is that the cause should be remanded with directions to recompute fees and damages in accordance with the foregoing.

[History of Case]

A brief reference to the history of this litigation is appropriate here. On March 17, 1945, Clapper applied for Letters Patent, and in May, 1945, gave an exclusive license to Bearing Distributors (later Comfort Equipment Co., and hereinafter called "Comfort"). In 1948 the U. S. Patent Office declared two interferences involving applications of Flora and one Halligan.

Flora had licensed Cab-Ette Co. (hereinafter called "Cab-Ette") and Halligan had licensed the Fort Dodge Tent and Awning Co. (later Burch Manufacturing Co., hereinafter called "Burch").

[License Agreement]

In April, 1948, Clapper, Flora, Halligan and their licensees and attorneys met to settle the interferences. The result of their efforts was the License Agreement of August

[1] Comfort Equipment Co. v. Steckler, 7 Cir. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,731], 212 F. 2d 371 (1954). Two of the licensees moved to dismiss Original's counterclaim and cross-complaint on the ground that proper venue did not exist. The Trial Court overruled the motions, whereupon the two licensees sought writs of mandamus, which this Court denied.

3-4, 1948, whereby Flora and Clapper jointly licensed Comfort, Burch and Cab-Ette.

In the summer of 1948, Original began manufacture of the accused device. On November 24, 1948, Clapper sent Original notice of infringement of his patent. In August, 1949, Clapper's attorney sent a second notice to Original and sent notices of infringement to Original's distributors threatening suits for patent infringement. This suit was instituted April 14, 1950, as indicated.

[Government Suit]

The group license was terminated by agreement April 6, 1953, (effective November 15, 1952) during the pendency of a civil suit brought, about a year after the initial patent infringement suit, by the Department of Justice, in the Western District of Missouri, against Flora, Clapper, and their licensees, for antitrust violation. That action was terminated by consent decree dated October 27, 1953. The District Court found inter alia:

> "59. By the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, the patentees, Clapper and Flora, granted a non-exclusive and non-transferable license to Comfort, Cabette and Burch to manufacture and sell tractor covers. The limitations imposed on the licensees by said Agreement, that the licensees would manufacture the inventions 'at their respective * * * named addresses and in no other place or places'; and that no other license would be granted 'without obtaining the written consent thereto of the remaining parties to the Agreement;' that if a license so granted was terminated, as provided in Paragraph 8 thereof Flora or Clapper, respectively, shall be at liberty to license other licensees; that the parties would 'mutually agree upon procedure for the disposition' of infringement suits; and that the parties set up a 'litigation fund' to be used for that purpose, all are elements of illegality when used for an illegal purpose, as they were."

[Antitrust Violation]

It is apparently conceded that the joint License Agreement violated sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

[Validity of Patents]

After the consent decree in the Missouri case, a license was twice offered to Original and twice declined by Original, which was then contesting the validity of the patents in this cause, although prior to suit, Original had sought a license from plaintiffs.

The group License Agreement had provided for a litigation fund, of which Clapper was trustee. He directed the policing of the licensed patents. When the License Agreement terminated, the litigation fund, out of which costs of this suit had been paid, was divided between Clapper and Flora to maintain this action which was then still pending.

Clapper moved for admission of exhibits 199 and 200 as pertinent to the then pending questions of attorneys' fees, possible release of Clapper from liability under the counterclaim for antitrust violation, and Clapper's assertion that defendants had not complied fully with the District Court's order requiring production of documents. Exhibit 199 was described in the aforesaid motion as a conformed copy of the Agreement dated December 14, 1954, executed by Flora, Cab-Ette, Comfort and Burch (the three licensees) and four attorneys for defendants. Exhibit 200 was described as a conformed copy of waiver and release of attorneys' lien executed by the same four attorneys. Both documents are set out in plaintiff's appendix at pages PA-431 to 435.

The District Court found that nothing would be gained from admission of these documents and overruled the motion. However, the District Court plainly indicated that full consideration had been given to the contents of these documents, remarking that the Court stood on its prior ruling that Clapper had not been released by the terms of the settlement and covenant not to sue the other alleged joint tort-feasors. The District Court went on to say that the waiver and release of attorneys' lien meant only that the attorneys would not look to Flora, Comfort, Burch, and Cab-Ette for payment of fees. The defendants were not parties to the release and were not thus precluded from recovering fees and costs as provided by the antitrust laws. The District Court also found that defendants had made satisfactory production. We cannot agree with plaintiff that denial of admission of these exhibits constituted error on the part of the Trial Court.

[Patent Invalid—Lack of Invention]

The Clapper patent is directed toward utilizing the heat of a tractor engine to warm the operator and facilitate use of the tractor in cold weather. Clapper describes it as including the tractor, its frame, the engine and the fan which creates a current of air over the engine, a flexible cover surrounding the engine compartment forming a cowling between the hood and steel bow mounted in front of the operator to constitute a passageway for the heated air to the operator.

Clapper did not invent a new tractor. Any conventional tractor could be used. The cowl and bow are found in early patents for automobiles. These include a number of patents not cited by the Patent Examiner, thus weakening the presumption of validity which attaches to a patent by virtue of its issuance. Johnson Laboratories, Inc. v. Meissner Mfg. Co., 7 Cir. (1938) 98 F. 2d 937, 943. Channelling heat back to the operator is also found in early automobile patents, notably Standish. Similar combinations are found in earlier patents such as Winet and Weiland. Clapper employed old elements known to prior art, freely available to skilled artisans, to perform their old functions. We cannot say that the finding of invalidity was clearly erroneous. On the contrary it was well supported by the record and the law. A. & P. Tea Co. v. Supermarket Corp., 340 U. S. 147, 152-3 (1950); General Time Corp. v. Hansen Mfg. Co., 7 Cir. (1952) 199 F. 2d 259, 265. In view of the District Court's careful analysis of the prior art, it is unnecessary for us to do more than refer to the District Court's findings.

[Attorneys' Fees for Defense of Infringment Action—Element of Antitrust Damages]

Clapper sees no justification for awarding defendants attorneys' fees for prosecution of the patent defense. The District Court found the patent infringement suit was instituted by Clapper and Flora as a part of the conspiracy in violation of the anti-trust laws. If that was the ground for considering the patent action "exceptional", Clapper believes that "purging of such stigma" removed the case from that category. Clapper considers the "stigma" to have ended when, following settlement of the anti-trust violation on December 5, 1954, he proceeded individually and in his own right, without support or influence of Flora or their three licensees. He argues that he was under no disability to collect damages for patent infringement following cessation of the anti-trust violation. As defendants point out, however, as late as 1955, Clapper was still seeking injunction and damages for the preceding 6-year period.

Clapper cited patent cases in which awards of attorneys' fees by District Courts have been reversed. In these cases the Court of Appeals found that characterization of the cases as "exceptional" was erroneous as a conclusion of law and unsupported by the record as a finding of fact. In the case before us the District Court's finding of fact No. 71 states this to be an "exceptional" case, and directs award of attorneys' fees for that reason. Defendants argue that the award is inadequate. They liken the situation here to that in Kobe, Inc. v. Dempsey Pump Co., D. C., Okla. (1951) [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,801], 97 F. Supp. 342, affirmed 10 Cir., (1952) [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,312]; 198 F. 2d 416, cert. den. 344 U. S. 837. There attorneys' fees incurred in defense of a patent infringement suit were held to be recoverable as damages sustained through anti-trust violations. Here the District Court declined to include the attorneys' fees incurred in the patent infringement defense as an element of damages in the anti-trust action (to be increased three-fold). The District Court stated that attorneys' fees were awarded because of the exceptional circumstances. Finding No. 71 reads:

> ". . . Said sum, however, is not to be included as an element of damages in the antitrust action to be increased threefold, as defendants would have the court do. It is to be awarded counsel for the defendants by reason of their representing the successful parties in the patent infringement action, and by reason of the exceptional circumstances involved in the case concerning the validity of the patent and its use by the patentee and his licensees, all as found in these findings of fact."

However, the District Court made no specific finding that the adverse party had been guilty of bad faith, inequitable, or unconscionable conduct "in the case concerning the validity of the patent." These are the usual bases for awarding attorneys' fees in patent cases. Continental Art Co. v. Bertolozzi, 7 Cir. (1956) 232 F. 2d 131, 134; Wilson v. Seng Co., 7 Cir. (1952) 194 F. 2d 399, 404; Apex Electrical Mfg. Co. v Altorfer Bros. Co., 7 Cir. (1956) [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,550], 238 F. 2d 867, 874. On the other hand, the District Court's reference to use of the patent by the patentee and his licensees can have reference only to the anti-trust violations. The record of this eight-year long litigation fully supports such a finding, and defendants are entitled to have their reasonable attorneys' fees and expenses included as an element of damages in the anti-trust action.

[Compliance With Discovery Orders]

Clapper charges the Trial Judge with error in denying motion under Rule 37(b)(2), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, to discipline and penalize defendants for alleged failure to comply with the District Court's orders respecting production of documents and discovery under Rule 34. The District Judge gave careful, complete and repeated consideration to this question, and, after hearing evidence, found that full discovery had been made.

In listing the contested issues, Clapper includes the following:

"9. Did defendants' misrepresentations concerning the loss of records by fire and their refusal and failure to comply with plaintiff's request for discovery and with the Trial Court's order for the production of documents impose undue, unwarranted and unlawful hardship and expense upon plaintiff in making his proofs

(a) respecting damage allegedly suffered by defendants as charged in their counterclaim;

(b) respecting the character, purpose and duration of the Original Tractor Cab-Cab-Ette working arrangement in the fall of 1949;

(c) respecting the breach by defendant Williams of the Clapper Williams contract entered into at the Chicago meeting of September 12, 1949."

However, the issue is not argued in the brief. Defendants, noting that fact in their brief, presume the issue to have been abandoned. The reply brief does not indicate otherwise. Review of the record before us shows the finding of the Trial Judge to be fully supported.

[Damages—Proximate Cause]

It is Clapper's position that defendants actually proved no damage of which the antitrust violation was a proximate cause. The District Court in this regard found:

"68. The evidence shows direct loss was suffered by the defendant, Original, in salaries, wages and other expenses of shutdown from August 22 to September 23, 1949, in the total amount of $2,561.45. . . ."

"69. The evidence shows that the defendant, Original, had negotiated for financing for continued operation which had to be dropped entirely by the shutdown following the notices sent by the plaintiff in concert with others, in August, 1949, the cost of which to the defendant, Original, was $317.20, which it is entitled to recover.

"70. The evidence shows that the defendant, Original, had expended for advertising the sum of $4,563.70, which was rendered valueless by the forced shutdown in August, 1949, as a result of said notices of infringement sent to the defendant and to its distributors."

"72. The evidence shows that there has been a direct loss of sales by defendant, Original, to Farm Equipment Sales Co. and Stover-Winsted Co. as a consequence of the notices of infringement sent pursuant to the conspiracy created by the License Agreement of August 3-4, 1948.

"Following the time Stover-Winsted Co. and Farm Equipment Sales Co. stopped doing business with the defendant, Original, the evidence shows that during the years 1949 through the first eleven months of 1956, Farm Equipment Sales Co. purchased from Comfort Equipment Company 9,084 covers. . . ."

"74. The losses heretofore stated resulted in damage to the business and property of the defendant, Original, as a consequence of the illegal conspiracy of the plaintiff Clapper, and Flora and their licensees acting in concert. For such damage, defendant, Original, is entitled to recover the following amounts of compensatory damages:

(1) Costs resulting from forced stoppage of production, from August 22, 1949, through September 23, 1949	$ 2,561.45
(2) Expenses incurred in finance negotiations.	317.20
(3) Advertising costs rendered useless by reason of forced work stoppage.	4,563.70
(4) Loss of potential sales to Farm Equipment Sales Co. for the years 1949 through the first eleven months of 1956	12,263.40
(5) Loss of potential sales to Stover-Winsted Co. for the years 1949 through the first five months of 1952.	7,905.60
Total	$27,611.35"

Review of the record shows ample support for these findings which cannot be held to have been clearly erroneous.

[Treble Damages]

The total figure of $27,611.35 was trebled under section 4 of the Clayton Act, which brought it to $82,834.05, against which the District Court credited the $110,000 payment made by Flora and the three licensees, leaving a balance in Clapper's favor, which in turn was credited against attorneys' fees of $28,244.31 awarded for defense of the patent infringement suit as an "exceptional" case. As indicated above, in our opinion, this latter sum should have been included in the compensatory damages sustained by defendants as a result of the antitrust violation.

[Attorneys' Fees—Antitrust Phase of Case]

Clapper protests the separate award of attorneys' fees to defendants for prosecution of the antitrust phase of the case, again, on the ground that defendants failed to prove any damage which was the proximate result of the alleged antitrust violation. As indicated above, this Court concurs in the District Court's findings to the contrary.

[Amount—Percentage of Damages]

Clapper also takes issue with the amount of $25,000 attorneys' fees allowed, as grossly disproportionate to the amount of compensatory damages proved—$27,611.35. The District Court arrived at this figure after disallowing the defendants' claim for $141,035.00 as not having a realistic relation to the amount of compensatory damages awarded. The District Court, in this aspect of the case, relied on Milwaukee Towne Corp. v. Loew's, Inc., 7 Cir. (1951) [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,891], 190 F. 2d 561, where this Court reduced attorneys' fees allowed by the Trial Court from about 50% to about 17% of the damages awarded.

The District Court also referred to Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp. v. Brookside Theatre Corp., 8 Cir. (1952) [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,218] 194 F. 2d 846. In that case the Court of Appeals considered a fee of 40% of the damages to be such as to (p. 859) "shock the conscience." The Court reduced a fee awarded in the sum of $150,000 to $100,000, including fees on appeal, which was considered to be reasonable after study of the entire record and briefs.

The District Court in the case before us noted that $25,000 was only a little less than the compensatory damages found to have been sustained by defendants, and ventured to say that except for the difficulty of proof, the actual damage suffered as a direct result of the antitrust violation would have been found to be far greater.

Defendants argue that this Court has set down no percentage requirements in the Milwaukee Towne case; that we computed fees for experienced trial lawyers in Chicago at $200 per day ($40 per hour for a 5-hour day) plus $20 per hour for assistants to counsel, and thus allowed $75,000, apparently for less than 2000 hours expended. Here defendants' counsel itemized in excess of 3700 hours expended solely on the antitrust action, which does not include time in excess of 100 days expended in the patent infringement aspect of the matter. Dedendants point out that the Milwaukee Towne opinion contains a favorable reference to fees of $30,000 awarded for 1300 hours in Bigelow v. R. K. O. Radio Pictures, Inc., 7 Cir. (1945) [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,402], 150 F. 2d 877. In the Bigelow case this Court agreed that the conspiracy had been established but reversed the judgment on the question of damages. The Supreme Court, [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,445], 327 U. S. 251 (1946) affirmed our holding with respect to the conspiracy but reversed our holding as to proof of damages. Defendants also cite Emich Motors Corp. v. General Motors Corp., 7 Cir. (1950) [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,577], 181 F. 2d 70. There the cause was retried after appeal to this Court and grant of certiorari by the U. S. Supreme Court [¶ 1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,778], 340 U. S. 558 (1951). On retrial, the bulk of the claims for damage was found to be barred by the Statute of Limitations [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,249], 229 F. 2d 714 (1956). The case is, therefore, of little assistance to us here.

In Milwaukee Towne (p. 571) this Court did say that allowances for services should be determined in the same manner as for those of a trial lawyer in any other kind of a case of comparable magnitude. However, this Court also said that the result might properly be taken into consideration in fixing a reasonable attorneys' fee and that in a case of this character, the result should be measured by the amount of damages found.

Defendants contend that the measure of fees is that stated in Cape Cod Food Products v. National Cranberry Assn., D. C., Mass. (1954) [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,769], 119 F. Supp. 242, 244:

> ". . . The rate is the free market price, the figure which a willing, successful client would pay a willing successful lawyer. Sometimes the figure may seem high."

and in Darden v. Besser, 6 Cir. (1958) [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 69,067] 257 F. 2d 285, 286:

> "While the allowance of reasonable attorneys' fees is always a matter of delicacy . . . the object always, of course, is to allow just and fair compensation for the services rendered, considering the time and skill employed, the experience brought to bear, and the result achieved."

Clapper further disputes the value of counsel's services on another ground. He maintains that counsel's task was made exceptionally easy by the fact that the same proofs needed in the instant case to prove violation of the antitrust laws and the existence of a conspiracy, had already been made and the issues resolved in the Kansas City case: Mason City Tent and Awning Co. v. Clapper [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,553], 144 F. Supp. 754, (1956). In that case $5,000 attorneys' fees were awarded. Counsel for Mason City, et al. in that case, Clapper adds, was also principal counsel for defendants here. Exhibits, interrogatories, pleadings etc. were markedly similar in both cases. Associate counsel in the two cases were not the same, but Clapper argues that their qualifications were much the same. He relies on Bordonaro Bros. Theatres v. Paramount Pictures, D. C., N. Y. (1953) [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,570] 113 F. Supp. 196, where attorneys' fees of $18,000 had been awarded in an earlier trial, but only $4,500 allowed on a second trial, which the Court there held to be substantially less demanding, although proof of continuing conspiracy was required for the second trial.

Defendants in reply point out that when their counterclaim was filed in 1950 and for several years afterward, Original alone was contesting the efforts of Clapper and his co-conspirators to control the market in tractor covers. Counsel for defendants were obliged to meet objections of Clapper and Flora to joining the licensees as cross-defendants, as well as claims of estoppel, pari delicto and the like, all of which required briefing, argument and trial. This case was pending for eight years. On the other hand, the Mason City case was not filed until June 11, 1954. Thus the Mason City case, although tried first, was greatly simplified by the discovery and preparation made for this case, rather than the reverse.

Clapper reasons that use of the italicized wording in section 15, Title 15, U. S. C., means that attorneys' fees are part of the costs in an antitrust action:

> "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the anti-trust laws . . . shall recover . . . the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

We cannot agree that attorneys' fees are meant to be thus included as an item of the usual "costs" taxed against the unsuccessful litigant. Clapper further concludes that the attorneys' fees for defendants' counsel are barred for the period up to and including December 14, 1954, the date of the order dismissing Flora and the licensees. That order stated:

> "4. That no costs be awarded to any party litigant designated in this Order, the respective parties litigant bearing their own costs."

Two of the named parties litigant are Original and Williams.

The District Court considered it unreasonable that Clapper should be completely exonerated from payment of all costs and attorneys' fees for a period of time during which he was as much a litigant as at any other time during the long controversy concerning a conspiracy from which he reaped the greatest benefit. However, the District Court specifically stated that the Court was not wholly ignoring Clapper's theory, and in determining a reasonable attorneys' fee, the Court would consider, as a weight factor, the recovery made and the attorneys' fees received in connection with the $110,000 paid by Clapper's co-conspirators.

It appears to this Court that the learned Trial Judge in the exercise of his discretion to set attorneys' fees, in the antitrust action, gave studied attention to all of the pertinent factors impinging on this delicate matter. We find no abuse of discretion in this regard, and conclude that interference with the amount set would be unwarranted in this case.

[Estoppel]

Clapper also assigns as error the District Court's refusal to consider defendant Williams' alleged breach of a contract made with Clapper. Clapper asserts that on September 12, 1949, in Chicago, after denial of Williams' request for a license, Clapper made an oral agreement with Williams (afterwards confirmed in writing) whereby Williams agreed that Original would discontinue manufacture of the accused device in return for Clapper's permission to dispose of the inventory on hand. Clapper charges that Williams breached this agreement by making an arrangement with one of the licensees, Cab-Ette, to allow continuance of manufacture and sale of the accused device, which was then designated "Original Cab-Ette" and marked with the patent numbers of both the Flora and Clapper patents. Defendants paid a royalty to Clapper on all Original Cab-Ette covers made during the life of this arrangement, which terminated by the end of November, 1949. At that time, defendants changed the designation from "Original Cab-Ette" to "Original Half/Cab," and notified Clapper that they were resuming manufacture. It was this action, Clapper says, which led to the filing of the complaint in this case on April 14, 1950.

Clapper contends that defendants' conduct in this connection estops them from denying the validity of the Clapper patent and from asserting violation of the antitrust laws because they had brought themselves under the cloak of the group license of August 3-4, 1948.

As in the case of contested issue No. 9, mentioned above, these propositions are set forth in the list of contested issues in Clapper's brief, but are not included in the argument. In their brief in answer, defendants presume these issues have been abandoned. Clapper does not contradict that presumption in his reply brief, although he includes the following in his "conclusions":

"3. That when defendants could not obtain a license under plaintiff's patent through legitimate channels they breached an agreement with plaintiff to discontinue infringement and negotiated a clandestine arrangement with one of plaintiff's licensees, the Cabette Co., in order to continue in business under the pale of plaintiff's patent rights."

The District Court did not refuse to consider these issues. We need not labor the point; it is sufficient to quote the District Court's findings:

"35. The spokesman for the several parties to the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, upon rejecting the application of the defendants for a license under the Clapper patent, in the meeting on September 12, 1949, informed the defendants that the defendant, Original, would be given a limited period of time within which to dispose of its stock of tractor covers then in course of manufacture and that if the defendants then ceased the manufacture of tractor covers, no action for patent infringement would be instituted. The evidence does not establish that an agreement was reached between the plaintiff and defendants in that meeting in Chicago on September 12, 1949, or subsequently. Any proposals made to the defendants in that meeting were in furtherance of a conspiracy in violation of antitrust laws, . . . Plaintiff has alleged and relies upon the theory that a contract was entered into between the defendants and the several parties to the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, and that he, plaintiff Clapper, has been damaged as a result of the breach of said contract on the part of the defendants. There is no evidence in the record of damages to the plaintiff flowing from the alleged breach, even if it were assumed that an agreement was reached, which the court does not find.

"36. Thereafter, the defendants entered into a working arrangement with Cabette, formed for the use of the Original facilities to manufacture parts of tractor covers for Cabette, which working arrangement became effective the latter part of October, 1949. A proposed contract to formalize the working arrangement was reduced to a writing dated November 4, 1949. Before the execution thereof by both parties, disagreement arose, and the proposed contract was not executed. The working arrangement was terminated by mutual consent. A proposed settlement contract dated November 23, 1949, was prepared. Before the execution by both parties, a controversy arose, and the contract was unexecuted by both parties.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

"37. The defendants prior to the filing of this action by the plaintiff, had no knowledge of the terms and provisions of the License Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, except with respect to the place of manufacture of the tractor covers with the permission of Clapper.

"38. The defendants discontinued the manufacture and sale of the Original products and entered into a working arrangement with Cabette. This arrangement was made in order to afford Cabette the working facilities of Original whereby Original could manufacture parts for Cabette, and at the same time, it was a means of keeping Original in operation.

"39. During the working arrangement between Cabette and the defendants, the defendants notified the plaintiff that they were discontinuing the manufacture and sale of tractor covers in accordance with the direction by the spokesman for the group at the meeting in Chicago, as aforesaid, on September 12, 1949, which notice was retracted, however, after the discontinuance of the working arrangement with Cabette in November, 1949.

"40. During the working arrangement with Cabette, the defendants operated only as suppliers for Cabette by direction of the latter and did not thereby become licensees under the Clapper patent nor parties to the conspiracy; whereby the defendants are not estopped from contesting the validity of the Clapper patent nor from claiming damages for violation of the antitrust laws, according to the first cause of action of the amended complaint."

[Costs]

Lastly Clapper urges that the District Court erred in awarding defendants costs in this action. Clapper attributes the major portion of the costs to the period of the venue dispute concerning the cross-defendants, in which he alleges he had no interest. Further he relies on the terms of the order of dismissal following the settlement between Flora, the licensees, and defendants, whereby the District Court directed that the respective parties litigant bear their own costs. Clapper's position is that this is the law of the case up to the date of that order (December 14, 1954) and that he had a right to rely on it to free him from costs which he otherwise would have shared with Flora and the three licensees.

The District Court found Clapper to have been as much a litigant to the venue issue, involving his co-conspirators (and the appeal taken therefrom) as at any other time, and held Clapper not to have been relieved, by the order of December 14, 1954, from payment of a just portion of the costs during the venue litigation. The District Court considered the costs in detail and disallowed a great bulk of the defendants' original bill of costs.

Here, and in the District Court, Clapper raised objections to the item of $744.44 paid for carbon copy of transcript of the main trial. The District Court found that it was a custom of long standing, in that Court, that in any case where a party ordered a transcript of evidence, the original must be furnished to the Trial Judge and the expense of same borne by the party ordering the transcript or as the Court otherwise directs. In view of the complexity of the case, the District Court thought it was reasonable for counsel to have a transcript of the evidence and minutes of trial, plus one copy for use in conduct of the trial and post-trial procedures. The District Court disallowed reporter's fees and charges for transcript of oral arguments.

Clapper also objects to costs for photostats which are unidentified. When this objection was addressed to the Trial Judge, the latter indicated regret that an itemized list had not been kept identifying each document with an explanation of its use. The Trial Judge said that ordinarily he would sustain the objection, but that in this case, the judge himself personally recalled many conferences and informal agreements among counsel with respect to furnishing copies of documents, and, as this was a matter within the Court's judicial discretion, and the amount of $207.98 was also supported by oath of counsel, he allowed that sum as costs. In view of all the attendant circumstances, we cannot say that there was an abuse of discretion with respect to allowance of costs.

[Damages—Loss of Potential Sales]

Defendants' position is that the District Court erred in awarding inadequate damages. They ask that this cause be remanded for recomputation of the damages to include losses from potential sales and losses attributable to the arrangement with CabEtte. Defendants cite a number of cases to support their contention that losses of profits may be determined by the calculations of a certified public accountant according to proper accounting practices. None of these cases involved the precise method of calculation used here. The District Court describes defendants' method as follows:

". . . Briefly and generally, the theory of the defendant, Original, as explained by its president, Williams, and its accountant, Morgan, involved the process of taking the number of dealers the defendant, Original, had prior to the summer of 1949, at which time it changed its sales methods from dealers over to distributors. Williams explained he was very careful in making his calculations in order to stay on the conservative side. In his survey of existing dealers, he found there were 901 dealers listed. But of the 901 dealers he could find only 684 cards showing actual sales to such dealers. Therefore in his calculations he used the figure of 684 dealer cards as the basis from which to test the average potential sales to the established dealers. Among the 684 dealers, he found that 336 had sent orders in and had purchased half/Cabs. The 336 dealers purchased 1,275 half/Cabs. By taking the number of purchases of half/Cabs and relating them to the number of dealers who had actually purchased half/Cabs, he found that the company sales amounted to three and eighty hundredths half/Cabs per dealer. By relating the company sales of half/Cabs to all of its dealers, he found that the company's average sales of half/Cabs per dealer amounted to 1.86 half/Cabs.

"After the establishment of the distributorships, Williams made a survey in order to determine the total number of dealers served by the distributors. It was found that the distributors serviced 17,450 dealers. Commencing with the year 1949, the first year defendant, Original, had distributors, and the first year of the impact of the conspiracy, the defendant, Original, estimated the sale of one unit to each dealer served by its distributors. Thus, it estimated its potential sales for the year 1949 at 17,450 units. Taking the year 1950 as the base year and applying the annual percentage growth in tractor population in the United States and applying such percentages of tractor population growth to the subsequent years to and including the year 1956, and by applying the estimated unit sales per dealer of 1.86, defendant thereby arrived at the respective total unit potential sales for the years 1950 through 1956. . . .

"By eliminating what defendants' accountant determined to be abnormal operating expenses by reason of the impact of the conspiracy and the attendant litigation, the accountant arrived at an adjusted net unit profit per half/Cab. By further applying the estimated unit potential sales as estimated by Williams according to his estimated sales per dealer as related to tractor population growth, defendant established a different and higher net unit profit through the commensurate savings in overhead costs per unit due to the greater estimated production. By applying the greater net unit profit to the respective annual estimated potential sales, the accountant arrived at the total dollar profits which defendants claim could have been realized on potential sales except for the impact of the conspiracy for the period 1949-1956, which amounted to $1,364,200.10. From this was deducted the actual profit realized from sales of half/Cabs as reflected by the accountant's pro-forma earnings statement adjusted to eliminate the abnormal effects of the conspiracy and litigation. The realized profits from actual sales of half/Cabs during the period amounted to $79,996.17. Subtracting the realized profits from the total estimated profits, the accountant arrived at the figure of $1,284,203.93, which the defendants claim represents the total profits that could have been realized on the estimated potential sales except for the antitrust violations by plaintiff Clapper, together with Flora and their licensees."

[Cases Considered]

In American Cooperative Serum Ass'n v. Anchor Serum Co., 7 Cir. (1946) [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,447], 153 F. 2d 907, 914, the District Court based judgment on the evidence of a certified public accountant who tabulated each of plaintiff's sales made at 65 cents (to meet unfair price-cutting) and also calculated the amount of each item had it been sold at 75 cents. The difference between the two totals was the amount on which judgment was based.

Central Coal and Coke Co. v. Hartman, 8 Cir. (1901) 111 Fed. 96, concerned a "club" formed to control the price of coal in Kansas City, Kansas, and Kansas City, Missouri. When plaintiff withdrew from the "club" his former associates refused to sell to him except at prices only 50 cents per ton less than that established for retail sale to consumers. In that case the Court of Appeals reversed a judgment for plaintiff on the ground that speculations, guesses and estimates of witnesses were insufficient bases for recovery. The Court mentioned (page 98)

> ". . . the general rule that the expected profits of a commercial business are too remote, speculative, and uncertain to warrant a judgment for their loss. (Citing cases.)"

The Court then set forth the exception to the general rule: that loss of profits from the interruption of an established business may be recovered where the plaintiff makes it reasonably certain by competent proof what the amount of his loss actually was.

Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Seagram & Sons [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,737], 340 U. S. 211 (1951) involved an agreement among competitors in interstate commerce to fix maximum resale prices of their products. When plaintiff refused to subscribe to that policy, his name was struck from the list of authorized distributors. The opinion of the Supreme Court does not touch on the method of computing damages but deals solely with reversing this Court's decision that a violation of the Sherman Act had not been proved. In the opinion of this Court, reported at [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,627] 182 F. 2d 228 (1950), the method of computing damages was never reached. Study of the briefs in the Kiefer case indicates that the primary objection to testimony of the accountant was that his evidence was based on hearsay in that certain books and records were not in evidence. He testified as to the actual dollar volume of sales during 1946, 1947, 1948 and the first quarter of 1949. He then testified to costs and expenses based on actual experience which Kiefer would have incurred had it realized, in 1947, 1948 and the first quarter of 1949, the additional volume of sales necessary to bring its actual sales to the level of 1946. He also testified to the resulting percentage of profit to sales and resulting total amount of profit which would have been realized on such additional volume of sales. The accountant was employed by a firm which had audited Kiefer's books for more than twenty years. There had been a showing that the books and records were voluminous in character. A member of the corporation and the auditor testified to the accuracy of the books and records. In spite of the burden involved, Kiefer's counsel had twice offered to produce the books in court. The District Court refused to permit proof that only one-third of the drop-off in sales volume was attributable to a general statewide decline in the volume of wholesale business after 1945, such proof being based only on check of the Indiana Alcoholic Beverage Commission's figures on liquor stamp sales.

In William H. Rankin Co. v. Associated Bill Posters of U. S., etc., 2 Cir. (1930) 42 F. 2d 152, the Trial Court permitted the Treasurer to show by his compilations, based on net profits of the business in 1911 and his knowledge of business conditions when free of the defendants' unlawful interference, what he considered would have been the probable yearly earnings from July 1913 to June 30, 1918, and to explain how he arrived at his figures. The Court of Appeals said that whatever might be said of the weight of the testimony, that was entirely for the jury.

The Trial Judge sitting as jury in the case before us weighed the evidence adduced by defendants and found their theory of computing estimated potential sales to the unrealistic. The Trial Judge noted (inter alia) that the theory assumed each of the distributors and dealers would continuously handle and sell the product throughout the years involved, although one firm included in the list of dealers discontinued the sale of tractor cabs in 1952 or 1953. It also assumed climatic conditions and the absence of peaks and valleys in annual sales, which the Trial Judge said was inconsistent with the actual experience of defendants' competitors.

In Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp. v. Brookside Th. Corp., 8 Cir. (1952) [1952 Trade Cases ¶ 67,218], 194 F. 2d 846, Brookside Theatre Corp. charged that it had been driven out of business and had been forced to turn over its theatre to one of the defendants. The Trial Court admitted evidence of a certified public accountant who had examined the books produced by defendants to show the operations and profits of the theatre after the sale by Brookside.

In Eastman Co. v. Southern Photo Co., 273 U. S. 359 (1927) the Court found that there was substantial evidence to show that prior to 1910 Southern Photo Co. had an established business in selling to professional photographers supplies largely purchased from Eastman. Southern also took on a non-conflicting line of goods for amateurs. When, because of the monopoly, Southern was no longer able to supply professionals, it lost most of its established trade in such goods, although the business was so organized that Southern would have been able to handle Eastman's goods with no increase in its general expenses and no additional cost except that incident to handling such goods themselves. Plaintiff sought to recover, as loss of profits, the amount of its gross profits on Eastman's goods during the four years preceding the period in suit, which was shown, less the additional expense (which was estimated) which would have been incurred in handling defendant's goods during the four year period in suit.

Eastman objected to this use, as a standard, of profits earned during the four years Southern had been Eastman's customer, on the ground that Southern had participated in Eastman's unlawful acts and was in pari delicto. However, there was evidence from which the jury could have concluded otherwise, and uncontradicted, affirmative evidence that under Eastman's restricted terms of sale, the dealers' profits did not exceed those on sale of goods of other manufacturers not parties to the monopoly.

In Story Parchment Co. v. Peterson Co., 282 U. S. 555 (1931) three companies maintained uniform prices and enjoyed a substantial monopoly of the interstate trade in parchment paper. The Trial Court submitted two items of damage for the consideration of the jury: (1) the difference, if any, between the amounts actually realized by Story and what it would have realized from sales at reasonable prices but for the acts of the defendants and coconspirators; and (2) the extent to which the value of Story's property had been diminished by such acts. The Court there found that there was evidence from which the jury could have found that, in pursuance of the conspiracy, goods had been sold below the point of fair profit and below cost of production. In that case, the evidence also included a detailed showing that current prices were higher during a period antedating the unlawful combination, and that there had been price cutting afterward. The Court held that it was fair to say that the natural and probable effect of the combination and price cutting would be to destroy normal prices. Story put in evidence of prices received before and after. The Court said that while damages may not be determined by mere speculation or guess, it was sufficient if the evidence showed the extent of the damages as a matter of just and reasonable inference, although the result was only approximate.

We agree with the District Court that defendants' theory of computation as described above, does not meet this standard of "just and reasonable inference."

In Bigelow v. R. K. O. Radio Pictures [1946-1947 Trade Cases ¶ 57,445], 327 U. S. 251 (1946), to demonstrate the damages suffered from a discriminatory system of motion picture showings, petitioners introduced a comparison of earnings, during a five year operation of their own theatre with earnings, during the same period, of one of respondents' theatres (comparable in size, but inferior in location, equipment, and attractiveness to patrons) which had been allowed to exhibit pictures ahead of petitioners. Other evidence dealt with petitioners' operation during a period when it had been able to find and show some films which had not been selected by respondents' theatres and thus had not been previously shown there. This period was contrasted with operations after the practice of showing double-features made it almost impossible to find any films which had not been selected for previous showing in respondents' theatres. The Supreme Court found these two classes of evidence not to be mutually exclusive, and the Court further held that the evidence of damage was sufficient to support the jury's verdict. Here, too, the Court said (page 264)

> ". . . even where the defendant by his own wrong has prevented a more precise computation, the jury may not render a verdict based on speculation or guesswork. But the jury may make a just and reasonable estimate of the damage based on relevant data and render its verdict accordingly."

That is what the District Court did in the case before us.

It appears to us, as it did to the District Court, from a study of the record, that there is no preponderance of evidence to show that Clapper (and his licensees) through any conspiratorial act caused the losses arising out of the working arrangement with Cab-Ette.

In view of the position we have adopted with respect to the issues discussed, it would only unduly lengthen this opinion to comment in detail on other arguments, advanced by counsel for both parties, which were considered by this Court.

[Ruling]

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed in all respects except as to failure to include attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in the patent infringement defense as an element of damages in the antitrust action. As to that aspect of the case only, the judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded for entry of order in conformity with this opinion.

In part affirmed. In part reversed and remanded with directions.

[Concurring and Dissenting Opinion]

PARKINSON, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

[Attorneys' Fees as "Damages"]

I concur in that part of the result reached by Judge Knoch in his opinion which affirms the judgment of the District Court. However, I am compelled to respectfully dissent to that portion of the opinion reversing for failure to include attorney fees and expenses incurred by counsel for Original in the defense of the patent infringement phase of the case as an element of treble damages in the antitrust action under the counterclaim.

The District Court made the award under authority of 35 U. S. C. A. § 285 by reason of the exceptional circumstances involved in the case concerning the validity of the patent and its use by Clapper and his licensees but specifically declined to include the award as an element of damages in the antitrust action under the counterclaim.

15 U. S. C. A. § 15 provides that one who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws shall recover threefold the damages sustained by him, plus the cost of suit including a reasonable attorney's fee.

It is a well settled rule of construction that language used in a statute which has a settled and well known meaning, sanctioned by judicial decision, is presumed to be used in that sense by the legislative body, Kepner v. United States, 1904, 195 U. S. 100, 124, or, as stated by the Supreme Court in another way, "where words are employed in an act which had at the time a well known meaning in the law, they are used in that sense unless the context requires the contrary." Case v. Los Angeles Lumber Co., 1939, 308 U. S. 106, 115.

When 15 U. S. C. A. § 15 was enacted by Congress, the word "damages" had acquired, through judicial interpretation, a well understood legislative meaning and it did not include attorney fees incurred in defending civil actions. Oelrichs v. Spain, 1872, 82 U. S. 211, 231; Flanders v. Tweed, 1872, 82 U. S. 450, 453; Tullock v. Mulvane, 1902, 184 U. S. 497, 511; Missouri, Kansas, etc., R'y Co. v. Elliott, 1902, 184 U. S. 530, 539-540; Straus v. Victor Talking Mach. Co., 2 Cir., 1924, 297 Fed. 791, 797. There is nothing in the Act to the contrary, and, in my opinion, any legal basis for an attorney fee allowance in the successful defense of the patent infringement phase of this action could emanate from and find its source only in 35 U. S. C. A. § 285.

As I read the case of Kobe, Inc. v. Dempsey Pump Co., 10 Cir., 1952 [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,312], 198 F. 2d 416, I am impressed with the thought that the question of the right to include counsel fees incurred in the successful defense of a patent infringement suit as an element of damage in an antitrust action was not squarely raised and decided by the Tenth Circuit, although the District Court so held. However, if the Tenth Circuit did so decide, I am constrained to disagree and am of the opinion that the Second Circuit was correct in its decision in Straus v. Victor Talking Mach. Co., 297 Fed. 791.

[Would Affirm Judgment]

The District Court made an award of $25,000 for the services of counsel for Original in the antitrust action under its counterclaim pursuant to 15 U. S. C. A. § 15 and made an award of $28,244.31 for the services and expenses of counsel for Original in the defense of the patent infringement action under the complaint pursuant to 35 U. S. C. A. § 285. I am convinced the refusal of the District Court to include the latter award as an element of treble antitrust damages is not erroneous under the circumstances here.

I would affirm the judgment of the District Court in its entirety.

[¶ 69,473] Independent Iron Works, Inc. v. United States Steel Corporation, Bethlehem Pacific Coast Steel Corporation, Bethlehem Steel Company, and Kaiser Steel Corporation.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, Southern Division. Civil No. 35080. Dated September 30, 1959.

Sherman and Clayton Acts

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Proof of Unlawful Conspiracy—"Conscious Parallelism"—Steel Producers' "Similar Conduct" as Basis for Inference of Conspiracy—Refusal to Sell to Fabricator.—Steel producers charged with violating Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act by conspiring to withhold steel from a "fabricator and erector" of structural steel were each granted a directed verdict on the ground that their alleged "similar conduct" was insufficient to support an inference of a conspiracy. Similar conduct, as such, does not establish a conspiracy; there must be a "sameness of conduct under circumstances which logically suggest joint agreement, as distinguished from individual action." Further, an inference of conspiracy is permissible only if the "similar" conduct is in apparent contradiction to the concern's own self-interest. Here, the crux of the plaintiff's claim was that, during a 1955 steel shortage, each of the producers refused to sell it all the steel it wanted to purchase. The plaintiff inferred that the refusals were conspiratorial since each of the producers, in "rationing" its supplies, considered its own customers' past purchases. However, that was not the kind of "parallel conduct" which would support an inference of a conspiracy. Each of the producers, acting individually, was legally entitled to sell or not to sell to any customer, or to sell to him as much as the producer saw fit. Also, past purchases afford a logical and reasonable guide for distribution during a shortage period. Further, any inference of agreement or any suggestion of "parallelism" was negated by the dissimilarities in the actual methods of allocation which each of the producers followed. Finally, the plaintiff's own evidence refuted the existence of any conspiracy to withhold steel from it.

Also, no conspiracy could be inferred from the fact that each of the producers was "vertically integrated," or from each producer's alleged "favoring" of its own "integrated" fabricating shops. Other claims by the plaintiff, including its contentions that the producers (1) "artificially" created the 1955 steel shortage, (2) engaged in unlawful bidding practices, and (3) conspired to fix prices, were not supported by the evidence.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.360, 2005.785; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2520.30, 2610.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Relevant Market—Products Used in Fabrication of Structural Steel in Seven Western States.—A treble damage action charging steel producers with conspiring to withhold steel from a California "fabricator and erector" of structural steel involved only a fragment of the steel industry in the United States, centering on "structural shapes and plates" sold by the producers for use in the fabrication of structural steel in seven Western states. Thus, inquiries regarding the distribution of "the total ingot tonnage of all types of steel produced by the several defendants" were not germane to the simple issue of whether or not the producers conspired to limit supplies of structural steel sold to the plaintiff in the competitive area.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2540.10.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Proof of Unlawful Conspiracy—"Vertical Integration"—Steel Producers' "Favoritism" Toward Own Fabricating Shops as Evidence of Conspiracy.—Steel producers "vertical integration," that is, the fact that each of them not only manufactured structural "shapes and plates," but also operated fabricating shops which used those products in competition with the plaintiff, a "fabricator and erector" of structural steel, did not support an inference of a conspiracy. Vertical integration is clearly legal. Further, there was no evidence that any of the producers had acquired any facilities pursuant to an agreement with any other producer. In addition, the alleged "favoritism" of each of the producers in supplying "disproportionately large quantities of steel to its own fabricating shops," even if true, would suggest normal conduct rather than conspiratorial conduct. Thus, the fact that each of the vertically integrated producers had favored its own fabricating shops would be no evidence that they had conspired to do so jointly rather than doing so individually. In any event, however, the facts refuted the argument that such favoritism had been shown. Over the years, the producers' respective shares of the national fabricating market had been declining. Moreover, during a shortage, each of the producer's fabricating shops were "rationed" in the same manner as other customers and faced the same problem of operating within limited supplies.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.865; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.170.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Price Fixing—Agreement Between Competitors to Fix Prices—"Standardized Commodity"—Price Uniformity as Prima Facie Showing of Agreement to Fix Prices.—A "fabricator and erector" of structural steel, in a treble damage action charging steel producers with conspiring to restrain and monopolize trade in the steel industry, failed to sustain its charges of a price fixing conspiracy. The plaintiff had never contended that the prices it paid for steel were higher than "reasonable or competitive prices." Also, steel is a "standardized" product. The law is clear that proof of price uniformity in the sale of a standardized commodity, with or without price leadership, is not sufficient to make a prima facie showing of an agreement to fix prices. Furthermore, the testimony of the plaintiff's own purchasing agent showed differences in the prices of steel, rather than uniformity. In fact, such differences in prices were substantial enough to be determinative of the mill from which the plaintiff bought. Thus, there was no evidence from which a reasonable inference of a price agreement could be drawn.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2011.181; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.600.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Exclusion from Trade—Bidding Practices—Reduction of Quoted Prices After Bidding.—A "fabricator and erector" of structural steel failed to sustain its charges that steel producers which also operated fabricating shops had conspired to take fabricating jobs away from it "by reducing the prices they quoted to general contractors after the bidding." There was no evidence that any producer had ever reduced its price after the bidding, and no evidence of any concerted action between the producers regarding bidding. Out of 835 jobs on which the plaintiff had bid in 1955, it offered evidence of only two alleged instances of such bidding practices. In one case, a producer had been unable to get its quotation to the successful general contractor prior to the opening of the bids. In the second case, another producer, after bidding on a job to a contractor in two parts, inquired of the contractor, after the bidding, whether its bid on the steel portion of the job was not low. In both instances the contractor accepted the plaintiff's bid. Finally, the court noted that, in 1955, the plaintiff obtained contracts on a larger percentage of the work on which it had bid than the 10 per cent it expected "under normal conditions" and "in fair competition."

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.503, 2005.660; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Practices—Production Control—"Artificial" Creation of Nationwide Steel Shortage.—"A fabricator and erector" of structural steel, in its treble damage action charging steel producers with conspiring to restrain and monopolize trade, failed to sustain its contention that a 1955 nationwide steel shortage was "artificially" created by the producers. The facts showed that the demand for structural steel products outstripped the available supply, and that customers' orders exceeded the producers' capacity. Published statistics showed that bookings of fabricrated structural steel rose to an all-time record in 1955, and that the steel industry was operating at close to 100 per cent of capacity throughout most of the year. Thus, the producers were engaged in maximum production efforts during the shortage.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.760; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.800.

Interlocking Directorates—Transactions Between Common Carriers and Business Organizations with Common Directors—Competitive Bidding Under Clayton Act, Section 10—"Lowest" Bid Not "Most Favorable" Bid.—A railroad's acceptance, from a steel producer with a common director, of bids which were not, in dollar amount, the lowest bids submitted, did not support any inference of a conspiracy, or a violation of Section 10 of the Clayton Act. That section, which requires a common carrier to hold competitive bidding when purchasing from any concern which has on its board of directors a person who is also a director of the common carrier, requires the carrier to accept the "most favorable" bid rather than the "lowest" bid. Here, there was uncontradicted testimony that the railroad scrupulously followed the provisions of Section 10 and the applicable regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that the bid of the steel producer, in each instance where it was accepted, was the most favorable to the railroad. There was no evidence of any conduct by the steel producer which was calculated to influence the award of the jobs involved, other than the mere submission of bids in compliance with the applicable statutory requirements. There is nothing in the statute, its legislative history, or the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission to support the plaintiff's "legal contention" that Section 10 requires a supplier which has a director in common with a carrier to sell "to any and all persons who wish to compete against such supplier in bidding to the carrier."

See Interlocking Directorates, Vol. 1, ¶ 4420.60.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Trial—Burden of Establishing Prima Facie Case—Sufficiency of Evidence to Go to Jury—Speculation, Surmise, or Conjecture—Directed Verdicts.—Steel producers charged with conspiring to restrain and monopolize trade in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, and a steel producer charged with conspiring to prevent free and competitive bidding on railroad car underframes in violation of Section 10 of the Clayton Act, were each granted a directed verdict. The plaintiff, a "fabricator and erector" of structural steel which relied upon the defendants' alleged "similar conduct" as the basis for drawing an inference of a conspiracy, was entitled to the benefit of all favorable inferences which could be drawn from the evidence, but it still had the burden of establishing a prima facie case. Thus, the plaintiff had to rely upon reasonable and logical inferences from the evidence in the record, and could not go to the jury on the basis of speculation, surmise, or conjecture.

[Treble Damage Action—Steel Industry]

WOLLENBERG, District Judge [In full text]: This is a private antitrust action for treble damages. Plaintiff is a fabricator and erector of structural steel, located in Oakland, California. The defendants, against whom the case proceeded to a jury trial (all other defendants having been dismissed) are United States Steel Corporation, the affiliated companies of Bethlehem Steel Company and Bethlehem Pacific Coast Steel Corporation, and Kaiser Steel Corporation.

[Conspiracy and Monopoly Charged]

The complaint, originally filed on November 28, 1955, and subsequently amended, alleges three causes of action. The first and second counts charge a conspiracy between the several defendants, under sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, to restrain and monopolize or attempt to monopolize [1] trade in the sale of structural shapes and plates and in the fabrication of structural steel. The crux of plaintiff's claims is that it was unable to purchase from the several defendants all of the structural steel products it desired during the period in suit, i.e., [1] Plaintiff's alternative claims of independent monopolization and individual attempts to monopolize by each of the defendants find no support in the evidence.

January 1, 1955, to November 28, 1955. The third count is against United States Steel alone, charging a conspiracy with Southern Pacific Company (not named a defendant) to prevent free and competitive bidding on railroad car underframes, in violation of section 10 of the Clayton Act.

[Pretrial Order]

Numerous pretrial conferences were held during which the factual and legal issues were extensively explored. Each of the parties presented both orally and in detailed memoranda a full exposition of their respective positions. These proceedings eventuated in the court's pretrial order of June 19, 1959, defining the issues and the scope of proof at trial.

[Motions]

Plaintiff, at the trial, first presented its evidence on the issues of violation of the antitrust laws. When plaintiff rested its case on liability, defendants severally moved to dismiss the first and second clauses of action under Rule 41(b) and for directed verdicts under Rule 50(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. United States Steel similarly moved with respect to the third cause of action.

[Relevant Market]

In passing upon these motions, several preliminary observations are warranted.

This case involves only a fragment of the steel industry in the United States. It centers on structural shapes and plates sold by the defendants for use in the fabrication of structural steel in the seven Western States. The distribution of the total ingot tonnage of all types of steel produced by the several defendants is not relevant to this action. Such inquiries are not germane to the simple issue here of whether or not defendants conspired to limit supplies of structural steel sold to plaintiff in this competitive area.

[Prior Litigation—Release]

Plaintiff bases its claim on acts of defendants in the year 1955 up to November 28th.[2] Plaintiff does not claim damages for acts of defendants prior to January 1, 1955, since plaintiff settled prior litigation and executed a release of all claims existing as of December 31, 1954.

[Conspiracy to Withhold Steel—Evidence]

At pretrial, plaintiff stipulated to confine its proof to certain designated jobs in the year 1955 but desired additionally and for background purposes to introduce evidence of certain pre-1955 jobs. Accordingly, for the limited purpose of attempting to establish the prior existence of the alleged conspiracy, the court permitted evidence pertaining to the 13th Street Freeway and Teaching Hospital jobs. Such pre-1955 evidence was not admitted against Kaiser. Plaintiff stipulated (Tr. 951-952) that "up to February 1, 1955, Kaiser Steel Corporation met the requirements of Independent Iron Works as Independent Iron Works called on them to do so, in quantity, in time, and also was a good, adequate and prompt supplier." The undisputed evidence respecting these two pre-1955 jobs contradicts, rather than supports, plaintiff's claim of conspiracy. Plaintiff's purchasing agent admitted that Bethlehem "offered quite a considerable tonnage of plate" when he needed it; indeed, Bethlehem offered plaintiff a larger tonnage than plaintiff chose to accept. Additionally, Bethlehem's delivery performance with respect to the 13th Street Freeway job was better than that of Kaiser, who plaintiff stipulated met plaintiff's requirements in quantity and on time. These undisputed facts leave no room for any inference of a conspiracy to withhold steel from plaintiff.

The U. C. Teaching Hospital job was fabricated by the Moore Dry Dock Company, who received the job at the inception of the Korean War in 1950. Mr. J. R. Moore, vice president of that company, called as a witness by plaintiff, testified that wartime demands for steel, Government controls, and his inability to obtain priorities for this job affected Bethlehem's[3] ability to fill Moore's orders. Mr. Moore further testified that in the face of these problems "Bethlehem nevertheless made a definite effort to try to help out Moore Dry Dock Company in supplying steel for it for the U. C. Hospital job." This is demonstrated by the fact that during the years when Moore was fabricating the job it received about three times the tonnage of steel it had bought from Bethlehem in prior years. Here again these undisputed facts repudiated any reasonable suggestion of a conspiracy to withhold steel.

[2] Plaintiff's cause of action, being founded upon an alleged continuing conspiracy and repeated refusals to sell, comes within the purview of the Ninth Circuit's decision in Flintkote Company v. Lysfjord, [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,674], 246 F. 2d 368 (9th Cir. 1957), certiorari denied (1957) 355 U. S. 835; accordingly, evidence of postcomplaint acts was inadmissible.

[3] Notably the evidence with respect to this job is silent as to U. S. Steel and plaintiff stipulated that pre-1955 evidence was not offered against Kaiser.

["Conscious Parallelism"]

Turning then to 1955, plaintiff relies exclusively upon the defendants' alleged similar conduct as the basis for drawing an inference of conspiracy.

[Principles]

On these motions plaintiff is entitled to and must receive the benefit of all favorable inferences which can be drawn from the evidence. The plaintiff, however, still has the burden of establishing a prima facie case. He must rely upon reasonable and logical inferences from the evidence in the record. Plaintiff can not go to the jury on the basis of speculation, surmise or conjecture. Wolfe v. National Lead Company [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,094], 225 F. 2d 427, 433-434 (9th Cir. 1955).

In following these principles in the instant case, the court's way has been made easier by the remarkable absence of any real conflicts in the evidence. Despite the size of the record, the basic facts are not in dispute.

[Similar Conduct Which Contradicts Self-Interest]

In deciding whether evidence of defendants' conduct can reasonably support an inference of conspiracy, there must be more than mere general similarities; there must be a sameness of conduct under circumstances which logically suggest joint agreement, as distinguished from individual action. Proof of parallel business conduct is not a substitute for proof of conspiracy, and similar conduct, as such, does not establish conspiracy. Theatre Enterprises, Inc. v. Paramount [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,640], 346 U. S. 537 (1954). As stated in United States v. Borden Co. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,461], 111 F. Supp. 562, 579 (N. D. Ill. 1953): "Reasonable businessmen will act similarly when presented with the same problem." The antitrust laws were not meant to prohibit businessmen from adopting sound business policies merely because competitors had already adopted the same or a similar policy.

An inference of conspiracy is permissible only where the conduct was adopted by a competitor "in apparent contradiction to its own self-interest." Milgram v. Loew's Inc. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,938], 192 F. 2d 579, 583 (3rd Cir. 1951). An inference of conspiracy would only arise from similar business conduct if it appeared more to the interest of competitors to adopt different practices. Chorak v. RKO Radio Pictures [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,267], 196 F. 2d 225, 229 (9th Cir. 1952), certiorari denied (1952) 344 U. S. 887.

These are the general standards against which can be measured plaintiff's factual contentions in this case, recognizing always, however, that plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of all reasonable inferences which may be drawn from the evidence in this record.

["Artificial" Shortage]

Plaintiff first contends that the nationwide shortage of steel which commenced in the middle of 1955 was "artificially" created by the defendants. The undisputed facts, however, are to the contrary. The demand for structural steel products increased tremendously in the second quarter of 1955. The demand quickly outstripped the available supply. The customers' orders greatly exceeded the defendants' productive capacity.

Published and uncontradicted statistics show that the bookings of fabricated structural steel rose from 3,161,611 tons in 1954 to 4,651,312 tons in 1955, an all-time record. On the production side, similar published and uncontroverted statistics demonstrate that the steel industry was operating at close to 100% of capacity throughout most of 1955. During the shortage defendants were engaged in maximum production efforts.

Such uncontradicted evidence leaves plaintiff's theory of "artificial" shortage without support. "* * * one must always measure what is claimed by plaintiff to have theoretically happened against what is mathematically proved by defendants to have actually happened." United States v. Natl. Malleable & Steel Castings Co., CCH [1957] TRADE CASES, par. 68,890 (N. D. Ohio 1957), aff'd per curiam [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,164], 358 U. S. 38 (1958).

[Vertical Integration—Legality]

Plaintiff next seeks to support its claims by the fact that each of the defendants is vertically integrated. That is, each defendant not only manufactures structural shapes and plates but also operates fabricating shops which use those products in competition with the plaintiff and other fabricators. United States Steel and Bethlehem have had such fabricating facilities for many years; Kaiser acquired its facilities in 1955. There is no evidence in the record that any defendant acquired any facilities pursuant to understanding or agreement with any other defendant. The mere fact that each defendant is vertically integrated does not support an inference of conspiracy. Vertical integration is clearly legal. United States v. Columbia Steel Co. [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,260], 334 U. S. 495, 525-526 (1948).

[Favoritism Toward Own Shops—Legality]

Plaintiff further argues, however, that each defendant supplied disproportionately large quantities of steel to its own fabricating shops. Even if true, this alleged favoritism of defendants' own fabricating shops would suggest normal, rather than conspiratorial conduct. In Dipson Theatres v. Buffalo Theatres [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,896], 190 F. 2d 951, 960, 961 (2nd Cir. 1951), cert. den. 342 U. S. 926 (1952), the court in commenting on the evidence that > "it was the policy of each [defendant] to favor theatres in which they had an interest," said,

> "This was to be expected, and the fact that they did so is no evidence that they conspired to do so jointly rather than doing so individually"; they "could legally favor their own theatres" (emphasis added).

In any event, undisputed facts refute plaintiff's argument. Over the years the defendants' respective shares of the national fabricating market have been declining. Moreover, during the shortage each defendant's fabricating shops were rationed in the same manner as other customers and faced the same problems of operating within their limited supplies.

["Rationing" Based on Past Purchases]

The crux of plaintiff's claim is that during the shortage in 1955, each defendant refused to sell plaintiff all the steel it wanted to purchase. Plaintiff would draw an inference of conspiratorial refusals from allegedly "parallel conduct" in that each defendant, in rationing its available supply, gave some consideration to its customers' past purchases.

[Right of Customer Selection]

It is settled law, however, that each defendant, acting individually, was legally entitled to sell or not to sell to any customer or to sell him as much as he saw fit. Times-Picayune v. United States [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,494], 345 U. S. 594, 625 (1953).

> "If a manufacturer may sell to whom he pleases, it is entirely logical that he may restrict his sales as to quantity, and sell to his customers such quantities as he may see fit." Fosburgh v. California & Hawaiian Sugar Refining Co., 291 Fed. 29 (pp. 36-37) (9th Cir. 1923).

And "an allocation system alone, without further factors, is not inherently illegal as a method of distribution in times of scarce supply." Banana Distributors v. United Fruit Company [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 69,057], 162 F. Supp. 32, 42 (S. D. N. Y. 1958).

The Banana case recognizes the logic and good business sense of some method of rationing in a shortage period. Any other approach, as the testimony here shows, would leave many customers with no steel at all. The broad similarity of business conduct, in the sense that each defendant considered as one factor of its distribution policy its respective customers' past purchases, is not the kind of "parallel conduct" which will support an inference of conspiracy. Past purchases afford a logical and reasonable guide for distribution during a shortage period. Wholly apart from this broad similarity, however, the evidence shows dissimilarities in the actual methods each defendant followed which militate against any suggesion of "parallelism."

[Methods of Rationing—Differences]

United States Steel's method was more formalized and mathematical than the methods of the other defendants. The tonnages of steel which each customer could order from each of its mills—so-called "entry limits"—were calculated with reference to the customers' purchases in 1953, 1954 and the first six months of 1955. The customer was notified in advance as to what his tonnages would be for the following quarter. These entry limits were generally intended as the maximum amounts which a particular customer could purchase. Exceptions, however, were made—notably in plaintiff's case—where the customer received additional tonnages.

Bethlehem's method differed from the methods of the other defendants. It was unique in that it differed within the Bethlehem organization itself. In considering past purchases as one of the factors affecting sales during the shortage, the top sales management reviewed sales records over a number of years in making broad decisions covering all types of steel products; at the next level the product manager for plates looked exclusively to 1954, whereas the product manager for structural shapes started out using 1954 but later on took into account 1952 and 1953 as well as 1954; Mr. Cort, in charge of sales on the West Coast, was not bound by any of these recommendations but made his own determinations. In the case of plates he followed the product manager's recommendation and used 1954; in the case of structural shapes he considered customers' purchases in 1953 and 1954, to the end of providing each customer with the largest tonnage he had bought in either of those years. In all instances Bethlehem's consideration of a customer's prior purchases was intended to provide a minimum of monthly tonnage.

The tonnages which Kaiser provided its customers were for the most part worked out by direct negotiation with the customer. To the extent it gave consideration to past purchases, it looked to the year 1954. Kaiser, unlike the other defendants, frequently gave so-called "job protection," i. e., an assurance to furnish all of a particular type of steel needed by a customer for a specific job.

Other differences in the defendants' respective distribution methods are undisputed in the record. The foregoing examples are sufficient to illustrate that as soon as generalities are put aside, the many divergencies in the defendants' practices show such a lack of "parallel conduct" as to negate any inference of agreement. Indeed, plaintiff's own purchasing agent testified, "that 1955 was a very confusing year insofar as allocations, and various mills operated differently" (emphasis added).

[Lower Receipts—Admissions]

Plaintiff repeatedly urges that its total receipts of steel were lower in 1955 than in 1954. Yet the undisputed testimony shows that when steel was in ample supply at the end of 1954 and during the first part of 1955, plaintiff placed very few orders. Accordingly, its receipts were low in the first half of 1955.

In this regard the admissions made by plaintiff's purchasing agent while under cross-examination also are illustrative. Job by job, order by order, and shipment by shipment the witness admitted, on cross-examination, that Bethlehem had accepted all orders tendered by plaintiff for steel, had filled all such orders, and that Bethlehem's performance was satisfactory. Similar, though less detailed, admissions were made regarding the performances of United States Steel and Kaiser. Thus, plaintiff's own evidence flatly refutes the existence of any conspiracy to withhold steel from plaintiff.

[Delays in Deliveries—Causes]

In much the same vein is the evidence regarding the claimed lateness of deliveries. The defendants admit that there were some minor delays in the shipments of plaintiff's orders. The evidence explaining the causes of such delays is not disputed. Steel strikes, shipping strikes, and other unavoidable circumstances such as an unprecedented flood at the Bethlehem mill and interferences in production due to efforts to expand capacity reasonably account for the delays that occurred. Indeed, in the light of such circumstances, the extent of the delays appears minimal. For example, the admissions of plaintiff's purchasing agent show that only 4% of Bethlehem's shipments were late and these were justifiably explained by the circumstances previously mentioned.

[Bidding Practices]

Two further matters in connection with the first and second causes of action warrant mention.

Plaintiff also contends that the defendants conspired to take fabricating jobs away from the plaintiff by reducing the prices they quoted to general contractors after the bidding. Out of 835 jobs which plaintiff bid on in 1955, it offered evidence of only two alleged instances of such bidding practices. In one case Kaiser had been unable to get its quotation to the successful general contractor prior to the opening of the bids. The contractor rejected Kaiser's offer and awarded the job to plaintiff. In the second case Bethlehem had bid a job to a contractor in two parts and after the bidding had inquired of the contractor whether Bethlehem's bid on the steel portion of the job was not low. Here again the contractor chose to accept the combined bid of plaintiff.

There was no evidence that any defendant ever reduced its price after the bidding, nor any evidence of any concerted action between the defendants regarding bidding. Finally, plaintiff's president testified that "under normal conditions" and "in fair competition" plaintiff would normally expect to get about 10% of the work on which it bid. In 1955 plaintiff bid on 174,041 tons of fabricated work and actually obtained contracts for 19,733 tons—or better than the 10% it expected.

[Price Fixing Conspiracy]

Plaintiff's complaint also charges a price-fixing conspiracy. However, plaintiff has never contended that the prices it paid for steel were higher than reasonable or competitive prices nor is there any evidence from which a reasonable inference of price agreement could be drawn.

Steel is a standardized product. The law is clear that even where there is proof of price uniformity in the sale of a standardized commodity, with or without price leadership, that is not sufficient to make a prima facie showing of agreement to fix prices. United States v. Int. Harvester Co., 274 U. S. 693 (1927).

Furthermore, the testimony of plaintiff's own purchasing agent showed, not uniformity, but differences in the actual prices of steel. Indeed, the actual differences in mill prices, together with freight costs, are of such a substantial nature as to be determinative of the mill from which plaintiff will buy.

[No Inference of Conspiracy]

As to the remaining charges in the first and second causes of action of the complaint, plaintiff either offered no evidence at all or the charges were so patently unsupported as not to warrant discussion herein. In reviewing separately the evidence relating to each of plaintiff's contentions, the court has not overlooked giving consideration to them in their entirety. The record as a whole has been reviewed and whether plaintiff's charges are taken singly or collectively, the conclusion is inescapable that no logical or reasonable inference of conspiracy between the defendants could be drawn.

[Clayton Act, Section 10]

It remains to consider briefly the third cause of action against United States Steel Corporation alone. This involves the narrow issue whether that defendant violated section 10 of the Clayton Act in connection with the bidding on certain freight car underframe jobs for the Southern Pacific Company. Considerable evidence was offered and received at the trial solely with respect to this third cause of action.

Section 10 of the Clayton Act requires a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce to hold competitive bidding when purchasing goods or supplies from any concern which has on its board of directors a person who is also a director of the common carrier. It is undisputed that during the period herein involved, Mr. James B. Black was a director of both defendant United States Steel and the Southern Pacific Company.

Preliminarily, United States Steel disputes whether an alleged violation of section 10 of the Clayton Act may be the subject of a private treble damage action. In this case the court need not pass upon that issue, for it is of the opinion that the record in any event fails to show a violation of section 10.

The evidence relates to the acts and conduct of Southern Pacific and United States Steel in connection with a number of bids for car frames between September, 1953, and October, 1955. The uncontradicted testimony of Mr. M. C. Nystrom, general purchasing agent of Southern Pacific, was that Southern Pacific scrupulously followed the provisions of section 10 of the Clayton Act and the applicable regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to competitive bidding.

["Lowest Bid" Not "Most Favorable" Bid]

There is no evidence of any conduct by defendant United States Steel calculated to influence the award of the jobs involved other than the mere submission of its bids in compliance with the applicable statutory requirements. The fact that Southern Pacific accepted United States Steel's bids on certain jobs, although such bids were not in dollar amount the lowest of the bids submitted, will not support any inference of conspiracy between United States Steel and Southern Pacific or of any wrongdoing by United States Steel. Section 10 of the Clayton Act requires the carrier to accept the "most favorable" rather than the lowest bid, and the uncontradicted testimony of Mr. Nystrom was that the bid of United States Steel in each instance where it was accepted was, under all the circumstances, the most favorable to Southern Pacfic.

In essence, plaintiff's legal contention is that section 10 should be so construed as to require a supplier which has a common director with a carrier to sell steel or other material to any and all persons who wish to compete against such supplier in bidding to the carrier. There is nothing in the statute, its legislative history or the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission to support such an interpretation of the statute.

The motions of the defendants are granted and the clerk is hereby directed to enter verdict and judgment in favor of each of the defendants, United States Steel Corporation, Bethlehem Pacific Coast Steel Corporation, Bethlehem Steel Company, and Kaiser Steel Corporation on both the first and second causes of action herein, and in favor of defendant United States Steel Corporation on the third cause of action herein, together with their costs.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—When Recovery May Be Barred—Applicable State Statute of Limitations—Pennsylvania One-year or Six-year Statute.—A Federal district court in Pennsylvania held that a Pennsylvania six-year statute of limitations (governing actions in trespass on the case), rather than a Pennsylvania one-year statute (governing "forfeiture" actions), was applicable to a treble damage action commenced before the effective date of the Federal four-year statute. In the absence of a Federal statute, the Federal courts use the appropriate statute of limitations of the state in which they are sitting. Thus, the court had to use the statute of limitations which the Pennsylvania courts would apply to a similar suit. In Gordon v. Loew's, Inc., 1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,783 and 68,820, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit held that a New Jersey statute governing actions "for any forfeiture upon any penal statute" was applicable to a treble damage action under Section 4 of the Clayton Act. However, that decision only established the "approach to be taken," namely, that Federal courts employing a state statute of limitations for Federal purposes must give it the scope and meaning that the state courts give to it in analogous suits under state law. Here, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, in such an analogous suit, had clearly indicated that it would not apply the Pennsylvania one-year statute to a private action under Section 4 of the Clayton Act.

As to a defendant which was joined after the effective date of the Federal four-year statute of limitations (January 7, 1956), that statute was applicable.

Memorandum Opinion sur Proposed Pretrial Order re Applicability of Pennsylvania Act of March 26, 1785, 2 Sm. L. Section 6 (12 P. S. § 44) [1]

[Applicable Statute of Limitations]

VAN DUSEN, District Judge [In full text]: The statute of limitations applicable to private suits for treble damages brought under § 4 of the Clayton Act [2] is a matter of federal law. In the absence of a federal statute, the federal courts use the appropriate statute of limitations of the state in which it is sitting.[3] This state statute does not operate of its own force but because it is adopted federal law.[4]

[Federal Statute Not Applicable]

There is no federal statute which provides a limitation period for this particular antitrust action. Congress recently enacted a statute of limitations for actions brought under § 4 of the Clayton Act, but this law did not become effective until January 7, 1956.[5] This action was commenced on January 4, 1956, against all but one of the defendants. In Chattanooga Foundry v. Atlanta, 203 U. S. 390 (1906), it was held that the fore-runner of 28 U. S. C. A. § 2462, which provides a limitation period for > "an action, suit or proceeding for the enforcement of any civil fine, penalty, or forfeiture, pecuniary or otherwise, . . ."

did not apply to a suit for treble damages under the Sherman Act. Thus, this court must use the statute of limitations which the Pennsylvania courts would apply to a similar suit.

[Pennsylvania One-year Statute]

The defendants assert that the Act of March 26, 1785, 2 Sm. L. § 6 (12 P. S. § 44), governs this action and that any award of damages must be limited to the year preceding the commencement of this action. That Act provides as follows:

> "All actions, suits, bills, indictments or informations, which shall be brought for any forfeiture, upon any penal act of assembly made or to be made, whereby the forfeiture is or shall be limited to the commonwealth only, shall hereafter be brought within two years after the offense was committed, and at no time afterwards; and that all actions, suits, bills or informations, which shall be brought for any forfeiture, upon any penal act of assembly made or to be made, the benefit and suit whereof is or shall be by the said act limited to the commonwealth, and to any person or persons that shall prosecute in that behalf, shall be brought by any person or persons that may lawfully sue for the same, within one year next after the offense was committed; and in default of such pursuit, that then the same shall be brought for the commonwealth, any time within one year after that year ended; and if any action, suit, bill, indictment or information, shall be brought after the time so limited, the same shall be void, and where a shorter time is limited by any act of assembly, the prosecution shall be within that time."

["Approach to Be Taken"]

In support of their contention, defendants cite the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit's decision in Gordon v. Loew's Incorporated.[6] In that case, the court held that a New Jersey statute of limitations governing "All actions at law brought for any forfeiture upon any penal statute . . . ." [7] applied to a suit under § 4 of the Clayton Act for treble damages. An examination of the basis for the decision, however, shows that it only establishes the approach to be taken in resolving the question presented. The court pointed out in Gordon that when the federal courts employ a state statute of limitations for federal purposes, they must give it the scope and meaning that the state courts give to it in analogous suits under state law.[8] The court then referred to a recent New Jersey case which held that the state Rent Control Act, providing for treble damages in suits by a tenant against his landlord for violations of that Act, was a penal statute for statute of limitation purposes.[9] Our inquiry must, therefore, be directed to the problem of how the courts of Pennsylvania would characterize a statute similar to § 4 of the Clayton Act in applying the Act of 1785.

[Pennsylvania Decision]

In Commonwealth v. Musser Forests, Inc., 394 Pa. 205, 146 A. 2d 714 (1958), the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania had occasion to consider the applicability of the Act of 1785 to the Forest Tree Seedling Act, which provides that anyone who purchases trees from the Commonwealth must promise to pay a penalty of three times the value of any trees resold for ornamental use.[10] The court held that the Act of 1785 did not apply. The court cites Justice Holmes' opinion in the Chattanooga Foundry case [11] in support of its conclusion.[12] This is a clear indication that the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania would not apply the Act of 1785 to a private action under § 4 of the Clayton Act. Therefore, this court cannot apply that statute.

[Six-year Pennsylvania Statute]

It has been conceded by all parties that, in the event that the Act of 1785 does not apply to this action, the six-year Pennsylvania statute for actions in trespass on the case [13] should be employed with respect to all defendants except Fox Philadelphia Building, Inc., and that the recent four-year federal statute [14] should be used for the latter since it was not joined as a defendant until April 26, 1956, which was after the federal statute became effective.

The contentions of counsel for defendant Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation were disposed of by this court in County Theatre Company v. Paramount Film Dist. Corp., 166 F. Supp. 221 (E. D. Pa. 1958).

[Order]

Counsel for plaintiffs will submit an order consistent with this opinion within one week.

of certain leases and assignments between the two mining companies. Hence, it would be a waste of judicial effort for the present court to decide now the motion to dismiss, before a determination of that same issue by the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals.

For the defendants: William S. Potter (Berl, Potter & Anderson), Wilmington, Del.; Walter J. Milde, George H. Rudolph and Richard W. Pogue (Jones, Day, Cockley & Reavis), and William J. De Lancy, Cleveland, Ohio, of counsel, for Republic Steel Corporation.

Memorandum Opinion

[Treble Damage Action]

WRIGHT, Chief Judge [In full text]: The plaintiff, Mesabi Iron Company (Mesabi), has commenced this action against Republic Steel Corporation (Republic) and Armco Steel Corporation (Armco), seeking damages and injunctive relief against Republic and Armco for alleged violations of the Federal antitrust laws.[1]

[Motions]

Republic has moved to dismiss the action because the complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, or in the alternative, to stay the action pending the determination of various disputes which have arisen between Mesabi and Reserve Mining Company (Reserve).[2] Republic and Armco each owns fifty percent of the outstanding stock of Reserve.[3]

[Proceedings in Another Court—Appeal Pending]

Prior to the commencement of this action, suit was instituted in the State Courts of Minnesota and removed to the United States District Court, 5th Division Minnesota, seeking construction of certain leases and assignments between Reserve, plaintiff therein, and Mesabi, and certain named individuals.[4] Mesabi filed a motion in the Minnesota action requesting leave to amend its answer to include, by way of counterclaim, the alleged violation by Reserve, Republic and Armco of the Federal antitrust laws and to bring in additional parties. The antitrust violations alleged in the counterclaim are substantially the same as those in the complaint filed here.

The Minnesota Federal District Court held that as it then viewed the matter, neither monopoly or restraint of trade were relevant at that time but that its "ruling thereon will be held in abeyance until necessity therefor and in order to protect Mesabi's claims in connection therewith."[5] Mesabi has appealed the decision and it is now before the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals.[6]

["Standing" to Bring Suit]

At the outset the parties have placed squarely before this court the question of whether Mesabi has standing to sue for antitrust violations in the light of Harrison v. Paramount Pictures, Inc.,[7] and Melrose Realty Co. v. Loew's Inc.,[8] both decisions of our own Circuit Court.

If this court should decide Mesabi has no standing to sue, this phase of the litigation would be terminated. If the court concluded Mesabi had standing, it would have the alternative of hearing all factual and legal issues in dispute of certifying the issue of standing to the Circuit Court for a dispositive finding to avoid time consuming and costly litigation.[9]

[Ruling Deferred]

Another Federal forum has yet to decide whether it will dismiss the antitrust counterclaim or permit the filing of an amended answer alleging antitrust violations by the same parties, among others, to this action. If this court were to decide now the motion to dismiss before determination of this issue by the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals, it would result in a waste of judicial effort.

After careful deliberation, in the light of the aforementioned considerations, the court is convinced it should defer ruling on defendant's motion to dismiss and that any further proceedings in this litigation should be stayed pending final ruling by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the 8th Judicial Circuit.[10]

[Future Procedures]

Adoption of this procedure will permit the court to chart a course most suitable from the standpoint of judicial efficiency. After decision by the Circuit Court of Appeals of the 8th Circuit, the court upon proper application could:

1. Entertain an application for a further stay in proceedings.

2. Deny the motion to stay and grant the motion to dismiss if the court determines such a ruling correct.

3. Deny the motion to dismiss and if the circumstances so warrant certify the question raised by the Harrison and Melrose cases, supra, to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the 3d Circuit under 28 U. S. C. A. § 1292(b) as amended.

4. Consider any other motion or combination of motions that might be appropriate.

[Case Stayed]

Accordingly, the case at bar will be stayed pending disposition of the appeal now pending before the 8th Circuit.

Let an order in conformity herewith be submitted.

[¶ 69,476] Kentucky Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation v. Moloney Electric Co.

In the United States District Court for the Western District of Kentucky, at Louisville. Civil Action No. 3526. Dated July 7, 1959.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Brokerage Commissions Under Clayton Act, Section 2(c)—Seller's Payment of Commissions to Buyer's Agent—Manufacturer's Payment of Commissions to Buyer-owned "Distributor"—Legality.—An "arrangement" under which a manufacturer of electrical equipment and supplies paid "commissions, brokerage or discounts" to a "distributor" which was owned and controlled by the purchasers (rural electric cooperatives engaged in generating and distributing electric energy) was illegal under Section 2(c) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act. An "intermediary or broker may not receive fees from the seller which he in fact turns over to the buyer." Here, all of the manufacturer's sales through the "distributor" were to "member" cooperatives (those which owned the "distributor"), or to "participating" cooperatives which, along with the "member" cooperatives, shared in the profits which the "distributor" derived from the commissions and discounts.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3520.535.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Antitrust Violations as Defense—Action Based on Manufacturer's Refusal to Continue Illegal Brokerage "Arrangement."—A manufacturer of electrical equipment and supplies, in a treble damage action charging it with "terminating" one of its "distributors" and thereby discriminating in favor of competing distributors in violation of Section 2 of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, and Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act, was granted summary judgment on the ground that the "arrangement" which the "distributor" sought to continue violated the brokerage prohibitions of Section 2(c) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. If a plaintiff proves his own violation of law in proving his case, then no court will aid him to recover. Thus, where parties are in pari delicto, the law will leave them where it finds them. Here, the "distributor" asserted that its suit was "for a tort resulting from the violation of a statute," not for a breach of contract, and that, under the United States Supreme Court's recent decision in Kelly v.

Kosuga, 1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,283, and other cited cases, its recovery was not defeated by the antitrust illegality of the "arrangement." Rejecting that argument, the court concluded that "if it be tort for the defendant to refuse to continue the transactions with the plaintiff, which by the terms of the statute are unlawful both as to the plaintiff and defendant, then neither plaintiff nor defendant has a valid claim against the other arising out of the alleged tortious refusal to continue such transactions banned by the statute."

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9040.20.

For the plaintiff: Philip P. Ardery, Louisville, Ky.

For the defendant: Malcolm Y. Marshall and Richard F. Newell, of Ogden, Brown, Robertson & Marshall, Louisville, Ky.; and William H. Ferrell, of Keefe, Schlafly, Griesedieck & Ferrell, St. Louis, Mo.

Memorandum

[Price Discrimination Action]

SHELBOURNE, District Judge [In full text]: This suit was instituted January 6, 1958, by the Kentucky Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation, plaintiff, against Moloney Electric Company, defendant, seeking to recover three times the alleged damage of $367,000.00, or an aggregate of $1,101,021.00, plus reasonable attorney's fees, under the provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, Sections 13, 13a, 15 and 22, Title 15, United States Code.

The defendant is a manufacturer of electrical equipment and supplies. It is the contention of the plaintiff that it was a distributor, supplier, jobber and manufacturer's sales representative; that in April, 1949, plaintiff began business as a distributor of electrical transformers manufactured by the defendant, and from that date until October 15, 1955, was the distributor of transformers to rural electric cooperative corporations in Kentucky and as such sold approximately $4,000,000.00 worth of defendant's transformers, maintaining and operating warehousing facilities for defendant's products in Kentucky; that on October 15, 1955, pursuant to previous notice, defendant refused to accept further orders, and arbitrarily and without right terminated the previously existing arrangement; that such termination had the effect of lessening competition between distributors, suppliers, jobbers and manufacturer's sales representatives of electrical equipment, and tended to create a monopoly and to destroy and prevent competition; that this was an unlawful discrimination in favor of certain distributors, suppliers, jobbers and manufacturer's sales representatives in competition with plaintiff; that thereby the defendant has prevented plaintiff from obtaining similar electrical equipment and supplies on the same basis existing prior to October 15, 1955, and that plaintiff has thereby been damaged.

December 31, 1958, plaintiff filed its amended complaint, reducing the amount of damages sought to $472,666.20, three times the actual damage sustained alleged to have been $157,555.40.

The defendant, by its answer to the original and to the amended or substituted complaint, denied the material allegations of the complaint as amended and, by its Fifth Defense, alleged that all of the sales of defendant's equipment through the plaintiff were to rural electric cooperative corporations engaged in the business of generating and distributing electric energy; that 98.14 per cent of such sales were to rural electric cooperative corporations which owned the plaintiff corporation, and the remaining 1.86 per cent of the total sales were made to rural electric cooperative corporations which were entitled to share and participate in all of the profits of the plaintiff upon the basis of each of such distribution cooperatives' purchases of the products and service distributed and made available by the plaintiff; that the plaintiff was acting as agent and representative of both the member cooperatives and participating cooperatives, and that the member cooperatives were the owners of the plaintiff corporation which was subject to the direct and indirect control of the member cooperatives.

The defendant alleged that the paying or granting by the defendant to the plaintiff and the receiving or accepting by the plaintiff from the defendant of commission, brokerage or other compensation or discount upon the purchase by the member cooperatives and the participating cooperatives of transformers and other equipment manufactured by the defendant was unlawful by reason of the provisions of Section 2(c) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, and that the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant for the making of such payments, allowances, discounts or commissions was illegal, unenforceable, and void.

[Motion for Summary Judgment]

Two or more pre-trial conferences were had, discovery processes employed by counsel in the case and, on February 5, 1959, defendant filed its motion for a summary judgment. This motion has been briefed, and there is substantially no dispute between the parties as to the facts. As Judge Parker stated in the case of Oliver Bros., Inc., v. Federal Trade Commission (CA 4) [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,212], 102 F. 2d 763, 766, "* * * the controversy here is over the conclusions to be deduced from the facts rather than over the facts themselves; * * *."

["Distributor" Owned by Buyers]

The plaintiff, Kentucky Rural Electric Cooperative Corporation, is not an operating rural electric cooperative corporation; it does not generate, transmit or distribute electrical energy, but it is styled by counsel in this case a "super cooperative" owned and controlled by the operating cooperatives. In its by-laws, one of its recited purposes is to purchase materials, supplies and equipment for its members. The plaintiff, while acting as defendant's distributor, agent or broker, did not seek to obtain orders from purchasers other then rural electric cooperative corporations. The complaint of the plaintiff here is that Moloney Electric Company on and after October 15, 1955, refused to pay commission or disceant upon sales of Moloney's equipment through the plaintiff to member and participating cooperatives.

[Brokerage Payments Under Clayton Act, Section 2(c)]

Section 2(c) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, Section 13 (c), Title 15, United States Code, provides:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to pay or grant, or to receive or accept, anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, except for services rendered in connection with the sale or purchase of goods, wares, or merchandise, either to the other party to such transaction or to an agent, representative, or other intermediary therein where such intermediary is acting in fact for or in behalf, or is subject to the direct or indirect control, of any party to such transaction other than the person by whom such compensation is so granted or paid."

It is the contention of the defendant that under this statute it is unlawful for a seller to pay a commission, discount or brokerage to either (1) the buyer, or (2) an intermediary who is acting in fact for or in behalf of the buyer, or (3) an intermediary who is subject to the direct or indirect control of the buyer, and that the statute likewise makes the acceptance or receipt of any such commission, discount or compensation unlawful.

[Commissions Distributed to Buyers]

All of the member cooperatives owning the plaintiff corporation and the participating cooperatives at each year's end shared in the profits derived by the plaintiff from the commissions and discounts paid by the defendant to plaintiff in proportion or on a basis of their respective purchases of Moloney's products.

The plan of operation consummating sales to member cooperatives during the period from April, 1949 to October, 1955, was for the plaintiff to take from a member or participating cooperative an order for Moloney equipment and forward such order to Moloney at St. Louis. The ordered equipment was billed direct to the ordering cooperative at the usual or ordinary retail price, and the defendant Moloney would then forward the commission, brokerage or discount to the plaintiff. Moloney has not indicated an unwillingness to continue to sell its equipment to the member and participating cooperatives, but declines to pay to plaintiff the discount or brokerage formerly done.

In Oliver Bros. v. Federal Trade Commission, supra, the following interpretation of Section 2(c) of the statute from the Report of the House and Senate Conference Committee is quoted on page 768:

> " 'This subsection permits the payment of compensation by a seller to his broker or agent for services actually rendered in his behalf; likewise by a buyer to his broker or agent for services in connection with the purchase of goods actually rendered in his behalf; but it prohibits the direct or indirect payment of brokerage except for such services rendered. It prohibits its allowance by the buyer direct to the seller, or by the seller direct to the buyer; and it prohibits its payment by either to an agent or intermediary acting in fact for or in behalf, or subject to the direct or indirect control, of the other.'"

And, on page 770 of the opinion, Judge Parker said;

"No one would contend that without violating this section, a broker representing the seller could give his commissions to the buyer; * * * We may assume that under the section it is permissible for a broker to render services to both buyer and seller and to receive from both compensation for the services rendered; but this is a very different thing from the buyer himself receiving the compensation."

In the case of Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Federal Trade Commission (CA 3) [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,242], 106 F. 2d 667, 673, with respect to Section 2(c), the court said, "We * * * believe that paragraph (c) expresses an absolute prohibition of the payment of brokerage or compensation in lieu thereof to the buyer upon the buyer's own purchases." The court stated in that case that the question presented is simply whether or not the vendee may be compensated for services rendered by the vendee's agent acting as agent for the vendors, and said:

"We entertain no doubt that it was the intention of Congress to prevent dual representation by agents purporting to deal on behalf of both the buyer and seller. For this reason paragraph (c) is framed by disjunctives. The edge of the paragraph cuts two ways, prohibiting the payment or receipt of commissions, discounts or brokerage to the adversary party by the other's agent. * * * The agent cannot serve two masters, simultaneously rendering services in an arm's length transaction to both. * * * In short, a buying and selling service cannot be combined in one person."

In Biddle Purchasing Co. v. Federal Trade Commission (CA 2) [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,180], 96 F. 2d 687, 691, that court said:

"It is clear that the statute [referring to 2(c)] prohibits payments of brokerage by the seller to the buyer or his agent or representative or controlled intermediary except for services rendered."

"Congress must have intended that payments by sellers should not be made to buyers through any one acting as agent for the buyer."

[Fees May Not Be Turned Over to Buyer]

The intermediary or broker may not receive fees from the seller which he in fact turns over to the buyer. See also Webb-Crawford Co. v. Federal Trade Commission (CA 5) [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,303], 109 F. 2d 268; Quality Bakers of America v. Co. v. Federal Trade Commission (CA 7) [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,479], 203 F. 2d 941.

[Antitrust Violations as Defense]

Plaintiff's counsel seeks to avoid the teaching of the above cases as to the meaning of Section 2(c) by such cases as Bruce's Juices v. American Can Co. [1946-1947 Trade Cases ¶ 57,553], 330 U. S. 743; Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Seagram & Sons [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,737], 340 U. S. 211; Moore v. Mead Service Co. (CA 10) [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,876], 190 F. 2d 540; Noerr Motor Freight v. Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference, [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,827], 155 F. Supp. 768.

The sole question decided in the case of Bruce's Juices, as stated by the Supreme Court, is whether notes given for purchases are unenforceable if the quantity discount plan violates the Act (Robinson-Patman Act). At page 750 of the opinion the Court said:

"The Act prescribes sanctions, and it does not make uncollectibility of the purchase price one of them. Violation of the Act is made criminal and upon conviction a violator may be fined or imprisoned. * * * Any person who is injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden therein may sue and recover threefold the damages by him sustained and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

> "This Court has held that where a suit is based upon an agreement to which both defendant and plaintiff are parties, and which has as its object and effect accomplishment of illegal ends which would be consummated by the judgment sought, the Court will entertain the defense that the contract in suit is illegal under the express provision of the statute. Continental Wall Paper Co. v. Lewis Voight and Sons Co., 212 U. S. 227."

On page 756 of the opinion in Bruce's Juices, supra, citing McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, the Supreme Court said,

> "If, in order to prove his own case, a plaintiff proves his violation of law, then no court will aid the plaintiff to recover."

We think plaintiff's reliance upon the Kiefer-Stewart case, supra, is likewise unfounded. Kiefer-Stewart's suit against Seagram charged the latter with conspiracy with other distillers to maintain a fixed maximum retail price for liquor by selling only to wholesalers who agreed to maintain the fixed maximum retail price. Seagram's defense was that Kiefer-Stewart had entered into illegal agreements, fixing minimum retail prices, with other Indiana wholesalers. Hence, the suit was not between parties who had entered into the same illegal contract the alleged breach of which constituted the gravamen of the suit. The Supreme Court held this defense unavailing.

Following the Kiefer-Stewart opinion, in the case of National Transformer Corp. v. France Mfg. Co. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,824], 215 F. 2d 343, 361, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit said:

> "It may be here emphasized that a contract which cannot be performed without violation of a statute is illegal and void. Where parties are in pari delicto the law will leave them where it finds them, and all relief is refused because of the public interest. Twin City Pipe Line Co. v. Harding Glass Co., 283 U. S. 353, 51 S. Ct. 476, 75 L. Ed. 1112. The defendant may assert the invalidity of an agreement, even though he is a participator in the wrong. Standard Lumber Co. v. Butler Ice Co., 3 Cir., 146 F. 359. The defense of illegality is allowed, not as a protection to the defendant, but as a disability to the plaintiff."

See also Pennsylvania Water & P. Co. v. Consolidated G. E. L. & P. Co. (CA 4) [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,641], 209 F. 2d 131.

Plaintiff also relies on the Supreme Court's opinion in Kelly v. Kosuga [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,283], 358 U. S. 516. The Kelly case was likewise a suit to recover the purchase price of commodities sold to it. The defense was sought to be made that the sale was pursuant to an agreement which violated the Sherman Antitrust Act. The Supreme Court, on page 518 of its opinion, said:

> "As a defense to an action based on contract, the plea of illegality based on violation of the Sherman Act, has not met with much favor in this Court. This has been notably the case where the plea has been made by the purchaser in an action to recover from him the agreed price of goods sold."

[Alleged Tort, Not Contract]

The plaintiff here disavows any intent or purpose that its suit is based on a breach of contract. Conversely, it states that it is for a tort resulting from the violation of a statute. The answer to that contention seems obvious to this Court: if it be tort for the defendant to refuse to continue the transactions with the plaintiff, which by the terms of the statute are unlawful both as to plaintiff and defendant, then neither plaintiff nor defendant has a valid claim against the other arising out of the alleged tortious refusal to continue such transactions banned by the statute.

[Summary Judgment Granted]

There being no substantial dispute as to the facts here involved, we believe the authorities referred to herein and cited by counsel in their briefs entitle the defendant to a summary judgment. Counsel for defendant will submit an appropriate judgment, upon notice to plaintiff's counsel, in accordance with the rules of this Court.

In the Louisiana Supreme Court. No. 44,550. Dated June 1, 1959.

Appeal from the Nineteenth Judicial District Court, Parish of East Baton Rouge, Division "C." JOHNSON, Judge.

Louisiana Orderly Milk Marketing Act

Sales Below Cost—Louisiana Orderly Milk Marketing Act—Constitutionality—Delegation of Legislative Price Fixing Power—Due Process.—The Louisiana Orderly Milk Marketing Act (prohibiting, among other practices, sales below cost, rebates or discounts from invoice prices, and trade concessions "with the intent or with the effect" of injuring competitors or creating a monopoly), by permitting the Louisiana Commissioner of Agriculture & Immigration to fix minimum prices to go into effect only if approved by two-thirds of the producers of milk products in a given marketing area, does not violate the "due process" guarantees of the Louisiana and Federal Constitutions by delegating to private persons the legislative power to fix minimum prices. Rejecting that argument along with the further contention that the Act failed to provide adequate standards for the Commissioner's exercise of certain discretionary functions, the court noted that the legislature may make the operation of a statute contingent upon the existence of certain conditions, and may delegate to some executive or administrative board the power to determine the existence of such facts and to carry out the terms of the statute. As to the contention that the Act did not meet the criteria under which the legislative power to fix prices could be invoked, the court cited as controlling its own ruling, in Louisiana Wholesale Distributors Assn. v. Rosenzweig, 1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,262, that the Louisiana Unfair Sales Act, a "comparable example of constitutional regulatory legislation," was within the "police power" of the legislature. Price control, like any other form of regulation, is unconstitutional only if it is arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant to a policy the legislature is free to adopt.

Further, a provision to the effect that proof of the prohibited acts "shall be prima facie evidence of a violation" was only a rule of evidence and did not create a "presumption of guilt" in violation of any "due process" guarantees. The court also rejected the contentions that the Act created an undue burden on interstate commerce, and that it was arbitrary, unreasonable, and indefinite.

[Louisiana Orderly Milk Marketing Act—Constitutionality]

FOURNET, Chief Justice [In full text]: The plaintiff, Schwegmann Brothers Giant Super Markets, a commercial partnership engaged in the business of selling, at retail, food and other commodities and conducting three very large establishments in New Orleans and its environs, sought an injunction in the Nineteenth Judicial District Court for the Parish of East Baton Rouge against the Commissioner of Agriculture & Immigration of this State, Sidney J. McCrory, restraining enforcement of the provisions of Act 193 of the Legislature of 1958, known as the Orderly Milk Marketing Act, and attacking its constitutionality on various grounds. Certain producers and processors of milk and milk products, domiciled in various parts of the State, twenty-one in number,[1] were allowed to intervene and join with the defendant in defending the legality and constitutionality of the Act. After a full hearing[2] there was judgment decreeing that the rule nisi be recalled, vacated and set aside and plaintiff's suit be dismissed at its cost; and the plaintiff has appealed.

[Purpose of Act]

The said Act—a supplement and amendment to Part VII of Chapter 4 of Title 40 of the Revised Statutes and designated R. S. 40:940.1-940.15—according to its title, is "* * * to protect and preserve the orderly marketing of milk, milk products and frozen desserts listed or referred to herein * * *,"[3] and contains a preamble declaring the Legislature's recognition of the development in the State of unfair competition and trade practices in the sale and distribution of those products, its further recognition of the necessity to protect and preserve orderly marketing and to prevent certain unfair trade and marketing practices, and expressing the lawmakers' intent to prevent the economic destruction of many dairy farmers and others dealing in said products because of discriminatory trade practices engaged in by certain financially strong business organizations to stifle competition—thus presenting "a situation detrimental to the health, welfare and economy of the people of this State." Among the practices engaged in by the plaintiff and other large chain stores, and sought to be abolished by provisions of the Act, were a system of rebates or discounts from invoice prices; trade concessions, including the furnishing of display and storage equipment, contributions for free use of refrigeration equipment, advertising paid for by those from whom the dairy products were bought; and trucking of the product from North Louisiana, the entire length of the State (by financially powerful distributors and processors not parties here) and offered for sale at prices cut in half and substantially below the market in the locality from which the product was shipped.

[Practices Prohibited]

The first section of the Act lists the items covered by its provisions, i. e., the various kinds of milk, milk products and "frozen desserts" (40:940.1); the next section contains a definition of terms, including "Non-processing Retailer" which fits plaintiff's business, and "Cost" which "shall include the cost" of the product to the non-processing retailer plus cost of doing business—which latter shall include but not be limited to labor costs, including executive salaries, cost of receiving, cooling, processing, packaging, manufacturing, rent, depreciation, power, supplies, selling costs, delivery costs, storing, maintenance of plant and equipment, advertising, transportation, all types of licenses, taxes, fees, insurance, and all other costs of doing business as determined by the Commissioner, and cost shall be allocated proportionately to each unit of product sold "and in no case can any item or unit be sold for less than the unit cost; * * *."[4] (940.2) By the following section (940.3), headed "Disruptive Sales Practices," it is declared to be a violation for a processor,

[2] It was stipulated that the evidence offered on the application for a preliminary injunction should be considered by the Court as evidence on behalf of all parties on the application for permanent injunction without further trial.

[3] The title further declares that the Act is one "to prevent disruptive trade practices; specifying the items covered by this act; defining the terms used therein; authorizing the establishment of minimum prices under certain conditions; providing regulations for the sale, transfer or other disposal of the products mentioned and for trade practices connected therewith; establishing license requirements; vesting in the Commissioner of the Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Immigration certain powers, duties and functions; providing penalties and establishing remedies for the violation of this Act; repealing all laws or parts of laws in conflict herewith."

[4] There is a proviso that "in the absence of specific evidence that the cost of doing business as herein defined for a non-processing retailer is less than eight per cent, the cost of doing business * * * shall be presumed to be not less than eight per cent of the invoice price and this cost shall be calculated to the nearest half cent per sales unit. * * *" (940.2) handler, distributor or bulk milk handler[5] to do certain described acts, including

> (a) "To discriminate in price between non-processing retailers or between consumers who purchase any of the products listed * * * where such products are offered for sale in the same size and type of container" (b) "To give or offer any discount or rebates on products sold * * *" (c) "To furnish, give, lend, sell or rent any signs and display material except those advertising only his own products," and the name or products of the non-processing retailer are not to be included in such signs or display material—except in the case of installations in place as of July 30, 1958.[6] The method is then provided (940.4) of arriving at minimum prices to producers so as to achieve orderly marketing, and is reproduced in full in the margin.[7]

[Sales Below Cost]

Succeeding sections (940.5 and 940.6), prohibiting certain acts by processors, handlers and/or distributors, need not be detailed. With reference to sales by a non-processing retailer, the Act provides (940.7):

> "No non-processing retailer shall with the intent or with the effect of unfairly diverting trade from a competitor, or of otherwise injuring a competitor, or of destroying competition, or of creating a monopoly, advertise, give, offer to sell or sell within the state of Louisiana, any of the items listed or referred to * * * for less than cost, as defined in R. S. 40:940.2. Proof of the advertising, giving, offer to sell or sale of such products by a non-processing retailer for less than cost to such non-processing retailer shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of this Section."

Like provisions are applicable to sales by bulk milk handlers (940.8), followed by prohibition (940.9) of combination sales involving milk products with any other commodity or service at a price less than the aggregate of the prices for each, with intent or effect of injuring a competitor, destroying competition or creating a monpoly.[8] Rebates, dis-

[5] The producer is the dairy farmer who obtains the raw milk from the cow and sells it to the processor, handler or distributor; the processor or handler (who may also in some cases be a distributor, or who may sell direct to the consumer) is the one who processes (i.e., cools, pasteurizes, homogenizes, flavors, etc.) the milk and packages it before it is delivered to the seller for sale to the public; a distributor is one who sells the products for purpose of resale or further processing; and a bulk milk handler is one who furnishes milk in cans, tank cars or tank trucks to the processor or handler. (Definition of terms, 940.2)

[6] The remaining violations enumerated in this subparagraph are: (d) "To make payments of money, credit, gifts or loans to non-processing retailers or their employees, or for rental for the storage or display of any of the products" covered by the Act; (e) "To sell any non-processing retailer any new fixture or equipment for less than a mark-up" as specified, and "any used equipment sold to a non-processing retailer by processor, handler, distributor, or bulk milk handler shall be sold" on the basis of price arrived at in a certain way; (f) "To make any loan" or guarantee or underwrite any financial obligation of a non-processing retailer; (g) to extend credit to a non-processing retailer to exceed 60 days, and delinquent accounts beyond 90 days subjects the non-processing retailer to revocation of his license; (h) to make or maintain repairs to the equipment of the non-processing retailer at less than usual charges; (i) to make a gift to him of money or merchandise, soda fountain, carbonator, services or material, or to help him conduct his business (except as permitted elsewhere); (j) to sell any product listed in the Act at "dock prices at places other than the point of processing," and if at the point of processing, the dock price shall be augmented by any transportation cost to place of distribution. The final violation is (k) refusal by a handler, processor or distributor to accept milk from a milk producer as a result of the latter's affiliation with a cooperative association. (940.3)

[7] "Upon written request of 50 per cent or more of the dairy farmers who regularly supply milk to a milk marketing area, the commissioner shall determine, by official order, after public hearing in which all interested persons shall be given reasonable opportunity to be heard, the appropriate area to be included in the marketing area and minimum prices to be paid for milk by processors or handlers, distributors or bulk milk handlers for milk received. Such minimum prices in any milk marketing area within the state shall be beneficial to the public interest, protect the dairy industry of the state, and insure a sufficient quantity of pure and wholesome milk for inhabitants of this state. In determining the minimum prices, the commissioner shall take into consideration the following factors operative in each marketing area; the quantity of fluid milk produced and disposed of; the cost of dairy feed, farm labor, and other economic conditions affecting the production and sale of milk in the area. The commissioner shall, upon approval by ⅔ of the producers voting at a referendum in the marketing area, require payment of such appropriate minimum prices for milk in the respective marketing areas."

[8] By further provision of the subsection, "Proof of the advertising, giving, offering to sell or sale of such product with any other commodity or service at a combined price which is less than the aggregate of the price for which such product and the other commodity or service are offered for sale shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of this Section." (940.9) counts, and other trade practices by processors, handlers or distributors with intent to destroy competition are prohibited (940.10) except upon final liquidation of business, items sold under court order, where the prices of similar or comparable products are made in good faith to meet legal competition, or bids are made in response to invitation from governing bodies. Non-processing retailers as well as other named handlers of milk are required (940.11) to be licensed by the Commissioner; the method for obtaining the license and provision for revocation are incorporated in this Section. The Commissioner, designated "the instrumentality of the state" for administering the Act and "to execute the legislative intent herein expressed" (940.12), is vested with certain powers deemed appropriate and necessary to that end, including subpoena power; he promulgates regulations pertaining to the purchases and sales of the affected products, and is empowered to issue licenses for the sum of one dollar annually. He is further authorized to assess against those who process or handle any of the products listed, certain fees to cover the cost of administering the provisions of the Act (940.13), the said fees and other monies to be deposited in the state treasury to the credit of a revolving fund, the assessments to be adjusted so that the fund does not exceed a stated amount (940.14). Penalties for violation of the Act are set out in the final paragraph (940.15).

The market practices which led to this enactment are disclosed by the record, wherein is revealed a system developed by plaintiff under which it received rebates or discounts from the invoice prices [9] in addition to trade concessions, such as contributions for its free use of refrigeration, display and storage equipment, and advertising furnished and paid for by those from whom it bought dairy products. There was also the practice by large distributors and processors of trucking merchandise great distances from one end of the State to the other, and selling it to big chain stores at prices cut in half below the current market in that locality. In the words of the Trial Judge,

> "It does not take much imagination to realize the result of such practices on the small dairies and processors who could make some money at a fair current market price with fair competition, but who were not financially strong enough to meet such abnormal competition."

But the effect of such practices is denied by the plaintiff, who asserts that official statistics of the U. S. Department of Agriculture [10] covering the period from 1945 to 1957 reflect an expanding and prosperous dairy industry in Louisiana, showing an increase in quantity, price and cash receipts significantly larger than that of neighboring states and three times the national average; and counsel assert that

> "What the witnesses [intervenors and other witnesses for defendant] were unknowingly describing was competition in a free economy."

In giving his carefully prepared Reasons the Trial Judge observed:

> "The evidence in this case, some of which has been referred to briefly herein, convincingly sustains the already well known fact that the all-power combination of volume buying and adequate financial resources has developed demands and requirements which the small producer, processor and retailer cannot meet. Nor is it shown that the effect of such a combination has profited the consumer."

One brief reference was to an ice cream processor of Lake Charles who, said the Trial Judge,

> "explained that his company had been in business for 44 years and that it had made a profit every year except in the last 5 years his business lost money 3 out of the 5 years, and that one more year with the necessary outlay to meet the discount, rebate, trade concessions and contributions required to hold customers would have put his company out of business. This manner of testimony was repeated by all the witnesses for the defense. It is further shown that the short period of a few months after August 1, 1958, when Act 193 went into effect, has brought equal and wholesome relief from [9] One of the plaintiff-owners in this case testified that plaintiff first deducted 5% of the invoice price of milk and milk products, then added a cost mark-up of 6% of the remainder.

this disruptive pressure which brought about its enactment. There is no testimony that the discontinuance of these practices * * * has resulted in any material general increase in the retail price to the consumer." [11]

[Delegation of Legislative Power]

The plaintiff's first and most seriously urged contention is that the Act unlawfully delegates legislative power, including the power to fix prices, in violation of State and Federal due process guarantees. The unlawful delegations are said to be found (a) in Section 904.4, which permits the Commissioner of Agriculture to fix a minimum price, to go into effect only if approved by two-thirds of the producers in a given marketing area (as defined by the Commissioner)—thus effecting an unlawful delegation to private persons of legislative authority to fix minimum prices, because the producer controls whether any minimum price will be fixed and can effectively control, through use of the veto power, any change in a price once set; (b) in Section 940.1, in that the State Board of Health is given authority to define one of the major product groups regulated by the Act,[12] without providing any sort of standard; thus the State Board of Health can control the scope of the Act and "legislate" by extending or narrowing its definition of frozen desserts at will; (c) in a failure to provide adequate standards for exercise by the Commissioner of certain discretionary functions, in violation of the requirements of due process; e. g., by Section 940.2(14), the Commissioner is allowed to create and define "Disruptive Trade Practices" other than those set forth elsewhere in the Act; [13] by Section 940.11 he is given discretion to grant, withhold or revoke licenses; by Section 940.2(12) he has authority to determine "cost" by [11] Other testimony to the same effect was (a) By a processor and small distributor in Webster and Claiborne Parishes, who got caught in a "milk war" between two major concerns in Monroe and Shreveport, with the result that milk in super markets in his locality dropped from 52 cents to 39 cents a half gallon—yet the price where the milk was processed, bottled and put up for wholesale distribution by one of those major concerns was 49 cents a half gallon and it then had to be hauled 100 miles to a dock plus 30 miles from there to the witness' area; (b) By a man in the milk business for some 30 years in the Alexandria area, who described the same situation when a big distributor, which bottled and processed the milk 130 miles away, started selling to chain stores below cost; (c) By an ice cream manufacturer of Claiborne Parish who lost accounts because he had to refuse to give discounts and rebates and to furnish free a refrigerated cabinet for storage and display of non-dairy foods such as frozen foods, meats, etc.; and who also lost accounts to a "big chain" which quoted a price of 50 cents per half gallon for ice cream when the list price was 80 cents; (d) By a dairyman in Lake Charles, who at one time had employed 38 people but because of the loss of approximately one-third of the volume of his business due to the tactics being used in the milk industry had found it necessary to reduce his force considerably—his loss of business having been caused in large part because milk imported from Shreveport was selling in Lake Charles for 39¢—the while the same quantity and quality were being sold in Shreveport for 45¢; (e) By a retail grocer, who stated that the volume of his business on all items fell off because he was having to buy milk at a higher price than the selling price of his competitors, made possible because they were getting discounts and he was not; and (f) By a disinterested witness, with wide knowledge and experience in the field of marketing and utilization of milk and milk products, who testified concerning the practice of big chains of selling at a loss in a particular area but maintaining the prices in another area to make up the losses. This witness, who, under authority of the U. S. Secretary of Agriculture, had prepared the Federal orders under which milk was being sold in the Shreveport area, stated that the procedure for determining a fair minimum price under the Louisiana statute was identical to that under the Federal Act except for the jurisdiction. With reference to the "loss leader" sales of milk, he aptly observed: "Therefore, I think it could be concluded properly that the Shreveport housewife was subsidizing the Lake Charles housewife to some extent."

[12] Section 940.1, after listing the various kinds of milk and milk products covered by the Act, provides: "Also, all frozen desserts as defined in Section 1 of Chapter XXV of the Sanitary Code of the State of Louisiana as revised through February 22, 1957, including any subsequent revisions." The said Section 1 defines a frozen dessert as "any sound and clean, frozen or partially frozen combination of two or more of the following: Milk or milk products, vegetable fat, animal fat, other food products approved by the Louisiana State Board of Health, eggs or egg products, nutritive sweetening ingredients, artificial sweetening ingredients (used only in diabetic desserts), water, confection (defined in Section 5), nut meats, fruit or fruit juices, citric or other organic food acid or other wholesome flavoring agents and colors together with harmless stabilizer, and shall be deemed to include ice cream, fruit ice cream, nut ice cream, ice milk, frozen malt ice cream, french ice cream, milk sherbert, ices or water ices, mellorine, olarine, sherine, and icicle bars."

[13] That paragraph provides "Disruptive Sales Practices" means those practices which are prohibited in R. S. 40:940.3 or such other practices as may be determined by the commissioner to be disruptive of orderly marketing. (R. S. 40:940.2(14))

determining what items must be considered as "costs of doing business."[14] and ultimately to define a crime, since other sections (940.5, "Sales by a processor, handler or distributor" and 940.7, "Sales by a non-processing retailer") declare certain sales below "cost" as defined in the Act to be a violation of its provisions, with attendant criminal penalties. The authorities relied on in the main are Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U. S. 238, 56 S. Ct. 855, 80 L. Ed. 1160; City of Alexandria v. Alexandria Fire Fighters Ass'n, 220 La. 754, 57 So. 2d 673; Dr. G. H. Tichenor Antiseptic Co. v. Schwegmann Bros. G. S. Mkts. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,400], 231 La. 51, 90 So. 2d 343; State v. Maitrejean, 193 La. 824, 192 So. 361; and State v. Chisesi, 187 La. 675, 175 So. 453.

Defendant and intervenors counter with a denial that private individuals fix minimum prices, contending that Section 940.4 sets out factors for the Commissioner to take into consideration in determining the minimum prices in each marketing area, and in that way standards are prescribed for carrying out the legislative will; that private individuals at a referendum and upon approval of two-thirds of the milk producers voting, merely approve such minimum prices —following which the Commissioner shall require payment of such minimum prices, and therefore no arbitrary discretion is vested in him. Relied on are the cases of Currin v. Wallace, 306 U. S. 1, 59 S. Ct. 379, 83 L. Ed. 441, and U. S. v. Rock Royal Cooperative, 307 U. S. 533, 59 S. Ct. 993, 83 L. Ed. 1446.

[Administrative Law—Principles]

Due to the complexity of our social and industrial activities, the decisions display an increasing tendency to hold as non-legislative the authority conferred upon commissions and boards to determine the facts or state of things upon which the law intends to make its action depend. It is now well settled that the Legislature may make the operation or application of a statute contingent upon the existence of certain conditions, and may delegate to some executive or administrative board the power to determine the existence of such facts and to carry out the terms of the statute.[15] So long as the regulation or action of the official or board authorized by statute does not in effect determine what the law shall be, or involve the exercise of primary and independent discretion, but only determines within prescribed limits some fact upon which the law by its own terms operates, such regulation is administrative and not legislative in its nature.[16] The United States Supreme Court has aptly observed that while powers of administration and legislation are quite distinct,

> "the line which separates exactly their exercise is not easy to define in words. It is best recognized in illustrations. Undoubtedly the legislature must declare the policy of the law and fix the legal principles which are to control in given cases; but an administrative body may be invested with the power to ascertain the facts and conditions to which the policy and principles apply. If this could not be done, there would be indefinite confusion in the laws, and in an effort to detail and particularize they would miss sufficiency both in provision and execution * * * If this were not so, the many administrative agencies created by the state and national governments would be denuded of their utility, and government in some of its most important exercises become impossible."[17]

[Cases Considered]

The case of Currin v. Wallace, supra (83 L. Ed. 441), has important points of similarity to the instant case; the Secretary of Agriculture, authorized by Congress to investigate the handling, inspection and marketing of tobacco and to establish standards by which type and grade might be determined, was empowered to designate the markets in which tobacco was to be bought and sold if two-thirds of the growers, voting at a special referendum, favored it, and that provision was attacked as an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to individuals; but the Court declared that the required referendum was merely a condition under which the Secretary was to be bound in the exercise of his administrative powers under the Act.

> "The intention of Congress is clear that markets thus ascertained shall be designated subject to the prescribed conditions and as rapidly as facilities for inspection are available. We find no unfettered discretion lodged with the administrative officer. The requirement of a referendum, as already noted, calls for the expression of the wishes of the growers and the Secretary acts merely as an administrative agent in conducting the referendum." (83 L. Ed. at 452)

The case of United States v. Rock Royal Cooperative, supra (83 L. Ed. 1446), is very much in point, treating as it does of an order of the Secretary of Agriculture regulating the handling of milk in the New York metropolitan area, which order had provisions similar to our Orderly Milk Marketing Act. There, a section of the Agriculture Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, 7 USC § 601, under which the Secretary of Agriculture fixed a fluctuating minimum price based on wholesale butter prices in New York, was attacked as an invalid delegation of power.[18] In rejecting the attack, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

> "While it is true that the determination of price under this section has a less definite standard than the parity tests of Section 2 and 8e, we cannot say that it is beyond the power of the Congress to leave this determination to a designated [18] That suit was instituted by the United States for a mandatory injunction requiring the defendant milk cooperatives and milk handlers to comply with Order No. 27 of the Secretary of Agriculture regulating the handling of milk in the New York Metropolitan area, and also, if it should be found that defendants were not subject to that Order, then alleging violation of Official Order No. 126 issued by the Commissioner of Agriculture and Markets of the State of New York. The two orders were in pari materia, one covering milk moving in interstate commerce, and the other covering milk in intrastate commerce. The Commissioner of Agriculture and Markets of the State of New York was permitted to intervene as party plaintiff, and sought an injunction commanding the defendants to comply with his Order No. 126 or, if it did not apply, then to comply with the Order of the U. S. Secretary of Agriculture. The answers challenged the two orders as contrary to the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution, and challenged the Act of Congress as involving improper delegation of legislative power. It appears that in the final analysis the controversy revolved almost entirely around Order No. 27, backed by the Statute under which it was issued, a provision of which authorized the Secretary, if he finds after a hearing that minimum prices with a base period purchasing power are unreasonable, to fix minimum prices so as to reflect the prices of available supplies of feed and other economic conditions; it also provided for a use of voluntary agreements as to certain specified commodities, including milk, and for orders instead of agreements when the Secretary of Agriculture had reason to believe that issuance of an order would tend to effectuate the declared policy of the Act, and after notice and an opportunity for hearing; in such Order the Secretary was required to set forth a finding upon the evidence introduced at the hearing, and that the issuance of the Order and the terms and conditions thereof would tend to effectuate the declared policy (Section 1 declares that the disruption of orderly exchange of commodities impairs the purchasing power of farmers, thus destroying the value of agricultural assets to the detriment of the national public interest). Orders may only be issued after hearing upon a marketing agreement which regulates the handling of the commodity, and do not become effective unless approved by a majority of the handlers—but notwithstanding the refusal or failure of handlers to sign a marketing agreement relating to the commodity the Secretary of Agriculture, with approval of the President, may issue an order if he determines that the refusal or failure of the handlers to sign such agreement tends to prevent the effectuation of the declared policy with respect to the commodity and that the issuance of the order is the only practical means of advancing the interest of the producers. In such a case the order must be approved or favored by two-thirds of the producers in number or volume who have been engaged, during the period, in the production for market of the commodity within the area, or by two-thirds of those engaged in the production of the commodity for sale in the marketing area. A referendum is authorized to determine whether the issuance of the order is approved by the producers.

Among pertinent observations made by the Court in the course of a lengthy examination of the Act, including phases with which we are not here concerned, is one distinguishing the case of Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,072], 295 U. S. 538, 79 L. Ed. 1584, 55 S. Ct. 837, 97 A. L. R. 947, cited by the plaintiff here as "probably the leading case on the subject of the constitutional delegation of legislative power," as follows: "Unlike the language of the National Industrial Recovery Act condemned in the A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. case, the tests here to determine the purpose and the powers dependent upon that conclusion are defined. In the Recovery Act the Declaration of Policy was couched in most general terms. In this Act it is to restore parity prices * * *. Under the RecoveryAct, general welfare might be sought through codes of any industry, formulated to express standards of fair competition for the businesses covered. Here the terms of orders are limited to the specific provisions, minutely set out * * *. While considerable flexibility is provided * * *, it gives opportunity only to include provisions auxiliary to those definitely specified."

administrator, with the standards named. The Secretary must have first determined the prices in accordance with Section 2 and 8e, that is, the prices that will give the commodity a purchasing power equivalent to that of the base period, considering the price and supply of feed and other pertinent economic conditions affecting the milk market in the area. If he finds the price so determined unreasonable, it is to be fixed at a level which will reflect such factors, provide adequate quantities of wholesome milk and be in the public interest. This price cannot be determined by mathematical formula but the standards give ample indications of the various factors to be considered by the Secretary." (83 L. Ed. at 1472)

The Court observed that milk belongs to that category of commodities that for many years has been subjected to the regulatory power of the State, and with reference to an attack on another pertinent provision of the same Act, disposed of the matter in these words:

"By subsection 19 it is provided that for the purpose of ascertaining whether the issuance of such an order is approved 'the Secretary may conduct a referendum among producers,' The objection is made that this is an unlawful delegation to producers of the legislative power to put an order into effect in a market. In considering this question, we must assume that the Congress had the power to put this Order into effect without the approval of anyone. Whether producer approval by election is necessary or not, a question we reserve, a requirement of such approval would not be an invalid delegation." (Citing Currin v. Wallace, supra) (83 L. Ed. at 1472.)

Plaintiff's counsel have been diligent in envisaging situations which they consider possible and view with alarm, but we think such fears are unwarranted at this time in the absence of a shred of showing that such happenings, contrary to the intent and purpose of the enactment, might occur. An Act of the Legislature is presumed to be legal until it is shown to be unconstitutional, and the lawmakers would indeed be hard put to draft legislation were it necessary to cover every conceivable contingency or to foresee and prohibit acts of an irresponsible administrator. The purpose and intent of the subject statute is clearly expressed, and the Commissioner of Agriculture, specifically declared to be the instrumentality of the State for the purpose of administering its provisions, is given the duty "to execute the legislative intent herein expressed." The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking in the Rock Royal case, said:

"* * * It is well settled therefore that it is no argument against the constitutionality of an Act to say it delegates broad powers to executives to determine the details of any legislative scheme. This necessary authority has never been denied."

[No Unlawful Delegation]

We therefore think that the objections raised by plaintiff on the ground that the Act unlawfully delegates legislative power in certain of its provisions are without merit. The authorities cited in support are distinguishable for various reasons, and in view of our further conclusions set out below are not controlling here.

[Due Process—Price Fixing]

The plaintiff next contends that the Act violates the due process clauses of the State and Federal Constitutions because the power to regulate private business by coercive price fixing is a legislative function, to be invoked under special circumstances and only when the measure bears a real, substantial and reasonable relation to the public welfare, and is neither arbitrary nor discriminatory—a criterion which the Act fails to meet.

[Controlling Decision]

The trial judge, in disposing of this issue, relied in great measure on the case of Louisiana Wholesale Distributors Ass'n v. Rosenzweig [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,262], 214 La. 1, 36 So. 2d 403, observing that the "Unfair Sales Law," R. S. 51:421 et seq., under attack there, is a comparable example of constitutional regulatory legislation, and that he deemed the decision controlling. In this we think he was eminently correct.

In that case the defendant Rosenzweig, as a defense to the charge that he had violated the Unfair Sales Act, contended that such a statute is, in fact, a price fixing statute and class legislation, precluding him from freely contracting with regard to his property, in violation of due process and equal protection guarantees of the Federal and State Constitutions. This Court, observing that the simple question posed (i.e., constitutionality vel non of the Unfair Sales Act) had been answered adversely to the defendant's contention by the courts of thirty states which had reviewed the similar acts adopted by their respective legislatures, and that the underlying principle upon which those decisions are based has the support of opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, quoted at length from "the leading case on this subject, Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502, 54 S. Ct. 505, 78 L. Ed. 940, 89 A. L. R. 1469," which posed the question of the constitutionality of a New York milk control law adopted for the purpose of thwarting harmful competition,[19] and contained many pertinent observations that were equally applicable in the case then under consideration. Among these were that

> "'So far as the requirement of due process is concerned, * * * a state is free to adopt whatever economic policy may reasonably be deemed to promote public welfare, and to enforce that policy by legislation adapted to its purpose. The courts are without authority either to declare such policy, or, when it is declared by the legislature, to override it. If the laws passed are seen to have a reasonable relation to a proper legislative purpose, and are neither arbitrary nor discriminatory, the requirements of due process are satisfied and judicial determination to that effect renders a court functus officio. * * * And it is equally clear that if the legislative policy be to curb unrestrained and harmful competition by measures which are not arbitrary or discriminatory it does not lie with the courts to determine that the rule is unwise. * * * Times without number we have said that the Legislature is primarily the judge of the necessity of such an enactment, that every possible presumption is in favor of its validity * * * The constitution does not secure to anyone liberty to conduct his business in such fashion as to inflict injury upon the public at large, or upon any substantial group of the people. Price control, like any other form of regulation, is unconstitutional only if arbitrary, discriminatory, or demonstrably irrelevant to the policy the legislature is free to adopt, and hence an unnecessary and unwarranted interference with individual liberty.'"

We then said:

> "Such acts have consistently been held not to be price fixing statutes. They merely fix the level below which producers and distributors may not sell without injury to a competitor and, ultimately, to the community."

Our conclusion was that

> "in adopting this state's Unfair Sales Act for the protection of our economic structure and to prevent the creation or perpetuation of monopolies, the legislature was acting well within its police power." (214 La. at 14.)

[Alleged Distinctions]

Plaintiff's counsel, realizing that their argument on this phase of the case is foreclosed by the above decisions, advance the thesis that principles announced in the Nebbia case are applicable only where emergency legislation has grown out of legislative study—because the New York milk control law, adopted in 1933, was the result of study by a joint legislative committee whose activities extended for nearly a year, following which a comprehensive report was submitted; and counsel say that in the absence of such emergency and study there is lacking any basis which the Nebbia case might otherwise furnish for the regulation of milk marketing and distribution under the subject Act. Those statements are without substance, particularly in view of the principle for which the Nebbia case was subsequently cited by the same Court, when it said:

> "Recently, upon a reexamination of the grounds of state power over prices, that power was phrased by this Court to mean that 'upon proper occasion and by appropriate measures the state may regulate a business in any of its aspects, including the prices to be charged for the products or commodities it sells.'"[20]

Equally unimpressive is the assertion that the Rosenzweig case is not controlling because we there concluded the Unfair Sales

[19] The defendant complained that the Board's order fixing minimum prices discriminated unfairly against him as a "cash and carry" dealer in milk since his rivals in the trade who had no store but only a wagon and delivery route were allowed to sell pints of milk as low as he did, with delivery to the customer's door as a bonus.

Act was not a price fixing statute, whereas the Act under attack is a price fixing statute —and differences between provisions of the two Acts, termed "significant" and "critical," are enumerated in brief. Suffice to say that the distinctions made are not of controlling importance, and additional discussion would serve no useful purpose.

[Presumption of Wrongful Intent]

It is further objected by plaintiff that the Act creates a presumption of guilt (ignoring the presumption of innocence fundamental under our law) in violation of due process guarantees of both Federal and State Constitutions; that a series of new crimes has been created by Sections 940.5 through 940.10, in that the doing of any one of a number of otherwise harmless acts with the intent or the effect of injuring a competitor, destroying competition, creating a monopoly, etc., is a crime, and while the intent or effect are necessary before the act becomes criminal, those elements are supplied by making the commission of the act prima facie evidence of violation of the section—the fatal defect being the presumption of the wrongful intent or injurious effect which are essential elements of the crime.

Reference to the wording of the various provisions complained of readily shows that counsel's analysis is not wholly accurate; they declare that none of the groups or individuals (as therein defined) who handle the products covered by the Act, "with the intent or with the effect of unfairly diverting trade from a competitor, or of otherwise injuring a competitor, or of destroying competition, or of creating a monopoly," shall do a described thing, and proof of the doing of the thing "shall be prima facie evidence of a violation of this Section." Penalties for such violation are set out in 940.15, and that section makes clear that punishment is by Court action—the subsection declares that "violation of this Subpart shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine not to exceed $500 in the discretion of the court," and refers to injunctions at the suit of any person aggrieved as well as to suits against the violator in the courts of competent jurisdiction.

In State v. Elkin, 177 La. 427, 148 So. 668, this Court had for consideration the constitutionality of a statute (Act 209 of 1914) declaring that failure to pay a worthless check within ten days after written notice to the drawer of its non-payment "shall be prima facie evidence of intent to defraud, within the meaning of this act," and held that the provision did not strip the accused of a presumption of innocence without due process of law, observing

> "In other words, under [Section 1] the statute, the guilty knowledge of the drawer that his check is worthless when issued constitutes fraudulent intent upon his part. The Legislature has declared that failure to pay the check, within ten days * * * shall be prima facie evidence of such guilty knowledge or fraudulent intent. There is nothing unreasonable or arbitrary in this clause of the statute. * * * The presumptive clause bears directly upon the guilty knowledge of the accused, and provides a rational relation between the fact proved and that presumed."

Also,

> "An accused person in this state is permitted to testify in his own behalf, and his testimony is weighed according to the rules of evidence applicable to other witnesses. The presumption of intent to defraud under the statute is prima facie and rebuttable and, therefore, does not deprive an accused of the opportunity to submit all the facts bearing upon the issue." (177 La. at 432.)

And in Yee Hem v. United States, 268 U. S. 178, 45 S. Ct. 470, 69 L. Ed. 904, the Court said:

> "Every accused person, of course, enters upon his trial clothed with the presumption of innocence. But that presumption may be overcome, not only by direct proof, but, in many cases, when the facts standing alone are not enough, by the additional weight of a countervailing legislative presumption."

The following, from an earlier pronouncement of the Court, was quoted approvingly:

> " 'Legislation providing that proof of one fact shall constitute prima facie evidence of the main fact in issue is but to enact a rule of evidence, and quite within the general power of government. Statutes, national and state, dealing with such methods of proof in both civil and criminal cases, abound, and the decisions upholding them are numerous. * * * 'That a legislative presumption of one fact from evidence of another may not constitute a denial of due process of law, or a denial of the equal protection of the law, it is only essential that there shall be some rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed, and that the inference of one fact from proof of another shall not be so unreasonable as to be a purely arbitrary mandate. So, also, it must not, under guise of regulating the presentation of evidence, operate to preclude the party from the right to present his defense to the main fact thus presumed.'" (69 L. Ed. at 906.)

While counsel oppose on numerous other grounds—i.e., that the Act is arbitrary, unreasonable and capricious; is so vague, general and indefinite in numerous instances as to be impossible of reasonable, fair and practical administration, etc.—we think that enough has been said to show that those objections are clearly without merit. And the argument that the statute creates undue burdens on interstate commerce and contravenes the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution is fully answered by the United States Supreme Court, when, in treating of a Pennsylvania statute creating a milk control board with authority to fix a minimum price to be paid producers (e.g. farmers), where a milk receiving plant within the state which purchased the commodity for shipment out of the state sought to justify its failure to comply with the statute's requirements by claiming that it was engaged in interstate commerce, the Court said:[21]

"* * * One of the commonest forms of state action is the exercise of the police power directed to the control of local conditions and exerted in the interest of the welfare of the state's citizens. Every state police statute necessarily will affect interstate commerce in some degree, but such a statute does not run counter to the grant of Congressional power merely because it incidentally or indirectly involves or burdens interstate commerce. This is so even though, should Congress determine to exercise its paramount power, the state law might thereby be restricted in operation. * * * The purpose of the statute under review obviously is to reach a domestic situation in the interest of the welfare of the producers and consumers of milk in Pennsylvania. Its provisions with respect to license, bond, and regulation of prices to be paid to producers are appropriate means to the ends in view. The question is whether the prescription of prices to be paid producers in the effort to accomplish these ends constitutes a prohibited burden on interstate commerce, or an incidental burden which is permissible until superseded by Congressional enactment. * * *"

Texas Antitrust Laws

Combinations and Conspiracies—Exclusive Dealing Under Texas Antitrust Laws—Legality of "Licensing" Agreement Where Patent Application Rejected.—Provisions of a "licensing" agreement (1) purporting to grant "exclusive permits" for the manufacture and sale of an alleged invention called a "window unit for doors" and (2) imposing numerous restrictions on the sale of the product were made illegal under the Texas antitrust laws by the Patent Office's rejection of the application for a patent and the absence of trade secrets. Among the restrictions imposed were agreements by the licensees to refrain from manufacturing or selling the product for five years after the termination of the licensing agreement, and to sell only on a "nonexclusive basis" through door manufacturers and building materials dealers.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2323.46, 2329.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Texas Antitrust Laws—Antitrust Illegality of "Licensing" Agreement as Defense to Partner's Accounting Action for Share of "Royalties."—A partner was not permitted to set up the antitrust illegality of a patent "licensing" agreement as a defense to his partner's accounting action for a share of the "royalty" payments received under the illegal agreement. The trial court concluded that the agreement was illegal and void under the Texas antitrust laws and that, since the partnership had "as one of its purposes the entering of an illegal licensing agreement," the plaintiff was not entitled to an accounting from his partner. While the licensing agreement was made illegal under the Texas antitrust laws by the fact that the Patent Office rejected the patent application (the "licensing" agreement purported to grant "exclusive permits" to manufacture and sell the alleged invention and imposed numerous sales restrictions), the reviewing court noted that the plaintiff was in the military service when the agreement was entered into, and had no knowledge of the rejection of the patent application. When the licensees discovered that the patent application had been rejected, they terminated the licensing agreement, in accordance with the terms of the agreement itself, but permitted the partnership to retain the royalty payments already made. Thus, the plaintiff could not justly claim any further royalties from the licensees. However, as between the partners themselves, there was a fiduciary relationship. The defendant could not, because of his own wrong against the licensees, refuse to do equity to his partner.

Dixon, Chief Justice [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: Willena Hall and Wilbert Hall, appellants here, plaintiffs in the trial court, on August 19, 1953 sued H. D. Hall, J. D. Hall, Jr., J. D. Hall, Sr., Don Hall, Robert Hall, The Visador Corporation, and the Visador Co., a partnership or joint stock association composed of J. D. Hall, Jr., Don Hall, Robert Hall, "and many others." The plaintiffs are mother and son. H. D. Hall is the father of Wilbert Hall and the divorced husband of Willena Hall. The other individual defendants are the grandfather, uncle, and cousins of Wilbert Hall.

The relationship of the parties is more easily understood after a study of the family tree, which we copy from appellants' brief:

J. D. Hall, Sr.	H. D. Hall	Wilbert Hall
	M. Wellena Hall (divorced 7-29-52)	Milton Hall (witness)
	J. D. Hall, Jr.	Don Hall
		Robert Hall

In their suit appellants seek an accounting and in the alternative, damages in the amount of $250,000.00 claimed to be due them in connection with alleged rights and royalties under the terms of a licensing agreement dated February 27, 1951 wherein Wilbert Hall is named as licensor and J. D. Hall, Jr., and J. D. Hall, Sr. are named as licensees. Though the instrument names only Wilbert Hall as licensor, appellants plead that at the time the agreement was executed Wilbert Hall and his father H. D. Hall were business partners and all rights as licensors really belonged to Wilbert Hall and his father H. D. Hall equally as partners. Willena Hall claims an interest under the terms of a judgment of divorce from H. D. Hall obtained by her in the District Court of Tarrant County, Texas, on July 29, 1952.

[Judgment Below]

After a trial without a jury judgment was rendered July 19, 1958 that appellants take nothing by their suit.

[Facts]

H. D. Hall had been in the lumber business. His son Wilbert Hall was an employee when he was not attending college. In 1948 a fire destroyed the business, leaving H. D. Hall heavily in debt. In 1949 H. D. Hall and his son Wilbert, then 22 years of age, formed a partnership, which was conducted in the name of Wilbert Hall alone because of the creditors of H. D. Hall. This partnership was operated in Fort Worth, Texas, under the name of "Doorlight Company". Its name was later changed to "The Visador Products Company".

[Application for Patent]

On March 23, 1950 an application for a patent was filed for the partnership, but in the name of Wilbert Hall, for an alleged invention called a window unit for doors, which in the application is described as follows:

> "This invention relates to a window unit designed for use in connection with hollow doors, the primary object of the invention being to provide a window in the form of a sliding panel which when moved to its open position, permits conversation between persons on the outside and inside of the door, without opening the door."

On August 4, 1950 Wilbert Hall was called into the military service. According to H. D. Hall the partnership business was thereupon "discontinued". According to Wilbert Hall he was merely on leave of absence from the partnership during his military services.

Following the departure of Wilbert Hall into the Navy, H. D. Hall set up a place of business in Irving, Texas. His other son, Milton Hall, claims to have been a partner with his father in this business. The claim is denied by H. D. Hall. Milton is not a party to this suit, but it was stipulated by the parties hereto that the Irving business of H. D. Hall is not involved in this litigation.

On January 8, 1951 Wilbert Hall executed a power of attorney to his father H. D. Hall, granting to H. D. Hall broad powers to act for and in behalf of Wilbert Hall. A second but similar power of attorney was later executed when the partnership name was changed to "The Visador Products Company".

[Application Rejected]

On January 9, 1951 the Patent Office rejected all claims made in the application for a patent for the window unit. Appellees contend that this amounted to a rejection of the application. Be that as it may, after the filing of an amended application the Patent Office on August 20, 1953 again denied all claims and marked its notice of rejection. "This rejection is FINAL."

[Basis of Suit—Licensing Contract]

On February 21, 1951 J. D. Hall, Sr. and J. D. Hall, Jr. entered into a five year licensing agreement with H. D. Hall acting for himself and by power of attorney for Wilbert Hall and their partnership. This is the contract which is the basis of appellants' suit. It recites that the application for patent for "Door Lights" is pending. Appellees were not aware of the fact that the Patent Office had already, under date of January 9, 1951, rejected all claims made in Wilbert Hall's application for a patent. H. D. Hall did not tell them of that fact. Appellees allege that they were induced to enter into the contract by H. D. Hall's representation that the patent would be granted.

[Exclusive License—Restrictions]

The licensing agreement is much too long to copy here, but it is necessary to notice some of its terms. It contains these provisions: licensees are granted an exclusive license to manufacture "The item" according to the invention in the territory comprising the "Continental U. S. A. only"; licensees are to pay licensor a stipulated royalty on each and every product manufactured under the terms of the agreement and according to the invention, including several types of door lights, and including also vents, and louvers; licensees agree to mark plainly every light made in accordance with licensor's trademark "Visador", and the patent pending, or patent numbers; licensees shall have the right to terminate and cancel the agreement at any time they so desire; but licensee agrees following termination not to manufacture or sell the products described in the contract for a period of five years following termination; licensees agree that articles manufactured must be sold on a "nonexclusive basis" through door manufacturers and building materials dealers only.

The licensees, J. D. Hall, Sr. and J. D. Hall, Jr., as partners under the name of Doorlite Company, began manufacturing and marketing the products described in the licensing contract. J. D. Hall, Sr. invested $40,000.00 capital in the business. The business prospered. During the latter part of its first year of operation the royalties paid were nearly $1,000 per month. Later a corporation was formed, "Visador Corporation," which took over the partnership business of licensees. Still later the corporation was dissolved and a partnership or joint stock company was formed and named "The Visador Company". The personnel of the reorganized company consisted of fifteen persons, members of the Hall family; some of whom were acting as trustees of other members of the family. The Company did a gross business of about $280,000.00 in 1952, $360,000.00 in 1953, $590,000.00 in 1954 and $800,000.00 in 1955.

Meantime H. D. Hall was having domestic trouble. On January 15, 1952 his wife, Willena Hall, one of the appellants herein sued him for divorce. H. D. Hall testified that he thereupon informed Willena Hall that the application for a patent had been denied, that J. D. Hall, Sr. and J. D. Hall, Jr. did not know of this fact, and if they discovered the truth (as they would, if she went through with her divorce), they would cancel the licensing agreement. H. D. Hall further testified that he urged his wife to abandon her divorce suit in order that he might continue to collect royalties. Willena Hall refused to discontinue her divorce action, so H. D. Hall soon thereafter confessed the facts to J. D. Hall, Jr.

[Cancellation Agreement]

Immediately upon learning that the patent application had been rejected, J. D. Hall, Jr. terminated the licensing contract. On January 21, 1952 a written cancellation agreement was entered into by H. D. Hall acting for himself, for Wilbert Hall, and for the H. D. Hall-Wilbert Hall partnership on the one hand, and J. D. Hall, Sr. and J. D. Hall, Jr. on the other hand.

[Royalties Retained]

This cancellation agreement recites that the consideration for the licensing contract had been the obtaining of a patent by Wilbert Hall, which consideration had wholly failed because of the denial of the application for the patent. Therefore in consideration of mutual releases, the licensing contract was declared null and void, and J. D. Hall, Sr. and J. D. Hall, Jr., their heirs and assigns, were released and discharged from all claims, past and future, in connection with the licensing agreement. It was further provided that Wilbert Hall, H. D. Hall and the Visador Products Company might retain all the money theretofore paid them whether or not paid under and by virtue of the licensing contract.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Appeal—Accounting Sought]

In their first, second, third and fourth points on appeal appellants in substance allege error on the part of the trial court in failing to hold that Wilbert Hall was entitled to an accounting from his father H. D. Hall for royalties actually paid to H. D. Hall for the partnership.

The application for a patent was filed March 23, 1950 in the name of Wilbert Hall only. However in the licensing agreement of February 27, 1951 the licensors are stated to be "Wilbert Hall and/or H. D. Hall and for the Visador Products Co., ..." Wilbert Hall testified that his father had a partnership interest in the application. The trial court found as a fact that the application was filed for the "H. D. Hall . . . Wilbert Hall partnership." Considerable sums of money were paid to H. D. Hall as royalties pursuant to said licensing contract. When the licensing contract was cancelled on January 21, 1952, the written cancellation agreement expressly provided that "Wilbert Hall, H. D. Hall and the Visador Products Company may have and retain whatever money or funds they have heretofore received . . . whether . . . paid them under and by virtue of the aforesaid contract or not." It is undisputed that there has not been an accounting between Wilbert Hall and H. D. Hall for the money so received by H. D. Hall for the partnership.

[Texas Antitrust Laws—Antitrust Illegality as Defense]

The trial court concluded that the licensing agreement violated the Texas Anti-Trust Laws and the common law rule against monopolies and was therefore void; and that the "partnership of Wilbert Hall and H. D. Hall having as one of its purposes the entering of an illegal licensing agreement, Wilbert Hall is not entitled to an accounting from his father."

It is our opinion that Wilbert Hall is entitled to an accounting from H. D. Hall; and that he is entitled to be paid by H. D. Hall his, Wilbert's, part of the payments received by H. D. Hall in behalf of the partnership, which money under an express provision in the cancellation agreement, might be retained by Wilbert Hall, H. D. Hall and the Visador Products Company.

It was not illegal for Wilbert Hall to enter into a partnership with his father in 1949. It was not illegal for him to file the application for a patent on the window unit in 1950. It was not illegal for him to execute the written power of attorney to his father on January 8, 1951, while he was in the military service. There are no pleadings and no evidence to show that Wilbert Hall knew when he filed the application for a patent that it would be denied. In fact the uncontradicted evidence is that neither Wilbert Hall nor his mother Willena Hall actually knew that the application had been denied until the divorce matter came up in 1952, at which time Wilbert Hall came home on a leave of absence. By that time the licensing contract of February 27, 1951 had already been entered into by H. D. Hall with J. D. Hall, Sr. and J. D. Hall, Jr.

Of course, H. D. Hall, acting for the partnership, knew at that time that the Patent Office on January 9, 1951 had rejected all claims under the application. And certainly constructive knowledge of this rejection could be imputed to Wilbert Hall as a partner of H. D. Hall. Nevertheless J. D. Hall, Sr. and J. D. Hall, Jr., the victims of H. D. Hall's fraud, chose to allow the Wilbert Hall—H. D. Hall partnership to keep the money paid to the partnership prior to the cancellation agreement of January 21, 1952.

The relationship between the two partners, Wilbert Hall and H. D. Hall, was fiduciary in nature. It does not lie in the mouth of H. D. Hall, who has obtained possession of the partnership's funds, to refuse to do equity to his partner, because of the wrong originally perpetrated by H. D. Hall on J. D. Hall, Sr. and J. D. Hall, Jr. The case of Wilbert Hall against H. D. Hall is made without going into the illegal transaction. H. D. Hall will not be permitted to set up the illegality of the licensing contract in order to defeat Wilbert Hall's recovery under his suit for an accounting. Lewis v. Davis, 145 Texas, 468, 199 S. W. 2d 146; Amer. Refining Co. v. Gasoline Products Co., 294 S. W. 967; Floyd v. Patterson, 72 Tex. 202, 10 S. W. 526; DeLeon v. Trevino, 49 Tex. 88; Brooks v. Martin, 69 U. S. 70, 17 L. Ed. 732; 10-A Tex. Jur. 288. Appellants' first, second, third and fourth points on appeal are sustained.

In their eighth point appellants say that the trial court erred in holding that the licensing contract was in violation of the Anti-Trust Statutes of the State of Texas, Arts. 7426 V. A. C. S. The licensing contract purported to grant exclusive permits to manufacture and sell the products named together with numerous restrictions pertaining to their sale. The rejection of the application for patent and the fact that trade secrets were not involved made these exclusive permits and restrictions objectionable under our Anti-Trust Statutes. Appellants' eighth point is overruled.

In their eleventh point appellants take the position that they are entitled to an accounting from appellees even if it be held that there is some provision in the licensing contract in violation of the Anti-Trust Statutes. We have already held that Wilbert Hall is entitled to an accounting from H. D. Hall for royalties actually paid to the partnership prior to cancellation, but is not entitled to any royalties thereafter. Mrs. Willena Hall had her property settlement with H. D. Hall upon obtaining her divorce on July 29, 1952. The royalty payments had been made to H. D. Hall before the divorce. The licensing contract had been cancelled and the payments had ceased before Willena Hall obtained her divorce. Neither of appellants may justly claim any royalty payments to be due following the cancellation of the licensing contract regardless of whether the contract contained provisions in violation of the Anti-Trust Statutes. Their eleventh point is overruled.

[Reversed in Part—Affirmed in Part]

The judgment of the trial court in favor of H. D. Hall that Wilbert Hall take nothing in his suit for accounting against H. D. Hall for royalties actually paid to H. D. Hall for Wilbert Hall—H. D. Hall partnership is reversed and the cause as between said parties, remanded for another trial.

The judgment in favor of appellees that appellants take nothing is affirmed except as otherwise held in the next preceding paragraph hereof.

Reversed and remanded in part, and affirmed in part.

[¶ 69,480] Eli Lilly and Company v. Sav-on Drugs, Inc.

In the Superior Court of New Jersey, Chancery Division, Union County. Civil Action, Docket No. C-2465-58. Decided September 29, 1959.

New Jersey Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Person Who May Maintain Suit—Foreign Corporation—Failure to Comply with "Qualification" Statute—"Doing Business"—Burden on Interstate Commerce.—An Indiana corporation engaged in the production of pharmaceutical products was not entitled to maintain a fair trade enforcement action in New Jersey because it had transacted business there without complying with the foreign corporation "qualification" provisions of the New Jersey Corporation Act. Under that statute, a foreign corporation "transacting business" in New Jersey cannot maintain an action "upon any contract made by it in this state" without first having obtained a "certificate that it is authorized to transact business in this state" from the New Jersey Secretary of State. The court, rejecting the plaintiff's contention that it was not transacting business in New Jersey, found that it maintained a local office and 18 "detailmen" who visited retailers, physicians, and hospitals "to acquaint them with the plaintiff's products." The plaintiff's fair trade contracts with New Jersey retailers were Indiana contracts, since they were subject to acceptance there. However, the defendant was a non-signer who was liable only because of the New Jersey Fair Trade Act, the sole basis for the suit. Thus, the court rejected the claim that the action was based on a tort, holding that the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant was based upon a contract made in New Jersey, created by the New Jersey Fair Trade Act as a result of contracts signed by others in New Jersey. Hence, the action against the non-signer was based on a New Jersey contract and the "qualification" statute was therefore applicable. Also, New Jersey has a "retaliatory" or "mutual spite" statute. Thus, because the Indiana corporation law bars both contract and tort actions by foreign corporations which have not "qualified" to do business there, the present action is barred in New Jersey.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

The court also rejected the plaintiff's contention that application of those regulatory provisions would impose a burden on interstate commerce which was forbidden by the "commerce clause" of the Federal Constitution. To hold that the simple requirements of the New Jersey "qualification" statute was a burden on interstate commerce, so as to exempt the plaintiff from its provisions, would be indulgence in an unwarranted legalism.

Fair Trade—Enforcement Action Against Noncontracting Retailer—Notice of Fair Trade Contract.—The fact that a retail drug company had not signed a fair trade contract was no defense to an action under the New Jersey Fair Trade Act where the retailer admitted having notice of the fact that the fair trader had such contracts in force in the state.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3258.32, 3268.32.

Fair Trade—Enforcement Action—Sales Which May Be Excepted from Price Restrictions—Repackaging—Failure to Remove Trademark.—It was doubtful if a retailer's alleged repackaging of fair trade products under its own name constituted a good defense to a fair trade enforcement action where a bottle marked in evidence disclosed that the fair trader's name and trademark appeared on the label. The retailer "was obviously seeking to gain the benefit of plaintiff's good will."

Opinion

[Fair Trade Enforcement by Foreign Corporation]

SCHERER, Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff is a corporation of the State of Indiana not authorized to transact business in the State of New Jersey. It does not have a certificate from the Secretary of State as required by N. J. S. 14:15-4: It filed the present suit to compel the defendant to comply with minimum prices fixed for the resale of plaintiff's products, in accordance with N. J. S. 56:4-3 et seq., generally known as the Fair Trade Act. The facts are substantially undisputed and appear in the affidavits filed by both parties.

[Fair Trade Contracts]

Plaintiff is one of the largest dealers of pharmaceutical products in this country, if not in the world, and its products are distributed throughout the United States and in foreign countries. Its office and principal place of business is in Indianapolis, Indiana. Plaintiff's products within the United States are sold to selected wholesale distributors and in interstate commerce. It is said that the business done in New Jersey represents 2.7% of its domestic sales. Plaintiff does not sell directly to the retail trade, but its products reach the retail trade through wholesale distributors. Plaintiff says that it leases no sales office, owns no real estate, and maintains no warehouse or other place of business in this state. Its products are "fair traded" in New Jersey under the above cited statute and it claims to have approximately 1500 contracts in effect in this state signed by retailers of its products, under which these retailers agree to maintain the minimum price structure fixed by plaintiff.

Defendant is a retail drug company with stores in Plainfield and Carteret. Defendant did not sign any contract, but it admits having notice of the fact that plaintiff has fair trade contracts in force and that it is, therefore, bound by the provisions of the Fair Trade Act, unless its other defenses are sustained. Even though a non-signer, defendant must maintain plaintiff's minimum price structure. N. J. S. 56:4-6; Lionel Corp. v. Grayson-Robinson Stores [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,717], 15 N. J. 191 (1954), appeal denied [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,877], 99 L. ed. 677, 348 U. S. 859 (1954).

[Trading Stamps]

prices fixed by it, in that in some instances, while selling at the minimum prices, it gave to its customers "S. & H. Green Cooperative Cash Discount Stamps," which are redeemable for merchandise, thus in effect lowering the prices of plaintiff's products below the minimum by the amount of the discount represented by the stamps. Whether this constitutes willfully and knowingly advertising or selling plaintiff's products at less than the prices stipulated by it—which defendant denies—need not be now decided. See E. R. Squibb & Sons and Eli Lilly Company v. Charline's Cut Rate, Inc. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,661], 9 N. J. Super. 328 (Ch. Div. 1950); Bristol-Myers Co. v. Picker [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,755], 96 N. E. 2d 177 (Ct. App. N. Y. 1950); Bristol-Myers Co. v. Lit Brothers, Inc. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,227], 6 A. 2d 843 (Sup. Ct., Pa. 1939); Weco Products Co. v. Mid-City Cut Rate Drug Stores [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,242], 131 P. 2d 856 (Dist. Ct. App., Cal. 1942); Sperry and Hutchinson Co. v. Margetts [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,747], 15 N. J. 203 (1954). Defendant is charged also with violating the minimum price structure by selling other products of the plaintiff below the minimum prices in cases where no stamps were given. Plaintiff originally applied for an interlocutory injunction (R. R. 4:67) to enjoin all sales by defendant below minimum prices until final hearing.

[Repackaging—Trademark Not Removed]

Defendant admitted the sales but denied that in an instance the sales were below minimum prices or that there were any willful and knowing sales below such prices, in violation of N. J. S. 56:4-6. With respect to the sales made of products other than those with which stamps were given, defendant states that it made up packages from bulk shipments and that the products of plaintiff were packaged under defendant's name and, therefore, they were exempt under the provisions of N. J. S. 56:4-5(1). It is doubtful that this constitutes a good defense because the bottle which was marked in evidence clearly disclosed that the plaintiff's name and trademark appeared on the label and defendant was obviously seeking to gain the benefit of plaintiff's good will. This may not be done. Johnson & Johnson v. Weissbard [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,159], 121 N. J. Eq. 585, 586 (E. & A. 1937).

The substantial defense interposed is that plaintiff, being a foreign corporation, was required as a condition precedent to transacting business in this state to file with the Secretary of State, under N. J. S. 14:15-3, a copy of its certificate of incorporation and a statement providing information required by that section, and, as a preliminary to instituting suit in this state "upon any contract made by it in this state," was required to obtain a certificate from the Secretary of State under N. J. S. 14:15-4. It is conceded that neither of the last cited sections has been complied with by the plaintiff.

Plaintiff's application for an interlocutory injunction was denied on the ground that its right to relief was not clear as a matter of law, in view of the above mentioned legal defenses. General Electric Co. v. Gem Vacuum Stores, 36 N. J. Super. 234 (App. Div. 1955); Wilentz v. Crown Laundry Service, Inc., 116 N. J. Eq. 40 (Ch. 1934); Allman v. United Brotherhood of Carpenters &c., 79 N. J. Eq. 150, 155 (Ch. 1911).

[New Jersey "Mutual Spite" Statutes]

The matter is now before the Court on defendant's motion to strike the complaint and for summary judgment on the ground that the plaintiff is transacting business in this state contrary to N. J. S. 14:15-3 and, being a foreign corporation, is precluded from bringing this action under N. J. S. 14:15-4. As an integral part of these defenses, the defendant urges the provisions of N. J. S. 14:15-5, where it is provided as follows:

> "14:15-5. Obligations imposed on domestic corporations doing business in foreign states imposed on foreign corporations.
> When, by the laws of any other state or nation, any other or greater taxes, fines, penalties, licenses, fees or other obligations or requirements are imposed upon corporations of this state, doing business in such other state or nation, or upon their agents therein, than the laws of this state impose upon their corporations or agents, doing business in this state, so long as such laws continue in force in such foreign state or nation, the same taxes, fines, penalties, licenses, fees obligations and requirements of whatever kind shall be imposed upon all corporations of such other state or nation doing business within this state and upon their agents here, but nothing herein shall be held to repeal any duty, condition or requirement now imposed by law upon such corporations of other states or nations transacting business in this state."

["Onerous" Requirements of Indiana Statute]

The State of Indiana has a similar statute, and the requirements of that state upon foreign corporations are much more onerous than those imposed by our statute. The Indiana statute (Burns Annotated Statutes of Indiana) provides:

"25-314: Penalties. No foreign corporation transacting business in this state without procuring a certificate of admission or, if such a certificate has been procured, after its certificate of admission has been withdrawn or revoked, shall maintain any suit or proceeding in any of the courts of this state upon any demand, whether arising out of contract or tort; and every such corporation so transacting business shall be liable by reason thereof to a penalty of not exceeding ten thousand ($10,000), to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction in an action to be begun and prosecuted by the attorney general in any county in which such business was transacted.

"If any foreign corporation shall transact business in this state without procuring a certificate of admission, or, if a certificate has been withdrawn or revoked, or shall transact any business not authorized by such certificate, such corporation shall not be entitled to maintain any suit or action at law or in equity upon any claim, legal or equitable whether arising out of contract or tort, in any court in this state; and it shall be the duty of the attorney general, upon being advised that any foreign corporation is so transacting business in this state, to bring action in the circuit or superior court of Marion County for an injunction to restrain it from transacting such unauthorized business and for the annulment of its certificate of admission, if one has been procured. * * *." (Emphasis supplied)

Plaintiff argues that it is not doing business in this state and that, even if it be held that it is, the above cited provisions of our Corporation Act do not apply to it because its goods are distributed solely in interstate commerce, thus exempting it from the provisions of any regulatory state statute of the kind above quoted, and that to apply to it the provisions of N. J. S. 14:15-3, 4 and 5 is to impose a burden upon interstate commerce which is forbidden by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution (United States Constitution, Article I, Sec. 8, Clause 3).

Plaintiff countered the motion to dismiss with a renewal of its motion for interlocutory injunction on the ground that, if the defendant's motion should be denied, then plaintiff's motion should be granted because then its right to relief as a matter of law would be clear, thus eliminating the reason for the original denial of its motion.

I.

["Doing Business"]

Is the plaintiff doing business in New Jersey? The facts in the affidavits filed in support of the respective motions differ in only one material respect. Defendant says that plaintiff's salesmen, or "detailmen" as plaintiff calls them, in New Jersey accept orders for the purchase of plaintiff's products, while plaintiff denies this to be true and says that, even though on occasions its representatives may receive an order for the purpose of transmitting the same to the wholesaler and that such orders are subject to acceptance or rejection by such wholesaler. In view of the result reached, this fact is immaterial, but it will be assumed that the plaintiff's statement is correct.

[Facts]

The facts are these: plaintiff maintains an office at 60 Park Place, Newark, New Jersey. Its name is on the door and on the tenant registry in the lobby of the building. (The September 1959 issue of the Newark Telephone Directory lists the plaintiff both in the regular section and in the classified section under "Pharmaceutical Products" as having an office at 60 Park Place, Newark.) The lessor of the space is plaintiff's employee, Leonard L. Audino, who is district manager in charge of its marketing division for the district known as Newark. Plaintiff is not a party to the lease, but it reimburses Audino "for all expenses incidental to the maintenance and operation of said office." There is a secretary in the office, who is paid directly by the plaintiff on a salary basis. There are eighteen "detailmen" under the supervision of Audino. These detailmen are paid on a salary basis by the plaintiff, but receive no commissions. Many, if not all of them, reside in the State of New Jersey. Whether plaintiff pays unemployment, or other taxes to the State of New Jersey is not stated. It is the function of the detailmen to visit retail pharmacists, physicians and hospitals in order to acquaint them with the products of the plaintiff with a view to encouraging the use of these products. Plaintiff contends that their work is "promotional and informational only." On an occasion, these detailmen, "as a service to the retailer," may receive an order for plaintiff's products for transmittal to a wholesaler. They examine the stocks and inventory of retailers and make recommendations to them relating to the supplying and merchandising of plaintiff's products. They also made available to retail druggists, free of charge, advertising and promotional material. When defendant opened its store in Carteret, plaintiff offered to provide, and did provide, announcements for mailing to the medical profession, without cost to defendant. The same thing occurred when defendant opened its Plainfield store. Plaintiff says that all of its fair trade contracts and orders for its products are subject to acceptance in Indiana, and therefore none of them constitutes a contract made, or order taken, in this state.

[Plaintiff's Contention]

Despite the above recited facts, plaintiff insists that it is not doing business in New Jersey. It concedes that, perhaps for the purpose of having service of process made upon it in a suit in which it is a defendant, it might conceivably be properly served within this state. But, it says that, although it may be subject to the jurisdiction of the state courts and amenable to service of process therein when it is sued, it is not subject to the statute regulating foreign corporations or prescribing the conditions of their doing business in that state. 146 A. L. R. 942. The difference, it is claimed, is ascribable to the fact that the power of a state to subject a foreign corporation engaged in interstate commerce to local regulations is limited and restricted by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. On this subject, more hereafter.

[No Statutory Definition]

The New Jersey Corporation Act does not define "transacting any business" in this state. Our Supreme Court, in A & M Trading Corp. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 13 N. J. 516 (1953), quoting with approval from Yedway v. M. A. Richards Corp., 137 N. J. L. 448 (Sup. Ct. 1948), observed that doing business is a term that is not susceptible of precise definition automatically resolving every case, and that each case turns upon its own circumstances.

To hold under the facts above recited that plaintiff is not doing business in New Jersey is to completely ignore reality. A corporation thus acting within this state should not be permitted to take advantage of the laws of this state which promote its business, such as the Fair Trade Act (which is the sole basis for this suit), and yet not comply with reasonable regulatory provisions of our Corporation Act. As is noted in 146 A. L. R. 957, where this subject is discussed in detail, many corporations selling products in the several states act, with a studied purpose, to avoid the necessity of conforming to state laws or becoming subject to service of process. Thew Shovel Co. v. Superior Ct., 95 P. 2d 149 (App. Ct., Cal. 1939).

Most of the cases in which the question of whether a corporation is or is not doing business in a particular state has arisen are those in which service of process was attempted to be made upon a foreign corporation or a tax was sought to be assessed. See Miklos v. Liberty Coach Co., 48 N. J. Super. 591 (App. Div. 1958); International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U. S. 310, 90 L. ed. 95 (1945); McGee v. International Life Ins. Co., 355 U. S. 220, 2 L. ed. 2d 223 (1957); A & M Trading Corp. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra; Westerdale v. Kaiser-Frazer Corp., 6 N. J. 571 (1951). The present case is the converse of those cited. Here, the plaintiff seeks not to avoid service, but to be permitted to sue.

If, as stated in the Miklos case (quoting from the International Shoe Co. case), at p. 598,

> "that in order to subject a foreign corporation to a judgment in personam, if it be not present within the territory of the forum, it have 'certain minimum contacts with (the forum) such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice,"' "

so the plaintiff here, in the interest of fair play and substantial justice, should not object to complying with the requirements of the Corporation Act and securing a certificate to do business here, thus enabling it to maintain its suit. This, however, the plaintiff refuses to do. It has been held that such a certificate is secured timely if taken out pending an action. Lehigh, &c., Co. v. Atlantic S. & R. Works, 92 N. J. Eq. 131, 148 (Ch. 1920). It has been stated that the effect of the International Shoe Co. case was to establish a rule that, where a foreign corporation is present within the state, the court looks not only to the regulatory (sic), continuity and extent of the corporate activity within the state, but also to whether the cause of action asserted resulted from the corporate activity within the state and the convenience to the parties. Fletcher, Corporations, Sec. 8713.1, pp. 419-420.

Plaintiff cites Remington Arms Co. v. Lechmere Tire & Sales Co., [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,347], 158 N. E. 2d 134 (Sup. Jud. Ct., Mass. 1959), as an example of a case where a foreign corporation, under facts quite similar to those here, was held not to be doing business in Massachusetts and was not required to secure a certificate to do business as a condition precedent to securing relief under the local Fair Trade Act. The suit was started under the Massachusetts Fair Trade Act, and the defenses here interposed were there set up, but overruled. Plaintiff was granted an injunction. The Massachusetts court held that Remington was not doing business within that state and had a right to use the facilities of the Massachusetts courts. Significantly, however, the court said, at p. 138, that its findings were based upon earlier decisions and that it had not been asked to reconsider those in the light of subsequent United States Supreme Court decisions broadening the scope of local regulations, dealing with foreign corporations. It would appear, therefore, that, if this precise point had been been argued, the result might have been different.

[Plaintiff was "Doing Business" in State]

Applying the tests set forth in the cited authorities to the undisputed evidence disclosed by the affidavits, the conclusion is inescapable that the plaintiff was in fact doing business in this state at the time of the acts complained of and was required to, but did not, comply with the provisions of the Corporation Act.

II.

Plaintiff contends that it is excepted from any requirement to comply with foreign corporation provisions of our Corporation Act because it is engaged entirely in interstate commerce, and that it is unlawful for any state to impose such regulations upon interstate commerce as will constitute a burden thereon.

Not all state regulations affecting foreign corporations constitute a burden upon interstate commerce, thereby rendering them unconstitutional. General Electric Co. v. Packard Bamberger & Co., [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,643], 14 N. J. 209, 221 (1953). The regulation is only unlawful if it materially restricts the free flow of commerce across state lines. In Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona, 325 U. S. 761, 89 L. ed. 1915, 1925 (1945), the court said:

> "* * * There has thus been left to the states wide scope for the regulation of matters of local state concern, even though it in some measure affects the commerce, provided it does not materially restrict the free flow of commerce across state lines, or interfere with it in matters with respect to which uniformity of regulation is of predominant national concern."

Plaintiff relies heavily for support of its argument on International Text Book Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S. 81, 54 L. ed. 678 (1910). There, the court struck down a Kansas statute requiring a foreign corporation to secure a certificate to do business as a condition precedent to instituting suit. A comparison of the Kansas statute with ours will show that the requirements of that statute were much more onerous than those in our statute. It is interesting to note, also, that the court did not specifically pass upon the requirement that the corporation have a certificate before instituting suit, but held that, since this section of the statute was so connected with the other sections held unconstitutional as to be inseparable, it, too, had to fall. The court went on to say, at p. 687:

> "* * * How far a corporation of one state is entitled to claim in another state, where it is doing business, equality of treatment with individual citizens in respect of the right to sue and defend in the courts, is a question which the exigencies of this case do not require to be definitely decided. * * *."

This case was followed by our former Supreme Court in Federal Schools, Inc. v. Sidden, 14 N. J. Misc. 892 (1936), but the decision in that case rested not upon any alleged illegal interference with interstate commerce, but upon the fact that the contract sued upon, being one made outside of New Jersey, was not interdicted by the provisions of then Section 98 of the Corporation Act (now N. J. S. 14:15-4).

The trend and philosophy of the more recent cases has been in favor of upholding, rather than striking down, reasonable state regulations of foreign corporations. This is illustrated by the very recent case of Portland Cement Co. v. Minnesota, 3 L. ed. 2d 421, 79 S. Ct. (1959), in upholding a state income tax imposed upon a foreign corporation. In sustaining the right of a state to exact an income tax from a foreign corporation upon that portion of its profits derived from activities within the state, the court said, at p. 429:

> "* * * While it is true that a State may not erect a wall around its borders preventing commerce an entry, it is axiomatic that the founders did not intend to immunize such commerce from carrying its fair share of the costs of the state government in return for the benefits it derives from within the State. * * *."

As early as 1908, the Supreme Court, in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Texas, 52 L. ed. 1031, 210 U. S. 217 (1908), said:

> "It being once admitted, as of course it must be, that not every law that affects commerce among the states is a regulation of it in a constitutional sense, nice distinctions are to be expected. Regulation and commerce among the states both are practical rather than technical conceptions, and, naturally, their limits must be fixed by practical lines. * * *."

If the levying of an income tax on the business of a foreign corporation which is generated within a state is not a burden upon interstate commerce, how can it be said that a simple regulatory statute, such as the cited sections of our Corporation Act, can impose a burden upon interstate commerce?

It must also be borne in mind that the cause of action here sued upon arises only because of the provisions of our Fair Trade Act. Such contract as the plaintiff relies upon would be illegal except for the provisions of that statute. General Electric Co. v. Packard Bamberger & Co., supra. Can it be said that there is anything unfair about requiring a foreign corporation, which seeks to take advantage of a cause of action given it by one of our laws, to comply with the provisions of the other as a condition to taking advantage of the other statutes? To pose the question is to suggest the answer.

[Reasonableness of "Qualification" Statutes]

In the General Electric Co., case, the court said that, although the power of Congress over interstate commerce may be exclusive as to a direct statutory regulation of interstate commerce as such, the states are authorized under pertinent decisions of the United States Supreme Court (citing cases) to enact regulations which affect all business done in the state, if such regulations are reasonable and not burdensome to interstate commerce. The simple requirements of our Corporation Act are reasonable and cannot be called burdensome. To hold that these regulations constitute such a burden upon interstate commerce as to exempt the plaintiff from the provisions thereof is to indulge in an unwarranted legalism.

The cases of Seagram Distillers Company v. Corenswet [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,108], 281 S. W. 2d 657 (Sup. Ct., Tenn. 1955); State v. Ford Motor Co., 38 S. E. 2d 242 (Sup. Ct., S. C. 1946); Bulova Watch Co. v. Anderson [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,036], 70 N. W. 2d 243 (Sup. Ct., Wis. 1955), cited by plaintiff in support of its position, have been examined, and the holdings there do not require any change in the result here reached.

III.

[State Where Contract Made]

Finally, it is argued that the provisions of N. J. S. 14:15-4 do not apply because that section precludes the maintaining of an action in this state only "upon any contract made by it (the foreign corporation) in this state." Admittedly, the 1500 contracts made by plaintiff with its retailers are Indiana contracts, since they were subject to acceptance there, and it is said that the orders received for plaintiff's products are likewise subject to acceptance in Indiana.

That this statute is ordinarily limited to contracts made in this state has been held in several cases. Federal Schools, Inc. v. Sidden, supra (and the numerous cases therein cited); Protective Finance Corp. v. Glass, 100 N. J. L. 85 (Sup. Ct. 1924); Lehigh, &c., Co. v. Atlantic S. & R. Works, supra. None of these cases was a suit upon a cause of action arising only out of one of our statutes. Also, this argument does not take into consideration the provisions of N. J. S. 14:15-5 (sometimes referred to as a "mutual spite" or "retaliatory" statute). Most states, including, as above noted, Indiana, have such statutes.

[Nature of Action As to Non-signer—Tort or Contract]

The Indiana statute bars suits arising out of contract, as well as tort, whether such actions are at law or in equity. Plaintiff argues that its action is one in tort and therefore not precluded by the Corporation Act. It would seem, however, that the action is one on contract because, while the defendant is a non-signer of a fair trade contract, it is liable under the statute since other persons have signed such contracts. Non-signers have been held to be bound to the same degree as signers. See Old Dearborn D. Co. v. Seagram-Distil. Corp. [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,141], 299 U. S. 183, 81 L. ed. 109 (1936); Lionel Corp. v. Grayson-Robinson Stores, supra.

Quaere: Under these circumstances, is not the relationship of the plaintiff and the defendant one of a contract made in the State of New Jersey, created by the Fair Trade Act as a result of the signing of other contracts by persons in New Jersey?

N. J. S. 14:15-5 was discussed in Ex-Cell-o Corp. v. Farmers Coop., Dairies Ass'n., 28 N. J. Super. 159 (App. Div. 1953), but its provisions were not applied because the defense was first raised on appeal, and not below. That opinion indicates — without stating reasons—that this may be a disfavored defense. But, when timely raised, as here, it should not be so considered. No valid reason is given by plaintiff why the provisions of the statute should not be applied, except the argument concerning interstate commerce heretofore disposed of. In Babe Kaufman Music Corp. v. Mandia, 127 N. J. Eq. 480 (Ch. 1940), this defense was interposed and the court, after reviewing the retaliatory provisions of the New York Corporation Law—the plaintiff being a corporation of New York—refused to enforce the contract.

[Action Barred]

While it is clear that the provisions of N. J. S. 14:15-4 apply, and that the relationship between plaintiff and defendant is based upon a contract made in this state by virtue of the Fair Trade Act, it is also clear that the provisions of N. J. S. 14:15-5 are applicable and, based upon the retaliatory provisions of the Indiana statute, the plaintiff's suit is barred. The plaintiff's application for an interlocutory injunction, therefore, is denied.

[Summary Judgment]

Since the affidavits disclose palpably that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact, the defendant is entitled to a summary judgment dismissing the complaint, with costs. R. R. 4:58-3; Frank Rizzo, Inc. v. Alatsas, 27 N. J. 400, 405 (1958).

A judgment may be presented in accordance with these conclusions.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Participation in Trade Association Activities.—A concrete pipe manufacturer was prohibited by a consent decree from being a member of or participating in the activities of any association of manufacturers of such pipe with knowledge that the activities are in violation of the decree.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2017.121; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Boycotts.—A concrete pipe manufacturer was prohibited by a consent decree from entering into any plan or program to boycott or otherwise refuse to do business with any person.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.533; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.720.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Allocation of Markets.—A concrete pipe manufacturer was prohibited by a consent decree from (1) suggesting to any other concrete pipe manufacturer the customers, areas, or towns and cities in or to which concrete pipe is or is not to be sold or offered for sale by such other manufacturer or (2) entering into any agreement with any other concrete pipe manufacturer or association to allocate customers, territories, or markets for the sale of concrete pipe.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Exclusive Use of Machinery.—A manufacturer of concrete pipe manufacturing machinery was prohibited by a consent decree from granting exclusive use of such machinery to a concrete pipe manufacturer and the latter was prohibited from securing these exclusive rights.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Restraints on Product Use.—A firm engaged in manufacturing concrete pipe manufacturing machinery was prohibited by a consent decree from entering into or continuing in effect any agreement with any concrete pipe manufacturer which would restrain such manufacturer's use or disposition of such machinery after purchase.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Consent Decree—Permissive Provisions—Bona Fide Negotiations and Joint Bidding.—A concrete pipe manufacturer was permitted (a) to enter into negotiations concerning bona fide sales to other concrete pipe manufacturers and (b) to participate with any other concrete pipe manufacturer in a joint venture agreement whereby a single bid is submitted and the assets of the parties are combined for the performance of the contract where each party could not singly bid on or perform the contract.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8321.48.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Consent Decree—Specific Relief—Determination of New Prices.—A concrete pipe manufacturer was directed to determine prices for concrete pipe based on its own manufacturing and overhead costs, the margin of profit individually desired, and other lawful considerations and to put such independently determined prices into effect in place of its prevailing prices. However, the manufacturer was not prohibited from deviating from, modifying, or otherwise changing such prices for the purpose of meeting competition, reducing excessive inventory, or for other lawful business reasons.

Final Judgment

BAILEY ALDRICH, Circuit Judge [In full text]: The plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on June 28, 1957, and the defendants New England Concrete Pipe Corporation and Concrete Pipe Machinery Company, having appeared herein, and the plaintiff and said defendants, by their respective attorneys, having severally consented to the entry of this Final Judgment without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and without this Final Judgment constituting evidence or admission by plaintiff or such defendants in respect of any such issue;

Now, Therefore, before any testimony or evidence has been taken herein, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and upon the consent of the plaintiff and New England Concrete Pipe Corporation and Concrete Pipe Machinery Company, it is hereby Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed as follows:

I

[Sherman Act]

The Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter herein and of the parties signatory hereto. The complaint states claims upon which relief may be granted against defendants New England and Concrete Machinery under Sections 1 and 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, as amended.

II

[Definitions]

As used in this Final Judgment:

(A) "Person" means any individual, partnership, firm, association, corporation or other legal or business entity;

(B) "Concrete pipe manufacturer" means a person engaged in the business of manufacturing concrete pipe;

(C) "Concrete pipe" means concrete sewer pipe or concrete drain culvert pipe, plain or reinforced, or both of them;

(D) "New England" means defendant New England Concrete Pipe Corporation, with its principal place of business in Newton, Massachusetts;

(E) "Concrete Machinery" means defendant Concrete Pipe Machinery Company, with its principal place of business in Sioux City, Iowa.

[Applicability of Judgment]

The provisions of this Final Judgment applicable to a defendant signatory hereto shall apply also to its officers, agents, servants, employees, subsidiaries, successors and assigns, and to all persons in active concert or participation with such defendant who shall have received actual notice of this Final Judgment by personal service or otherwise.

IV

[Cost Information]

New England is enjoined and restrained from collecting from or circulating, reporting or recommending to any concrete pipe manufacturer any costs or averaged costs of manufacture or sale of concrete pipe or any formulae for computing any such costs.

V

[Pricing Practices]

New England is enjoined and restrained from:

(A) Urging, influencing or suggesting, or attempting to urge, influence or suggest, to any other concrete pipe manufacturer any price, bid, quotation, or other term or condition to be used by such other manufacturer or manufacturers in the sale of concrete pipe;

(B) Entering into, adhering to, maintaining or claiming any right under any contract, combination, agreement, understanding, plan or program with any other concrete pipe manufacturer or manufacturers or any association or central agency of or for such manufacturers to fix, determine, establish or maintain prices, bids, quotations, pricing methods, discounts or other terms or conditions of sale of concrete pipe to be used by New England or by such other manufacturer or manufacturers;

(C) Circulating to, or exchanging with any concrete pipe manufacturer any price list or price quotations applicable to concrete pipe in advance of the publication, circulation or communication of such price lists or price quotations to its customers generally;

(D) Circulating, exchanging or using in any manner, any price list or purported price list or making any bid, containing or purporting to contain any prices or terms or conditions for the sale of concrete pipe which had been agreed upon or established by agreement between two or more concrete pipe manufacturers;

(E) Disclosing to or exchanging with any other concrete pipe manufacturer or manufacturers the amount or other terms or conditions of any concrete pipe bid by New England or by such other manufacturer or manufacturers in advance of the filing of such bids; and

(F) Being a member of, contributing anything of value to, or participating in the activities of any association or central agency for concrete pipe manufacturers with knowledge that the activities are in violation of any of the provisions of this Final Judgment.

VI

[Allocation of Markets—Boycotts]

New England is enjoined and restrained from:

(A) Urging, influencing or suggesting, or attempting to urge, influence or suggest to any other concrete pipe manufacturer the customers, areas or towns and cities, in or to which concrete pipe is to be sold or offered for sale or in or to which concrete pipe is not to be sold or offered for sale by such other manufacturer;

(B) Entering into, adhering to, maintaining or claiming any right under any contract, combination, agreement, understanding, plan or program with any other concrete pipe manufacturer or manufacturers or any association or central agency of or for such manufacturer or manufacturers to allocate customers, territories or markets for the sale of concrete pipe;

(C) Entering into, adhering to, maintaining or enforcing any contract, agreement, understanding, plan or program to boycott or otherwise refuse to do business with any person.

[Determination of New Prices]

New England is ordered and directed, not later than sixty (60) days following the date of the entry of this Final Judgment, individually and independently (1) to review its then prevailing prices for concrete pipe, (2) to determine prices for concrete pipe based on its own manufacturing and overhead costs, the margin of profit individually desired and other lawful considerations, and (3) in place of its then prevailing prices, to establish the prices determined under (2) above, which prices shall become effective not later than one hundred and fifty (150) days following the date of the entry of this Final Judgment. Nothing contained herein shall prevent New England from deviating from, modifying or otherwise changing the price list as established herein, for the purpose of meeting competition, reducing excessive inventory, or for other lawful business reasons.

VIII

[Permissive Provision]

Nothing contained in the provisions of Sections V, VI and VII above shall be deemed (1), to invalidate, prohibit or restrain bona fide negotiations between New England and any other concrete pipe manufacturer or manufacturers concerning bona fide sales to one another, or (2), to enjoin New England from entering into, participating in, or maintaining with any other concrete pipe manufacturer or with any one acting for or in behalf of any other concrete pipe manufacturer, a joint venture agreement whereby a single bid will be submitted and the assets and facilities of each of the parties thereto will be combined for the sale and installation of concrete pipe of such monetary value or in such quantities that each party to the joint venture could not singly bid on or perform the contract. Provided, however, that such joint ventures shall not be used or permitted to circumvent or evade any of the other provisions of this Final Judgment or to implement other activities in derogation thereof.

IX

[Exclusive Use by Purchaser]

New England is enjoined and restrained from:

(A) Asserting, or threatening to assert, any rights to the exclusive use of any pipemaking machinery in any designated area under (1) a contract dated May 31, 1927, between McCracken Machinery Company of Sioux City, Iowa and G. S. Rutherford of Painesville, Ohio, (2) a contract dated September 26, 1934 between P. A. Lucy, Receiver of McCracken Machinery Company of Iowa and New England; and (3) a contract dated February 15, 1936 between Concrete Machinery and New England;

(B) Entering into or continuing in effect any other agreement or contract with Concrete Machinery or any other manufacturer of concrete pipemaking machinery having the purpose or effect of securing to New England the exclusive use of any concrete pipemaking machinery in any designated area.

X

[Cancellation of Exclusive Use Contracts]

New England and Concrete Machinery are ordered and directed to cancel forthwith the contracts described in Section IX(A) herein and to file with this Court, and with the plaintiff, a report setting forth the fact and manner of their compliance with this Section X.

XI

[Granting Exclusive Use—Restrictions on Use]

Concrete Machinery is enjoined from entering into or continuing in effect any contract or agreement with any concrete pipe manufacturer having the purpose or effect of (1) securing to such manufacturer the exclusive use of any concrete pipemaking machinery in any designated area within the New England States; or (2) restraining such manufacturer's use or disposition of any pipemaking machinery after purchase of such machinery from Concrete Machinery; Provided, however, that this Section XI shall not be deemed to prohibit Concrete Machinery, until payment therefor is completed, from restricting the movement or substitution of parts of machinery sold by conditional sales contract or chattel mortgage.

For the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to New England and Concrete Machinery made to its principal office, be permitted, subject to any legally-recognized privilege, (a) reasonable access, during the office hours of such defendants, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of such defendants, relating to any of the matters contained in this Final Judgment, and (b) subject to the reasonable convenience of such defendants, and without restraint or interference, to interview officers and employees of such defendants who may have counsel present, regarding such matters. Upon such written request of the Attorney General, or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, New England and Concrete Machinery shall submit such written reports with respect to any of the matters contained in this Final Judgment as from time to time may be necessary for the purpose of enforcement of this Final Judgment. No information obtained by the means permitted in this Section XII shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Executive Branch of the plaintiff except in the course of legal proceedings for the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment in which the United States is a party or as otherwise required by law.

XIII

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction of this Court is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this Final Judgment to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this Final Judgment, for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith, and punishment of violations thereof.

[¶ 69,482] United States v. McDonough Co., et al.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, Eastern Division. Criminal No. 7368. Dated October 13, 14, and 15, 1959.

Case No. 1429 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Defendant's Plea of Nolo Contendere—Sentences—Jail Terms and Fines.—In a criminal action charging five corporations and four of their officers with conspiring to fix the prices of hand tools, the court accepted the defendants' pleas of nolo contendere on the recommendation of the Government. The court noted that it never looked with favor upon such pleas, and that of all of the factors that could be taken into consideration, the paramount one was whether the public interest would be better served by the acceptance or rejection of the pleas. From the Government's statement that it saw no public harm by the acceptance of the pleas, the court assumed that the public interest would be better served by the acceptance of the pleas. The court noted that if the Government were of the opinion that the public interest would be better served by the rejection of the pleas, it would reject such pleas. The defendants, according to the court, stand before it as if they had pleaded guilty.

Although the court accepted the Government's recommendations as to the amount that each of the defendants should be fined ($20,000 as to three of the corporations, $15,000 as to two of the corporations, and $5,000 as to the individual defendants), it ruled that a fine in a case of this character was not a sufficient deterring factor to cause others who might contemplate violating the Sherman Act and those who were involved in the instant case from committing further violations, and, therefore, the individuals should be sentenced to ninety days in jail, as a further deterrent factor. The court noted that there was no difference between a plea of nolo contendere and a plea of guilty insofar as punishment is concerned, and that it "has no sympathy with the argument that this is a first case" in which jail sentences were imposed on a plea of nolo contendere because it did not "think the Congress would have put jail sentence in the statute if they didn't intend for a court to use it if it thought it was proper." In determining the sentences, the court considered the background and participation of each of the defendants in the alleged conspiracy. The court granted a stay of execution for a period of thirty days to enable the individual defendants to arrange their affairs and to permit the reception of evidence as to whether or not incarceration would endanger the life of an individual defendant because of his physical condition.

The Court [MELL G. UNDERWOOD, District Judge, In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: United States of America v. McDonough Co., et al., Criminal No. 7368.

Mr. McCareins: The Government is ready for trial, Your Honor.

The Court: I understand the defendants are also ready.

This matter is before the Court upon the propriety of accepting a plea of nolo contendere in this case on behalf of each defendant. The Court has never looked with favor upon such pleas. At the hearing on October 5 the Government stated it did not oppose the acceptance of these pleas.

Of all the factors that may be taken into consideration, the paramount one is whether the public interest will be better served by acceptance or rejection of the pleas. However, the Government has not gone on record as opposing the acceptance of these pleas. Does the Assistant United States Attorney General desire to be heard further upon that question at this time?

Mr. McCareins: Just except for one statement. I am authorized to state that under all the circumstances of this case—briefs have been served on us, which I assume the Court has seen?

The Court: The Court has examined the briefs.

Mr. McCareins: —that the Government deems it appropriate that the Court accept these pleas. Now, I assume that implicit in that is that no harm will be done to the public interest by the acceptance of the plea.

The Court: If I understand you correctly, Mr. McCareins, you are indicating to the Court that the public interest would be better served by acceptance of these pleas, is that correct?

Mr. McCareins: I don't want to seem to be quibbling. I prefer to put it the other way, that we see no public harm. I understand the determination was made when the Government changed its position and concluded not to oppose the pleas, that implicit in that determination was that there would not be public injury.

The Court: That was the thought in the mind of the Court. In other words, since the Government does not oppose the acceptance of these pleas the Court must assume that the Government, while aware of the factors the Court must consider and especially the paramount factor of public interest, has concluded upon information available to it that the—and your statement—that the public interest would be better served by accepting these pleas than by rejection. For the Court to assume otherwise would require the Court to view the Government's position as inconsistent. That is, stating to the Court on the one hand that it does not oppose acceptance of the pleas, while believing on the other that the public interest would be better served by rejection. Surely the Government is not in this position. And, I think from your statement, although you haven't made it quite clear to the Court, that the Court has a right to assume that the public interest would be better served.

Mr. McCareins: Because of our interest in these cases generally, of which this is only one, that we would like to make it clear, of course, this is not affecting other cases and it is based upon the particular circumstances of this case. There is no general change in policy.

The Court: The Court may say to you at this time if the Government were of the opinion, based upon information and the evidence gathered by it in investigating and preparing this case, that the public interest would be better served by rejection of these pleas and would so state, then the Court would reject the pleas. But, I do not so understand you.

Mr. McCareins: That is right. We don't make such a statement.

The Court: Does counsel for the defendants desire to be heard further at this time?

Mr. Ford: I believe not, if the Court please.

Mr. Dean: No, Your Honor.

The Court: A motion has been made to the Court to withdraw the not guilty pleas entered in this case and to enter a plea of nolo contendere, is that correct, on behalf of each of the defendants?

Mr. Ford: Yes, sir.

Mr. Dean: Yes, sir.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, sir.

Mr. McDonough: Yes, sir.

Mr. Taft: Yes, sir.

The Court: In view of the statement of the Assistant Attorney General representing the Department of Justice made at a previous hearing, and particularly the statement made this morning to the effect that the public interest would perhaps be better served by acceptance of the pleas than by their rejection, the Court, although as indicated a moment ago never looking with favor upon such pleas, is inclined to follow the recommendations of the Department of Justice and accept the pleas of nolo contendere in each individual case; that is, on behalf of the corporation and on behalf of the defendants.

Mr. McCareins: Yes, sir.

The Court: Are all the defendants in court?

Mr. Dean: Yes, Your Honor.

Mr. Ford: They are, Judge.

The Court: The Court will hear the United States Attorney.

Mr. Eisen: May it please the Court, the Government—

The Court: Just one moment. I am quite sure that able counsel representing all of the defendants understand the effect of a plea of nolo contendere. For all purposes insofar as penalties are concerned it is in effect a plea of guilty before the Court. Do you so understand, in this particular case?

Go ahead.

The Court: Now, you have made certain recommendations to the Court. This is a criminal case. The Court wants to know something specifically about the background and participation of each of these defendants in this conspiracy. I wish you would take them up individually and be specific and advise the Court fully what their conduct was and what their participation was in the conspiracy.

Mr. Eisen: With regard to the individuals and the corporations?

The Court: And the corporations. In other words, the Court is desirous of knowing whether or not there is any difference in culpability of these defendants or whether they were all equally participating. Now, Mr. McCareins gave the Court some background but I don't think he discussed the individual defendants in his previous statement. Did you?

Mr. Eisen: With the Court's permission I would like to defer to Mr. McCareins now since he is most familiar with these specific individuals.

The Court: I wish you would tell me all about the case, Mr. McCareins. That is more important to this Court than the recommendation about fines, because the statute does also carry a jail sentence.

[Indictment]

The Court: Have counsel for the Government and counsel for the defendants completed your statements to the Court?

Mr. McCareins: Yes, sir, we have, Your Honor.

The Court: Is there anything further?

Mr. Ford: Yes, sir, if the Court please.

The Court: Does counsel for the defendants desire to be heard further on behalf of the individual defendants who were indicted and entered a plea of nolo contendere?

Mr. Ford: No, if the Court please.

The Court: This indictment returned by the grand jury charges among other things that

> "For many years past, the exact date being to the grand jurors unknown, and continuing up to and including the date of the return of this indictment, the defendants named herein and others to the grand jurors unknown have engaged in a combination and conspiracy to fix prices and to eliminate competition in the sale of hand tools in unreasonable restraint of the aforesaid interstate trade and commerce in hand tools, in violation of Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled 'An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' as amended, 26 Stat. 209 Section 15 of the United States Criminal Code 1, commonly known as the Sherman Act."

It charges among other things that

"the combination and conspiracy herein charged has consisted of a continuing agreement, understanding, and concert of action among the defendants and others to the grand jurors unknown, the substantial terms of which have been and are that they agree:

(a) To fix and maintain uniform and non-competitive prices for hand tools sold by the corporate defendants;

(b) To hold meetings periodically for the purpose of discussing, arriving at and establishing uniform and non-competitive prices for hand tools sold by the corporate defendants;

(c) To exchange price lists and information affecting prices in advance of their publication to the trade;

(d) To standardize specifications and establish uniform grades for hand tools manufactured by the corporate defendants;

(e) To adopt and maintain a uniform system of discounts, due dates, and terms and conditions of sale in billing jobbers and distributors for hand tools purchased from the corporate defendants; and

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

(f) To adopt and maintain uniform basing points, shipping terms, and freight charges and allowances;

(g) To establish and maintain uniform and noncompetitive suggested jobber and distributor resale prices for hand tools and to require their respective jobbers and distributors to adhere to such resale prices in selling hand tools;

(h) To supervise their respective jobbers and distributors in submitting bids to users of hand tools who purchase their requirements by inviting bids thereon, to prescribe the prices and terms to be quoted in such bids by their said jobbers and distributors, and to require their said jobbers and distributors to adhere to such prices and terms of sale."

The indictment further charges that

"In effecting and carrying out the aforesaid combination and conspiracy, the defendants by agreement and concert of action have done the things which as hereinbefore alleged they have conspired and agreed to do.

"The effects of the aforesaid combination and conspiracy, among other things, have been and are:

(a) To restrain the aforesaid interstate commerce in the sale of hand tools by eliminating price competition in the sale thereof;

(b) To deprive purchasers of hand tools of the benefits of free and open competition in the sale thereof;

(c) To increase the price of hand tools sold in interstate commerce."

[Effect of Nolo Contendere Pleas]

Now, with the approval of the Department of Justice and the recommendation of the Department of Justice, in effect, to the Court, the Court has permitted the defendants to enter a plea of nolo contendere to this indictment, which for all purposes and effects is a plea of guilty, as able and learned counsel well understand. The only saving grace of a plea of nolo contendere is what benefit you may gain in any civil actions for treble damages or otherwise which may arise as a result of this indictment. The defendants stand before the Court upon what the Court has just indicated, in the view of the Court, is a plea of guilty.

Able counsel have presented your version of this case at length. Counsel representing the Department of Justice and the United States have also made an able presentation of their case. However, after all the statements are considered and digested the bare and unvarnished fact exists that the defendants have violated the Sherman Act. While you have advanced various theories of why such violation took place, yet, you are before this Court saying that you have conspired to violate the Act. In other words, you are a violator of the law.

Now, the Congress has seen fit to impose or at least permit the Court under the law to impose very severe penalty. Counsel representing the Attorney General has made certain recommendations to the Court as to the fines that should be imposed in this case. The Court is not bound by those recommendations. They are, however, helpful to the Court because the Department of Justice has in its possession all of the factual background. No doubt the Government has spent thousands of dollars in investigating this case. The Court is aware of the fact that you have entered a plea of guilty which has perhaps saved the Government and also saved yourselves expensive litigation and the time of this Court. However, since the law does carry a maximum fine of $50,000 and a year's imprisonment, the Court is of the opinion that the recommendations made by the Attorney General of the United States are fair, and in view of that fact the Court is inclined to impose the fines which the Department of Justice recommends in this case.

[Fine Alone Not Sufficient]

However, the Court is of the opinion that the Department of Justice has not gone far enough. It seems to this Court, in cases of this character, that a fine is not a sufficient deterring factor to cause others who might contemplate violating the Sherman law and those who are involved here today from committing further violations, since perhaps it is not too difficult for the defendant corporations or the defendants to pay a fine, but there ought to be a further deterrent factor, and for that reason the Court will not follow the recommendations in every respect.

[Fines Imposed on Corporations]

However, it will assess a fine of $20,000 against True Temper, defendant True Temper Corporation; a fine of $20,000 against the defendant McDonough Co.; and a fine of $20,000 against the defendant The Union Fork and Hoe Company.

At this point, before I impose a fine on the Wood Shovel and Tool Company, the Court understood that the officers of this company were granted immunity by reason of the testimony they gave before the grand jury?

Mr. McCareins: That's right.

The Court: And a further statement which you made in court as to Borg-Warner Corporation, that they did not participate actively after 1955. Is that correct?

Mr. McCareins: They didn't attend meetings after '55 but participated in this, what we call, surreptitious correspondence. They didn't continue to attend meetings but did take part in the correspondence, nor was there any disavowal of the benefits.

The Court: Were they in the picture initially?

Mr. McCareins: I would say we have no evidence that they were, for example, in the picture—let me correct that. I have a recollection of also involving Ingersoll as early as '49, rather mildly but interested in this sort of thing that early. I would say that they definitely were a part of it in '53.

The Court: In other words, they joined the conspiracy after it had once been—

Mr. McCareins: Yes, I would say that is a fair statement, that it had been in effect prior to their joining.

The Court: What was the situation with the Wood Shovel and Tool Company, or were they in from the start?

Mr. McCareins: It is very difficult for me to say, Your Honor. I have no definite information as to whether Wood was in there or not. Our first evidence, I should say, of Wood's participation I believe starts in about '53.

The Court: In view of those statements the Court will assess a fine against the Wood Shovel and Tool Company in the amount of $15,000; a fine against the Borg-Warner Corporation in the amount of $15,000.

[Individuals—Fines and Jail Terms]

Now, will the individual defendants step forward, please.

Does counsel desire to be heard further for these defendants?

Which is Mr. William Rector?

Mr. Rector: I am, sir.

The Court: Do you have anything to say as to why the judgment of the Court should not be pronounced against you?

Mr. Rector: No, Your Honor.

The Court: Mr. Robert R. Raymond, do you have anything to say as to why the judgment of the Court should not be pronounced against you?

Mr. Raymond: No, I do not, your Honor.

The Court: Mr. F. Bliss Winn, do you have anything to say as to why the judgment of the Court should not be pronounced against you?

Mr. Raymond [so in transcript]: I have not, Your Honor.

The Court: Mr. John T. Mains, do you have anything to say as to why the judgment of the Court should not be pronounced against you?

Mr. Mains: No, sir, Your Honor.

The Court: It will be the sentence of the Court, as to you, Mr. Rector, that you pay a fine of $5000 and that you be incarcerated in a jail to be designated by the Attorney General of the United States for a period of ninety days.

And as to you, Mr. Raymond, that you pay a fine of $5000 and that you be incarcerated in a jail to be designated by the Attorney General of the United States for a period of ninety days.

And as to you, Mr. Winn, it will be the judgment and sentence of the Court that you pay a fine of $5000 and that you be incarcerated in a jail to be designated by the Attorney General of the United States for a period of ninety days.

And as to you, Mr. Mains, that you pay a fine of $5000, that you be incarcerated in a jail to be designated by the Attorney General of the United States for a period of ninety days.

Now, a corporation acts through its officers. You gentlemen breathed life into this conspiracy, and your explanation is not sufficient to warrant this Court in not imposing more severe penalty than the Department of Justice has recommended for you.

You will be remanded to the custody of the Marshal.

You may recess court until two o'clock.

[Motions To Stay Execution of Sentences]

Mr. Holschuh: If the Court please, on behalf of Borg-Warner, may we have some time for arrangement—

The Court: You can work that out with the Attorney General. If he won't agree the Court will give you time to pay your fine.

Mr. Ford: If the Court please, may we have these sentences deferred for a few days until these gentlemen can make arrangements?

The Court: Is there objection upon the part of the Department of Justice?

Mr. McCareins: There is not.

The Court: The Court realizes that you are all business men. Perhaps you ought to have some time to straighten up your business affairs. The Court will suspend the execution of sentence for a period of thirty days. You will report back here to the United States Marshal—

How much time do you want, Mr. Ford?

Mr. Ford: Well, thirty days.

The Court: Are they all officers of the company?

Mr. Ford: Yes.

The Court: I doubt if they need thirty days.

Mr. Ford: I think probably they will.

The Court: Maybe the Court spoke too rapidly.

Mr. Ford: I think thirty days; they will need at least that.

The Court: What are their duties? Do they have anyone to take their place?

Mr. Ford: I don't know. Mr. Rector is president of the company and certainly his place will be hard to fill. Thirty days, I think, would be satisfactory time.

The Court: The Court will take the request under consideration. The defendants will be remanded to the custody of the Marshal.

You may recess court until two o'clock.

[Motions To Stay Execution of Sentences]

The Court: United States v. McDonough Co., and others, Criminal No. 7368. Counsel at the conclusion of the hearing yesterday indicated to the Court that you wanted to be heard on the motions to stay execution of sentence in this case; is that correct?

Mr. Ford: If the Court please, our motion last night was for a stay to enable the defendants to arrange their affairs so that they could serve their time.

The Court: Yes, the Court so understood that you were asking leave to straighten out your business affairs before the commencement of your sentence. Is that correct?

Mr. Ford: That's correct.

The Court: During the interim there has been filed with the Court certain medical statements, or, have they been filed? They were shown to the Court.

Mr. Dean: We have them for filing, Your Honor.

The Court: They were furnished to the Court and then you took them back into your possession. Do you have those statements with you?

Mr. Dean: Yes.

The Court: Now, do you care to be heard further on your stay, Mr. Ford?

Mr. Ford: Yes, I think so.

The Court: What are your reasons?

Mr. Ford: As the Court knows, I have been practicing law for a number of years.

The Court: I will take judicial notice of that fact and that you are a good lawyer. Go ahead.

Mr. Ford: Until the other day I kind of had the suspicion that I was, but that's been dispelled. In preparation for making a decision and advising my clients on the question of changing their plea we canvassed, I think, all of the anti-trust cases there and we didn't find a single, solitary case among hundreds of criminal anti-trust cases where nolo contendere pleas were entered of any jail sentences.

The Court: Now, let us get the record straight.

Mr. Ford: I say that from my—

The Court: Let us get the record straight. Is there any difference insofar as punishment is concerned between a nolo plea and a plea of guilty?

Mr. Ford: Perhaps not.

The Court: There is no perhaps to it. For all purposes, in effect it is a plea of guilty, is it not?

Mr. Ford: But, as I say, I have gone on precedent and therefore did not advise my clients to be prepared for what might happen, and it is my responsibility.

The Court: You don't mean to indicate to the Court that you lawyers didn't understand the effect of a nolo plea, do you? I told your clients in the court room the effect of a nolo plea. If you didn't tell them, the Court advised them that the implications of a nolo plea were the same as a plea of guilty.

Mr. Ford: That's right. But, I didn't tell them beforehand because I didn't appreciate that fact. I might tell the Court, this is my first criminal anti-trust case, too, and it is my sole responsibility that I did not. It is entirely my fault that I didn't advise my clients what might happen and be prepared.

Now, it so happens that they are not prepared to serve at this time. Mr. Rector's wife day before yesterday had a major operation and she will be in the hospital for several weeks. They have three children at home. There are no servants, nobody to look after the place, and preparations have to be made where you are away for a quarter of a year to take care of many things in the home. These gentlemen both have responsible positions. I haven't had an opportunity to go into detail with them as to what their duties are, but I know that Mr. Rector is president of this corporation, has the direction of it, he has many decisions to make every day. The same thing is true of Mr. Raymond. He is vice president, people come to him for advice, for the making of decisions.

There has to be some arrangement made for the fixing of responsibility while they are away. I am sure the Court appreciates that, and the disruption that might result if such arrangements are not made. There are many employees in the corporation who will be affected. I think the confusion that may result if arrangements are not made for the fixing of responsibility may have an adverse effect on many people.

Now, very briefly, those seem to me are very moving considerations why the Court should not [so in transcript] grant some time and stay the execution until these men can arrange their affairs.

The Court: Are you speaking for all of them, Mr. Ford, or just Mr. Rector?

Mr. Ford: I am speaking for all of them, Judge, particularly Mr. Raymond and Mr. Rector. Not only that, these men have community responsibility. I am sure Mr. Rector would want to make some arrangements for the change of responsibility in his church work and his Better Business Bureau matters, and his other civic responsibilities. And I say again to the Court, this is entirely my fault. I feel very badly about it.

The Court: I have no sympathy with your statement, Mr. Ford. I think there were very able lawyers sitting at these tables in these proceedings and I don't think it is fair to the Court or to the Government or to yourselves to say at this time that you didn't fully understand what was going on. And I think furthermore, that your clients are businessmen, they are intelligent men, they have reached high positions in the business world. If they stood in this court room and didn't understand what was going on and what was told them, why, then their intelligence is below what the Court has a right to assume they have.

And, I don't think you should hold yourself responsible. I think you attorneys did a good job. You presented your case as you saw it. I think counsel for the Government did a good job. But, after all, the bare and true and unvarnished fact remains that they entered what was in effect a plea of guilty to price fixing. You may call it something else, but the legal effect and meaning of a plea of nolo contendere is that it is for all purposes a plea of guilty. The only thing it does is save you from meeting a prima facie case in case you are sued for treble damages under the Clayton Act. That is, your plea of nolo contendere is not admissible against you in a civil action. And, evidently you must have had in mind that fact when you were considering a plea of nolo contendere.

Mr. Ford: I think that is one of the things.

The Court: In other words, if you should be sued by any of your dealers as a result of this price fixing or this rigging of prices, your plea here cannot be introduced against you to make a prima facie case against you. So you did gain something by a plea of nolo contendere.

Mr. Ford: That's correct, and we gained something else.

The Court: And as to your statements as to prison sentence being imposed, why did the Congress put in a year's jail sentence if they didn't intend the courts to use it? Why did they raise the penalty from $5000 to $50,000? You could have been fined $50,000, you could have gotten a year in jail.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Mr. Ford: I appreciate all that.

The Court: You were only fined two-fifths of what the law provided. You were only given a third of a jail sentence of what the law provided.

Mr. Ford: That's correct. But, as I told the Court, the law, and necessarily so, was designed for the large and the small, the bad and the good, and it is up to the Court to render, in its sound discretion, justice in each case, because—

The Court: The Court attempts to do that. The Court wants to do justice. And, the Court is of the opinion under these circumstances that these gentlemen, occupying high and responsible positions in the business world and in their own companies, when they met in back rooms and rigged and fixed prices should have known what they were doing and should have known that they were violating the laws of the United States. I think that they are well enough informed as business men to know that the Congress by law has prohibited the rigging or fixing of prices. Price fixing is a very serious offense. So, I don't have much sympathy for your argument along that line.

Go ahead if you have anything else.

Mr. Ford: I just want to say, Judge—

The Court: Call Mr. Rector up here and Mr. Raymond so I can find out what their duties are.

Mr. Ford: All right, if the Court please.

The Court: Mr. Rector, what are your duties with your corporation?

Mr. Rector: I am president of True Temper Corporation.

The Court: And, what are your duties?

Mr. Rector: Well, the president in charge of sales, treasurer, comptroller and the merchandising vice president report to me.

The Court: Is there anyone to take your place?

Mr. Rector: We have no single person, no, sir. I am assuming my associates will do an able job in my absence.

The Court: The Court has no desire to harm your business as far as that is concerned. You do occupy a responsible position.

You were in the court room when the Court stated to you, asked your counsel if you knew the implications of a plea of nolo contendere, is that correct?

Mr. Rector: I was in the court room the full time, sir.

The Court: Were you misled by such a plea?

Mr. Rector: I don't believe I was misled. I was—

The Court: You are an intelligent man.

Mr. Rector: I was taking the judgment of Mr. Ford, my able counsel.

The Court: Well, he is an able lawyer, and I think you are an able businessman.

Mr. Rector: Thank you.

The Court: And, when you were told that the plea of nolo contendere was for all purposes and effects a plea of guilty, you understood the same punishment could be administered under such plea?

Mr. Rector: I don't believe there was any misunderstanding.

The Court: Very well. I think you are fair about it.

Now, Mr. Raymond, what are your duties and what is your official capacity?

Mr. Raymond: I am vice president and general sales manager of True Temper Corporation. My duties are to supervise the functioning of five of our operating divisions.

The Court: Were these medical affidavits submitted in behalf of either one of these men?

Mr. Ford: No, we have no medical affidavits.

The Court: These men are in good health?

Mr. Ford: Until yesterday morning I am sure they were in good health. I explained about Mr. Rector's wife, and we do not have as yet the doctor's statement on that but we have asked for it. If the Court wants it we will get it.

The Court: No. I am going to grant these men additional time before the commencement of sentence.

That will be all right at this time. The Court will hear the other gentlemen. Does anyone want to be heard on behalf of the other defendants?

Mr. Dean: I would like to be heard for Mr. Mains, if Your Honor please. Mr. Mains is, I believe, as Your Honor will remember, the vice president in charge of sales for Union Fork and Hoe. His responsibilities in that job are comparable, I believe, to those you have just heard described for the sales manager of the True Temper Company. He does not have an assistant in the sense that there is a lieutenant, you might say, overall for the duties he has to perform. His predicament for the interest of his company is about as you have heard described for this other company. He is wholly responsible for the sales program, which means the coordination of that program with the production in the company. By the nature of this business, which we described to you here the other day, there must be a flow in the different type of tools to meet the diversified orders. That whole coordination program is Mr. Mains' sole responsibility.

He is also in charge of the sales force; there are fifteen, I believe. And, in addition, carries his own direct responsibility and is on sales directly. The principal, most important customer of the company is his sole responsibility, which accounts for about 25 per cent of the business of the company today, and that coordination of that is his responsibility.

The Court: Would you call Mr. Mains up here.

Mr. Dean: Yes, I would.

The Court: Go ahead and complete your statement.

Mr. Dean: He could, of course, elaborate on what I said with regard to his duties. You have spoken a couple of times about the more personal aspect that I brought to Your Honor's attention in the affidavits I have here on the table before me. We do appeal also on account of Mr. Mains' present physical condition, and most particularly at this time he has these business problems also, that at Dr. George Nelson's reference Dr. John Meagher is in the process of a series of neuro-surgical examinations with him and has appointments for that, which does very much require his availability, Your Honor. We appeal to you for some time.

The Court: Now, you have a medical certificate?

Mr. Dean: Yes, I have two, the one of Dr. George Nelson, and of Dr. John Meagher.

The Court: Do either of those gentlemen make the statement that incarceration would endanger this man's life?

Mr. Dean: They say it would imperil his condition.

The Court: I don't quite understand that. As I indicated when you talked to me in chambers—

Mr. Dean: Yes, I remember that you did raise that point. I am not a doctor myself. Dr. John Meagher feels that it is a very serious thing. In the affidavit that I have from him he says that "it would be to the patient's absolute detriment to be incarcerated by reason of the fact that he needs at this time proper rest and vitamin intake, especially to avoid on account of this neurological condition any exposures, drafts and otherwise." We hope that the studies and treatment that he is having will, of course, relieve and control the situation which he has had for a number of years, not caused by this awful experience but perhaps it has been aggravated by this. It goes back, as you recall Doctor Nelson's affidavit, some five or six years. But, this is the additional reason why on this morning we appeal to Your Honor that we may have some time to prepare ourselves for this.

Now, as to this—

The Court: The Court read the affidavits. If you are raising the question that incarceration would endanger this man's life the Court will permit you to introduce medical evidence to that effect.

Mr. Dean: Thank you very much, Your Honor.

The Court: However, the Court will direct a physical examination by a court appointed doctor. I have no question, I know Dr. George Nelson, he is a high type, reputable specialist in this city.

Mr. Dean: I know you know.

The Court: But, nevertheless, I think the Government is concerned in this case and perhaps in all fairness to the parties concerned the Court ought to appoint a disinterested doctor.

Mr. Dean: Let me say here and now, Your Honor, that we of course would welcome that. I do want to urge this upon you in a more detailed way with regard to his condition. You asked me the specific question this morning as to what it would do to his health and life if he were incarcerated. I want to present that fully and carefully.

The Court: Now, it impairs anyone's health to go to jail. It is not a healthy place over there.

Mr. Dean: No.

The Court: But that alone is not sufficient. I think the rule governing such situations is whether or not locking this man up or incarcerating him would endanger his life. Now, this is not a vicious crime. The Court has no desire to incarcerate a man if it is going to imperil his life. But, the mere fact that it affects him otherwise is no excuse, because you couldn't take any man over to jail and say he wasn't affected, especially a business man.

Mr. Dean: I am sure all these men have been very, very much affected by the experience, and I quite understand your position, your Honor. I certainly would like to have the opportunity to have Mr. Mains examined during such time as you might allow us at this time.

The Court: The Court will appoint a physician or physicians to do that. However, the Court will expect you to pay the bill. There is no reason why the Government should be charged because you are raising the question of their health.

Mr. Dean: We would like to bring all this—

The Court: Now, is there anyone to take your place?

Mr. Mains: No, sir, there is not, sir. We are a company with a very small staff. That's in both the manufacturing, the production, sales of the company. I am in complete charge of the entire sales operation of our organization. I do not have a close assistant. In addition to supervising not only the salesmen, not only the connection with our production as Mr. Dean has outlined, but I also have the complete charge of taking care of our major accounts, and I would need some time, sir, to bring someone along and educate them in that regard.

The Court: The Court will check up your counsel's statement as to your physical condition and the Court will, at the conclusion of these proceedings, grant you time in which to straighten out your business affairs. However, you heard the questions asked Mr. Rector and the other gentlemen. Your counsel seems to be very much worried about his advice. The Court is not concerned with that. That affects client and attorney. But, you gentlemen were in court. You are an intelligent man. Not once but two or three times you were advised as to what a plea of nolo contendere was, it was in effect a plea of guilty. Did you so understand?

Mr. Mains: Yes, sir.

The Court: I think you are fair, too. Do you have anything else?

Mr. Dean: Thank you, Your Honor.

The Court: Is there anyone else?

Mr. McDonough: If it please the Court, I represent F. Bliss Winn, president of McDonough Co. in the Ames Division. Mr. Winn, until January of this year was sales manager or vice president in charge of sales of McDonough Co. In January of this year Mr. E. E. Alexander, the then president, retired and Mr. Winn stepped into his shoes. He thereupon created a considerable vacancy in the sales department. There were numerous accounts which had for many years been handled by him alone, substantial accounts, but he has not had an opportunity, had he been willing to, to turn over to anyone else and has continued to handle them. In addition he has taken on the duties of the chief executive officer with no vice president to relieve him in that regard.

All the matters that have been said as to these other defendant corporations as to their affairs would apply to Mr. Winn. There is this one additional factor, too, which I believe, since it is of considerable importance to the community in which Ames is located the Court would take into consideration. For some weeks Mr. Winn has been negotiating on behalf of Ames a labor contract with the AFL-CIO, which expired on November 1. He has been the chief negotiator for the company. That contract deadline is November 1 and if negotiations are not completed approximately 900 persons will be affected, it will probably result in strike. We believe if the negotiations may be permitted to resume that the issues, many of which have already been settled, may be completely ironed out, but that Mr. Winn has such a personal touch with it and with the union official that it would be almost impossible for someone to step into his shoes at such a late stage of the negotiations after they have been going on for weeks.

Now, as to his personal affairs, of course he has the same problem no doubt that many of the other defendants have. Within the next ten days, I believe it is, his son who is in the army goes overseas. Of course he would like to see him off. His wife, who is a school teacher in Parkersburg —and incidentally, his wife became a school teacher because of a very great shortage of school teachers in the community. She had given up the profession sometime ago and went back to assist. But, some arrangements will have to be made by her since they have a younger son who reports in home before she does. Arrangements will have to be made for her to secure a replacement so she can be in the home.

Mr. Winn has certain financial obligations, as I assume most of us have, and he would have to make arrangements for an extension of time for payment of these. He is presently acting as the treasurer of the Union Mission Orphanage Drive in Parkersburg, Union Mission supplying housing for orphans or abandoned children, in excess of a hundred of them. He will have to make arrangements to account for funds in his hands and turn over that position to someone else. And, he is actively engaged presently in the industrial division of the United Fund Campaign. All these community projects in addition to his own personal projects.

Now, we did file with the Court, on yesterday, also an affidavit relating to his health, the affidavit disclosing that by reason of surgery at Mayo Clinic nearly two-thirds of Mr. Winn's stomach has been removed, and with the kind permission of the Court, since he has been incarcerated I have been taking his meals to him. I took his dinner to him last night and his breakfast about seven this morning.

The Court: Let the record be clear in that respect. You said he was ill and the Court permitted you to take his meals. But, I don't want it understood that any special meals are being sent in to anybody, to the other defendants here in this case, because the same treatment is afforded all Federal prisoners in jail.

Mr. McDonough: I did not mean to confuse that.

The Court: Due to his illness the Court told you you could take in the food.

Mr. McDonough: Yes, sir. So, we believe that these circumstances—

The Court: Would you call him up here, please.

Mr. McDonough: Mr. Winn?

The Court: Mr. Winn, what are your duties with the company?

Mr. Winn: I am the executive president of the company, sir.

The Court: Do you have anyone to take your place?

Mr. Winn: No, sir.

The Court: Now, your counsel has raised the question about your physical condition, that you have had major surgery. Is that correct?

Mr. Winn: Yes, sir.

The Court: I suppose the Court will have to take judicial notice of the fact that all you high pressured business men, lawyers and others, do develop ulcers and one thing and another.

Does your doctor say that incarceration would endanger this man's life, or will he say that?

Mr. McDonough: He will say so, sir. As I explained to the Court yesterday, by reason of the fact that we are from Parkersburg and the doctor is not a local doctor, I called Mr. Winn's doctor in Parkersburg at about eleven o'clock yesterday, just as soon as I left the court room, and asked him if he would dictate to my secretary in Parkersburg an affidavit which was put on the plane and flown up to here yesterday afternoon. Now, the doctor of course did not know, I assume, just exactly what facts the Court wanted the affidavit to set forth. The affidavit sets forth—

The Court: What I want to know is what I told other counsel. I want to know whether locking this man up would endanger his life. I know it might hurt his health. Jail is not a very agreeable place to be. But, that fact alone is not controlling.

Mr. McDonough: I can represent to the Court, and an affidavit will be obtained to that effect. In this affidavit the doctor does state that it would have critical effect upon him by reason of the abnormal size of his stomach and frequent feedings, the necessity for medication, the diet that he is on, bland diet, which is a strict diet which could not possibly be supplied in an institution, that it would have critical effect, and a statement could be obtained to just exactly that effect.

The Court: Now, the Court will tell you the same as it told other counsel, if you are raising the question as to this man's physical condition, that incarceration would endanger his life, you may present any medical evidence you have. But, the Court will direct that a court appointed medical expert or experts examine this man. The Court does that in fairness to the Government and the defendants. However, you will be expected to pay the expense of such an examination.

Mr. McDonough: Yes, sir. As I have previously indicated to the Court when I presented this affidavit on yesterday, we would welcome that opportunity if afforded to us.

The Court: The Court will perhaps designate a court appointed physician or physicians to examine these two men who claim to be ill.

Now, is there anything further?

Mr. McDonough: No, sir.

The Court: That is all, Mr. Winn.

Would Mr. Winn step back up here a moment.

Mr. Winn, you were in court during the entire proceeding in this case, were you not?

Mr. Winn: Yes, sir.

The Court: And, you heard the admonition of the Court and the statement of the Court at different times during the course of the trial, of the implications of a plea of nolo contendere, that it was in effect a plea of guilty?

Mr. Winn: Yes, sir.

The Court: Did you so understand?

Mr. Winn: I probably was under a misapprehension that there would be no restriction of freedom, but my answer to the question is yes, I did understand.

The Court: You heard the admonition of the Court—

Mr. Winn: Yes, sir.

The Court: —when the Court took your pleas, if you understood that the plea was in effect a plea of guilty insofar as punishment was concerned?

Mr. Winn: Yes, sir.

The Court: I think you are fair, too. I must say for you gentlemen that you have answered truthfully to the Court, because the Court did tell you at the time you changed your plea and asked you if you understood the implication of a plea of nolo contendere. I am glad that you gentlemen understood it even if some of your counsel did not, because I don't want it for a moment understood that you were taken advantage of in the matter. Because, the criminal statute under which you gentlemen are charged provides a penalty of a maximum fine of $50,000 and a year's imprisonment. So, when you changed your pleas you were taking all the chances, and the Court has no sympathy with the argument that this is a first case because I don't think the Congress would have put jail sentence in the statute if they didn't intend for a court to use it if it thought it was proper.

I sympathize with you gentlemen during all your troubles, but you are all intelligent men, you are bound to know what you did. You stand before the Court on a guilty plea. However, the Court has no desire to lock you up if it is going to endanger your life. I think you have had severe major surgery, according to your doctor's statement. However, the Court will have a disinterested specialist or specialists examine you at your expense.

Now, the Court is of the opinion—and, I understood the United States Assistant Attorney General has no objection to a stay of execution for a period of thirty days?

Mr. McCareins: The Government has no objection.

The Court: The Court, in view of the fact that you do occupy responsible positions in your business organizations, is going to grant you a stay of thirty days. You will return here at twelve o'clock noon on November 16 and report to the Marshal's office for the commencement of your sentence, unless there should be some finding to the contrary during the interim.

When will these men be available for physical examination?

Mr. McDonough: At the pleasure of the Court we will make them available.

The Court: Of course, that will be up to the doctors. I can't tell you when the doctors will see them.

Mr. McDonough: If the Court will designate the doctors, we are willing to—

The Court: I am not prepared to designate the doctors at this time.

Mr. McDonough: If the Court would advise us we would try to work out an agreeable time with the doctor.

The Court: The Court will take care of the doctor. This is a court appointed physician, it is not your physician. You can file anything you want to, any medical evidence you desire by your own physicians, but the Court, while it does not question the honesty and integrity of the family physician, nevertheless feels that his findings ought to be checked by a disinterested physician.

Mr. McDonough: When did Your Honor intend to designate the doctor?

The Court: I don't know. We have so many things to do. However, we will try to reach it. We will have thirty days time in which to have them examined. You will be advised.

Do you have something further?

Mr. McCareins: I have a question. Does the Court have any objection to the Government requesting counsel here that we may be furnished with whatever affidavits are supplied to you with respect to the health of these gentlemen?

The Court: Yes, I would suggest that you furnish counsel for the Government a copy of all medical evidence filed in this case. You will file it with the Court and furnish the Assistant Attorney General a copy of the evidence. And, you will be furnished a copy, if you so desire, of any findings made by a court appointed doctor.

Mr. McDonough: We will most certainly do that.

The Court: Do you want your doctor in the picture, too?

Mr. McCareins: No, nothing further.

The Court: The Court will permit the defendants to go until the date mentioned, November 16, at twelve o'clock, and their bonds will be continued.

Now, is there anything further? If not, you may recess court until two o'clock this afternoon.

In the District Court of Oklahoma County, State of Oklahoma. No. 147665. Filed October 16, 1959.

Oklahoma Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Constitutionality of Oklahoma Fair Trade Act—Nonsigner Provision—Oklahoma Constitution.—The nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act was held unconstitutional on the grounds that (a) it delegates the legislative power of price fixing to private persons in violation of the Oklahoma Constitution, (b) it is repugnant to the due process clause of the Constitution in that it delegates to private persons resale price fixing powers that may be exercised, and which are exercised, arbitrarily, without legislative standards and guideposts, and (c) it violates the due process clause of the Constitution in that there is no real and substantial relation between fair trade price fixing and preventing of injury to the economic, social, and moral well being of the state, and the means adopted are not reasonable and appropriate for the accomplishment of the alleged purpose of the statute.

Journal Entry of Judgment

A. P. Van Meter, District Judge [In full text]: This cause coming on to be heard before me, A. P. Van Meter, Judge of the District Court in and for Oklahoma County, Oklahoma, pursuant to regular assignment, on this 10th day of September, 1959, a regular court day of the July 1959 term of said Court, upon

The oral and written stipulations of facts, and

The issues drawn in the pleadings; and

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

The plaintiff appearing by its attorney, Granville Scanland; and

The defendant appearing by its attorneys, Miskovsky and Miskovsky, by George Miskovsky; and

Thereupon, all the parties, in open Court, announce ready for trial:

Whereupon, the case proceeds to trial on the oral and written stipulations of facts and the issues drawn in the pleadings; and

The Court, after hearing the argument of counsel, took the cause under advisement, pending receipt of briefs to be filed by the parties; and

Now on this 8th day of October, 1959, the Court, after having received briefs from all parties in the case, and after having thoroughly reviewed the facts and the law, and being fully advised in the premises, finds:

[Issue]

That the defendant herein challenges the constitutionality of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act, as found in the General Statutes of Oklahoma, Title 78, O. S. 1951, Sections 41-45; and

[Nonsigner Provision Unconstitutional]

The Court, having fully considered all the reasons suggested, argued, and briefed by both parties, further finds:

That the nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act, Title 78, O. S. 1951, Section 44, should be declared unconstitutional and void, for the following reasons:

The nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act delegates the Legislative power of price fixing to private persons, in violation of Article IV, Section 1, and Article V, Section 1, of the Oklahoma Constitution;

The nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act is repugnant to the due process clause of the State Constitution, in that it delegates to private persons resale price fixing powers that may be exercised, and which are exercised, arbitrarily, without Legislative standards and guideposts; and

The nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act violates the due process clause of the State Constitution, in that there is no real and substantial relation between fair trade price fixing and preventing of injury to the economic, social, and moral wellbeing of the State; and the means adopted are not reasonable and appropriate for the accomplishment of the alleged purpose of the Statute; and

Therefore, the Court finds:

That the judgment should be entered for the defendant;

That the plaintiff's application for injunction should be denied; and

That all costs of court incurred herein and incident hereto, and accrued and accruing herein, should be taxed to the plaintiff.

Oklahoma Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Constitutionality of Oklahoma Fair Trade Act—Nonsigner Provision—Oklahoma Constitution.—The nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act was held unconstitutional on the grounds that (a) it delegates the legislative power of price fixing to private persons in violation of the Oklahoma Constitution, (b) it is repugnant to the due process clause of the Constitution in that it delegates to private persons resale price fixing powers that may be exercised, and which are exercised, arbitrarily, without legislative standards and guideposts, and (c) it violates the due process clause of the Constitution in that there is no real and substantial relation between fair trade price fixing and preventing of injury to the economic, social, and moral wellbeing of the state, and the means adopted are not reasonable and appropriate for the accomplishment of the alleged purpose of the statute.

Journal Entry of Judgment

A. P. Van Meter, District Judge [In full text]: This cause coming on to be heard before me, A. P. Van Meter, Judge of the District Court in and for Oklahoma County, Oklahoma, pursuant to regular assignment, on this 10th day of September, 1959, a regular court day of the July 1959 term of said Court, upon

The oral and written stipulations of facts, and

The issues drawn in the pleadings; and

The plaintiff appearing by its attorneys, John G. Hervey and Hugh F. Owens; and

The defendants appearing by their attorneys, Miskovsky and Miskovsky, by George Miskovsky; and

Thereupon, all the parties, in open Court, announce ready for trial:

Whereupon, the case proceeds to trial on the oral and written stipulations of facts and the issues drawn in the pleadings; and

The Court, after hearing the argument of counsel, took the cause under advisement, pending receipt of briefs to be filed by the parties; and

Now on this 8th day of October, 1959, the Court, after having received briefs from the parties in the case, and after having thoroughly reviewed the facts and the law, and being fully advised in the premises, finds:

[Issue]

That the defendants herein challenge the constitutionality of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act, as found in the General Statutes of Oklahoma, Title 78, O. S. 1951, Sections 41-45; and

[Nonsigner Provision Unconstitutional]

The Court, having fully considered all the reasons suggested, argued, and briefed by both parties, further finds:

That the nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act, Title 78, O. S. 1951, Section 44, should be declared unconstitutional and void, for the following reasons:

The nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act delegates the Legislative power of price fixing to private persons, in violation of Article IV, Section 1, and Article V, Section 1, of the Oklahoma Constitution;

The nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act is repugnant to the due process clause of the State Constitution, in that it delegates to private persons resale price fixing powers that may be exercised, and which are exercised, arbitrarily, without Legislative standards and guideposts; and

The nonsigner provision of the Oklahoma Fair Trade Act violates the due process clause of the State Constitution, in that there is no real and substantial relation between fair trade price fixing and preventing of injury to the economic, social, and moral wellbeing of the State; and the means adopted are not reasonable and appropriate for the accomplishment of the alleged purpose of the Statute;

Therefore, the Court finds:

That judgment should be entered for the defendants;

That the plaintiff's application for injunction should be denied; and

That all costs of court incurred herein and incident hereto, and accrued and accruing herein, should be taxed to the plaintiff.

It Is Therefore Considered, Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed by this Court that judgment be, this date, to-wit: the 8th day of October, 1959, and hereby is, entered for the defendants, Benny R. Homsey, Joe R. Homsey, and Sam Homsey, partners, doing business as American Mutual Company; and

It is Ordered by this Court that the application of the plaintiff, American Home Products Corporation, a corporation, for injunction, be, and the same hereby is denied; and

It is Ordered by this Court that all costs of court incurred herein and incident hereto, and accrued and accruing herein, be, and the same hereby are, taxed to the plaintiff:

To all of which, the plaintiff Excepts, and Exceptions are allowed by the Court:

[Appeal]

Whereupon, the plaintiff, American Home Products Corporation, a corporation, in open Court, gave notice of its intention to Appeal to the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma; and

The plaintiff praying an Appeal to the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma, and an extension of time within which to make and serve case-made:

It is Ordered by the Court that an extension of thirty (30) days, in addition to the time allowed by law, be granted to said plaintiff to make and serve case-made, the defendant to have three (3) days thereafter to suggest amendments, and the same to be settled on three (3) days' notice in writing by either party.

In the New York Court of Appeals. Argued May 14, 1959. Decided July 8, 1959.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Selling Below Fair Trade Prices—Notice of Price Restriction—Defenses—Refusal of Fair Trader to Purchase Goods—Motion to Dismiss Appeal.—Rulings that (1) a nonsigner of a fair trade contract who purchased merchandise without knowledge that it was subject to a fair trade agreement did not violate the New York Fair Trade Act when it sold such merchandise below the prices specified in the fair trade agreement, and (2) a fair trader, in order to enforce its statutory rights against a nonsigner, is under no obligation to purchase fair traded goods from the nonsigner were affirmed. A motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that, since the nonsigner sold all of the fair trader's goods, the question involved was moot was denied.

[Appeal]

Appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant, entered January 17, 1958, upon an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the Second Judicial Department which (1) reversed, on the law, a judgment of the Supreme Court in favor of plaintiff, entered in Kings County upon a decision of a Special Referee (MEIER STEINBRINK, Special Ref.), enjoining defendant from advertising, offering for sale or selling at retail in New York State certain shirts manufactured by plaintiff bearing its trade-mark at less than the prices stipulated in plaintiff's fair-trade contract, except that, as to certain shirts purchased by defendant on March 15, 1957, defendant might offer to sell to plaintiff the balance of stock on hand at its cost and, if plaintiff refused, defendant could dispose of them at any price without reference to the fair-trade agreement, and (2) dismissed the complaint. The action was commenced to enjoin defendant from selling shirts manufactured by plaintiff at less than their fair-traded prices. On January 28, 1955 plaintiff, manufacturer of the widely advertised "Arrow" shirt, entered into a fair-trade agreement with a retailer in New York City providing minimum retail prices of three white shirt styles. Thereafter, more styles were added and the prices revised. Plaintiff sent written notice of the revised price schedule which became effective January 1, 1957 to its more than 400 customers in the metropolitan area. Defendant was not a customer and did not receive any notice. Approximately 20% of plaintiff's white shirts were not fair-traded. The advertisements of plaintiff's shirts in magazines of national circulation showed, without differentiation, suggested retail prices which the retailer was free to disregard and retail prices which were mandatory under the Fair-Trade Law. In March, 1957 defendant purchased a lot of plaintiff's shirts from an exporter. Defendant did not ask whether the shirts were price fixed and the exporter did not tell defendant. After purchasing the shirts defendant advertised them for less than their fair trade price. On the day the advertisement appeared, plaintiff wrote defendant that a fair-trade contract existed and stated the retail prices therein fixed. Defendant continued to sell the shirts at less than their fair-trade price and disposed of all the shirts. Section 369-b of the General Business Law provided that a retailer who had not signed a fair-trade agreement was guilty of unfair competition if he "Wilfully and knowingly" advertised and sold any commodity at less than the price stipulated in a fair-trade agreement covering such commodity. The Special Referee found that defendant had no knowledge of any fair-trade contracts when it purchased the shirts. In the Court of Appeals defendant argued that the statute was not violated by its purchase of plaintiff's shirts without knowledge of the existence of fair-trade agreements covering them, and that the statute was not violated by its subsequent sale of such shirts at less than fair-trade prices despite its after-acquired knowledge. Motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that, since defendant sold all of plaintiff's shirts, the question involved was moot.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Combinations and Conspiracies—Exclusive Dealing Under Sherman Act, Section 1, and Clayton Act, Section 3—Agreements by Independent Service Stations to Deal Exclusively in Accessories Sponsored by Oil Company—Legality.—There was sufficient evidence to sustain a jury's verdict that an oil company violated the antitrust laws by requiring its independent service stations to deal exclusively in automobile accessories sponsored by the company, thereby denying a manufacturer of automobile polish "access" to those stations. The manufacturer offered testimony to the effect that (1) distributors of its polish were generally unsuccessful in selling the product to the company's independent service stations, (2) a representative of the oil company told one of the company's station operators to get the manufacturer's polish out of the window or they would both lose their jobs, (3) salesmen for the manufacturer were told not to come in when the oil company's men were around, (4) the manufacturer's polish was occasionally sold in the stations, but it was kept under the counter and not displayed, and (5) a merchandiser for the oil company told a station operator that he did not want to see the manufacturer's polish in the station. Thus, it was apparent that independent service station men were "threatened and discouraged" from purchasing the manufacturer's polish. The jury could have concluded that there was a "general pattern of exclusion" of the manufacturer's polish from the oil company's independent stations, and that the company was responsible for that exclusion. Those independent operators of the stations were not the company's employees, and it had no right to tell them "not to buy other products."

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.690; Exclusive Dealing, Vol. 1, ¶ 4009.100.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Evidence Admissible to Prove Violations of Antitrust Laws—Effect of Clayton Act, Section 5—Prior Government Decree—Prima Facie Evidence or "Conclusive" Proof of Violations—Jury Instructions.—A trial court erroneously instructed a jury that a prior Government decree in which an oil company was held to have violated the antitrust laws by requiring its independent service stations to deal "exclusively" in automobile accessories sponsored by the company was res judicata in a private treble damage action, and precluded the company from controverting "the general proposition that such restrictions existed." Section 5 of the Clayton Act, which makes Government decrees prima facie evidence in private actions, refers to "estoppel" merely to define the area which the prima facie case covers. If that section made the Government decree conclusive evidence of the antitrust violation, rather than merely prima facie evidence which the oil company could rebut, it would deprive the company of its right to a jury trial on the violation issue. In the Government decree, it was held that the company had restrained trade in "waxes and polishes." Suppose, however, that the decree had also determined particularly a restraint against the manufacturer's polish. Applying the trial court's logic, this would have required him to instruct the jury that the Government decree was conclusive on the question of restraint against the manufacturer and its product, and that the only question left open to the jury was the question of the manufacturer's damages. That is not the law. The error, however, was not prejudicial, since the trial court's other instructions required the manufacturer to prove that the unlawful restraint was applied to its product, that it was damaged thereby, and the extent of its damages. Also, it could not be argued that the jury was prejudiced by being informed of the Government decree, since it was clearly admissible. Further, the oil company's objection to the trial court's jury instructions were not available on the appeal, because the error had been waived by the manufacturer's failure to state the grounds for its objections in accordance with Rule 51 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Further, the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict. In view of the prima facie effect of the Government decree, all that the manufacturer had to do was show that the general restraint applicable to "waxes and polishes" referred to in the decree was actually applied to its own product. That was established, since it was apparent from the testimony that the oil company had "threatened and discouraged" its independent service station operators from purchasing the manufacturer's polish.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9012.225, 9012.350, 9012.500.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Necessary Averments—Causal Relation Between Antitrust Violations and Damage to Plaintiff—Sufficiency of Proof.—In an automobile polish manufacturer's treble damage action against an oil company which prevented its independent service stations from purchasing the manufacturer's polish, there was a clear "causal connection" between the alleged restraints and the damage suffered by the manufacturer. That causal connection was proved when the manufacturer showed that the illegal restraint had been applied to its product. It seemed patent that the restraint, when applied, would result "in some loss of business." While there is a distinction between the quantum of proof required to establish the fact of damage as distinguished from the amount, here the impact of the oil company's exclusive dealing practices on the polish manufacturer was shown by evidence which the jury was entitled to, and did, believe.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9009.350.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Necessary Averments to State Cause of Action—Public Injury—Injury to One Person as Injury to "Public"—Prior Government Decree as Conclusive Proof of Public Injury.—A manufacturer of automobile polish, in its treble damage action against an oil company which "threatened and discouraged" its independent service stations from purchasing the manufacturer's polish, proved "public injury" when it proved the impact of the oil company's actions on it (the manufacturer) and its polish, since it was a member of the "public." The purpose of the antitrust laws is to protect the interstate market from illegal restraints. If such restraints are applied to one person in the interstate market, then free competition is hurt and damaged. In Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,316, the United States Supreme Court held that a combination "is not to be tolerated merely because the victim is just one merchant whose business is so small that his destruction makes little difference to the economy. . . ." Here, when the oil company hurt and damaged the polish manufacturer, "it hurt and damaged free competition, the touchstone of the antitrust laws." While the trial court was of the view that public injury was "conclusively established" by a prior Government decree entered against the oil company, the error was not prejudicial since "public injury" was proved by the manufacturer's proof of its own damages, and the trial court's other instructions left to the jury all of the proper elements of a treble damage case.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9009.475, 9009.900.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Sufficiency of Proof—"Just and Reasonable Estimate" of Damages—Lost Profits—Competitor's Sales of "Comparable" Product as Basis for Estimating Lost Profits.—A jury verdict of $7900 as the damage which a manufacturer of automobile polish suffered by reason of the fact that it was "denied access" to an oil company's independent service stations was not unjust or unreasonable. The quantum of proof required to establish the amount of damage is not as great as that required to establish the fact of damage. Here, the jury was properly instructed that the plaintiff was entitled to an approximation of what its profits would have been if its rights had not been interfered with. The manufacturer could not prove precisely how many cases of polish "were not sold," but it presented to the jury a realistic formula to assist it in arriving at a just and reasonable verdict. The manufacturer offered proof that its product sold as well, or, in many instances, 3 to 7 times better, than a "comparable" product. Then, the manufacturer offered evidence that it was staffed, equipped, and able to produce sufficient polish to meet additional sales; that its net profit per case was $0.57; and that the oil company, during the pertinent period, had purchased 4707 cases of the "comparable" product. Then, contending that the jury could infer that its polish outsold the "comparable" product 3 to 1, the manufacturer estimated that, if it had not been "denied access" to the oil company's stations, 14,121 cases of its polish would have been sold at those stations. There was little difference between that formula and the computations made in personal injury cases. Both are tort actions and, in each case, the plaintiff cannot prove his "dollars and cents" damages to a mathematical certainty.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.400.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Damages Recoverable—Attorneys' Fees—Reasonableness of Fees Allowed.—An oil company, on its appeal from a judgment entered on a jury verdict that it had violated the antitrust laws by preventing its independent service stations from purchasing a manufacturer's automobile polish, abandoned its objections to the reasonableness of a $7500 attorney's fee based on a trebled judgment of $23,700. In any event, the reviewing court did not consider the allowance unreasonable.

[Treble Damage Action]

James M. Carter, District Judge [In full text]: This is an appeal from a judgment entered on a jury verdict in a private treble damage action under the anti-trust laws. It presents two questions, (1) the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment, (2) the correctness of instructions given the jury on the effect of a prior decree in a government anti-trust case.

[Attorney's Fees]

There was originally presented a third question, the reasonableness of an allowance of $7500.00 attorney's fee based on the trebled judgment of $23,700.00. This point was abandoned by appellant Richfield during the oral arguments on the appeal. In any event we do not consider the allowance of such attorney's fee unreasonable.

[Prior Proceedings]

This case has been here before. In Karseal Corporation v. Richfield Oil Corporation (1955) [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,020], 221 F. 2d 358, this same panel of the court held that the amended complaint stated a cause of action and reversed a district court judgment dismissing the action. Reference is made to that decision for the pertinent allegations of the amended complaint.

This action was based upon a prior decree in the government's civil anti-trust action against the Richfield Oil Corporation, United States v. Richfield Oil Corporation, (S. D. Cal. 1951) [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,878], 99 Fed. Supp. 280, affirmed per curiam in Richfield Oil Corporation v. United States (1952) [1952 Trade Cases ¶ 67,262], 343 U. S. 922, 72 S. Ct. 665, 96 L. Ed. 1334. That case will hereafter be referred to as the Richfield case.

The Richfield case held generally that Richfield's handling of its TBA items, (tires, batteries and accessories) was illegal and in violation of the anti-trust laws because of Richfield requirements by contracts and agreements of exclusive dealing by independent service stations in the TBA items supplied by Richfield. Included within "accessories" under the terms of the Richfield decree, were "automobile waxes and polishes." Karseal's wax and polishes were not expressly named in the Richfield decree. The trial court in the Richfield case concluded and found that the exclusive dealing practices and agreements had

> "the necessary and intended effect of denying manufacturers and suppliers of . . . automotive accessories, competitive to those manufactured or sponsored by Richfield, access to a substantial number of outlets." [1]

Karseal, claiming that it was within the target area of Richfield's violation of the anti-trust laws and was proximately damaged by Richfield's illegal acts, brought the present action, seeking damages in the sum of $135,000 and praying that the damages be trebled. After the reversal of the dismissal of the action in Karseal v. Richfield (supra), the case was transferred to another judge, (Honorable Leon Yankwich) and was tried to a jury. A verdict in the sum of $7900.00 was returned. The verdict was trebled and judgment entered for $23,700.00, attorney's fees and costs. The district court had jurisdiction of the cause, Sec. 4 of the Clayton Act. 15 U. S. C. A., Sec. 15. This court has jurisdiction of the appeal, 28 U. S. C. A., Secs. 1291, and 1294. The appeal was timely filed.

I

The Evidence is Sufficient to Support the Verdict and the Judgment

[Sufficiency of Evidence]

Richfield makes dual contentions—

(a) That there was not substantial evidence of an illegal restraint on Karseal's product, and (b) That there was insufficient evidence of damage.

[1] The quotation is from a conclusion of law. The findings were to the same effect.

A. Sufficiency of the evidence as to illegal restraint.

[Proof Required]

Flintkote Company v. Lysfjord (9 Cir. 1957) [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,674], 246 F. 2d 368, cert. denied, 355 U. S. 835, states as follows:

> "We take it that the controlling rule today in seeking damages for loss of profits in antitrust cases is that the plaintiff is required to establish with reasonable probability the existence of some causal connection between defendant's wrongful act and some loss of anticipated revenue. Once that has been accomplished, the jury will be permitted to 'make a just and reasonable estimate of the damage based on relevant data, and render its verdict accordingly,' Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., [327 U. S. 251], supra, at p. 264. The cases have drawn a distinction between the quantum of proof necessary to show the fact as distinguished from the amount of damage; the burden as to the former is the more stringent one. In other words, the fact of injury must first be shown before the jury is allowed to estimate the amount of damage."[2] (p. 392). [Italics by the Court]

[Prior Government Decree]

The prior Richfield decree which was admissible and used in evidence against the appellant, determined that Richfield had violated the antitrust laws by agreements and understandings, written and oral, directly affecting and unreasonably restraining the course of interstate commerce in TBA automobile accessories, including waxes and polishes. Thus, the Richfield decree itself was prima facie evidence of the restraint of commerce in connection with waxes and polishes. There was substantial evidence that this restraint was not only applied to waxes and polishes generally, but to Karseal's product, "Wax Seal."

[Rule on Appeal]

Richfield's brief argues the evidence most favorable to its position as if the matter were now before a trial court or jury for decision.

The rule is clear that on appeal from a judgment based upon a jury's verdict, the verdict and judgment based thereon will be sustained if there is substantial evidence in the record in support thereof. We are required to view the evidence in a manner most favorable to the prevailing party, Glasser v. United States, (1942) 315 U. S. 60, 69, 62 S. Ct. 457, 87 L. Ed. 680; Woodward Laboratories v. United States, (9 Cir. 1952) 198 F. 2d 995; Las Vegas Merchant Plumber Assn. v. United States, (9 Cir. 1954) [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,673] 210 F. 2d 732, 742; Flintkote Co. v. Lysfjord, (supra) p. 375. The prevailing party is entitled to rely upon evidence most favorable to its position.

[Exclusion of Product—Threats]

The testimony offered by Karseal consisted of distributors and salesmen for "Wax Seal," a former Richfield service station operator, a former merchandiser for Richfield, a former TBA man for Richfield and an independent service station operator and others. Without enumerating the testimony in detail, the record shows that distributors for "Wax Seal" were generally unsuccessful in their efforts to sell their product to Richfield TBA men and Richfield service stations; that a Richfield representative told the Richfield service station operator to get Wax Seal out of his window or they would both lose their jobs; that salesmen for "Wax Seal" were told not to come in when Richfield men were around; that "Wax Seal" was occasionally sold in Richfield service stations but kept under the counter and not displayed. A former merchandiser for Richfield testified that he would warn and threaten Richfield dealers who carried non-authorized TBA products. A Richfield merchandiser told a Richfield operator he did not want to see "Wax Seal" in the station.

Thus it was apparent to the jury that independent Richfield service station men were threatened and discouraged from purchas-

[2] Other cases to the same effect are: Wolfe v. National Lead Co., (9 Cir. 1955) [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,094], 225 F. 2d 427, cert. den. 350 U. S. 915; G. & P. Amusement Co. v. Regent Theatre Co., (N. D. Ohio, 1952) [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,360], 107 F. Supp. 453, 461; affirmed per curiam (6 Cir. 1954) [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,888], 216 F. 2d 749; Chiplets, Inc., v. June Dairy Products Co., Inc., (D. N. J. 1953) [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,625], 114 F. Supp. 129, 143-144; *Turner Glass Corporation v. ing "Wax Seal" and when occasionally they did purchase, were required to conceal this fact from Richfield and hide the product from view. The jury, looking at the evidence most favorable to Karseal, could conclude that there was a general pattern of exclusion of "Wax Seal" from Richfield service stations, for which Richfield was responsible. As the trial judge stated during discussion with counsel, Richfield

> "had no right to tell the operators of stations, independent operators and not [Richfield] employees, not to buy other products."

[Government Decree—Additional Evidence Required]

In view of the prima facie effect of the prior antitrust decree, all that plaintiff was required to do, as far as proving restraint is concerned, was to show that the general, restraint applicable to waxes and polishes referred to in the prior decree was actually applied to the Karseal product, "Wax Seal."

[Evidence Sufficient]

There was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury's conclusion as to restraint.

B. The evidence as to damage was sufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment.

(a) Causal connection between restraint and damage.

[General Rule]

Richfield concedes that once Karseal had shown that the defendant had violated the antitrust laws, and the further fact that Karseal actually suffered damage to its business or property as a result of such violation, the jury was permitted to make a just and reasonable estimate of the amount of plaintiff's damage. But Richfield insists that there must be first, proof not only of an unreasonable restraint of trade by the defendant, but also a causal connection between defendant's act and a loss of anticipated revenue to plaintiff.

[Restraint "Applied" to Product as Proof of Causation]

Karseal concedes this general statement of the law but asserts that having shown the illegal restraint applied to its product, it had proved the causal connection between the defendant's wrongful act and the loss of revenue. We agree. It seems patent that the restraint applied would result in some loss of business.

[Cases]

Wolfe v. National Lead Co., (supra) is cited by Richfield for its holding that there was no proof that the plaintiffs had suffered damage. Richfield states,

> "In affirming the court pointed out the important distinction in the quantum of proof required as to the fact as distinguished from the amount of damages."

In the case at hand there was clear causal connection between the alleged restraints applied and damage suffered.

Contrast the factual basis in Monticello Tobacco Co. Inc. v. American Tobacco Co. (2 Cir. 1952) [1952 Trade Cases ¶ 67,300], 197 F. 2d 629, with the factual situation here. In Monticello, plaintiff could not prevail because of absence of a showing of causal connection between the illegal acts of the defendants and the "jobbers' refusals to handle plaintiffs' products." (p. 633). Here the impact of Richfield's exclusive dealing practices on Karseal was shown by evidence the jury was entitled to and did believe.

(b) A just and reasonable estimate of damage.

[Lost Profits]

How then is plaintiff to make a showing which will permit the jury to make a just and reasonable estimate of its damage? The Richfield brief concedes,

> "It is, of course, true that the quantum of proof required to establish the amount of damage is not and should not be as great as that required to establish the fact of damage. If there is substantial evidence that damage to the plaintiff in fact resulted from wrongful conduct of defendant, it is proper to permit the jury to make a just and reasonable estimate of the amount thereof. . . ."
> "A study of the adjudicated cases in this area readily dispels any impression that this question of damages is governed by an application of the common law rule of reasonable certainty. The cases have long since departed from this rule in anti-trust legislation. Story Parchment Co. v. Paterson, supra, 282 U. S. at page 565, 51 S. Ct. 248," Flintkote Company v. Lysfjord (supra) p. 391. See the general discussion following the above quotation, pp. 391-394.

There is no particular way for a plaintiff, injured by a defendant's violation of the anti-trust laws to show precisely what sales it lost. It certainly cannot prove precisely how many cases of "Wax Seal" were not sold.

To assist the jury in making a "just and reasonable estimate of damage," plaintiff offered proof which the jury could believe and consider, that "Wax Seal" sold on the free market, as well or in many instances 3 to 7 times better than a product known as "Mac's," and that "Mac's" was generally a comparable product. Evidence was offered which the jury was entitled to believe that during the period of time involved in this case that Richfield purchased from Mac's Super Gloss Company, 4707 cases of "Mac's" polish. Karseal then contended that the jury could infer that "Wax Seal" outsold "Mac's" 3 to 1, and that therefore had plaintiff not been denied access to the 3000 Richfield service stations during the six years between 1947 and 1953, that an estimate of approximately 14,121 cases of "Wax Seal" would have been sold at Richfield stations. Karseal offered evidence which the jury were entitled to believe, that it was staffed, equipped and able to produce sufficient "Wax Seal" to meet these additional sales. It also offered evidence, which the jury was entitled to believe, that its net profit per case of "Wax Seal" for the period in question was 57¢ per case.

Had the jury based its verdict on this computation, the result of course would have exceeded the verdict rendered by about $150.00 but the jury could have well taken into account that some "Wax Seal" was actually sold by the Richfield stations.

We do not see much difference between the suggested formula as an assist in arriving at just and reasonable damages, and a chart placed on a blackboard in a personal injury case, where plaintiff's lawyer outlines his computations as to loss of earnings, pain and suffering, and the various other items of damage. The plaintiff is not required to prove with mathematical certainty the amount of its damage resulting from a defendant's violation of the antitrust laws.

Story Parchment Company v. Paterson Parchment Paper Company, (supra) at pp. 562-563, states:

> ". . . It is true that there was uncertainty as to the extent of the damage, but there was none as to the fact of damage; and there is a clear distinction between the measure of proof necessary to establish the fact that petitioner had sustained some damage, and the measure of proof necessary to enable the jury to fix the amount. The rule which precludes the recovery of uncertain damages applies to such as are not the certain result of the wrong, not to those damages which are definitely attributable to the wrong and only uncertain in respect of their amount . . .
> "Where the tort itself is of such a nature as to preclude the ascertainment of damages with certainty, it would be a perversion of fundamental principles of justice to deny all relief to the injured person, and thereby relieve the wrongdoer from making any amend for his acts. In such case, while the damages may not be determined by mere speculation or guess, if will be enough if the evidence show the extent of the damages as a matter of just and reasonable inference, although the result be only approximate. The wrongdoer is not entitled to complain that they cannot be measured with the exactness and precision that would be possible if the case which he alone is responsible for making, were otherwise. . . .". [Emphasis added]

Bordonaro Bros. Theatres, Inc. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc. (2 Cir. 1949) [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,467], 176 F. 2d 594, at 597, states:

> ". . . Damages in such a situation necessarily cannot be assessed with mathematical precision; but the testimony of plaintiff's expert witness, Samuelson, 'while purely an estimate and introduced as such, was proof of a kind as definite and certain as the subject-matter admitted.' William H. Rankin Co. v. Associated Bill Posters of U. S. and Canada, 2 Cir. 42 F. 2d 152, 155, certiorari denied Associated Bill Posters of U. S. and Canada v. William H. Rankin Co., 282 U. S. 864, 51 S. Ct. 37, 75 L. Ed. 765. Defendants must not be allowed to create their own immunity by the extent and duration of their conspiracy. . . ."[3]

The record showed a restraint in interstate commerce on waxes and polishes which moved in interstate commerce, and particularly a restraint upon "Wax Seal" manufactured and sold by Karseal. It is patent that damage would result. The jury could conclude from the evidence that this restraint applied to Karseal was a planned and continuous one, and that it generally affected to a greater or less degree the majority of the 3000 Richfield service stations. The jury had evidence before it which indicated that Karseal out-sold on the free market a comparable product such as "Mac's" and had evidence as to how much of the "Mac's" product was sold in Richfield stations during the time involved.

We equate the just and reasonable estimate of damage to the just and reasonable verdict the jury must render in a personal injury case. Both are Tort actions. In neither can the plaintiff prove to any mathematical certainty, what are the damages in dollars and cents.

Story Parchment Company v. Paterson Parchment Paper Company, (supra) at 565, states:

> ". . . There are many cases in which damages are allowed where the element of uncertainty is at least equal to that in the present case—as, for example, copyright and trade mark cases, cases of unfair competition, and many cases of personal injury . . .". [Emphasis added]

Under all the facts in the case the damages must have a reasonable and fair relationship to the type, extent and period of the restraint applied, the number of outlets affected by the restraint and the kind of product, its price and salability, the profit made on sales, and an estimate of the amount of profit lost by reason of the illegal activities of the defendant. There was here proof of such matters.

In Flintkote Co. v. Lysfjord, (supra) plaintiffs were in their first year of working for themselves with no prior record of the success of their business. In the case at hand there was proof of gross dollars sales of $130,000 in the year ending June 30, 1948 and gross dollars sales of $501,000, $675,000, $799,000, $621,000 and $686,000 in the following years. This was not proof of business activity prior to the application of the illegal restraints, but during the period thereof. We see no reason why a plaintiff who has a substantial volume of sales during a period of illegal restraints would not be damaged by such restraint even if its business started during such period of restraint. The jury might have believed such volume of business indicated no restraint and no damage, but it found to the contrary.

This case is not controlled by Flintkote Co. v. Lysfjord, (supra) or Wolfe v. National Lead Co., (supra). Both are distinguishable. Here there was proof of illegal restraint, obvious causal connection between restraint and damage and proof of sufficient facts to permit the jury to make a just and reasonable estimate of damages.

[Jury Instructions—Reasonableness of Verdict]

Although Karseal sued for $135,000, its counsel realistically approached the problem and presented to the jury a realistic formula, not as exact proof of its damage but to assist the jury in arriving at a just and reasonable verdict. The instructions on damages, unchallenged, were fair and accurate and presented fully the applicable law on damages in this type of action.[4] Looking at the entire record, we cannot say that a verdict of $7900 as the damage suffered for restraint applied on a majority of 3000 service stations in a six year period was unjust or unreasonable.

I instruct you that the purpose of damage in an anti-trust action of this sort is to put the plaintiff in as good a position as if the illegal acts had never happened.

The law, therefore, allows you, as members of the jury, to arrive at an amount of damages which, in your judgment, under the proof in the case, equals the amount of plaintiff's profit lost as a result of defendant's illegal actions. In this regard, you cannot return a verdict based upon mere speculation, guesswork, or surmise, but the plaintiff, if you find it has suffered injury, is entitled by law to an approximation of what its profits would have been had its rights not been interfered with. Let's re-read that last sentence. In this regard, you cannot return a verdict based upon mere speculation, guesswork, or surmise, but the plaintiff, if you find it has suffered injury, is entitled by law to an approximation of what its profits would have been had its rights not been interfered with.

If you determine that defendant did in fact prevent some of its dealers from purchasing plaintiff's product Wax Seal, and that these dealers would otherwise have purchased plaintiff's product, plaintiff's right to recover is limited to the profits which plaintiff would have made on those sales which plaintiff's distributors would have made but for the action of defendant.

Where the plaintiff had an established business, and the future profits could be shown by past experience, it is permissible to arrive at net profits by deducting from the gross profits of an earlier period an estimated expense of doing business. Damages are not rendered uncertain because they cannot be calculated with absolute exactness. It is sufficient if a reasonable basis of computation is

II.

THE INSTRUCTIONS ON THE USE TO BE MADE BY THE JURY OF THE PRIOR DECREE

After giving the general instructions and explaining to the jury the substance of the prior equity decree, the court gave the following instructions which Richfield contends is error:

". . . The ordinary meaning of the phrase 'prima facie evidence' is this: 'Prima facie evidence' of a fact is such evidence as, in the judgment of the law, is sufficient to establish the fact, and, if afforded, although the result be only approximated.

If you come to a determination that the plaintiff has been damaged as a result of illegal acts upon the part of the defendant, you may arrive at the amount of such damages as follows:

First: You may consider the evidence regarding the relative amount of auto polish and auto wax sold in the independent service stations which were under written and oral contractual agreements with the Richfield Oil Corporation.

Second: You may consider, in connection with the foregoing, the amount of gross profit which the plaintiff derived from the sale of its product.

Third: You may consider the amount of plaintiff's auto polish and wax sold in service stations under contract with Richfield Oil Corporation in which plaintiff was able to place its product for sale.

The doctrine of proximate cause requires plaintiff to prove that but for oral agreements between defendant and service station dealers the injury complained of by plaintiff would not have occurred. If plaintiff did not suffer any injury to its business or property or if plaintiff was injured by causes other than acts of the defendant, then such injury was not proximately caused by the acts of the defendant and plaintiff is not entitled to recover from the defendant.

Plaintiff's right to recover is limited to actual damages, the amount of which can be determined with reasonable certainty from the evidence. Plaintiff is not entitled to damages which, as I stated before, are merely speculative, remote or uncertain. I do not mean to say that plaintiff would be precluded from recovery because of the fact that damages may not be exactly computed. Damages are recoverable if you are satisfied from the evidence that they may be reasonably approximated upon the evidence in the case. The question of the amount that plaintiff would be entitled to, if you conclude plaintiff is entitled to a recovery, is entirely and solely your responsibility, but it must be based upon some evidence in the case as a foundation that furnishes at least a reasonable approximation of damages that plaintiff has sustained, and cannot exceed the amount prayed in the complaint.

In determining damages you may consider the loss, if any, of profit which the plaintiff has suffered when deprived of the right to sell its products through retail service stations under contract to defendant, Richfield Oil Corporation.

In arriving at the extent of such damage suffered by the plaintiff, you may compare the amount of cleaner, auto polish, and wax sold in such service stations by one of the plaintiff's competitors whose products were not denied access to these stations under contract with Richfield Oil Corporation. After having selected a comparable product or products to plaintiff's product, you may ascertain the gross profit which plaintiff would have received from its sale of an equivalent amount of auto cleaner, polish and wax, had it not been denied access to retail stations under contract with the Richfield Oil Corporation. In no case may you award damage which exceeds the amount asked for in the plaintiff's complaint, and as to which testimony was given in the record.

However, the mere fact that the plaintiff may or may not have made as much profit as some competitor does not prove or disprove a violation of the antitrust laws. In a competitive system it is natural that some people will be more successful than others.

The question whether any injury to plaintiff's business or property was caused by the allegedly unlawful acts of the defendant is one that you should not consider prior to determining the issues whether there actually were oral agreements between defendants and service station dealers relating to plaintiff's product. If you decide against plaintiff on this question, it would not be necessary to consider the question of injury and it would be your duty to immediately return a verdict in favor of the defendant.

There is evidence that during parts of the period for which plaintiff claims damages plaintiff either had no distributor in some of the areas in which defendant does business or plaintiff's distributor in some areas made only limited efforts to make sales of plaintiff's product. Plaintiff was not injured by any act of defendant if a dealer did not buy plaintiff's product because he was not called on and requested to buy. Accordingly, if you should determine that defendant did in fact have agreements or understandings with its dealers which caused the dealers to refrain from purchasing plaintiff's product, plaintiff can recover only the profit it would have made on those sales which it proves were lost because of defendant's actions.

The fact that the Court has instructed you with respect to damages is not to be taken by you as an indication that the Court believes or does not believe that plaintiff is entitled to recover damages. Such instructions are given to you solely to guide you in arriving at the amount of your verdict only in the event you find from the preponderance of the evidence and instructions of the Court that plaintiff is entitled to recover. If from the evidence and the instructions of the Court you find that plaintiff is not entitled to recover, then of course you are to disregard entirely the instruction which the Court has given you concerning damages.

not rebutted, remains sufficient for that purpose.

"But in this case the phrase 'prima facie' has a different meaning. This arises from the fact that the section read to you uses the word 'estoppel.' An 'issue of fact' as to which the judgment operates as an estoppel' must be an issue as to an 'ultimate fact' such as is required in allegations of fact in good pleadings or in findings of fact in cases tried to the court and must be the ultimate fact without which judgment would lack support in an essential particular.

"When the plaintiff uses the decree to prove that restrictions applied to waxes and polishes, the defendant cannot controvert the general proposition that such restrictions existed. For that matter is what we call res judicata. He is 'estopped' to challenge the general fact. But he may still show that the restrictions were not enforced against the plaintiff's product and that, for this reason, the plaintiff suffered no damage.

"Therefore, it is still necessary in the present case, in order for the plaintiff to recover, for it to prove to your satisfaction, by the weight of the credible evidence that the defendant in an unreasonable manner prevented, access of the plaintiff's product to Richfield stations."

Other instructions on the use of the prior anti-trust decree are included in the footnote,[5] were not objected to by Richfield and were correct statements of law.

[5] The complete instructions given by the court insofar as the prior antitrust decree was concerned, are as follows: The court has admitted into evidence the decree, findings of fact, and conclusions of law entered in the case of the United States v. Richfield Oil Corporation, Civil Action 6896-Y. These findings and decree were entered in a civil suit instituted by the United States in this District against the defendant, Richfield Oil Corporation, charging a violation of the Anti-Trust Laws, by the defendant therein with respect to various trade practices and contracts used by the defendant in the sale and distribution of automobile accessories, including waxes and polishes. Among other things, it is provided by federal statute that a final decree or judgment obtained by the Federal Government in such a proceeding under the Anti-Trust Laws shall be prima facie evidence against a defendant named in judgment or decree as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the Government and such defendant.

Such decree is prima facie evidence in this case as to any question which was put in issue and directly determined against defendant Richfield Oil Corporation.

"Prima facie evidence" means evidence which is sufficient standing alone and on its face, to establish the existence of a given fact or facts, and which, if not rebutted or overcome by other evidence, will remain sufficient to establish such fact or facts throughout the trial. I shall amplify this matter further on in the instructions.

The following matters among others were put in issue and directly determined in the United States v. Richfield Oil Corporation case against defendant and are prima facie evidence against the defendant in this case:

1. That the defendant has violated the Anti-Trust Laws by committing the following acts during the period involved in this case:

(a) By entering into contracts, agreements, and understandings, both written and oral, directly affecting and unreasonably restraining the course of interstate commerce in automobile accessories, including waxes and polishes.

(b) substantially lessening competition, foreclosing competition and attempting to create a monopoly in the sale and distribution of automobile accessories including waxes and polishes, and which

(c) unreasonably restrained and substantially lessened competition in interstate commerce in the six States of the Western Area in the sale and distribution of automobile accessories, including waxes and polishes, and

(d) which had the necessary and intended effect of denying the independent service station operators access to products including waxes and polishes competitive to those handled and sponsored by Richfield and

(e) confined the independent operators to the handling of and dealing in automobile accessories manufactured, including waxes and polishes handled or sponsored by Richfield.

The contracts between Richfield and the various stations related to many products. However, you are concerned only with them insofar as they relate to waxes and polishes.

2. More specifically, the following matters were put in issue and directly determined in the United States v. Richfield Oil Corporation case against defendant:

Richfield has for many years past, and was at the time of the decree, leasing and acquiring title to service station sites and entering into contractual relations with operators of service stations as retail outlets within the western area; that the term "service stations", as used aforesaid, refers to a retail outlet at which petroleum products and/or "automotive accessories" manufactured or "sponsored" by Richfield are sold to the motoring public. The term "automotive accessories" as used hereinabove, includes waxes and polishes and other like items. The word "sponsored," as used hereinafter, refers to those petroleum products and/or "automotive accessories" not manufactured or produced by Richfield but sold and distributed at service stations, the sale and distribution of which are handled or arranged for at service stations by Richfield; that TBA distributors are distributors appointed by Richfield who receive and handle the orders of Richfield service station operators for automobile accessories within a marketing area designated by Richfield; that Richfield has entered into various written and oral agreements and understandings with service station operators.

The evidence in this case relates to three different types of service stations. The first type, including approximately 1350 stations, involved a lease-out or "L-O" type of arrange-

(a) Richfield has waived any error by failing to state the grounds for its objection.

Though not raised by Karseal, we are concerned at the outset as to whether there was sufficient compliance with Rule 51, Rules of Civil Procedure, concerning objections to instructions given. Rule 51, Rules of Civil Procedure, provides in part:

"No party may assign as error the giving or the failure to give an instruction unless he objects thereto before the jury retires to consider its verdict, stating ment. These stations were either owned by Richfield or leased by Richfield from a third person. In either event, the station was then leased by Richfield to an independent operator. The only written agreement between Richfield and L-O station operators was a lease.

The second type, including approximately 280 service stations involved three written agreements or a so-called "3-C" type of arrangement. These stations were either owned or leased from third persons by an independent operator. Under the 3-C arrangement such stations were leased to Richfield and leased back by Richfield to the operator. At the same time, Richfield and operator entered into a sales contract for petroleum products. The only written agreements between Richfield and 3-C station operators were the two leases and the sales contract.

The third type, including approximately 1370 service stations, involved a so-called "337" arrangement. These stations were either owned or leased from third persons by the station operator. The station operator entered into two agreements with Richfield, one of which provided for the painting of the service station and equipment with Richfield's colors and insignia at Richfield's expense, and the other of which provided for the sale of petroleum products to the operator by Richfield. These were the only written agreements between Richfield and 337 station operators.

You are instructed that the foregoing written agreements standing alone were an entirely lawful and valid method of establishing the business relationship between Richfield and independent station operators distributing its products.

However, oral agreements between Richfield and the operators of the foregoing three types of stations are alleged to have been entered into at substantially the same time as the written agreements and relate to the handling by the operator at his service station of petroleum products and automotive accessories, including waxes and polishes, manufactured or sponsored by Richfield on an exclusive basis.

Beginning in 1944, Richfield inaugurated a new TBA program (TBA meaning tires, batteries, accessories) for distributing its automotive accessories to the L-O, 3-C and 337 dealer service stations. Since 1944, Richfield has sold and distributed automotive accessories, which it purchases from various manufacturers and suppliers, directly to the L-O, 3-C or 337 dealer service stations or through TBA distributors designated by it.

There is evidence that L-O station operators were instructed by Richfield that they were to deal in gasoline, oil and automotive accessories for which the sale to these operators was made or arranged by Richfield. Plaintiff contends that this resulted in agreements that L-O station operators would not deal in wax polish manufactured by plaintiff. Richfield contends that the instructions given by it to L-O station operators were directed primarily to major accessory items such as tires, tubes and batteries and that in actual fact L-O station operators were not prevented from handling and, in fact, did handle plaintiff's wax polish. Plaintiff has the burden of proving that there were oral agreements between Richfield and L-O station operators, which applied to plaintiff's wax polish, and that in fact such oral agreements were carried out with respect to plaintiff's wax polish.

Plaintiff also contends that such instructions were given and resulted in agreements that 3-C and 337 station operators would not deal in plaintiff's polish. Richfield contends that no such instructions were given and that in actual fact 3-C and 337 station operators were free to deal and, in fact, did deal in plaintiff's wax polish. Plaintiff has the burden of proving that there were oral agreements between Richfield and such station operators applicable to plaintiff's wax polish, and that such agreements were in fact carried out with respect to plaintiff's product, to their damage.

It is not enough in a private suit of this character for a plaintiff to show simply that there was a violation of the antitrust laws. It is essential that plaintiff establish not only the fact of such violation but also that it resulted directly and proximately in injury to its business or property. In this case plaintiff would not be entitled to any recovery unless it had shown to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence that it had actually lost sales of its wax polish by reason of the allegedly unlawful acts of the defendant and/or that it suffered a loss of profits by reason thereof. . . .

Plaintiff alleges in its complaint that defendant prevented its dealers from purchasing the plaintiff's product Wax Seal from plaintiff's enfranchised distributors and their salesmen from July, 1947, when plaintiff was first organized, to January 3, 1953. You are instructed that in no event can plaintiff recover damages for any period subsequent to January 3, 1953.

The law provides:

"Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the Anti-Trust Laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent."

This means that there is made available to a private litigant, such as the plaintiff in this case, as prima facie evidence, any fact which was at issue and was determined in the Richfield-Government suit with respect to the defendant therein. The proof so offered, plus a showing that the conspiracy had an impact upon the plaintiff's product—Wax Seal—and that it suffered damage as a result, would be sufficient to establish a prima facie case. . . .

The ordinary meaning of the phrase "prima facie evidence" is this: "Prima facie evidence" of a fact is such evidence as, in the judgment distinctly the matter to which he objects and the grounds of his objection . . .". [Emphasis added.]

Counsel were given an opportunity out of the hearing of the jury to make their objections to the instructions given. Only two objections were made and both were of a most sketchy character. Counsel for Richfield stated:

> "The only ones to which we have objection Your Honor, are ones with respect to the effect of 'prima facie' . . . And of the others, there were two instructions in which the words 'gross profits' were used."

of the law, is sufficient to establish the fact, and, if not rebutted, remains sufficient for that purpose.

But in this case the phrase "prima facie" has a different meaning. This arises from the fact that the section read to you uses the word "estoppel."

An "issue of fact" as to which the judgment operates as an "estoppel" must be an issue as to an "ultimate fact" such as is required in allegations of fact in good pleadings or in findings of fact in cases tried to the court and must be the ultimate fact without which judgment would lack support in an essential particular.

When the plaintiff uses the decree to prove that restrictions applied to waxes and polishes, the defendant cannot controvert the general proposition that such restrictions existed. For that matter is what we call res judicata. He is "estopped" to challenge the general fact. But he may still show that the restrictions were not enforced against the plaintiff's product and that, for this reason, the plaintiff suffered no damage.

Therefore, it is still necessary in the present case, in order for the plaintiff to recover, for it to prove to your satisfaction, by the weight of the credible evidence that the defendant in an unreasonable manner prevented access of the plaintiff's product to Richfield stations.

This for the reason that there was no finding in the government suit concerning plaintiff's special product "Wax Seal,"—let's read that again. This for the reason that there was no special finding in the government suit concerning plaintiff's special product "Wax Seal." You have before you evidence of both the plaintiff and the defendant with respect to the issue whether plaintiff's product was restrained and you should make your own determination on the basis of this evidence whether plaintiff's distributors and their salesmen were actually denied access to Richfield stations. . . .

At the risk of repetition, I reiterate that it is important that you understand the relation of this case to the government case decided in 1948. That case was instituted by the government of the United States. It was not a criminal case. It was a civil case in which the Government alleged that Richfield through tie-in agreements and other methods was guilty of certain practices which were in violation of the antitrust laws.

In that case, I found in substance that certain practices were in violation of the antitrust acts and I issued an injunction prohibiting Richfield from indulging in those acts in the future.

The findings and the decree in that case are before you. The findings are marked Plaintiff's Exhibit I and the Decree is marked Plaintiff's Exhibit I-A, which you may take with you to the jury room along with the other exhibits. In order that you may understand the proper relation of the findings and decree in that case to this one, I state again to you generally that the law provides that any person who has been injured or damaged by any acts in violation of the antitrust laws may bring an action for damages.

The Government's suit was not for damages and nobody was named as plaintiff except the Government of the United States. The object of the Government was to stop certain practices and witnesses were brought to show that those practices were indulged in.

Now, the law provides also, as you were informed at the beginning, that anyone who has been injured by these practices may bring a private suit for damages.

In that private suit, the plaintiff, the person who is injured who has been damaged, brings a suit just as anybody else would bring an action who claims to have been injured by someone else's wrongful act.

That is the type of suit we are trying here. The Government of the United States has nothing to do with this lawsuit. This is a private lawsuit between two private parties. However, the law provides that in any such action the parties may, if they want to, use the decree which the Court has entered in the Government case, and that decree shall be prima facie evidence of the facts that the court found. I have already explained to you fully the meaning of this phrase.

The decree merely finds that certain acts were done. For instance, with relation to the present lawsuit, the decree did find that certain restrictive practices were indulged in relating to the waxes and polishes but it does not specify what the waxes and polishes were. It merely said "waxes and polishes."

And that is the only purpose for which that decree may be considered by you. The decree in itself, does not make out a case for plaintiff. The plaintiff, Karseal, has to show that that prohibition against waxes and polishes was actually exercised as to its wax and that by reason of the exercise of that policy as to it, it was damaged by losing sales it could otherwise have made.

To sum up: There are three elements to this lawsuit. First, the decree in the government suit. That stands undisputed as to the general practices involved. The second element is the effect, if any, of the restrictions found in the decree on the plaintiff's product. That is subject to proof on the part of both sides.

The third element is what, if any, damage the plaintiff has suffered, that is, the effect of the practice on the plaintiff's product and whether by the enforcement of that practice, it suffered any damage at all. To that element also evidence was offered by both parties.

These are the three elements of the lawsuit. The instructions given state fully the legal principles which govern the determination of these questions. . . .

The objections as to the use of the words "gross profits" were considered by the court and the jury were subsequently instructed, with the consent of Richfield, that the court had inadvertently used the word "gross" and the court deleted it and instructed the jury to disregard it. No error is here assigned.

As to the objection to the instruction involving the words "prima facie" and to the use to be made of the prior anti-trust decree, in addition to the objection heretofore quoted which states no ground whatsoever, the following is all that appears in the record. After the court and counsel had agreed on correcting of the words "gross profits" in the instructions, a Richfield attorney stated:

> "The only objection we would have then would be to give our No. 14[6] as to the 'prima facie'."

The Court:

> "I think you are absolutely wrong on that, I stake my entire case on that."

Richfield counsel:

> "We will specifically except to that Your Honor." . . . "Your Honor, just one other point, if we may clear up this objection. We have excepted to the failure to give our instruction No. 14, and we, of course, except to the giving of the instruction on prima facie as given by Your Honor."

This certainly is not a compliance with the rule requiring that counsel state not only the matter to which he objects, but state "distinctly . . . the grounds of his objection."

It is true that in an earlier portion of the record long before the conference on instructions and the actual instruction of the jury, there was discussion of this problem,[7] and we think it is fair to say that prior to the time of the giving of the instructions, and at the time provided by statute, after the giving of instructions, for the making of objections thereto, counsel for Richfield knew the court's position and the court knew counsel's position. The court had stated:

> "The meaning of that word 'prima facie' does not mean that the defendant in a case of this character can come in and controvert that finding in the other case . . .", and again,

> ". . . this is a thing I have in mind, that they are prima facie to the practice, and that two things are necessary, one to relate the practice to you and then the proof of damage. . . .".[8]

Thus, although the court's position was well known to Richfield's counsel, when the time arrived to make objections, Rule 51 of the Rules of Civil Procedure was not complied with. The purpose of the Rule is to give the court a chance to correct an erroneous instruction on the law. Though viewed realistically, we might hazard a guess that it would have been a difficult task, even by stating distinctly the grounds

[6] Defendant's Instruction No. 14.

The decree in the prior government case, to which I have referred, is only prima facie evidence with respect to certain matters. Prima facie evidence is such as to be sufficient to establish a fact unless it is rebutted by other evidence. If there is other evidence controverting the fact, you are required to make your own determination of that fact by weighing all of the evidence which pertains to it.

[7] No stipulation appears in the record that earlier objections and grounds stated by Richfield, might be incorporated by reference in the record at the time of making objection to the instructions given. This practice has been approved in the Ninth Circuit. See, Las Vegas Merchant Plumbers Assn. v. United States, (1954) [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,673], 210 F. 2d 732, 744-5 and cases cited therein. The trial judge in the case at bar does not follow this practice.

[8] Other statements showing the position of the trial judge are as follows:

". . . You can put before this jury facts, that this restriction was not effective, or partly effective only, as to Karseal, but you cannot say that it was not effective as to anybody . . .". And again. The Court: "Well, I am giving you the logic by which it would be an absolutely illogical situation, where a jury would determine not whether this plaintiff was damaged by this practice, but whether the practice existed as to all . . .". "The only thing I would submit to the jury is this: That the plaintiff has to show that this practice was applied to them in this territory, and that they were damaged by it, and then you can show that it wasn't applied as to them and/or they weren't damaged, and those are the only three elements I know of in a treble damage suit. . . ."

". . . But you can't go behind the decree and say this was not practiced as to anybody else." "You can say, 'We did not practice it as to Karseal,' but to go behind the decree and offer evidence that you did not practice it as to anyone would be to nullify this act of Congress, which only says it shall be prima facie, but defines it by saying the extent that people would be estopped . . .". And again. The Court: "If your theory is correct, then that section is absolutely meaningless, because you are going to retry before this jury, and I would have to instruct them, that they can find despite my decree not only didn't they exercise this as to this plaintiff, but they didn't exercise it as to anybody. . . .".

of the objection, to have caused the court to change its previously announced position. Nevertheless, to preserve the question, on appeal, not only should the objection have been made but the grounds thereof should have been distinctly stated, Husky Refining Co. v. Barnes (9 Cir. 1941) 119 F. 2d 715, 717, 134 ALR 1221; Shevlin-Hixon Co. v. Smith (9 Cir. 1947) 165 F. 2d 170, 179; Johnson v. Chesapeake and Ohio RR Co. (7 Cir. 1955) 227 F. 2d 858, 860-862; Franklin v. Shelton (10 Cir. 1957) 250 F. 2d 92, 98; see, Palmer v. Hoffman (1943) 318 U. S. 109, 119, Rehear. den. 318 U. S. 800.

Accordingly, Richfield's objection to the court's instructions is not available to it on this appeal. But we have nevertheless considered the question as to whether giving the instruction was error.

(b) It was error to so instruct but the error was not prejudicial.

Turning to the correctness of the questioned instructions, Section 5 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A., Sec. 16, provides as follows:

"§ 16. Judgment in favor of Government as evidence; limitation of actions

"A final judgment or decree rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the anti-trust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto; Provided, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken. . . .".

When the Clayton Act was originally passed by the House of Representatives it contained language which would make the government decree "conclusive evidence against the defendant of the law and facts determined in the prior equity action." However, the Bill was amended in the Senate substituting the words, "prima facie" for the word "conclusive." As so amended the Bill passed the Senate, was agreed to by the House conferees and became law. Report of the Senate Judiciary Committee set forth in the margin[9] pointed out that considerations of public policy might favor

[9] In section 6 there are two paragraphs as it came from the House. The first paragraph provides in substance that whenever in any suit in equity hereafter instituted by the United States a final decree is rendered against a defendant for violating any of the antitrust laws said decree shall, to the full extent to which such decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the United States and such defendant, constitute against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts, and be conclusive as to the same questions of law, in favor of any other party in any action brought under the provisions of any of the antitrust laws. It is proposed to amend this by making the decree in favor of the United States prima facie evidence against the same defendant in any suit brought by any other party under the antitrust laws as to all matters respecting which said decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto. The material difference between the House provision and the Senate amendment is of course whether the decree in favor of the Government shall be prima facie evidence against the same defendant in a subsequent suit by another party or be conclusive against such defendant. The Committee think there are considerations of public policy which favor the House provision of conclusiveness, but in the state of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in kindred cases they believe the law should go no further than to make the decree prima facie evidence. As a type of the opinions of the Supreme Court which have been examined by the committee in analogous cases attention is invited to the following:

"Without going at length into the discussion of a subject so often considered, we think the conclusion reached by the courts generally may be stated as follows: It is competent for the legislature to declare that a tax deed shall be prima facie evidence not only of the regularity of the sale, but of all prior proceedings, and of title in the purchaser, but that the legislature cannot deprive one of his property by making his adversary's claim to it, whatever that claim may be, conclusive of its own validity, and it cannot, therefore, make the tax deed conclusive evidence of the holder's title to the land.

"Mr. Cooley sums up his examination of the cases on this subject in the following statement: 'That a tax deed can be made conclusive evidence of title in the grantee we think is more than doubtful. The attempt is a plain violation of the great principle of Magna Charta, which has been incorporated in our bill of rights, and, if successful, would in many cases deprive the citizen of his property by proceedings absolutely without warrant of law or of justice; it is not in the power of any American legislature to deprive one of his property by making his adversary's claim to it, whatever that claim may be, conclusive of its own validity. It cannot, therefore, make the tax deed conclusive evidence of the holder's title to the land, or of the possible jurisdictional facts which would make out title. But the legislature might doubtless make the deed conclusive evidence of * * * everything except the essentials.' Cooley on Taxation, 521, 5th ed., 1886. (Marx v. Hanthorn, 148 U. S. 183.)" (Senate Report No. 698, 63rd Cong., 2d Sess. at p. 45).

the House proposition of conclusiveness, but that serious doubts existed as to the constitutionality of such a proposition, in that it would deprive one of his property without due process of law.

The reason for the concurrence by the House with the Senate amendment was expressly to the same effect.[10]

In Emich Motors Corporation v. General Motors Corporation, (7 Cir. 1950) [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,577], 181 F. 2d 70, reversed on other grounds [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,778], 340 U. S. 558, the Seventh Circuit quoted the following instruction given to the jury with approval:

> "Being prima facie evidence the judgment is not conclusive in this case. It is merely sufficient evidence of a violation by these defendants of the antitrust laws to put these defendants to their proof . . .". (p. 76).

In the same case in the Supreme Court, Emich Motors Corporation v. General Motors Corporation [1951] [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,778], 340 U. S. 558, the court said, (pp. 568-569):

> ". . . By its terms, however, § 5 makes a prior final judgment or decree in favor of the United States available to a private suitor as prima facie evidence of 'all matters respecting which' the judgment 'would be an estoppel' between the defendants and the United States. We think that Congress intended to confer, subject only to a defendant's enjoyment of its day in court against a new party, as large an advantage as the estoppel doctrine would afford had the Government brought suit.
> "The evidentiary use which may be made under § 5 of the prior conviction of respondents is thus to be determined by reference to the general doctrine of estoppel. * * * Accordingly, we think plaintiffs are entitled to introduce the prior judgment to establish prima facie all matters of fact and law necessarily decided by the conviction and the verdict on which it was based." [Emphasis added]

It is this portion of the Supreme Court's decision which the trial court apparently relied upon, together with Theatre Enterprises Inc. v. Paramount Film Distributing Corp. (1954) [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,640], 346 U. S. 537. But we think the judge's reliance on these cases was misplaced. The language relied upon from the Theatre Enterprise case (supra), as shown in the record of our case during prior discussion between the court and counsel, was the following:

> ". . . These instructions, petitioner argues, were 'so superficial and so limited as to deprive petitioner of any of the benefits conferred upon it' by § 5.
> "We cannot agree. The trial judge instructed in effect, that the Paramount decrees alone could not support a recovery by petitioner; additional evidence was required to relate the presumed Paramount conspiracy to Baltimore and to the claimed damage period. The reasons for this are clear. The Paramount decrees did not rest on findings, nor were the findings based on evidence, of a particular conspiracy concerning restrictions on runs and clearances in Baltimore theatres; yet such a conspiracy is the hub of plaintiff's claim. The Paramount case involved a conspiracy found to exist as of 1945, which was enjoined no later than June 25, 1948; but the conspiracy alleged here involves a claimed damage period running from February 1949 to March 1950. Indeed, the relevancy of Paramount to the instant case is slight . . .". (pp. 543-4).

However, the court in the Theatre Enterprise case (supra) had earlier stated:

> ". . . Petitioner next contends that the trial judge, when instructing the jury, failed to give sufficient weight to the Paramount decrees. The decrees were admitted in evidence pursuant to § 5 of the Clayton Act, which provides that a final judgment or decree rendered against a defendant in an equity suit brought by the United States under the antitrust laws 'shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto . . .' . Exercising his discretion to choose the precise manner of explaining a decree to the jury, the trial judge instructed that:

[10] Now let us pass to section 6, which refers to the "conclusiveness" or "prima facie" effect of judgments in Government suits against the trusts. As the House passed the section we made such judgment "conclusive". The Senate struck out the word "conclusive" and inserted "prima facie." Personally, I think the Senate did the best thing by making it "prima facie." I doubt whether the courts would have held that the "conclusive" provision was constitutional. On the other hand, I believe that the "prima facie" effect of the judgment is as powerful before a jury as if you had said that it was "conclusive". A great many lawyers, and some of the best ones in the Government service, think that a provision making the judgment conclusive would have rendered the bill unconstitutional, but with the "prima facie" provision it is constitutional and will be as effective as if we had left it "conclusive." (51 Cong. Rec., Part 16, p. 16,276.).

'. . . [T]hese same defendants had, at a time previous to the opening of the Crest Theatre, conspired together in restraint of trade in violation of these same Anti-Trust laws, in restricting to themselves first run and in establishing certain clearances in numerous places throughout the United States. Thus, these proven facts, I instruct you, become prima facie evidence in the present case, which the plaintiff may use in support of its claim that what the defendants have done since those decrees, in the present case in Baltimore, is within the prohibition of those earlier decrees. However, this is only prima facie evidence. There was not before the Court in the prior case the present factual situation which is before you now with respect to Baltimore theatres. Therefore, it is still necessary to the present case, in order for the plaintiff to recover, for it to prove to your satisfaction, by the weight of the credible evidence, that these defendants, or some of them, have conspired in an unreasonable manner to keep first run exhibitions from the plaintiff or have conspired to restrict plaintiff to clearances which are unreasonable.' . . ." (p. 542-3.)

We think the holding of the Theatre Enterprises case is directly contrary to the position of the trial judge.

Richfield argues, we think correctly, as follows:

". . . If Section 5 of the Clayton Act made the government decree conclusive evidence rather than merely prima facie evidence which the defendant could rebut, this obviously would deprive a defendant in a treble damage action of its right to a jury trial of the issue of the violation of the law."

The other reported cases confirm our view that the instruction of the trial court was erroneous. In Harrison v. Paramount Pictures (E. D. Pa. 1953) [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,568], 115 F. Supp. 312-315, affirmed by the Third Circuit on the opinion below [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,721], 211 F. 2d 405, the court said:

"The [Emich] case decided what matters the prima facie case covered, but there is nothing in the opinion to support the plaintiff's argument that the presumptions arising from the decree in favor of the United States are conclusive and incontrovertible. It is hardly necessary to say that the references to estoppel in Section 5 of the Clayton Act merely define the area which the prima facie case covers." (p. 315). [Emphasis added]

To the same effect is Zuckerman v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours Company (S. D. N. Y. 1953) 1952-53 CCH Trade Cases [¶ 67,468], Sec. [page] 68,346, otherwise unreported:

"Plaintiff in his moving papers urges that the judgment in the antitrust suit brought by the United States is conclusive as against defendant and that the misuse of patents by defendant invalidates its defense of ownership. . . .

"The purpose of Section 15 was to lighten the burden of proof of a private litigant and to facilitate the presentation of the necessarily extensive proof of such a conspiracy. However, the prior judgment is not to be accepted as conclusive proof of the conspiracy found; it is merely prima facie evidence against which defendant is entitled to his day in court for the purpose of rebuttal. . . ." .

In Eagle Lion Studios v. Loew's Inc., (11/24/58) [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 69,190], 358 U. S. 100, the Supreme Court had granted certiorari on the question,

"Were findings in the government's prior antitrust suit prima facie evidence under Section 5 of the Clayton Act of conspiracy against the plaintiffs," but the Supreme Court affirmed the lower court ([1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,819], 248 F. 2d 438), per curiam by an evenly divided court. The Circuit had affirmed (one judge dissenting) the dismissal of the case in the trial court for failure of proof of conspiracy.

The trial court had examined the prior Paramount decree and its findings and conclusions, and had concluded that

"while the findings may perhaps constitute evidence . . . that Loew's and RKO had no competition between themselves in obtaining pictures from the defendant distributors who were parties to the Paramount case and had monopolized between themselves the first neighborhood run in New York City, the findings, standing by themselves, are certainly not evidence that there was no competition between Loew's and RKO in obtaining and distributing pictures of so-called 'independents' such as the plaintiffs in the present case." (248 F. 2d at 443). On appeal the appellants characterized this as a "niggardly construction" of the Paramount judgment. (p. 443).

The Circuit court said, (p. 444):

". . . In determining, under that section, [Sec. 5, Clayton Act] the effect of a judgment in a prior anti-trust suit it is not our function to consider inferences, whether reasonable ones or not, that might be drawn from the language of the prior judgment. Under section 5 a judgment in a prior suit is prima facie evidence 'as to all matters respecting which said judgment * * * would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto * * *'." [Emphasis added in opinion]

The court quoted from its decision in Monticello Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co., (supra) [1952 TRADE CASES ¶67,300], 197 F. 2d 629, 631-632:

"* * * whatever is crucial to the treble-damage case and is not distinctly determined in the previous government suit must be proved by direct evidence. . . .". (citing cases)

The court concluded (pp. 444-5),

". . . Applying these principles to the Paramount judgment we conclude that the issue here in suit was not 'distinctly determined' in the Paramount litigation . . . In short, we must look elsewhere if we are to find any evidence of the conspiracy that the plaintiffs here charge."

The Eagle Lion case, (supra) is the last decision by the Supreme Court touching the effect of Sec. 5 of the Clayton Act, but the per curiam affirmance by an evenly divided court affords little help.

[Fallacy Illustrated]

We have been able to find no authority supporting the instruction of the trial court on Karseal's position on this problem. We think the fallacy would be well demonstrated by the following example. Suppose that the prior anti-trust decree had not only determined generally the restraint against waxes and polishes but also had determined particularly a restraint against Karseal's "Wax Seal". Applying the trial court's logic, this would have required him to have instructed that the prior anti-trust decree was conclusive on the question of restraint against the plaintiff Karseal and its product, and the only question then left open to the jury would have been the question of Karseal's damage. Certainly this is not the law.

[Error Not Prejudicial]

However, we cannot say that the error was prejudicial. Immediately following the challenged instruction, the court said:

"Therefore, it is still necessary in the present case, in order for the plaintiff to recover, for it to prove to your satisfaction, by the weight of the credible evidence that the defendant in an unreasonable manner prevented access of the plaintiff's product to Richfield stations. This for the reason that there was no special finding in the government's suit concerning plaintiff's special product "Wax Seal." You have before you evidence of both the plaintiff and the defendant with respect to the issue, whether plaintiff's product was restrained. You should make your own determination on the basis of this evidence whether plaintiff's distributors and their salesmen were actually denied access to Richfield's stations."

Various other instructions given by the court correctly stated the law. They are quoted in the margin.[11]

In summing up the court said:

"The decree in itself does not make out a case for plaintiff. The plaintiff, Karseal, has to show that the prohibition against waxes and polishes was actually exercised as to its wax and that by reason of the exercise of that policy as to it, it was damaged by losing sales it could otherwise have made."

Thus, under the instructions given, Karseal was still required to prove that an unlawful restraint was applied by Richfield to its product "Wax Seal," that it was damaged thereby, and the extent of its damage.

It cannot be argued that the jury was prejudiced by being informed of the prior decree, for it was clearly admissible. Even had the questioned instruction not been given, the jury would have had before it the prior decree and would have known that Richfield had been found to have violated the anti-trust laws by its exclusive dealing practices in TBA items, including wax and polishes.

There was left to the jury by the court's instructions all the proper elements of a treble damage case, (1) were illegal procedures applied to plaintiff and its product, [11] See note 5 (supra).

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

(2) was the plaintiff damaged, (3) the extent and amount of such damage.

[Public Injury]

We see the problem the trial court was approaching. In a private treble damage action it is necessary to prove, (1) public injury, i. e. a violation of the anti-trust laws, and (2) private injury. In a government anti-trust case only proof of the public injury is required.

As stated in Emich Motors Corp. v. General Motors Corp. (7 Cir. 1950) [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,577], 181 F. 2d 70, 75, reversed on other grounds [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,778], 340 U. S. 558,

> "And we think the judgment is available at least for the limited purpose of establishing that there had been a violation of public rights in the absence of which plaintiff would have no cause of action under the statute, and from which violation they assert their injury stemmed." [Emphasis added]

[Injury to Single "Member" as Injury to Public]

The trial court was of the view that the public injury was conclusively established by the prior anti-trust decree. But the trial court required Karseal to prove the impact of Richfield's actions on it and its product "Wax Seal." When this was proved, then public injury was proved since Karseal was a member of that illusive body, the "public." The purpose of the anti-trust laws is to protect the interstate market from illegal restraints. If such restraints are applied to one person in the interstate market, then free competition is hurt and damaged.[12]

When Richfield hurt and damaged Karseal it hurt and damaged free competition, the touchstone of the anti-trust laws. This was what the trial judge's instructions required Karseal to prove.

[Conclusion]

We therefore conclude that appellant Richfield, for failure to comply with Rule 51 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, does not have available to it on this appeal, the right to challenge the instruction as given by the court and alternately, that although the instruction complained of was erroneous, in view of other instructions by the court and the scope of the issues left to the jury, the error was not prejudicial.

[Judgment Affirmed]

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. No. 16,541. Filed October 12, 1959.

Clayton Act and Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Brokerage Commissions—Meeting Competition As a Defense.—The good faith meeting of competition defense under Section 2(b) of the Clayton Act is inapplicable to a violation of Section 2(c) of the Act, relating to brokerage commissions. Section 2(b), in part, provides that nothing shall prevent a seller from rebutting a prima-facie case by showing that his "lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities" to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor. Brokerage commissions do not involve a "lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities"; therefore, the defense is inapplicable to Section 2(c) violations. The fact that the granting of a purported brokerage fee to a buyer may result in discriminatory prices is immaterial.

[12] This opinion was prepared prior to the decision in Klor's Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,316], 359 U. S. 209. There the court said that a combination "is not to be tolerated merely because the victim is just one merchant whose business is so small that his destruction makes little difference to the economy. Monopoly can as surely thrive by the elimination of such small businessmen, one at a time, as it can by driving them out in large groups. . . .". (p. 213).

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Enforcement of Clayton Act Orders—Power To Conduct Investigation Under FTC Act To Determine Violation of Order—Filing of Investigation Record with Court of Appeals in Enforcement Proceeding.—The Federal Trade Commission has the authority to conduct a formal investigation under Section 6 of the Federal Trade Commission Act to determine whether or not a cease and desist order issued under the Clayton Act is being violated. While the Clayton Act does not specifically direct the Commission to conduct an investigation to determine whether or not an order is being violated, the Act provides that the Commission may apply to a Court of Appeals for the enforcement of an order. Congress contemplated that the Commission determine the fact of violation before applying to the courts. While the method or procedure to be followed in determining the fact of violation is not spelled out, any reasonable and fair method or procedure not forbidden by statute would be appropriate. The Commission is given broad powers of investigation under Section 6 of the FTC Act, and the Commission, pursuant to that authority, has promulgated rules under which investigational hearings may be conducted for determining compliance with orders.

Also, the entire record of such an investigation may be filed for the consideration of a Court of Appeals in an enforcement proceeding. The statute authorizing the Commission to institute enforcement proceedings before the Courts of Appeals provides that the Commission shall file the record in the proceeding, as provided in Section 2112, Title 28, United States Code. The record in connection with the Commission's investigation of violations of a cease and desist order constitutes "pleadings, evidence, and proceedings before the agency" which may be filed with the court for consideration in the enforcement proceeding pursuant to Section 2112(b) of Title 28, United States Code.

See FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8701, 8801.

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Enforcement of Clayton Act Orders in Courts of Appeals—Motion To Adduce Additional Evidence.—In an enforcement proceeding under Section 11 of the Clayton Act, the court may not order the Federal Trade Commission to adduce additional evidence unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material.

See FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8801.

On Motions to Strike Certain Parts of Application and Designation of Record and, in the Alternative, for Leave to Adduce Additional Evidence

[Enforcement of FTC Order]

Hamley, Circuit Judge [In full text]: The Federal Trade Commission has applied to this court for enforcement of a cease and desist order entered under section 2(c) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 13(c). The cease and desist order, issued on March 25, 1946, directed Washington Fish & Oyster Company, Inc., to cease and desist from

> ". . . paying or granting, directly or indirectly, to any buyer anything of value as a commission or brokerage, or any compensation, allowance, or discount in lieu thereof, upon purchases made for such buyer's own account."

On June 7, 1957, the Commission undertook a formal investigation to determine whether the cease and desist order was being obeyed. As a result the Commission on February 18, 1959, filed a report in which it was found and concluded that Washington Fish & Oyster had violated the cease and desist order. On July 21, 1959, the Commission filed an application in this court for enforcement of that order. This was done pursuant to section 11 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 21.[1]

Paragraphs VIII and XII of this application pertain to the formal investigation which was instituted by the Commission on June 7, 1957, to determine whether the company had violated the cease and desist order. Items 6 to 11 of the Commission's designation of record in this enforcement proceeding relate to the orders and reports of the Commission or its examiner or to testimony and exhibits having to do with the investigation begun on June 7, 1957.

The company has now moved to strike these paragraphs of the application and items of the designation of record. The company has also moved, in the alternative, that in the event the motions to strike are denied, an order be entered directing the Commission to take additional evidence to be adduced by the company.

Motions to Strike

The company contends that the Commission was without statutory authority to conduct its formal investigation to determine whether the cease and desist order was being obeyed, and that all proceedings and reports issued thereunder are therefore illegal and void.

It is true, as the Commission concedes, that the Clayton Act, as amended, does not specifically direct the Commission to conduct investigations to determine whether cease and desist orders are being violated. The act provides, however, that the Commission may apply to the United States Court of Appeals for enforcement "if such person fails or neglects to obey" a cease and desist order.[2] Congress must therefore have expected the Commission to determine the fact of violation before applying to a United States court of appeals for enforcement.

The method or procedure to be followed by the Commission in determining the fact of violation is not spelled out in the statute. Hence, any reasonable and fair method or procedure not forbidden by statute would be appropriate. Under section 6 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 46, the Commission is given broad powers of investigation. Pursuant to this authority, the Commission has promulgated rules under which investigational hearings may be conducted for the purpose of determining whether a respondent is complying with an order of the Commission.[3]

In the formal investigation as to violations of the cease and desist order of March 25, 1946, there has been compliance with all requirements of statute and rule concerning procedure. The company had full and ample opportunity to cross-examine all witnesses and examine all documents, and availed itself of that opportunity. It had full and ample opportunity to contest the issue of violation of the order by introducing evidence, but did not avail itself of that opportunity. There is no contention that the record of that investigation, as designated by the Commission, is incomplete or inaccurate in any respect.

We hold that by virtue of the statutes cited the Commission had authority to conduct the questioned formal investigation as to violations of the cease and desist order of March 25, 1946.

The company further argues, however, that if the Commission had authority to conduct such an investigation there is nevertheless a total absence of statutory authority for the filing of the report therein, or record thereof, in this enforcement proceeding.

The statute authorizing the Commission to institute enforcement proceedings before United States courts of appeals provides that the Commission "shall file the record in the proceeding, as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code. . . ."[4] Paragraph (b) of the latter section, 28 U. S. C. A. § 2112(b), provides that the record to be filed in the court of appeals in such a proceeding shall consist of the agency order sought to be reviewed or enforced, the findings or report upon which it is based, "and the pleadings, evidence, and proceedings before the agency. . . ." [5]

The question presented, therefore, is whether the record in connection with the Commission's investigation of violations of the instant cease and desist order constitutes "pleadings, evidence, and proceedings before the agency" which may be filed with the court for consideration in the enforcement proceeding pursuant to section 2112(b).

As before indicated, the Commission must determine to its own satisfaction that there has been a violation of a cease and desist order before it may apply to a United States court of appeals for enforcement. Where this determination is made as a result of an ex parte informal investigation, there are no "pleadings, evidence, and proceedings," within the meaning of the statute. In this event the court, if it affirms the cease and desist order and if the assertion of violation is disputed, must remand the matter to the Commission for formal proceedings on the question of whether the order has been violated. Indeed, this is the usual practice.[6]

As we have held herein, however, the Commission may make this determination as to the fact of violation by means of a formal investigation preceding application to a court for enforcement. Such an investigation pertains to an issue which must be decided before an enforcement order can be effectuated. Federal Trade Commission v. Ruberoid Co. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,279], 343 U. S. 470, 478. An issue which must be decided before an enforcement order can be effectuated is appropriate to be considered in deciding whether such an order should be entered by the court. The record of that investigation therefore constitutes "pleadings, evidence, and proceedings before the agency," within the meaning of section 2112(b).

It follows that the entire record of that investigation may be filed for our consideration in this enforcement proceeding.[7]

Motion to Adduce Additional Evidence

The company has also moved, in the alternative, that in the event the motions to strike are denied, an order be entered directing the Commission to take additional testimony to be adduced by the company.

This court may not order the Commission to adduce additional evidence in an enforcement proceeding unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material. Third paragraph of section 11 of the Clayton Act, as amended, 15 U. S. C. A. § 21.

The additional testimony which the company desires to adduce would tend to establish what the company regards as a defense to a charge of violation of section 2(c) of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 13(c). Specifically, the additional evidence, it is asserted, would show that any difference between the prices charged by the company with respect to sales to direct purchasers and sales to customers purchasing through brokers was the result of the economic necessity to the company of meeting the competitive prices of other packers and brokers.

The company relies upon Henry Broch & Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir. [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,208], 261 F. 2d 725, as establishing that the necessity of meeting

[1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,797, 62,846], 189 F. 2d 510, but on somewhat different reasoning. The court there said (p. 512): "True, it has been customary for a court, upon affirming such an order, to appoint a master to make an inquiry as to violation, and, usually, to name the Commission as master. But there is no reason why, now that we have affirmed the order, we may not, in the exercise of our discretion, treat the Commission's findings as if the Commission had been appointed our master, since, in the Commission hearings, respondent was accorded all its procedural privileges. (If, in future cases, a respondent, believing the Commission's order invalid, wishes to avoid what it may consider the needless expense of such a hearing if the order is invalid, such a respondent can promptly test the order's validity by a petition to review the order.)" competition affords a defense to a charge of violation of section 2(c) of the Clayton Act.[8] If such a defense is available, the evidence tending to establish it is material, and the company should be permitted to adduce it.

The cease and desist order involved in Broch was not directed against a seller or buyer but against brokers representing a seller. The Commission found that the brokers had violated section 2(c) by granting and allowing a portion of their normal and customary brokerage fee to a particular buyer in connection with that buyer's purchase of food products from the seller. The court set aside this order, holding a seller's broker is not covered by section 2(c). Since our case involves a seller rather than a seller's broker, we need not decide whether we would agree with this ruling in Broch.[9]

In its decision in Broch, however, the court went on to make some general observations concerning the desirability of permitting sellers to meet competition by reducing items in the cost of distribution, including brokerage commissions.[10] It is this language which Washington Fish & Oyster relies upon as establishing that the necessity of meeting competition affords a defense to a charge under section 2(c).

These observations by the court in Broch indicate that it regarded that case as one in which a seller reduced the fee to be paid to his broker for bona fide brokerage services in order to quote a competitive over-all price to a buyer. Whether this was really the case, and if so whether the seller could so proceed without violating section 2(c), we need not decide.[11] Our case involves no such circumstance, the purported brokerage fee here having been paid to the buyer.

Subsections (c), (d), and (e) of section 2 of the Clayton Act, as amended, unqualifiedly make unlawful certain business practices other than price discriminations. The only escape Congress has provided for violations under these subsections is that which is sanctioned in subsection (b) of that section. Federal Trade Commission v. Simplicity Pattern Co., Inc. [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,361], 360 U. S. 55.

Subsection (b) provides that nothing contained in section 2 and other specified sections "shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor."

Washington Fish & Oyster was not charged with any violation connected with the furnishing of services or facilities (subsection (d) and (e) of section 2). Nor was it charged with quoting and collecting a discriminatory price contrary to subsection (a). What it was charged with was the paying of a brokerage fee to a buyer, no brokerage services being rendered.

The defense based on competition, set out in subsection (b), is inapplicable to section 2(c) violations, since such violations are not primarily concerned with prices, services, or facilities. The fact that the granting of a purported brokerage fee to a buyer may in a particular case result in discriminatory prices is immaterial. The gist of the violation under section 2(c) is not that discriminatory prices have been charged, but that the parties have engaged in a practice designed to deceive others as to the price charged and paid, whether or not discriminatory.

[8] Broch was decided after the instant Commission hearings. The company points to this circumstance as explaining why the defense now asserted was not advanced during the Commission proceedings. Prior to Broch, the company concedes, "the necessity of meeting competition had not been held to constitute a defense to a charge of violation of Section 2(c) of the Clayton Act . . ."

[9] Certiorari was granted in Broch on June 15, 1959. Federal Trade Commission v. Henry Broch & Co., 360 U. S. 908.

[10] In this connection the court said:

"Obviously an important element in the cost of food distribution is the commission paid by sellers to their brokers. If a seller is to be forbidden to meet competition by reducing an item in its cost of distribution, then to that extent his costs are frozen without regard for the welfare of the public which must ultimately defray the resultant costs of distribution. Trade restraints in the distribution of groceries surely do not occupy a preferred antitrust position, as distinguished from comparable situations. Standard Oil Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 1951, 340 U. S. 231, 248-250, 71 S. Ct. 240, 95 L. Ed. 239; 7 Cir., 1956, 233 F. 2d 649, affirmed 1958, 355 U. S. 396, 78 S. Ct. 369, 2 L. Ed. 2d 359."

[11] Nor need we concern ourselves with whether such an observation in the Broch decision is to be regarded as dictum in view of that court's holding that section 2(c) does not apply to a seller's broker.

Since the necessities of competition do not constitute an available defense under section 2(c), the evidence concerning competition which the company seeks to adduce is not material.

The motions to strike and the motion, in the alternative, for leave to adduce additional evidence are denied.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. September Term, 1959—September Session, 1959. No. 12669. Dated October 20, 1959.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. PERRY, District Judge.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Counterclaim for Damages—Dismissal of One of Several Claims—Appealability—"No Just Reason for Delay"—Certification by Trial Judge.—A trial court which dismissed a price discrimination "count" in a three-count antitrust counterclaim and "certified" the dismissal for an appeal under Rule 54(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure abused its discretion in determining that there was "no just reason for delay" in reviewing the judgment. The question of whether or not there was a basis for that determination had to be answered "in the light of the traditional, deeply-rooted and wisely sanctioned principle against piecemeal appeals." The case, when measured by the standard that the power which Rule 54(b) confers upon a trial judge should be used only "in the infrequent harsh case," was not an appropriate one for the entering of such a special order. The appeal served to delay the trial of the principal claim and the remaining portions of the counterclaim without simplifying or facilitating the conduct of the future litigation. Further, the case presented no hardship or unfairness which would justify a discretionary departure from the normal rule as to the time of appeal.

For the plaintiff: Thomas M. Thomas and David Parson.

Before HASTINGS, Chief Judge, PARKINSON and CASTLE, Circuit Judges.

[Contract Action—Antitrust Counterclaim]

CASTLE, Circuit Judge [In full text]: Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., plaintiff-appellee (CBS) brought a diversity action against Amana Refrigeration, Inc., (Amana) for $284,545.21 alleged to be due under agreements for the production and broadcasting of a television program by CBS under Amana's sponsorship over certain broadcasting stations affiliated with the CBS television network. Amana's answer contained a counterclaim setting forth three alleged anti-trust law violations by CBS in connection with the transactions upon which the action brought by CBS was predicated. The counterclaim charged that Amana was damaged by alleged action of CBS (1) granting greater discounts to favored advertisers, competitors of Amana, in violation of 15 U. S. C. A. § 13(a), (2) requiring as a condition of the broadcasts that Amana agree to sponsor the program over a specific group of television stations designated by CBS in violation of 15 U. S. C. A. § 1 and § 14, and (3) requiring as a condition of the broadcasts that Amana agree to sponsor a program in which CBS had a financial interest in violation of 15 U. S. C. A. § 1 and § 14. Treble damages were sought.

[Price Discrimination Charge—Dismissal and Appeal]

CBS moved to dismiss the first of the three parts of the counterclaim on the ground that 15 U. S. C. A. § 13(a) was inapplicable. It filed a reply to the balance of the counterclaim. The District Court found for CBS on its motion to dismiss and entered an order of dismissal as to the "first cause of action of the counter-claim". Thereafter, Amana applied to the District Court for a certification pursuant to Rule 54(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, declaring that there is "no just reason for delay" and moving the court to direct the entry of "final judgment". The District Court granted Amana's application for certification over the objection of CBS. Amana filed its notice of appeal from the order of dismissal. CBS filed a motion to dismiss the appeal on the grounds that the order below was not a final order and that the requirement of Rule 54(b) that there be no just reason for delay is not satisfied. The motion to dismiss the appeal was taken with the case.

["Abuse of Discretion"]

The District Court's determination does not preclude review by us, Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Mackey [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,370], 351 U. S. 427. Apart from consideration of the question of whether the part of the counterclaim dismissed constituted a "claim for relief" within the meaning of Rule 54 (b), it is our opinion that the District Court's determination that there was no just reason for delay was an abuse of discretion.

[Piecemeal Appeals]

The question of whether there was a basis for the determination by the District Court that there is no just reason for delaying review of the dismissal of the portion of the counterclaim until after final judgment had been rendered on the claim of CBS and the other parts of Amana's counterclaim must be determined in the light of the traditional, deeply-rooted and wisely sanctioned principle against piecemeal appeals. Rule 54(b) is designed to make an accommodation between that policy and the problems of the timing of review which have arisen under the liberalized joinder of claims, counterclaims, crossclaims and third party claims in one suit permitted by modern procedural rules. In this connection the following observations made in Panichella v. Pennsylvania Railroad Company, 3d Cir., 252 F. 2d 452 are pertinent:

> "Thus, the procedure contemplated by Rule 54(b) is usually more than a formality. Perhaps it can properly be viewed as mere formality, albeit an essential prerequisite of immediate appeal, in those cases where it is clear that the disposition of a portion of the litigation has been such as would clearly have constituted an appealable final judgment under Section 1291 of Title 28 before the adoption of the Rules of Civil Procedure. But otherwise and ordinarily an application for a 54(b) order requires the trial judge to exercise considered discretion, weighing the overall policy against piecemeal appeals against whatever exigencies the case at hand may present. Indeed, the draftsmen of this Rule have made explicit their thought that it would serve only to authorize 'the exercise of a discretionary power to afford a remedy in the infrequent harsh case * * *.' 28 U. S. C. A., Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 118-119 note. It follows that 54 (b) orders should not be entered routinely or as a courtesy or accommodation to counsel. The power which this Rule confers upon the trial judge should be used only 'in the infrequent harsh case' as an instrument for the improved administration of justice and the more satisfactory disposition of litigation in the light of the public policy indicated by statute and rule. See 6 Moore, Federal Practice, 1953, 264-65."

[Not Appropriate Case for "Certification"]

Evaluated by the above standard the instant case was clearly not an appropriate one for entering a special order under Rule 54(b). The prosecution of an appeal from the order dismissing the portion of the counterclaim serves to delay the trial of the principal claim and remaining portions of the counterclaim without in any way either simplifying or facilitating the conduct of the future litigation. The instant case presents no hardship or unfairness which would justify discretionary departure from the normal rule as to the time of the appeal.

[Order Vacated]

We conclude that the order entered under Rule 54(b) did not constitute a proper exercise of discretion. It should be vacated so that the order dismissing the portion of the counterclaim may be restored to an interlocutory status which would permit a later appeal if occasion should arise upon final disposition of the cause.

[Appeal Dismissed]

This appeal is dismissed and the cause remanded to the District Court with directions to vacate the order entered under Rule 54(b).

[Dissenting Opinion]

HASTINGS, Chief Judge, dissenting. In the action below, Amana filed an answer to the complaint of CBS by way of a counterclaim alleging therein three separate causes of action, designated, respectively, as the First, Second and Third "Cause of Action." The First Cause of Action alleges a violation of Section 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 13(a), predicated on an alleged price discrimination by CBS. The Second and Third Causes of Action allege a violation of both Section 3 of the Clayton Act and Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 14 and § 1, predicated, respectively, on two "tying" practices engaged in by CBS: (1) The "must buy" policy, whereby each sponsor, as a condition of purchasing any television time over the CBS network, must agree to purchase such time over a specified group of television stations and is thereby denied the opportunity of choosing those stations which he deems best suited to his marketing objectives; and (2) the policy of refusing to sell network time to a prospective sponsor unless such sponsor agrees to purchase a program in which CBS has a financial interest instead of an independently-owned program of the sponsor's own choice.

The district court sustained the motion of CBS to dismiss the First Cause of Action of the counterclaim on the ground that it failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, that is, that Section 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act is not applicable to the television network services rendered by CBS to Amana. Or, as the district court stated in its order of dismissal,

> "* * * the word 'commodity' as therein [15 U. S. C. A. § 13(a)] used relates only to articles of merchandise—goods, wares and merchandise—in short, anything having the attribute of tangible existence—and cannot be construed so as to include the concept of network television time."

Following dismissal of the First Cause of Action in its counterclaim, Amana elected not to amend and moved for entry of final judgment thereon. The district court found that such First Cause of Action constituted a claim for relief separate and distinct from the other two claims in the counterclaim; that its order of dismissal constituted a final decision dispositive of such claim; that "there is no just reason for delay;" and it entered final judgment dismissing the claim with prejudice, all over objection of CBS. The certification by the district court was made pursuant to and in full compliance with the provisions of Rule 54(b), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, 28 U. S. C. A. On April 27, 1959, Amana filed a timely notice of appeal from the order of dismissal.

On June 9, 1959 CBS filed its motion to dismiss this appeal on the grounds: (1) that the order below is not a "final" order within the definition of 28 U. S. C. A. § 1291 and Rule 54(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure; and (2) that the requirement of Rule 54(b) that there be no just reason for delay is not satisfied. On June 19, 1959, our court entered an order that the motion of CBS to dismiss this appeal be continued and taken with the case on its merits. Thereafter, the case was fully briefed on its merits by both parties and on September 24, 1959, was heard by this court both on the motion to dismiss the appeal and on the merits.

The majority is moved to dispose of this appeal by granting the motion of dismissal on the second ground thereof, holding that "the District Court's determination that there was no just reason for delay was an abuse of discretion." The majority did not pass upon the first ground asserted for dismissal, i. e., whether the First Cause of Action of the counterclaim constituted a "claim for relief" within the meaning of 28 U. S. C. A. § 1291 and Rule 54(b).

I find myself in disagreement with the disposition made of this appeal by the majority. In my judgment the claim dismissed was clearly a "claim for relief" within the meaning of Rule 54(b); and its dismissal constituted a "final decision" on that claim pursuant to 28 U. S. C. A. § 1291, under the recent holdings of the Supreme Court of the United States in Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Mackey [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,370], 351 U. S. 427 (1956) and Cold Metal Process Co. v. United Co., 351 U. S. 445 (1956).

This leads us then to a consideration of whether the district court was guilty of an abuse of discretion. Mr. Justice Burton, in Sears, Roebuck, at page 437, said:

> "* * * But the District Court may, by the exercise of its discretion in the interest of sound judicial administration, release for appeal final decisions upon one or more, but less than all, claims in multiple claims actions. The timing of such a release is, with good reason, vested by the rule primarily in the discretion of the District Court as the one most likely to be familiar with the case and with any justifiable reasons for delay. With equally good reason, any abuse of that discretion remains reviewable by the Court of Appeals."

I agree that in considering this problem we cannot lose sight "of the traditional, deeply-rooted and wisely sanctioned principle against piecemeal appeals." Applying the standard announced in Panichella v. Pennsylvania Railroad Company, 3 Cir., 252 F. 2d 452 (1958), the "infrequent harsh case" rule, the majority then concludes:

"* * * The prosecution of an appeal from the order dismissing the portion of the counterclaim serves to delay the trial of the principal claim and remaining portions of the counterclaim without in any way either simplifying or facilitating the conduct of the future litigation. The instant case presents no hardship or unfairness which would justify discretionary departure from the normal rule as to the time of the appeal."

[Delay]

It is with this conclusion that I disagree. This case is now remanded to the district court for trial on the issues drawn on the plaintiff's principal claim for damages and defendant's remaining two claims under its counterclaim. On appeal from the result of that trial Amana may again challenge the merits of the dismissal of its first claim, as it attempted to do in the case at bar. If it is successful in that effort, a reversal will send the case back again for a second trial with its attendant pre-trial proceedings and resulting additional delay and cost to Amana. The possibility of this occurrence can be avoided by the simple expedient of determining this appeal on its merits now.

It does not appear that real harm will result in the delay occasioned by the disposition of this appeal on its merits at this time. CBS admits that Amana paid $252,430.94 on its claim of $284,545.21 at the time of filing its answer, leaving the remaining disputed balance of $32,114.27 for trial on the complaint. It is shown that CBS has deferred taking depositions and requiring Amana to answer interrogatories until the conclusion of the motion to dismiss Amana's first claim.

Without in any sense indicating the disposition I would make of it, it is my judgment that a determination of this appeal on its merits at this time would serve to simplify and facilitate the conduct of the future litigation in this case, and that to fail to do so will result in hardship and unfairness to both parties. The case has been fully briefed and argued before us on the merits, and we will never be in better position to decide the important principal issue before us than we are at this time. To do so is to give effect to the plain import of the holding in Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Mackey, supra.

I would hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in entering its order under Rule 54(b) and would deny the motion to dismiss this appeal and then proceed to determine the appeal on its merits at this time.

In the New York Supreme Court, Westchester County, Special Term, Part II. Index No. 5765-1953. Dated September 11, 1959. Amended November 30, 1959.

New York and Sherman Antitrust Acts

Combinations and Conspiracies—Contracts Not to Compete—Employee's Agreement Not to Work for Employer's Competitors for One Year—Legality.—In an action by a manufacturer of pressure-sensitive adhesive tape for injunctive relief and damages from a competitor and a former employee, an antitrust issue, based on an agreement not to enter the employment of a competitor within one year, was eliminated on stipulation and agreement between the parties. The court then ordered eliminated portions of its original findings and conclusions with respect to the monopoly allegations.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2407.34.

For the plaintiff: Townley, Updike, Carter & Rodgers, New York, N. Y. (J. Howard Carter, John R. Schoemer, Jr., Bronson B. T. Eden, and Charles T. Bates, New York, N. Y., and Harold J. Kinney and Robert I. Coulter, St. Paul, Minn., of counsel).

For all defendants except Beyer: Gallop, Climenko & Gould, New York, N. Y., and Paul L. Bleakley, Yonkers, N. Y. (Paul L. Bleakley and Arthur S. Friedman, of counsel).

[Misappropriation of Trade Secrets—Antitrust Violations as Defense]

BRENNAN, Justice [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: This action was instituted by the plaintiff for injunctive relief and damages upon the ground that the defendants allegedly misappropriated and utilized processing methods of the plaintiff. The plaintiff contends that the defendants, Shalita and Cohen, acting on behalf of themselves as well as the defendant corporations, inveigled the defendant, Beyer, a former employee of the plaintiff, to breach his contract with the plaintiff and to disclose its trade secrets.

[Industry Involved—Parties]

The plaintiff, hereinafter also referred to as "3M", is a Delaware corporation licensed to do business in the State of New York, and for the past 30 years has conducted a substantial and profitable business of manufacturing and selling, among other things, pressure-sensitive adhesive tape under the trade-mark, "Scotch". Insofar as this action is concerned, there are two types of tape involved—one known as the crepe paper-backed pressure-sensitive masking tape which will hereinafter be referred to as "masking tape", and the other is a transparent cellophane-backed pressure-sensitive adhesive tape, hereinafter referred to as "cellophane tape".

The defendant, Technical Tape Corp., hereinafter referred to as "Technical Tape", is a New York corporation and since 1948 has been manufacturing and selling a masking tape; since the fall of 1951, it also has been manufacturing and selling a cellophane tape. Both tapes have been sold under the trade-name of "Tuck". The defendant, Vernon Chemical & Manufacturing Corp., hereinafter referred to as "Vernon", is a New York corporation engaged since 1951 solely in the business of selling masking tape and cellophane tape manufactured by Technical Tape, and which tapes it has sold under the trade-name, "Black Wizzard". The fair inference to be drawn from the testimony is that "Vernon" was dominated by the defendant, Cohen. Said defendant, Cohen, founded Technical Tape in 1947 and since that time he has been the principal stockholder, a director, and the chief executive thereof. The defendant, Shalita, was the first employee of Technical Tape and since 1951 he has been and still is a vice-president of that company. From approximately 1943 through 1947, he was associated, as technical director, with a firm known as the Cofax Company which manufactured and sold pressure-sensitive adhesive cellophane tape.

The defendant, Beyer, was employed by the plaintiff from June 25th, 1945 to May 25th, 1951, first at the manufacturing plant of the plaintiff in St. Paul, Minnesota, and thereafter at its plant in Bristol, Pennsylvania. In 1930 this defendant was graduated from the University of Minnesota with the degree of Bachelor of Science in chemical engineering and two years later he received his Master's Degree. Thereafter he was employed, as a chemist, by the Minnesota & Ontario Paper Company and by the Insulite Company, until the spring of 1945 when he entered the employ of the plaintiff. At both of the plaintiff's aforesaid plants Beyer's duties included research in and development of particular kinds of pressure-sensitive adhesive tape (including especially masking tape) as well as quality control of the production of cellophane tape and masking tape.

As the result of the work of one Richard Gurley Drew, who entered the employ of the plaintiff in 1921, the basic masking tape patent (U. S. Pat. No. 1,760,820) was issued to the plaintiff on Drew's application on May 27th, 1930 and the basic cellophane tape patent (U. S. Pat. No. 2,177,627) was issued to the plaintiff on Drew's application on October 31st, 1939. Since the beginning of the plaintiff's operations in the pressure-sensitive tape field, it has expended large sums in research and development for the purposes of enhancing the quality, life and performance characteristics of its tapes; and in the years from 1934 to 1945 the plaintiff expended for such purposes approximately $3,500,000, most of which was for the improvement of cellophane and masking tape.

[Agreement Not to Compete—Antitrust Legality]

From the beginning of the plaintiff's operations in the pressure-sensitive tape field, to and including May 25th, 1951, the plaintiff developed certain manufacturing standards, formulations, techniques and processes, and special machinery and equipment used in connection therewith (with respect to masking tape and cellophane tape) which, during said period, were not disclosed to the public by plaintiff in patents or otherwise, and which were of value to the plaintiff. Every reasonable precaution was taken by plaintiff to insure that the said manufacturing standards, formulations, techniques, processes, and the special machinery and equipment used in connection therewith, would not be disclosed or described to any person who, by virtue of the nature of his employment with the plaintiff, was not entitled to have knowledge thereof; and one of said precautionary means was to require all technical employees whose duties would require them to have knowledge of some or all of plaintiff's processes to execute a form of agreement, hereinafter referred to as the "Technical Agreement," which, among other things, bound said employees not to disclose or divulge any of plaintiff's processes to anyone without plaintiff's prior written consent. This "Technical Agreement" also provided that any such employee, upon leaving the employ of the plaintiff, would not enter the employment of any competitor for a period of one year. The defendant, Beyer, signed such an agreement. The plaintiff maintained its secret processes in so-called "Standards Books", the distribution and use of which was limited to employees whose duties required them to have knowledge of plaintiff's processes; said books were so constructed and written (by the use of code symbols and otherwise) as not to be intelligible and comprehensible, in particular portions thereof, to a person not having access to an entire set of the standards, and it was plaintiff's general policy and practice not to disclose its manufacturing processes and formulations or its technological "know-how" to other persons or companies, even companies holding licenses under plaintiff's tape patents.

[Access to "Trade Secrets"]

The defendant, Beyer, who was a trained and qualified chemist while working at plaintiff's tape laboratory in St. Paul, had access to a complete set of manufacturing standards of the plaintiff as well as to those production areas in plaintiff's factory where the manufacture of masking tape and cellophane tape was carried out. Said defendant's duties, while working in the tape laboratory in St. Paul, included experiments on, among other things, various types of saturants used on masking tape as well as the so-called "alkabize backsize process" for masking tape. Prior to his transfer to the plaintiff's plant in Bristol, Pennsylvania, said defendant was well instructed in the plaintiff's quality control procedures with respect to the manufacture of both masking tape and cellophane tape. In early 1949, the plaintiff promoted the defendant, Beyer, to the position of Assistant Supervisor of Quality Control at the plaintiff's Bristol plant wherein masking tape and cellophane tape were being manufactured and it was his responsibility as well as the responsibility of other supervisors to insure against the improper disclosure of any of the manufacturing information set forth in plaintiff's standards books. Beyer's duties required him to have a familiarity with all of plaintiff's manufacturing standards and each phase of the manufacturing operation pertaining to the aforesaid tapes. Said defendant learned and became fully familiar with or was in a position to become fully familiar with the details of the plaintiff's alleged trade secrets as described in plaintiff's proposed supplemental findings of fact.

[Divulging Confidential Information]

This Court finds that Technical Tape's employment of Beyer was arranged for the specific purpose of having him divulge confidential information which he possessed or could readily ascertain by reference to the plaintiff's standards books with respect to the manufacture of masking tape and cellophane tape and which information he acquired or could acquire in the course of his employment by the plaintiff. From the record before this Court, it is clear that the action of Technical Tape and those who aided it was wrongful. Cohen and Shalita both knew that Beyer was under a written obligation not to divulge the confidential information and trade secrets which he acquired in the course of his employment with the plaintiff or could acquire in the course of such employment. It is apparent that Beyer was willing to be and was knowingly placed by Technical Tape in a position of performing services wherein, by resorting to and disclosing the use of that which he had learned or could learn while in the plaintiff's confidence and employ, he could make such a major contribution to the pressure-sensitive tape products of the aforesaid defendant so as to enable said products to compete favorably with those of the plaintiff.

Amending Opinion, November 30, 1959

[Antitrust Comment Eliminated]

BRENNAN, Justice [In full text]: The defendants, other than the defendant Beyer, move to set aside the decision of this court, herein, and for a new trial, pursuant to the provisions of section 549 of the Civil Practice Act. Upon the argument of this application it was stipulated and agreed by and between counsel for the respective parties that the so-called monopoly allegations of the amended answers (such as are contained in paragraphs 26 to 29 inclusive of the amended answer of the defendant Technical Tape Corporation) be withdrawn nunc pro tunc as of the date of the service of said amended answers and that, with this court's approval, the aforesaid decision of this court (dated September 11, 1959) filed September 15, 1959, be modified by eliminating therefrom any and all findings of fact and conclusions of law with respect thereto with the same force and effect as if the said allegations and the said findings and conclusions had never been made. Thereupon this court approved the aforesaid stipulation and agreement. The remaining contentions of the movants have been considered and found to be without merit. Accordingly, this application is denied. Settle order on notice. The judgment to be entered on the decision of this court will be settled at chambers at 2 P.M. on December 4, 1959. Counsel are requested to be present.

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Violation of Injunction—Contempt.—A motion to punish a defendant for contempt for allegedly selling a commodity below fair trade prices in violation of an injunction was held in abeyance pending the taking of evidence on the issue by an official referee.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3380.34.

[Contempt Action]

GREENBERG, Justice [In full text]: This is a motion to punish the defendant for contempt for violating the injunctive provision in a judgment dated March 2, 1956, which prohibited defendant from selling plaintiff's commodities below fair trade prices. The sole violation now complained of against defendant is an alleged isolated sale of one specific item, by an unnamed sales person at defendant's retail store on July 21, 1959. The defendant denies that any sale of this nature took place or that any products of plaintiff were sold at less than fair trade price. This court, under the circumstances, cannot resolve the matter on the papers submitted. Testimony must be taken concerning the disputed issue. Accordingly, the matter is respectfully referred to Hon. Jacob Marks, official referee, to take proof on the issue raised and to report to the court with his recommendations. Pending the coming in of the report, the final disposition of this motion will be held in abeyance.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Violation of Injunction—Contempt.—A pharmacy, adjudged in contempt for selling products on four occasions at less than fair trade prices in violation of an injunction, was fined $500, plus $100 costs and expenses. The pharmacy could not excuse continued contempts by claims that its president had no knowledge of such sales or by hearsay denials of them. The contention that the purchasers' affidavits were unworthy of belief because they were employed to check on the pharmacy's compliance with the fair trade prices was untenable.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3380.34.

[Contempt]

McGIVERN, Justice [In full text]: This is the second motion to punish defendant for four contempts of court in selling plaintiff's products on four occasions at less than the minimum retail fair trade prices in disobedience to the permanent injunction of this court entered on June 17, 1959. Defendant cannot excuse its continued contempts by a claim that its president has no knowledge of the sales and by hearsay denials of any contemptuous sales (General Electric Co. v. Golden Rule Appliance Co., Inc. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,698], 3 App. Div. 2d 436). Moreover, the contention of defendant that the purchasers' affidavits are unworthy of belief because they were employed to check on defendant's compliance with plaintiff's fair trade price is entirely untenable. (Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp'n v. Lindemann Pharmacy, Inc. [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,425], 8 App. Div. 802). Finally, defendant's attempt to place notice in issue does not raise a genuine defense to this motion. Accordingly, the motion is granted and defendant is adjudged in contempt and fined $500, plus $100 costs and expenses. Settle order.

[Temporary Injunction]

GREENBERG, Justice [In full text]: Plaintiff moves for a temporary injunction in enforcement of the Feld-Crawford Act. The action is by retailer against retailer. The offending sales are claimed to have been made on September 14, 1959. The defendant, it appears, claims to have opened the place of business as a corporate enterprise on September 2, 1959. It is alleged in the complaint that defendant has had due and sufficient notice of all of the matters set forth in the complaint relating to the existence of fair trade contracts between the manufacturers and retailers. The allegation is conclusory and the moving affidavit fails to produce any factual support of claimed notice. The motion is denied.

GREENBERG, Justice [In full text]: Application for temporary injunction is granted. The underlying suit involves a retailer against retailer in which the plaintiff moves for an injunction in enforcement of the Feld-Crawford Act. The defendant has cross-moved under section 307 of the Civil Practice Act for the appointment of a referee before whom two proposed witnesses are to appear to give testimony in aid of defendant's opposition to plaintiff's motion for temporary injunction, those witnesses having refused to make an affidavit. A study of the proffered testimony indicates that it is immaterial and unnecessary. The defense of "unclean hands" is not available under the facts and circumstances revealed on the present application. The plaintiff having otherwise established grounds for the relief sought, the cross-motion is denied and the motion for a temporary injunction is granted. Settle order.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas, Houston Division. Civil Action No. 10,701. Filed July 30, 1959.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Monopolies—Practices as Evidence of Monopolization or Attempts to Monopolize—Institution of Patent Infringement Suit.—A valve manufacturer did not misuse its patent or violate the Sherman Act by instituting and maintaining a patent infringement suit. Such action was taken in good faith and with the sole motive of enforcing its patent against what it considered an infringement and not for the purpose of monopolizing or attempting to monopolize any substantial portion of interstate commerce. The manufacturer had good cause to file the suit since the claimed infringing product closely resembled its product. Also, the manufacturer's patent had been adjudged valid by a U. S. Court of Appeals. The act of bringing and maintaining an infringement suit cannot, standing alone, be a violation of the Sherman Act. A contrary ruling would discourage patentees from resorting to the courts to have their controversies determined. Among other things, it was found that the past popularity of the patented product for certain uses had been due to the excellence of the product, the protection afforded by a patent, and proper sales efforts, and not from any illegal or unfair practices. The evidence showed healthy competition in the segment of the valve industry involved.

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.525.

Monopolies—Relevant Market—Valves.—In a counterclaim charging a patentee with monopolizing or attempting to monopolize the market for "mudline valves with resilient sealing surfaces," the court ruled that there was no market for such valves separate and apart from the general market for valves of the proper pressure ratings capable of controlling the flow of abrasive laden fluids. The resilient seated valves in issue competed with metal-to-metal seated valves, which were produced by several of the large manufacturers of valves.

[Patent Infringement Suit]

INGRAHAM, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: This is a suit for patent infringement, injunction and accounting for profits and damages, brought by Cameron Iron Works, Inc., as plaintiff, against Edward Valves, Inc. and Rockwell Manufacturing Company, defendants. Other defendants were originally named in the Complaint but were dropped as parties by stipulation of counsel. Defendant Edward Valves, Inc. is a subsidiary of defendant Rockwell Manufacturing Company. Mr. Crawford, President of Edward Valves, Inc., is also Vice President of Rockwell Manufacturing Company and serves as Director upon the board of each company.

The patent in suit is patent No. 2,606,740 issued to plaintiff on August 12, 1952, upon an application of Herbert Allen filed April 5, 1945. The Allen patent is for a "Valve" and relates to an improvement in valves for controlling the flow of abrasive-laden fluids under pressures of as high as several thousand pounds per square inch in various oil and gas well drilling operations. The invention is directed to the form of the sealing means adapted to seal against the closure member of the valve and the valve body when the valve is closed. The principal object of the invention was to provide a valve having a fluid pressure actuated sealing means which will not tend to tear off or be blown past the valve closure member while the gate is being opened or closed.

The Complaint alleges that the defendants have infringed and will continue to infringe the Allen patent by its manufacture, use and sale of valves known as "Mudwonder" valves. The particular claims alleged to be infringed are not specified in the Complaint, but at the trial plaintiff urged only claims 1, 2, 4 and 5. However, defendants attacked the validity of claim 3 as well as claims 1, 2, 4 and 5.

The Allen patent drawings illustrate two gate valves and a plug valve. However, inasmuch as the accused "Mudwonder" valve is a gate valve, most of the evidence and this discussion are limited to gate valves. The gate valve embodies the following elements: A conventional housing having a flow passage therethrough which connects the pipes leading to and from the valve; a chamber intersecting the flow passage in which is located the movable valve closure member called a gate; the gate which is mounted to move up and down in the chamber to shut off the flow when the gate is across the flow passage; and a sealing element to prevent leakage flow around the gate when it is in closed position. In operation when the gate is across the flow passage, the valve is closed and to open the valve the gate is raised to a position not obstructing the flow passage.

The claims recite a novel combination of elements which includes sealing elements having a lip to seal against the gate to stop leakage. The arrangement specified in the claims is such that the lips are adapted when they are on the downstream side of the closure member to be forced by upstream pressure into sealing engagement with the closure member. The lips have surfaces which are exposed to the upstream pressure in the chamber so as to effect this pressure actuation.

Although the valve is capable of use with either end as the inlet, the seal is always effected against the valve closure member only around the valve outlet; that is, on the downstream side of the valve. This is due to the fact that the lip seal is so disposed that the upstream pressure is permitted to pass into the valve chamber and the downstream lip serves to seal the pressure fluid against flowing out of the valve chamber.

From the plaintiff's evidence it appears that this invention was made in an effort to provide a valve that would be easier to open and close than plaintiff's highly successful "Flex-Seal" valve, made under its patent 2,194,262 which is not in suit but is urged as prior art by defendants. Another point of improvement was to provide a valve that did not depend for its sealing action upon how hard the handwheel was turned to close the valve. In other words, a valve that has seals which are actuated by the pressure sealed against.

Mr. Allen testified, when called by the defendants, that the experimental valves made by plaintiff, although they proved the seal principles, did not offer enough practical advantage over the "Flex-Seal" to warrant its adoption over the "Flex-Seal" as a commercial valve. Plaintiff offered evidence showing the construction and successful testing of three plug valves and one gate valve. There is, however, no evidence that the valve was ever made and sold as a commercial item by plaintiff.

The development of the "Mudwonder" valve by defendants and the events leading up to its sale as a commercial valve are shown by a number of the technical reports taken from defendants' own files. These show that as early as 1949 defendants were weighing arguments in favor of copying the Cameron "Flex-Seal" valve against arguments against this procedure. Defendants tested the Cameron "Flex-Seal" valve and compared it to other valves on the market and proceeded to design and construct an experimental valve having a rubber seat in a one-piece body and a gate with a shoulder which would squeeze against the rubber seat and cause an upstream seal much on the principle of the Cameron "Flex-Seal" valve. However, this was abandoned in favor of the "Mudwonder" construction charged as an infringement here.

The "Mudwonder" valve has fluid pressure actuated sealing means which do not tend to tear off or be blown past the valve closure member while the gate is being opened or closed. It is a gate valve that embodies the following elements: A conventional housing having a flow passage therethrough which connects the pipes leading to and from the valve; a chamber intersecting the flow passage in which the movable valve closure member or gate is located; the gate which is mounted to move up and down in the chamber to shut off the flow when the gate is across the flow passage; and a sealing element that prevents leakage flow around the gate when it is in closed position. In operation when the gate is across the flow passage, the valve is closed and to open the valve the gate is raised to a position not obstructing the flow passage.

Plaintiff's evidence shows that defendants' employees in their conversation, in their technical reports, and even in preparing their application for patent, when referring to the "Mudwonder" called the sealing elements of the valve "lips". The lips included the ridge portion of the seal rings that engage the gate and the ridge portion which seal against the body. The seal is provided by the lips on the downstream side of the closure member, which are forced by the upstream pressure in the chamber into sealing engagement with the closure member. The seal is always about the outlet and the upstream pressure leaks by the lips on the upstream side of the gate to pass into the valve chamber.

The lips that confront the gate engage it. At their lower ends these latter lips are joined by a crescent shaped bridge that makes it easier to install the seal ring insert and provides a seal against the very bottom of the gate. The bridge does not change the function of the lips that seal three fourths of the way around the passage.

The evidence shows that defendants received a copy of the Allen patent on August 27, 1952; that in November of 1952 the Allen patent was tested by defendants; and in March of 1953 defendants were advised by their attorneys that Cameron was almost certain to bring this infringement suit. Defendants elected to go ahead with the project and to rely upon prior art, so that the infringement was both bold and deliberate.

[Defenses]

Defendants pleaded defenses of anticipation by the prior art, lack of invention over the prior art, non-infringement, file wrapper estopple, patent and claims are indefinite, misuse of patent and fraudulent misrepresentations to the Patent Office. The evidence does not sustain any of these defenses. The Allen patent was adjudged valid in Cameron Iron Works, Inc. v. Stekoll, 242 Fed. (2d) 17.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

I am of the opinion that the Allen patent is valid and infringed and find for the plaintiff on all issues.

[Antitrust Counterclaim]

Defendants filed a Counterclaim against plaintiff under Section 4 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C., Section 15) for thrice defendants' damages resulting from certain alleged acts of plaintiff which defendants charge violated 15 U. S. C. Section 2, commonly known as the Sherman Act.

Plaintiff moved for judgment dismissing the Counterclaim on the ground that upon the facts and the law the defendants have shown no right to relief. This motion was made by plaintiff under Rule 41(b) F. R. C. P. after the defendants had completed the presentation of their evidence in support of the Counterclaim.

The Counterclaim charges that plaintiff is attempting to monopolize the market in valves "sized especially for mudline service and having resilient sealing surfaces which render them capable of effectively controlling the flow of abrasive-laden fluids" circulated in the mud supply system of drilling oil wells. The offense charged in the Counterclaim was the filing and maintaining of this civil action without justification.

[Evidence]

The evidence failed to show that any separate market exists in valves with resilient sealing surfaces for mudline service. Rather the evidence shows that such valves in fact compete with valves having metal-to-metal seals used in this and other services. The metal-to-metal valves are sold by numerous manufacturers of valves. The evidence was inconclusive as to any particular portion of the market enjoyed by plaintiff. The evidence doesn't show any alleged illegal act on the part of Cameron other than the filing and maintaining of this civil action on the Allen patent which had already been held valid in Cameron Iron Works, Inc. v. Stekoll, (C. A. 5, 1957), 242 Fed. (2d) 17.

All of the evidence points toward the good faith of plaintiff in filing and maintaining this suit. There is no evidence that plaintiff had any motive in filing this suit other than a proper motive to enforce its patent against what it considered was an infringement.

[Institution of Suit Not Unlawful]

The act of bringing and maintaining a suit for infringement of a patent cannot, standing alone, be a violation of the Sherman Act. A contrary holding would make a serious inroad on the integrity of the patent system as it would discourage patentees from resorting to the courts to have their controversies determined. This is even the case where the patent has not been previously adjudicated. Jacquard Knitting Machine Co. v. Ordnance Gauge Co. (C. A. 3, 1954) [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 68,871], 213 Fed. (2d) 503; Cole v. Hughes Tool Company (C. A. 10, 1954) [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,857], 215 Fed. (2d) 924 at 935; and Walker On Patents, Deller's Edition, Volume 2, Section 408.

[Legal Damage]

Defendants have not produced any evidence showing legal damage to either of them in their business or property, resulting proximately from the alleged unlawful acts. This is a statutory prerequisite to the right of action under 15 U. S. C. 15; Triangle Conduit and Cable Co. v. National Electric Products Corporation (C. A. 3, 1945) [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,422], 152 Fed. (2d) 398; and Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp. v. Brookside Theater Corp. (C. A. 8, 1952) [1952 Trade Cases ¶ 67,218], 194 Fed. (2d) 846.

[Judgment for Plaintiff]

The evidence presents healthy competition in this segment of the valve industry in the true spirit of American free enterprise. Plaintiff's motion will be sustained and a judgment will be entered for plaintiff dismissing the Counterclaim.

Following are findings of fact and conclusions of law, separately, (1) upon the issues of validity and infringement of the Allen patent, and (2) upon defendants' Counterclaim under the Clayton and Sherman Acts.

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law Upon the Issues of Validity and Infringement

Findings of Fact

Plaintiff Has Not Misused the Allen Patent

57. As indicated in the foregoing findings relating to infringement, the Mudwonder valve so closely resembles the Allen patent disclosure that it fully meets the terms of claims 1, 2, 4 and 5 thereof from the standpoint of both structure and function. Therefore, plaintiff had good cause to file and maintain this civil action to submit the question of infringement to the courts.

58. There is no evidence showing an overt act of plaintiff to monopolize or attempt to monopolize any portion of the valve industry and defendants' only allegation of such act is the filing and maintaining of the suit to enforce its patent.

59. Healthy competition exists in the market supplying valves to the oil and gas well drilling industry for service in mud lines, well cementing, formation fracturing and other services in which plaintiff's Flex-Seal valve and defendants' Mudwonder valve are used. Each of these valves competes with valves manufactured and offered for sale in use in these services by numerous valve manufacturers.

60. Plaintiff's Flex-Seal valve was protected by United States patent 2,194,262 until its expiration on March 19, 1957. Its past popularity for certain uses has been due to the excellence of the product, the protection once afforded by the now expired patent, and proper sales efforts, and not from any illegal or unfair practices.

61. The Flex-Seal and the competing valves have been sold for the most part by a large number of supply stores operated in the old fields. The supply stores are owned by supply companies that are unrelated to plaintiff and operate independently of plaintiff. Plaintiff has no power to control these supply stores and there is no evidence that it has attempted to do so.

62. The resilient seated Flex-Seal and Mudwonder valves compete with metal-to-metal seated valves, both lubricated and non-lubricated. The competing metal seated valves are manufactured by several of the large manufacturers of valves.

63. Resilient seated valves compete with metal seated valves except where temperatures higher than about 300° F. or the chemical composition of the fluids prevent their use. There is no market of "mudline valves with resilient sealing surfaces" separate and apart from the general market of valves of the proper pressure ratings capable of controlling flow of abrasive laden fluids.

64. The magnitude of annual sales of "mudline valves with resilient sealing surfaces" was not establish in the evidence with any reasonable certainty. Also, plaintiff's particular share of the sale of such resilient seated valves has not been established with any reasonable certainty.

65. Neither defendant has proved it has suffered any legal damages to its business or property by reason of any acts of plaintiff alleged in the Counterclaim to be unlawful.

Conclusions of Law

14. Plaintiff, in filing and maintaining this civil action and in the conduct of its business, acted in good faith and not for the purpose of monopolizing or attempting to monopolize any substantial portion of commerce controllable by Congress in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States and has not misused the patent.

15. Plaintiff has not misused the Allen patent.

10. Resilient seated valves compete with metal seated valves except where temperatures higher than about 300° F. or the chemical composition of the fluids prevent their use. There is no market of "mud line valves with resilient sealing surfaces" separate and apart from the general market of valves of the proper pressure ratings capable of controlling flow of abrasive laden fluids.

11. The magnitude of annual sales of "mud line valves with resilient sealing surfaces" was not established in the evidence with any reasonable certainty. Also, plaintiff's particular share of the sale of such resilient seated valves has not been established with any reasonable certainty.

12. Neither defendant has proved it has suffered any legal damages to its business or property by reason of any acts of plaintiff alleged in the Counterclaim to be unlawful.

Conclusions of Law

1. This court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter of the Counterclaim.

2. Plaintiff had good cause to file and maintain the civil action brought on its Complaint filed herein for infringement of United States Letters Patent 2,606,740, and such action was filed and maintained by plaintiff in good faith without any illegal intent to monopolize or to attempt to monopolize any portion of the valve industry.

3. There is no market for "mud line valves with the resilient sealing surfaces" separate and apart from the general market of valves of the proper pressure ratings capable of controlling flow of abrasive laden fluids because of competition offered by the metal-to-metal seated valves of this general market.

4. Defendants have not been severally or jointly injured or damaged in their business or property by reason of plaintiff's acts which defendants have alleged violate the antitrust laws of the United States and thus would not be entitled to relief even though plaintiff's acts did constitute a violation of the antitrust laws.

5. Plaintiff has not violated the antitrust laws of the United States.

6. The Counterclaim should be dismissed.

Filed with the clerk herewith are separate judgments (1) for plaintiff upon its suit for validity and infringement of the Allen patent, and (2) dismissing defendants' Counterclaim.

Copies hereof will be forwarded by the clerk to the attorneys of record.

[¶ 69,495] Gulf Oil Corporation v. Claude E. Mays, individually and trading as Mays Gulf Service.

In the Pennsylvania Court of Common Pleas of Berks County. No. 2813, Equity Docket, 1959. Dated October 8, 1959.

Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement Action—Defenses—Lack of Enforcement Activity—Fair Trader's Failure to Stop Other Retailers from Giving Trading Stamps—Legality of Practice.—A gasoline producer which allegedly "sanctioned" its dealers' practice of giving "trading stamps" in connection with the retail sale of its product was not precluded from enforcing its fair trade prices against a retailer who did not follow that practice. Rejecting the contention that the circumstances gave rise to an equitable defense, the court noted that the producer had not prohibited the retailer from adopting the practice. Further, the more important answer to that contention was that "the giving of trading stamps is not a reduction of price of the article whose purchase entitles the buyer to stamps." It is not a price cutting device, but a means of inducing a customer to return and make additional purchases. In a sense, the stamps have no value in themselves; they acquire value only if the stipulated amount of other purchases is made. Thus, the giving of trading stamps cannot be regarded as cutting prices any more than free delivery service or free parking, practices which obviously save money for customers, could be so regarded.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3294.40, 3440.40.

Fair Trade—Fair Trade Prices Established After "Nonsigner's" Execution of Long-term Sales Agreement—Validity—"Unilateral Modification" of Existing Contract.—A gasoline producer with a 1955 sales agreement binding a retailer to purchase 90,000 gallons per year for 15 years was not required to obtain the consent of that retailer in order to enforce against him, a "nonsigner," the producer's 1959 fair trade agreements with others. Rejecting the contention that enforcement of those fair trade agreements against the nonsigner would constitute a "unilateral modification" of an existing contract, the court noted that (1) the parties contracted in view of, and subject to, the law of Pennsylvania, (2) the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act was in existence at the time the parties entered into the sales agreement, (3) neither party could object to the invocation of any applicable law of Pennsylvania, and (4) the dealer could not successfully maintain that he or the producer was "impliedly contracted out of the statute."

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3130, 3258.40, 3420.

Fair Trade—Defenses to Enforcement Action—Lack of "Option" to Accept or Reject Fair Trade Goods—Contractual Obligation to Make Minimum Yearly Purchases.—The fact that a gasoline retailer was contractually obligated to purchase from a producer at least 90,000 gallons of gasoline per year for 15 years did not relieve him from complying with the producer's fair trade prices. The retailer contended that, in every case which had arisen from the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act, the retailer had had an option to buy the fair trade goods or not to buy them, but that he had no such choice by reason of his contractual obligations with the producer. He thus argued that it would be against "conscience and good equity" to forbid him to sell at such a price as he found necessary "to move it in the channel of distribution to the consumers." However, it did not appear that the retailer had labored under any difficulty in disposing of 90,000 gallons per year. During 1958, a fairly representative year, he had sold over 220,000 gallons. He testified that raising his price by one cent to meet the fair trade price would cause him to suffer a great reduction in his business, but it could not be concluded that his loss of business would be so great as to "embarrass and financially jeopardize him in taking the 90,000 gallons." In short, he had not shown that by adopting the fair trade price he could not market gasoline. Therefore, it was not necessary to rule upon the general validity of the contention that the nature and extent of his total contracts with the producer might, under some circumstances, relieve him from compliance with the fair trade prices.

Sur Application for Injunction

PLEADINGS AND ISSUES

SHANAMAN, President Judge [In full text]: The pleadings are: (1) Plaintiff's complaint, (2) defendant's answer, (3) plaintiff's reply. The issue is whether or not defendant shall be ordered to comply with fair-trading prices for plaintiff's products, when offered for sale by defendant.

FINDINGS OF FACT

[Parties]

1. At all times material hereto Gulf has been and now is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, with its principal office and place of business at Seventh Avenue and Grant Street, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania (N. T. 6).

2. At all times material hereto defendant has been and now is an individual doing business under the name of Mays Gulf Service at 39th Street and Philadelphia Pike, Reiffton, Berks County, Pennsylvania, where he is engaged, inter alia, in the sale at retail of Good Gulf, Gulf Super No-nox, and Gulf Crest gasoline, herein sometimes referred to separately and collectively as "Gulf Brand Gasoline" (N. T. 6).

3. For many years and at all times herein mentioned, Gulf has been and now is a refiner and vendor of branded regular and premium grades of gasolines, which gasolines are sold throughout the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania (N. T. 6).

[Trademarked Commodity]

4. Gulf Brand Gasoline is sold at retail from dispensing or vending machines which bear the trade-marks, brands or names of plaintiff (N. T. 6-7).

5. Gulf Brand Gasoline is in fair and open competition in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania with commodities of the same general class produced or manufactured by others (N. T. 6-7).

6. Gulf has expended millions of dollars in promoting and advertising Gulf Brand Gasoline, both nationally and in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and has established valuable public acceptance and good will for such gasolines and for the name, brand and trade-mark under which they are produced and sold (N. T. 13-14).

[Fair Trade Contracts]

7. Gulf, pursuant to the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act, has entered into certain Fair Trade Agreements with retailers of Gulf Brand Gasoline in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and particularly in Berks County, under which Gulf has a right to and did stipulate minimum retail prices for Gulf Brand Gasoline (N. T. 11-13, 25).

8. Of 1,846 retailers of Gulf Brand Gasoline in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 1,539 have executed Gulf Fair Trade Agreements; of the 63 Gulf dealers in the Reading tank wagon area, 56 have executed Gulf Fair Trade Agreements; and of the 51 Gulf dealers in Berks County, Pennsylvania, 47 or 48 have executed Gulf Fair Trade Agreements (N. T. 11, 25).

9. On January 12, 1959, Gulf commenced the Fair Trading of Gulf Brand Gasoline in Pennsylvania and gave notice thereof to its retailers including the defendant (N. T. 7-8, 12-13, 20).

10. On January 13, 1959, and again on February 20, 1959, Gulf duly notified defendant of the existence of its Fair Trade Agreements and of the minimum retail prices stipulated by Gulf under said Agreements for the sale of Gulf Brand Gasoline (N. T. 7-8, 9-10).

[Violation by Nonsigner]

11. Defendant, at various times since January 13, 1959, advertised, offered for sale and sold at retail Gulf Brand Gasolines, to wit, Good Gulf, Gulf Super No-nox, and Gulf Crest, from dispensing or vending machines and equipment bearing Gulf's name, brand and trade-mark at 26.9, 29.9, and 32.9 cents per gallon respectively (including taxes), although he had notice of the fact that Gulf's stipulated minimum retail prices therefor were 27.9, 30.9 and 33.9 cents per gallon respectively (including taxes) (N. T. 8-10).

12. The foregoing sales of Gulf Brand Gasoline by defendant were not made for the purpose of closing out defendant's stock of Gulf Brand Gasoline for the purpose of discontinuing delivery thereof; were not sales of Gulf Brand Gasoline defective or deteriorated in quality or removed from Gulf's Fair Trade price schedule; were not sales by an officer acting under the order of any court; and were not sales in execution of any writ or distress (N. T. 10-11).

13. The aforesaid sales of Gulf Brand Gasoline below the legally stipulated minimum retail prices therefor were made wilfully and knowingly.

14. The aforesaid sales by defendant have caused irreparable damage to Gulf and have tended to impair and destroy the good will and value of the brands and trade-marks pertaining to Gulf Brand Gasoline.

[Other Agreements]

15. On September 15, 1955, the parties hereto entered into a sales agreement under which, for a period of fifteen years, from October 7, 1955 to October 6, 1970, the defendant was obligated to purchase from the plaintiff, at least 90,000 gallons of motor fuel per year (Exhibit 4).

16. Under an agreement dated September 15, 1955 between the parties hereto, the defendant agreed that in the event the defendant should for any reason cease to operate himself the gasoline station on Perkiomen Avenue in Reiffton, the plaintiff has an option to lease from the defendant said premises for the sum of $200.00 per month until December 31, 1970.

17. Under an agreement dated September 15, 1955 between the parties hereto, the defendant agreed that in the event the defendant breached any condition of a sales agreement between the parties hereto dated September 15, 1955, the plaintiff had an option to lease from the defendant said premises for the sum of $200.00 per month until December 31, 1970.

18. Under an agreement dated September 15, 1955 between the parties hereto, the defendant agreed that in the event that a sales agreement between the parties hereto dated September 15, 1955 was terminated by operation of law or by mutual consent or by other cause not attributable to the action of the plaintiff, plaintiff had an option to lease from the defendant said premises for the sum of $200.00 per month until December 31, 1970 (Appendix, N. T. filed April 8, 1959).

19. The defendant and his wife, Olive D. Mays, have operated the gas station on Perkiomen Avenue in Reiffton since October 7, 1955, and have purchased more than 90,000 gallons of motor fuel from the plaintiff during each year.

[Trading Stamps]

20. Competitors of the defendant selling the gasoline distributed by the plaintiff have given to customers purchasing motor fuel trading stamps.

21. The plaintiff has taken no steps to prevent competitors of the defendant selling the plaintiff's product from giving trading stamps to the customers of said competitors.

DISCUSSION

[Defenses—Lack of Enforcement Activity]

The validity of the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act of June 5, 1935, P. L. 266, as amended, 73 P. S. 7, et seq., has been more than once upheld.

> "The Act of 1935 is violated when the vendor either (1) cuts directly the prices of commodities within the protection of the act, or (2) accomplishes the same result in respect to the commodities by a device which is a palpable subterfuge resorted to for the purpose of circumventing the law." Bristol-Myers Company v. Lit Brothers, Inc. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,227], 336 Pa. 81, Syll. 3; Lentheric, Inc. v. F. W. Woolworth Co. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,033], 338 Pa. 523; Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp. v. L. & H. Stores, Inc. [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,981], 392 Pa. 225, accord.

[Giving Trading Stamps—Legality]

Defendant argues that some dealers in plaintiff's products give trading stamps to purchasers, and that plaintiff has made no substantial effort to stop this practice. Defendant concedes that in suits brought by maker against dealer to enforce a Fair-Trade price, the courts have not regarded the giving of trading stamps to purchasers as a violation by the dealer of the Fair Trade Act. Defendant contends, however, that where the defendant-dealer does not himself give trading stamps and defends on the ground that the plaintiff-manufacturer is sanctioning the practice of his other dealers in giving trading stamps, an equitable defense against an injunction should be held to exist. There are two answers to this contention: First, whatever practice of giving trading stamps exists among plaintiff's other dealers, or some of them, the plaintiff,

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Gulf Oil Corporation is not prohibiting and has not prohibited Claude Mays, the defendant, to adopt it. The second and more important answer to defendant's contention is that the giving of trading stamps is not a reduction of price of the article whose purchase entitles the buyer to stamps. In Bristol-Myers Co. v. Lit Brothers, Inc. [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,227], 336 Pa. 81, 89, the court said:

> "There is no doubt that the giving away of these stamps by Lit Brothers, Inc.,—its practice for 30 years—is not a price-cutting device but a means of inducing a customer to return to the store to make additional purchases. . . . While it is the purpose of the Fair Trade Act to prevent 'cut-throat competition,' it is NOT the purpose of the Act to prevent ALL business competition. . . . It follows, therefore, that for a merchant to confer pecuniary benefits upon his customers, which benefits some competing merchant does not confer, does not amount to such unfair competition as the Fair Trade Law forbids. . . . It is clear to us that the practice indulged in by Lit Brothers, of issuing trading stamps with the sales of its merchandise falls within the sphere of legitimate competition and does not constitute a 'selling (of) any commodity at less than the price stipulated and that it is not unfair competition' within the meaning of the act appellant invokes."

In Gever v. American Stores Co. [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,569], 387 Pa. 206, the manufacturer was not a party. The suit was brought by one retailer against another. Both competed in selling at retail various branded drugs, medical, and cosmetic products. The defendant, but not the plaintiff, gave trading stamps. The court, in approving the doctrine of the Bristol-Myers Company case, hereinabove quoted, said at page 212:

> "Viewed realistically, the giving of trading stamps may be regarded as nothing more than the equivalent of a normal cash discount, which is merely a term of payment and not a price reduction. Indeed, in a sense, the stamps have no value in themselves but acquire it only if the stipulated amount of other purchases is made. They cannot be regarded as cutting prices any more than free delivery service or free parking could be so regarded although these are practices which obviously save money for the customers of stores offering such advantages. Accordingly, the use of trading stamps, pursued as a general business practice by a commercial establishment, does not violate either the letter or the spirit of the Fair Trade Act."

Defendant contends secondly that the original contract between him and the plaintiff involving purchase by defendant and his wife of the gas station, the giving of notes by them for about $25,000.00, payable to a bank and guaranteed by plaintiff, the execution of a bond and mortgage by Mr. and Mrs. Mays to plaintiff as security against plaintiff's liability as guarantor of defendant's notes, the sales agreement itself, executed September 15, 1955, operative for fifteen years, ending October 6, 1970, the obligatory purchase by defendant during that period of at least 90,000 gallons of Gulf motor fuels each year, a lease-option agreement, from defendant to plaintiff, covering the gas station, at a rental of $200.00 a month, optionally available to plaintiff as a further security in certain contingencies, all together had the effect of making defendant a "captive dealer". Defendant contends that in every other case that has arisen from the Fair Trade Act, the retailer has had the option to buy the fair trade goods or not to buy them, but in this case is compelled to buy them from the plaintiff to the amount of 90,000 gallons a year. The defendant would, in these circumstances, have the chancellor conclude that it would be against conscience and good equity to forbid defendant to price the product to his customers at such amount as he finds in his judgment necessary to move it in the channel of distribution to the consumers. It is not necessary for us to rule either that some or no set of facts can be presented which will prevent the chancellor from enforcing the fair trade price. The chancellor sees no special harm to defendant, if he conform to the regulated price, which generally obtains among plaintiff's dealers, F. of F. 8. True, defendant is obligated to accept at least 90,000 gallons yearly under the contract. It does not appear, however, that the defendant has labored under difficulty in disposing of this quantity. During 1958, a fairly representative year, he sold over 220,000 gallons of gasoline. In one month of 1959, he sold over 24,000 gallons, N. T. 42. True, he testifies to his expectation that if he would raise his price by one cent in order to meet the required fair trade price, he would suffer a great reduction in business, N. T.

42. This expectation might well be justified, but it does not follow, nor can we conclude that his loss of business would be so great as to embarrass and financially jeopardize him in taking the 90,000 gallons. In short, he has not shown that by adopting the fair trade price he cannot market gasoline. It is not necessary, therefore, to rule upon the general validity of the defendant's contention that the nature and extent of his total contracts with plaintiff may under some circumstances relieve him at least in equity from compliance with the fair-traded price. It is sufficient to rule that upon this record defendant has shown no equitable circumstances which ought to restrain us from issuing an injunction to enforce the legal rights of plaintiff under the statute. We should mention a collateral contention of defendant, that since the plaintiff had not fair-traded its product before or at the time when it entered into its agreement with defendant, it cannot, as to him, fair-trade its product thereafter, unless it first obtain his consent. To rule otherwise, defendant asserts, would be to sustain as lawful a unilateral modification of the terms of an existing contract. We are of opinion that the parties contracted in view of the law of the State of Pennsylvania and subject to it; that the Fair Trade Act was at the time in existence and had been for many years; and that neither party can object to the invocation of any applicable law of Pennsylvania, nor can the defendant successfully maintain that he or plaintiff were impliedly contracted out of the statute. We find nothing either in the language of the basic contract of September 15, 1955, between the parties, nor in the statutory or decisional law extant at that time and since, to relieve defendant. Such rights of defendant, if any there be, as might conceivably develop in the future under changing circumstances, may be sufficently guarded by allowing him at any future time to petition to reopen the case for modification or alteration of the decree. Since this is a business dispute, involving chiefly or solely a question of law, the solution of which is desirable in the interest of both parties, it is equitable to divide the costs.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

[Injunction Granted]

1. This court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter of the action.

2. Gulf has established a valid cause of action under the Fair Trade Act of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved June 5, 1935, P. L. 226, as amended (73 P. S. 7 et seq.).

3. The wilful and knowing offering for sale and selling of Gulf Brand Gasoline below the stipulated minimum retail price therefor constitutes unfair competition by the defendant.

4. Plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law and is entitled to a perpetual injunction restraining defendant from selling any Gulf Brand Gasoline for less than the applicable minimum retail price stipulated by plaintiff pursuant to the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act.

5. The plaintiff and the defendant shall each pay half the costs.

6. The court will retain jurisdiction in case future alteration in the circumstances or law of the case should warrant either party in petitioning for rehearing and reconsideration.

7. The defendant, Claude E. Mays, individually and trading as May Gulf Service, his agents, employees and all persons acting under his authority and control, be and they are hereby perpetually enjoined and restrained from advertising, offering for sale or selling at retail any fair-traded Gulf Brand Gasoline from any dispensing or vending machine bearing plaintiff's trademark, brand or name for prices less than the applicable minimum retail prices now or hereafter stipulated therefor by plaintiff pursuant to a Fair Trade Agreement between plaintiff and a retailer of Gulf Fair-Traded gasoline; provided plaintiff shall have mailed notice of such prices to defendant at 39th Street and Philadelphia Pike, Reiffton, Berks County, Pennsylvania, or at such other address as defendant has specified in writing to plaintiff for such purpose, or shall have delivered such notice to defendant or any employee or agent of defendant at any such address.

And Now, To Wit, October 8, 1959 the prothonotary is directed to enter a decree nisi in accordance with the foregoing decision, and forthwith to give notice thereof to the parties or their counsel of record.

[¶ 69,496] Clinton Engines Corporation v. Briggs & Stratton Corporation.

In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division. Civil No. 14007. Filed March 31, 1959.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Patents—Practices—Obtaining Patents on Inventions Known to Be Unpatentable—Institution of Infringement Action—Evidence of Antitrust Violations.—An engine manufacturer was not entitled to summary judgment in a competitor's treble damage action charging that the manufacturer had (1) obtained certain patents from the United States Patent Office with full knowledge that the inventions were not patentable, (2) withheld from the Patent Office knowledge of prior art and previous public use of the so-called inventions, and (3) commenced, in bad faith, an infringement action against the competitor. In the latter action, it was held that the patents were invalid. Here, however, the manufacturer asserted that its actions in obtaining the patents and instituting the infringement action to protect the patents could not be the basis for a suit under the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts. Even though a patent finally proves to be invalid, no violation of the antitrust laws results from the obtaining of a patent or from efforts to protect it by litigation. However, activities indulged in for the purpose of seeking to patent something known by the applicant to be invalid, and as a part of a scheme to create an illegal monopoly or restrain trade, would not be excluded as evidence in an action seeking to enforce the antitrust laws. Thus, if the competitor could prove that the obtaining of the patents and the infringement action were part of an "evil and illegal scheme to create and maintain a monopoly, it should not be foreclosed from relying on such proofs."

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2013.200, 2013.225; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.500, 2610.525; Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9012.130.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Summary Judgment—"Collateral Estoppel"—Prior Patent Infringement Action—Disallowance of Attorney's Fees and Concessions of Counsel as "Adjudication" of "Inequitable Conduct" Issue.—An engine manufacturer, in a treble damage action charging it with obtaining certain patents and instituting an infringement action against a competitor as a part of a scheme in violation of the antitrust laws, was not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of its alleged "misconduct," under the doctrine of "collateral estoppel," as a result of another court's refusal, in the infringement action, to award attorney's fees to the competitor for successfully defending that action (the patents were adjudged invalid). Generally, in patent litigation, a trial court considers the matter of equitable or inequitable conduct in exercising its discretion to grant or withhold attorney's fees. However, it could not be said with certainty that the disallowance of such fees was an adjudication that there was no fraud, bad faith, or inequitable conduct on the manufacturer's part. Further, it could not be said that there was no "genuine issue as to any material fact." While the manufacturer asserted in its brief that the record and file in the prior action "presumably" contained all the evidence which could be submitted on the misconduct issue, no affidavits that such was the fact were filed in support of the motion for summary judgment.

However, under the doctrine of "collateral estoppel," the competitor was foreclosed from retrying any of the facts included in a statement by its counsel, during the trial of the infringement action, that it was not true that the manufacturer's counsel had "intentionally, or even knowingly, withheld any information from the patent office." Noting that its ruling was not based upon a characterization of that statement as a judicial admission, the court held that counsel's concession was, in effect, a stipulation of fact and was tantamount to an agreement that the competitor was defeated on that issue.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9012, 9013.675.

For the plaintiff: Armstrong, Essery, Helm & Marshall, and Rottman, Siegel & Sugar, Detroit, Mich. (Harry F. Hittle, Lansing, Mich., and Chris M. Youngjohn, Detroit, Mich., of counsel).

Opinion on Motion for Summary Judgment

[Patent Misuse as Basis for Antitrust Action]

O'SULLIVAN, District Judge [In full text]: The matter for decision is defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment as to those matters set forth in paragraphs 15, 18(a), 19 and 21 of plaintiff's Complaint. Defendant contends that all matters contained in said paragraphs were tried, determined and fully adjudicated in a previous suit between these parties wherein the defendant here, Briggs & Stratton Corporation, was plaintiff, and Clinton Machine Company, plaintiff herein, was defendant. Defendant's motion further asserts that there remains now no issue for this Court to try as to the matters set forth and relied upon in the mentioned paragraphs of plaintiff's Complaint. Defendant partially relies upon the doctrine of collateral estoppel. Clinton Machine Company will hereafter be referred to as Clinton and Briggs & Stratton Corporation as Briggs & Stratton.

Clinton, in this action, seeks damages from Briggs & Stratton for alleged violations of the Sherman and Clayton Act. In its Complaint, filed in December, 1954, it charges that Briggs & Stratton, as a part of its scheme to create a monopoly and restrain trade, in bad faith and with evil design, sought and obtained from the United States Patent Office certain patents, referred to as the Lechtenberg patents, with full knowledge that the inventions thereby sought to be patented were not, in fact, patentable. Plaintiff further charges that in seeking said patents, defendant deliberately and fraudulently withheld from the Patent Office its knowledge of prior art and previous public use of the so-called inventions which, if disclosed to the Patent Office, would have prevented issuance of the patents in question; that, after obtaining the patents in question, the defendant, Briggs & Stratton, in bad faith, on December 9, 1954, commenced an action in the United States District Court in Iowa against Clinton alleging infringement by Clinton of the patents fraudulently and illegally obtained. These charges are set forth in paragraphs 15, 18(a), 19 and 21 of the complaint as follows:

"15. In the spring of the year 1953, plaintiff publicly announced to the industry that it intended to design additional models to its line of engines, and that it would shortly be in a position to offer an engine in competition for each of the models produced by defendant. Upon learning of such plans, defendant, well knowing that it would thus be unable to pursue its practice of price reduction on competing models while retaining higher prices on non-competing models, and in order to impede, stifle and hamper interstate commerce, reduce competition and regain complete domination in the industry, deliberately and maliciously conceived a scheme to undermine the plaintiff by obtaining certain letters patent which it well knew would be wholly invalid, but which it well knew would nevertheless be useful to embarrass plaintiff in its relationships with customers and others. Accordingly, on May 11, 1953, and again on May 11, 1954, defendant assembled numerous and divers specious claims which comprised numerous and divers mechanical practices and forms previously employed chiefly by plaintiff as well as other engine manufacturers, and caused to be filed two separate applications for letters patent in the U. S. Patent Office in Washington, D. C., well knowing that any patent or patents that would or could issue pursuant to claims made thereunder would be wholly and completely invalid and were intended solely to be used to injure and destroy plaintiff and remove it from the industry.

"18(a). Exerted unseemly and undue pressure upon certain examiners of the U. S. Patent Office, as a result of which U. S. Patents numbers 2693789 and 2693791, now owned by defendant, were issued on November 9, 1954, greatly in advance of the time that action thereon would normally have been taken. These patents relate to certain features embodied in plaintiff's so-called light weight aluminum engine, which was the most popular and best seller in plaintiff's line.

"19. Defendant well knew that the aforesaid patents were not based on novelty or invention, but embodied features previously used by plaintiff, and were thus wholly and completely invalid. Nevertheless, on the 16th day of November, 1954, it notified plaintiff that it was infringing said patents and demanded that plaintiff desist from further manufacture of engines with features embodied therein. On November 24, 1954, solely in pursuance of its scheme unlawfully to destroy plaintiff, restrain interstate trade and commerce, and stifle competition, defendant wrote a letter to each of plaintiff's original equipment customers notifying them of the issuance of said patents and stated that two manufacturers who had copied certain features covered by said patents had been notified of infringement. A copy of said letter of November 24, 1954, is hereto attached as Exhibit 'A' and incorporated herein by express reference. Defendant well knew that because of plaintiff's large volume of sales of said type of engine, its customers, as maliciously calculated by defendant, would readily infer that plaintiff was intended as one of such manufacturers.

"21. In further pursuance of its malicious and illegal scheme to force plaintiff out of business and stifle competition, defendant, on the 9th day of December, 1954, instituted an action against plaintiff in the Northern District of Iowa, Eastern Division, for alleged infringement of the aforesaid patents, well knowing that the same were wholly and completely invalid, but intending thereby further to influence and induce plaintiff's customers to cease purchasing its engines, and as part of its plan and scheme to undermine plaintiff, defendant circulated divers rumors and false information in the small engine industry and particularly among plaintiff's customers relative to the institution of said suit and its probable outcome and result. In addition, defendant well knew that the expense of defending said suit in the courts would so weaken plaintiff financially that it might not wish to undertake such defense."

[Prior Patent Litigation]

Defendant's answer denies the wrongdoing so charged against it. After this cause was at issue, trial thereof was postponed to await the conclusion of the Iowa litigation.

In the Iowa case, Clinton filed an answer and counter-claim denying the validity of the so-called Lechtenberg patents, its claimed infringement thereof, and set forth as its 13th, 15th and 16th defenses, the following:

"13th Defense. That the subject matter of the U. S. Letters Patent No. 2693789 and Patent No. 2693791, set out in the Complaint and covered by the claims thereof, was in public use and on sale for more than one year prior to the filing of said applications, and that the patentee of said Letters Patents and his attorneys and agents, and the assignee of said Letters Patents, knew of such subject matter being in public use and on sale in the United States for over a year, but concealed such fact from the officials of the United States Patent Office, and as a consequence thereof, said Letters Patents were fraudulently and deceitfully obtained.

"15th Defense. That the application for Letters Patent No. 2605753, which was filed by Dorothy H. Madle, as Administratrix of the Estate of Alain Madle, deceased, as a continuation of an application previously filed by Alain Madle, and abandoned, discloses and covers subject matter which was not the invention of the said Alain Madle, and which was not embraced by or disclosed in or covered by the patent applications previously filed by said Alain Madle, and that at the time of the filing of the application on which Patent No. 2605753 issued to this Plaintiff, its agents and attorneys knew that such application contained other subject matter than the invention of the said Alain Madle, and particularly as disclosed and set forth in the applications previously filed by the said Alain Madle, and that with fraudulent intent and purpose concealed such fact from Dorothy H. Madle, Administratrix, and while so concealing such fact had the said Dorothy H. Madle sign the application and swear to the statutory oath forming a part of the application and thus perpetrating upon the officials of the United States Patent Office fraud and deceit and thereupon had said Letters Patent No. 2605753, surreptitiously issued; and that in view of such fraudulent conduct, said Letters Patent No. 2605753, and each and all of the claims thereof, is invalid, null and void.

"16th Defense. That the specifications and claims of each of said patents set out in said complaint are calculated to deceive and mislead the public because of ambiguity and needless multiplication of nebulous claims, and said patents are, therefore, null and void."

In its counterclaim for Declaratory Judgment in the Iowa action, Clinton incorporated by reference the allegations of its answer. It asked for a declaratory judgment that the Lechtenberg patents were invalid, that it was not infringing, that the plaintiff's complaint be dismissed, and "that this defendant be allowed costs and attorneys fees, and that this defendant have such further, other, different and general relief as it may be entitled to."

In the Iowa litigation, Briggs & Stratton sought to establish the validity of three patents, a so-called Madle patent, No. 2605753, and the so-called Lechtenberg patents, Nos. 2693789 and 2693791, respectively. The cause in Iowa was tried before Honorable Henry N. Graven, United States District Judge. At the conclusion of the proofs originally offered in the case, Judge Graven filed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law and entered a Judgment. In his original disposition of the case Judge Graven found that the Madle patent and Lechtenberg patent 2693791 were invalid, but that if such patents were valid, Clinton was guilty of infringement thereof; he held that Lechtenberg patent 2693789 was valid, that Clinton had infringed it, and directed that Briggs & Stratton should receive damages later to be determined by the Court. The said first Findings of Judge Graven contained the following:

"17. The defendant claims that in the prosecution of the application for the patent pertinent prior art was concealed from the Patent Office. The Court finds that no pertinent prior art was concealed from the Patent Office in connection with the patent.

"18. The defendant's engine VS100 is a striking copy and imitation of the structure disclosed by the patent. It is clear and the Court so finds, that the defendant's engine VS100 reads on and infringes the claims in question as to the patentable invention found to have been disclosed by them.

"29. The Court finds that the circumstances are such that no award of attorney fees shall be made to either the plaintiff or the defendant.

"30. The Court finds that the circumstances are such that each party should be assessed one-half of the taxable costs."

Judgment on Judge Graven's Findings was entered on March 12, 1956. Following entry of this judgment, new counsel appeared for Clinton, and on April 2, 1956, it filed a pleading designated "Motion to Relieve Defendant from Judgment and Order of March 12, 1956, and Motion for New Trial with Respect to the Matter of the Validity and Infringement of the Lechtenberg U. S. Patent No. 2693789." Various affidavits were filed in support of these motions; the affidavits related principally to claimed prior art and previous public use of the subject matter of the Lechtenberg patent which had been held valid and infringed.

[Concession of Counsel]

In oral argument on the last mentioned motions, the following colloquy between the Court and the then counsel for Clinton Machine Company occurred:

"By Mr. Raisch: Now, I think the defendant has been diligent in locating this Lauson prior arts, for reasons I will point out very shortly. And I think there is an excusable mistake or inadvertence with respect to some of the issues raised with respect to the issue of protecting the invention and the interchangeability of the covers. But if Your Honor finds that the defendant has not been diligent, then defendant offers to pay the expenses —reasonable expenses incurred by the plaintiff due to defendant's so-called lack of diligence, namely, the expenses incurred by the new trial, bearing on the newly found evidence.

"I want to point out to Your Honor one thing that is very significant. Plaintiff is a very old company in this field, it is located just sixty or seventy miles from New Holstein, which is a very short distance northeast of Fond du Lac, Wisconsin. Defendant is a relatively new newcomer in this field, located here in Iowa and away out in Michigan.

"As Your Honor is well aware, in the prosecution or acting upon applications in the Patent Office, they are filed chronologically in the patent office in the order in which they are received. The first application filed is acted upon first. During the course of prosecution of the Lechtenberg application, the plaintiff filed a petition to make the Lechtenberg application special, that is, urged the office to grant immediate action. Now, as a prerequisite to having a case made special the petitioner, which was Lechtenberg in this case, filed affidavit of certain prior arts and apprised the patent office of the best prior art that is available. Now, I have known the attorneys for Briggs & Stratton Company a good many years, I am very fond of them, and I don't want any inferences drawn whatsoever that they intentionally or even knowingly withheld any information from the patent office, I don't think they did.

"The Court: That charge is made in the pleadings, isn't it?

"Mr. Raisch: If it is Your Honor—

"Mr. Custin: Yes, it is.

"Mr. Raisch: If that charge is made, I don't stand upon it, neither would Mr. Balluff, and I am sure we would agree we would withdraw it. I have known

Mr. Jones and right here I want to say that is not correct or encouraged. Ira happens to be a friend of mine. Here is a very fine old line company, they didn't know about this patent. If they didn't know it, then how could this little newcomer in the field have known of it when this transpired from 1941 to 1947. It was only through an accident that this prior arts was discovered within the last week or ten days, subsequent to this decision of March 12th."

[Patents Held Invalid]

Judge Graven granted the motion for supplemental hearing, and on April 9, 1956, entered an order containing, among other things, the following:

"It is hereby ordered that the judgment heretofore entered on March 12, 1956, be, and the same is, set aside in its entirety."

Evidence was taken upon a supplemental hearing. At its beginning, and on motion of Briggs & Stratton, it was ordered that the claim based upon Lechtenberg Patent No. 2693791 be dismissed. On December 31, 1956, Judge Graven filed Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Order for Judgment (reported as Briggs & Stratton v. Clinton Machine Co., Inc., 147 F. Supp. 361). In this Finding and Judgment Judge Graven declared the Lechtenberg patent No. 2693789 invalid, so that all of the patents relied upon by Briggs & Stratton became adjudged invalid. It is not necessary to here repeat all of the matters reviewed and discussed in this reported opinion. However, the following have special pertinence in considering the disposition of the instant Motion for Summary Judgment.

Findings of Fact:

"14. The plaintiff, Briggs & Stratton, following extensive experiments in January, 1953, placed on sale a die cast aluminum one cylinder four cycle air cooled gasoline engine. Soon thereafter the defendant brought out its VS100 engine, which is the accused engine. The structure of the plaintiff's engine is in accord with the disclosure contained in the first Lechtenberg patent. (No. 2693789) The plaintiff's engine met, and is meeting, with marked commercial success. * * * The question for determination is whether the structure disclosed by the first Lechtenberg patent discloses patentable invention, or merely a high degree of artisanship.

"16. * * * In the light of the additional prior art patents introduced into evidence at the supplemental hearing and further development of the prior art patents introduced into evidence at the original trial and the evidence as to prior use introduced at the supplemental hearing, the Court is of the view that the finding as to patentable invention was erroneous.

"18. The engine produced by the plaintiff in accord with the disclosures of the Lechtenberg patent represents a high degree of artisanship and an excellent piece of engineering. However, the disclosures do not amount to patentable invention.

"20. Save in the matter of the cylinder liner, the defendant's accused engine is a striking and almost slavish copy of the plaintiff's engine. If the claims of Lechtenberg patent No. 2693789 do define inventive combination, the defendant's accused engine clearly infringes.

"12. If Claim 5 of the Madle patent does define inventive combination, then the defendant's Model 2500 engine infringes that claim.

"21. The Court finds that the circumstances are such that no award of attorney fees should be made to the defendant.

"22. The Court finds that the circumstances are such that each party should be assessed one-half of the taxable costs."

Judge Graven's Conclusions of Law follow the Findings of Fact and his Order for Judgment contained the following:

"1. That claim 5 of the Madle Patent No. 2605753 is invalid;

"2. That claims 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 14, 15 and 16 of Lechtenberg patent No. 2693789 are invalid;

"3. That no award of attorney fees should be made to the defendant;

"4. That each party pay one-half of the taxable costs."

[Appeal]

Judgment was accordingly entered on December 31, 1956. Briggs & Stratton appealed. Clinton gave notice of cross-appeal and therein gave notice that it,

"appeals * * * from that portion of the decision entered December 31, 1956, in effect holding U. S. Patents 2693789 and 2605753 infringed by defendant, and from the failure of said judgment to grant defendant all of the relief asked in its counter-claim * * *."

The Court of Appeals affirmed Judge Graven's judgment of the invalidity of Briggs &

Stratton's patents. It accordingly held that the question of infringement had become moot and dismissed Clinton's cross-appeal. This decision is reported as Briggs & Stratton v. Clinton Machine Co., 247 F. (2) 397.

Although Clinton's notice of cross appeal indicated its appeal from Judge Graven's failure to award it all of the relief asked in its counter claim (such relief including a request for allowance of attorney fees) its briefs on appeal did not argue nor state as one of the questions involved the propriety of Judge Graven's holding that under the circumstances of the case no award of attorney fees could be made to the defendant. This question was not discussed or passed upon by the Court of Appeals. In its brief, filed at the conclusion of the first hearing before Judge Graven, Clinton made the following arguments concerning its claim that Briggs & Stratton had, in processing the Lechtenberg patents, knowingly failed to make full disclosures of prior art and public use, which Clinton claimed was within the knowledge of Briggs & Stratton. The following are excerpts from Clinton's brief in this regard.

"In the prosecution of the patent application which resulted in Lechtenberg Patent 789, no structure embodying the features of the structure previously manufactured by Briggs & Stratton Corporation, the plaintiff, and by Clinton Machine Co., the defendant, was ever called to the attention of the examiner of the Patent Office. The examiner of the Patent Office, it is true, made a search of the prior art but this search of necessity was limited to the records of the Patent Office. No prior patents showing the structure of the previous Briggs & Stratton machine and the previous Clinton machine was found by the examiner in the search of the prior patents nor was it called to the attention of the examiner.

"In the prosecution of the application resulting in the Lechtenberg Patent 789, the attorney prosecuting the application personally interviewed the examiner. It is significant that this attorney in interviewing the examiner did not disclose these previous prior art machines previously manufactured by Briggs & Stratton and Clinton Machine Co., and by no means called them to the attention of the examiner. The examiner, therefore, was left in the dark entirely concerning the prior art structure of which Lechtenberg's attorney had knowledge while the application was being prosecuted. Lechtenberg's attorney knew, of course, that had he called to the attention of the examiner these prior art machines, the examiner would have undoubtedly ruled that there was no invention in the claimed structure of the Lechtenberg Patent 789; that there was no invention in making one of the walls of the crankcase removable instead of making the other wall removable; that there would be no invention in casting one of the walls integral instead of another wall and making the bottom wall removable instead of the side wall.

"These machines previously manufactured by Briggs & Stratton, plaintiff, and Clinton Machine Co., defendant, long prior to the filing of the Lechtenberg application, were well known to the plaintiff as indicated by the testimony of the plaintiff's Vice-President in charge of engineering, Mr. Brown. It is also shown that these machines were manufactured and sold by the defendant Clinton Machine Co. long prior to the filing of the Lechtenberg application, which resulted in Patent 789, and more than a year prior to the filing of said application, as shown by the testimony of witness Damon (T. R. 355).

"Moreover, Lechtenberg's attorney knew all of this. He knew what he was doing. He also knew that the Patent Office did not know of these prior structures because they were never cited as prior art in the applications. They were never cited because these patent elements of structure were never considered by either Clinton Machine Co., or Briggs & Stratton Corporation to be of patentable nature and were never patented.

"In spite of all of this Lechtenberg's attorney did not inform the Patent Office of the prior art even though he had a personal interview with the examiner handling the application."

Notwithstanding that its counsel, upon the argument in support of Clinton's motion for new trial had completely exonerated the attorneys for Briggs & Stratton of any fraud or concealment in processing the Lechtenberg patents, the Clinton brief on appeal in the Iowa litigation referred to Briggs & Stratton's petition to make special the processing of its patent application as follows:

"It would appear that the petition had the effect of 'pressuring' the Patent Office into allowing the claims without carefully considering them or the prior art cited in the Petition."

The decision of the Court of Appeals did not discuss bad faith or inequitable conduct upon the part of Briggs & Stratton. In his concurring opinion, Judge Sanborn was complimentary to the work of Briggs & Stratton in producing the engine which was the subject of the Lechtenberg patent question, but concurred in holding that it did not quite reach the status of invention within the meaning of the patent laws. He said:

> "As a practical matter, Lechtenberg's contribution to the art of producing a light, cheap, efficient, air-cooled engine, suitable for furnishing power to rotary lawn mowers and like devices, and susceptible of being die cast, was a meritorious one and was both new and useful. It met with commercial success and was, of course, soon copied by competitors. It is not strange that the District Court first concluded that the Lechtenberg patent was valid and infringed. * * * However, as we have pointed out in a number of cases since the Supreme Court decided Cuno Engineering Corp. v. Automatic Devices Corp., 314 U. S. 84, * * * the amount of originality and ingenuity, over and beyond novelty and utility which will constitute invention necessary to sustain a patent for a combination of old elements in a crowded art, has increased. The conclusion of the District Court is not out of line with our recent decisions in such cases."

With this review of the Iowa litigation, it becomes necessary now to consider Briggs & Stratton's present reliance thereon as a basis for its present motion for summary judgment. This Court believes the following to be a fair statement of the reasoning of the Briggs & Stratton motion:

First: The findings and judgment of Judge Craven that under the circumstances of the Iowa case no attorney fees should be awarded to Clinton was a determination and adjudication that there was no fraud, concealment or inequitable conduct on the part of Briggs & Stratton in obtaining the Lechtenberg patents or in maintaining its infringement suit to protect them.

Second: That all matters relating to fraud, concealment and inequitable conduct on the part of Briggs & Stratton were litigated and tried in the Iowa case, and that a review of the evidence and issues of that litigation demonstrates beyond argument that there was no such fraud, concealment or inequitable conduct; therefore, there are no issues in that regard that can be tried out here. This Court has, from the briefs filed by Briggs & Stratton, concluded that it is here contending that from a review of the pleadings, evidence and findings of the Iowa litigation (the entire record thereof being received in evidence for the purpose of this motion) this Court must hold that reasonable minds could come to no other conclusion than that Briggs & Stratton were not guilty of the misconduct charged in paragraphs 15, 18(a), 19 and 21 of the Clinton complaint in this action. Judgment for defendant as to those paragraphs is accordingly asked. This Court assumes that the defendant is relying upon subsection (c) of Rule 56 which states that:

> "The judgment sought shall be rendered forthwith if the pleadings, depositions, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law."

Third: That the actions of Briggs & Stratton in obtaining the patents and in instituting litigation to protect them cannot be the basis for a suit under the Sherman and Clayton Act. They argue that a patentee by obtaining a patent becomes the possessor of a monopoly to the extent of the patent, and, therefore, such patentee cannot be guilty of a violation of the antitrust laws by seeking to protect a monopoly that such a patent affords to such patentee. Their briefs, however, concede that the application of this doctrine does not apply if it can be shown that the applicant for the patent knew that what he sought to have patented was not patentable; that such patentee was guilty of concealment and fraud in seeking the patent and in instituting litigation to protect it, and that such actions were part of an illegal and evil scheme to create an illegal monopoly and illegally restrain trade.

The Court will discuss these contentions in the above order.

[Estoppel by Prior Judgment]

First, collateral estoppel: The cases which have brought into being the doctrine of collateral estoppel clearly announced its underlying principles. The problem comes in their application to the instant case.

Restatement of Judgments, Section 69, page 293, defines the rule as follows:

"(1) Where a question of fact essential to the judgment is actually litigated and determined by a valid and final judgment, the determination is conclusive between the parties in a subsequent action on a different cause of action, except as (exceptions not here applicable)

"(2) A judgment on one cause of action is not conclusive in a subsequent action on a different cause of action as to questions of fact not actually litigated and determined in the first action."

The United States Supreme Court has stated the principle in the case of Partmar Corp., et al. v. Paramount Pictures Theatres Corp., et al. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶67,674], 347 U. S. 89, as follows:

"We have often held that under the doctrine of res judicata a judgment entered in an action conclusively settles that action as to all matters that were or might have been litigated or adjudged therein. But a prior judgment between the parties has been held to operate as an estoppel in a suit on a cause of action different from that forming the basis for the original suit only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered. This latter aspect of res judicata is the doctrine of collateral estoppel by judgment, established as a procedure for carrying out the public policy of avoiding repetitious litigation."

Judge Cooley of the Michigan Supreme Court in the case of Jacobson v. Miller, 41 Mich. 90 (93) described the doctrine as follows:

"The general principles which must govern the case are familiar. There are two matters in respect to which an adjudication once made may be conclusive; first, the subject matter involved in the litigation; second, the point of fact or of law, or of both, which was necessarily adjudicated in determining the issue upon the subject matter in litigation."

Another tersely descriptive statement of the principle is found in the language of Judge Hamley of the 9th Circuit in the case of E. V. Prentice Machine Co. v. Associated Plywood Mills, 252 F. (2) 473 (476):

"It is predicated on the idea that once a party has fought out a matter in litigation with the opposing party, he cannot later renew the duel."

The limitations of the doctrine were stated in an early and leading authority on the point as follows:

"* * * the inquiry must always be as to the point or question actually litigated and determined in the original action; not what might have been thus litigated and determined. Only upon such matters is the judgment conclusive in another action." Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351 (353).

[Elements of Collateral Estoppel]

In their brief filed in support of the instant motion, counsel for Briggs & Stratton break this principle down into the components which they recognize must combine in order that a previous judgment collaterally estop an issue from being retried in later litigation. They assert:

"A matter is subject to collateral estoppel if (1) the parties are the same, (2) the matter is put into issue by the pleadings, (3) it is in some fashion determined during the course of the litigation; (4) the judgment resulting from the litigation is based upon the determination made, and (5) there is an opportunity for the losing party to appeal."

There is no question but that elements 1 and 5 are present here. The question is whether elements 2, 3 and 4 came into being as a result of the Iowa judgment. Existence of element number two depends on whether the subject matter of paragraphs 15, 18(a), 19 and 21 of the complaint in this case was put in issue by the pleadings in the Iowa litigation. To the extent that special defense No. 13 of Clinton's answer in the Iowa case covers the same subject matter as is contained in the mentioned paragraphs of the present complaint, that subject matter was put in issue by the pleadings in Iowa. The 13th defense charged that the subject matter of the Lechtenberg patents was in public use and on sale for more than a year prior to the filing of application for said patents and that patentee knew of such subject matter being in public use and on sale in the United States for over a year, but concealed such fact from officials of the U. S. Patent Office and as a consequence the patents were fraudulently and deceitfully obtained. This Court feels that it can be fairly stated that this subject matter could be considered as being included in the assertions in paragraphs 15, 18(a) and 19 of the complaint in this action. Other elements, however, of the mentioned paragraphs of the instant complaint were not necessarily put in issue in the Iowa litigation, unless it can be assumed that by asking for the allowance of attorney fees in its counter-claim, Clinton there put in issue all matters that might be considered as demonstrating fraud or inequitable conduct upon the part of Briggs & Stratton even though not specifically spelled out in the Clinton pleadings. This Court is of the opinion that it cannot be said that the pleadings in the Iowa litigation put in issue anything more than the distinct averments of its pleadings, because defendant's prayer for allowance of attorney fees was bottomed upon the assertion of its pleadings. Any averments of the complaint in this case that go beyond the contentions of the 13th defense in Clinton's answer in the Iowa litigation cannot be said to have been put in issue in the Iowa litigation. If, however, proofs were offered of the facts now the subject matter of the complaint in this case, and it can be said that the court considered that evidence and made a finding and an adjudication thereon, absence of allegations thereof in the peladings would not prevent the Iowa findings being conclusive. For the reasons stated hereinafter, this Court does not believe that it has to determine whether or not the subject matter of the mentioned paragraphs of instant complaint were in fact put in issue by the pleadings and proofs in the Iowa litigation.

In the argument of the instant motion, Clinton's attorneys make concession of record that they do not intend to present evidence to support or rely upon the averments of their 13th defense in the Iowa litigation to aid the cause of action asserted in this case. The elimination of that issue from this case can be determined upon a pre-trial order, and does not require the granting of a motion for summary judgment at this time.

The 15th defense in the Iowa litigation charges fraud and deceit on the part of Briggs & Stratton in connection with the Madle patent. The complaint in this case in no way relies upon such fraud and deceit. Clinton's counsel advised the court that such subject matter will not be brought into this litigation.

[Concealment]

Judge Graven's first findings in the Iowa litigation contained the following as his finding No. 17:

> "17. The defendant claims that in the prosecution of the application for the patent pertinent prior art was concealed from the Patent Office. The Court finds that no pertinent prior art was concealed from the Patent Office in connection with the patent."

He was referring to Lechtenberg Patent No. 2693789 which, by his first judgment, he found to be valid.

This finding was not repeated in his final Findings of Fact, nor was the subject matter thereof discussed or treated in his final findings or judgment. Inasmuch as he set aside his first findings and the judgment entered thereon, "in its entirety" the mentioned finding No. 17 ceased to be any part of the final findings or determinations of this litigation.

> "And the general rule is that where a court, in the discharge of its judicial function, vacates an order previously entered, the legal status is the same as if the order had never existed. Mitchell v. Joseph, 117 F. (2d) 253 (255).

One may, indeed, speculate that the reason why Judge Graven did not repeat this finding or make any finding at all upon the subject was as a consequence of statements made by Mr. Raisch at the time of arguing the motion for new trial, exonerating Briggs & Stratton's attorneys from any fraudulent withholding of information from the Patent Office. Judge Graven, however, did not say so and this Court's speculations as to what reasons may have prompted his failure to specifically reconsider the matter are not controlling here.

[Denial of Attorney's Fees as "Adjudication" of Misconduct Issue]

The determination of this motion upon the basis of collateral estoppel depends upon whether this Court can say with certainty that because Judge Graven did not allow attorney fees to defendant Clinton, he thereby adjudicated and determined that Briggs & Stratton were not guilty of any of the conduct charged against them in the aforesaid paragraphs 15, 18(a), 19 and 21 of the complaint in this case.

The statute which would have permitted Judge Graven to award such attorney fees is 35 USC 285:

> "The Court in exceptional cases may award reasonable attorney fees to the prevailing party."

Judge Graven also ordered that under the circumstances of the case each party should pay one-half of the taxable costs. Our rule 54(d) provides:

> "Except when express provision therefor is made either in a statute of the United States or in these rules, costs shall be allowed as of course to the prevailing party unless the court otherwise directs; * * *"

This Court must answer the question of whether or not the only reason why Judge Graven refused, or could have refused, attorney fees to Clinton and ordered costs to be divided equally was a determination and finding by him that Briggs & Stratton was not guilty of any of the charges made against it in the mentioned paragraphs of the complaint in this case.

This Court recognizes that generally in patent and infringement litigation, a trial court considers the matter of equitable or inequitable conduct in exercising his discretion to grant or withhold attorney fees.

In the case of Turchan v. Cincinnati Milling Machine Co., 208 F. (2d) 228 (229), Judge Simons of the Sixth Circuit, commented that:

> "It has been held that under this section (referring to 35 USCA 285, as it then read) that such fees are not to be allowed as a matter of course for Congress did not intend recovery of attorney fees to become the usual thing in patent cases, that the section commits the matter to the discretion of the District Court, that the criterion for its exercise is bad faith of the unsuccessful party and the reviewing court will not interfere unless there has been an abuse of discretion amounting to caprice or an erroneous conception of law."

To the same general effect is the language of Judge Allen of the Sixth Circuit in Swan Carburetor Co. v. Chrysler Corp., 149 F. (2d) 476 (478):

> "There is no evidence of bad faith. We think that the exceptional circumstances adverted to in Sprague v. Ticonic National Bank, supra, (307 U. S. 161) which justify exceptional allowances, not authorized by statute, are such as exist in the case of fraud, oppression, or bad faith * * *."

A much quoted statement of this principle is contained in Park-in-theatres v. Perkins, 190 F. (2d) 137 (142), as follows:

> "Thus, the payment of attorney's fees for the victor is not to be regarded as a penalty for failure to win a patent infringement suit. The exercise of discretion in favor of such an allowance should be bottomed upon a finding of unfairness or bad faith in the conduct of the losing party, or some other equitable consideration of similar force, which makes it grossly unjust that the winner of the particular law suit be left to bear the burden of his own counsel fees which prevailing litigants normally bear."

In the case of Cutting Room Appliances Corp. v. Weatherbee Coats Inc., 158 Fed. Supp. 231, the District Judge in denying attorney fees held:

> "The Court further finds that the fact that plaintiff did not disclose to the Patent Examiner the prior art of the 'Regal' and 'Model A' machines is not, in itself, without further evidence, sufficient proof of fraud in the prosecution of the patent, such that would warrant the award of attorney fees to the prevailing party."

Recognizing the general rule, this Court does not feel that Judge Graven's disallowance of attorney fees must be judicially construed here as a finding and adjudication that none of the matters charged in the mentioned paragraphs of the complaint in this case were true and, therefore, a finding that there was no fraud, bad faith, or inequitable conduct of any kind in connection with the Lechtenberg patents and the institution of the infringement action. Certainly, this Court might well speculate as to whether as a matter of reality such was, in fact, the thinking of Judge Graven. However, in applying a doctrine such as collateral estoppel, this Court cannot expand the findings or judgment of Judge Graven or read into his findings and judgment adjudications or implications not expressed, unless it is crystal clear that the findings he did make had, beyond argument, a certain definite legal import.

Was there no other reason than an exoneration of Briggs & Stratton of all inequitable conduct that could have motivated Judge Graven in denying attorney fees to Clinton? Might not the failure of Clinton to put in all of its evidence at the first hearing—necessitating the vacation of Judge Graven's first judgment and the further hearing of the matter—have actuated Judge Graven in his discretion to refuse attorney fees to Clinton?

Judge Graven might also have been motivated by the fact that Clinton's attorneys in the motion for new trial offered to pay the expense incident thereto, including Briggs & Stratton's expenses, should the Court be of the opinion that Clinton was lacking in diligence in preparing its evidence for the first hearing. It is not, however, for this Court to speculate as to what Judge Graven's reasons were, though unexpressed. No request for a finding upon this question of good faith or equitable conduct was made by Briggs & Stratton.

This Court might also speculate that Judge Graven may have, after the re-hearing, had some feeling that there was some inequitable conduct on the part of Briggs & Stratton and that his denial of attorney fees to Clinton was an abuse of discretion. This Court, however, cannot pass upon Judge Graven's discretionary action nor speculate as to what was within his judicial contemplation when he rendered the judgment that he did.

> "Where several questions are litigated in an action, and in a subsequent action between the parties on a different cause of action one of the questions is in issue, and one of the parties relies upon the judgment as conclusive on the question, the burden of proof is upon him to show that the matter was determined by the judgment in the prior action. If it does not appear whether the judgment was based on the determination of the question, the judgment is not conclusive in the second action. Restatement of Judgments, Sec. 68 (1) page 306.

Even if this Court should feel that Judge Graven should have made some specific finding upon this question (and this Court does not indicate that such is its feeling) such omitted finding cannot be supplied here.

This Court, therefore, by granting Briggs & Stratton's instant motion would make a finding that was not made by the judge who tried the former case.

> "* * * we can import into it (judgment) no adjudication the court never made merely because it ought to have made it." Jacobson v. Miller, 41 Mich. 99.

[Concession by Counsel]

This Court, however, feels that legal effectiveness should, in this litigation, be given to the statements made by Clinton's counsel in the Iowa case at the time of presenting Clinton's motion to reopen the proofs and for a new trial. The colloquy that occurred in this regard is set forth above. It is apparent from this that Clinton's counsel was there asking to be excused from its own failure to have put in testimony concerning the prior art and former public use of certain inventions which it claimed destroyed the patentability of the Lechtenberg patents. Counsel was there claiming to the Court that Clinton should not be charged with lack of diligence in discovering this evidence in time to have presented it at the original hearing. Clinton's counsel's attention was called to the fact that Clinton's pleadings had charged Briggs & Stratton with withholding information of prior public use from the Patent Office. Clinton's counsel thereupon said:

> "If that charge is made, I don't stand upon it. * * * and I am sure we would agree we would withdraw it. I have known Mr. Jones and right here I want to say that is not correct or encouraged."

A full review of what was said in this connection can result in only one conclusion. The concession was intended to be a complete exculpation of any wrong doing on the part of Briggs & Stratton's attorneys in the processing of the petition to make the Lechtenberg patent special. It was made for the purpose of having the trial court act upon such concession and admission. This Court views what was said and done as, in effect, a stipulation of fact, made of record for the purpose of obtaining the trial court's grant of a further hearing of the matter.

At the time of the colloquy under discussion, the issue of concealment of prior art was in the Iowa litigation, and Clinton had, by the Court's finding 17, been defeated on it. If the case was to be reopened, it would still be an issue in the case. No amendment of the pleadings eliminating it was made at that time, nor thereafter. This Court feels that counsel's concession was tantamount to an agreement that on an issue distinctly relied upon by Clinton it was in truth defeated. If the rationale of the doctrine of collateral estoppel is to be given effect, a litigant defeated on an issue, by proof or admission, or both, should not be permitted to pinch out such issue and save it for re-trial on another day. After Clinton's admission in this regard, it was not necessary that thereafter a specific finding be made thereon. The concession of counsel was not an off-hand comment nor a statement made in the heat of argument by a zealous advocate. It was purposefully made, and disposed of at least part of an issue that was still involved in the Iowa litigation. This Court feels that it, together with all of the circumstances, including the Court's previous findings, brought about the equivalent of an adjudication on the point involved. Clinton should not now, for the purpose of this case, be allowed to recant and here to "renew the duel". E. V. Prentice Machine Co. v. Associated Plywood Mills, supra.

No text or decided cases have been cited to the Court which directly support its position in this regard. Neither has this Court by its own research been able to find authorities which will completely square its conclusion with the definitions made of collateral estoppel. This, however, should not prevent its application, if a situation arises where the philosophy and spirit of the doctrine should appropriately be applied. Collateral estoppel is not a mathematical or mechanical formula. The Court is not making its ruling upon a characterization of what was done by Clinton's counsel as a judicial admission, having in mind the limitations applicable to judicial admissions (31 C. J. S. Sec. 361, page 1138. Wigmore, 3 E. D. 2593, et seq.).

This Court feels that the situation we are dealing with is not unlike the principle stated on page 304 Restatement of Judgments, Sec. 68(f):

> "If a question of fact is put in issue by the pleadings, and at the trial the fact is admitted and in consequence no proof is offered by the party having the burden of proof, the question is litigated and a judgment is conclusive between the parties as to the question."

The writers of Restatement of Judgments leave open a question which, perhaps, this opinion is daring to answer.

> "(h) Effect of Stipulation. If a question of fact is put in issue by the pleadings, and the parties enter into a stipulation as to the truth of the fact, it is a question of the interpretation of the stipulation whether it is binding on the parties only with reference to the particular cause of action sued upon, or whether it is binding in subsequent actions between them based upon different causes of action." Restatement of Judgments, Sec. 68, page 304.

This Court's interpretation of what occurred in connection with the statement by Clinton's counsel that it was not true that Briggs & Stratton's counsel had "intentionally, or even knowingly, withheld any information from the patent office" convinces him that collateral estoppel should foreclose retrial of the facts fairly included in the hereinabove quoted colloquy.

This Court feels that the case of E. Ingraham Co. v. Germanow, et al., 4 F. (2d) 1002, is in point on the principle here. There a defendant sued for infringement consented to the entry of a decree holding that the plaintiff's patents were valid. Upon this concession, the plaintiff waived damages and costs. Later on, in another suit by the patentee against another claimed infringer, its patents were held invalid. Thereupon, the defendant in the first action proceeded to infringe the patents, relying upon the determination of their invalidity in the later case. Judge Learned Hand held that they were estopped by the judgment that had been entered in the case first heard. He said:

> "The decree entered upon their consent is a good estoppel, though the issues were not litigated, and while it stands they are as much bound by it as though the later suit had never been brought."

[Issues to Be Tried—Affidavits]

Second: The second reason assigned by Briggs & Stratton to support its motion for summary judgment is the assertion that on the testimony taken and the record made in the Iowa litigation, this Court should find that there remains no issue to be here tried upon the bad faith or misconduct charged in Clinton's present complaint in paragraphs 15, 18(a), 19 and 21. In its brief filed in this case, it asserts:

> "The records and file of that litigation (Iowa case) presumably contain all evidence which could possibly be submitted on that issue. That evidence is, therefore, all the evidence that might be submitted to this court in a re-trial of the issues which Clinton now attempts to inject into this litigation. The records are before this Court as to all of the matters asserted by Clinton relating to the character of Briggs & Stratton's activities with respect to the Lechtenberg patents. The records disclose no genuine issue of fact."

This Court feels that this is unwarranted assumption. We construe it to mean that, on the issue in question, there is no other evidence beyond what was offered in the Iowa litigation that could conceivably be offered in the trial of the instant case. This Court has no right to make such an assumption. There was not filed, in support of the motion for summary judgment, any affidavit to the effect that the matters put in evidence and considered in the Iowa case constituted all of the evidence which could possibly be offered on this trial upon the claims presented by the mentioned paragraphs of Clinton's complaint in this action. If such an affidavit had been filed, Clinton would have had the right to file counter affidavits traversing the assertions of the Briggs & Stratton affidavits and, if such was the case, setting forth what facts, additional to the disclosures of the Iowa case, they would present to sustain their position. Clinton was not called upon to make such a sworn showing in the absence of affidavits by Briggs & Stratton. This Court does not feel that upon the motion, as presented, it should conclude that there can be no genuine issue as to any material fact relied upon by Clinton in the mentioned paragraphs of its complaint.

Certainly, if this Court was the trier of the facts and the only evidence before him was what was offered at the trial of the Iowa litigation, this Court would probably hold that there was no inequitable conduct and no fraud or deceit by Briggs & Stratton in its processing and attempt to protect the Lechtenberg patents. So far as they go, the findings of fact of Judge Graven and the comments made by the concurring opinion in the Court of Appeals appear to negate any inference of wrong doing on the part of Briggs & Stratton of the character now claimed in the complaint in this action. The complementary observations by the trial court and by the concurring opinion in the Court of Appeals and the labeling of Clinton's own engine as a "slavish copy" of the Lechtenberg design, suggests that on the record made in the Iowa litigation, a trier of the facts might well conclude that the allegations of the mentioned paragraphs of Clinton's complaint here are without foundation. This Court, however, does not feel that it is in a position in the present posture of this litigation, to dispose of the motion for summary judgment because of impressions gained from reading the record and decisions of the Iowa litigation.

[Patent Misuse as Evidence of Antitrust Violations]

Third: The third position of Briggs & Stratton in its request for summary judgment is stated in the caption of the portion of its brief devoted thereto. There Briggs & Stratton assert:

> "In the absence of bad faith, the obtaining of a patent and bringing on an action for infringement by patentee does not constitute a violation of the anti-trust statutes of the United States, either alone or in combination with other activities, even though the patent may prove to be invalid."

For the purpose of disposing of the motion before this Court, it is not necessary to disagree with the above general observation. No citation of authorities is needed for the proposition that a valid patent, in itself, creates a monopoly, and no violation of the anti-trust laws results from the obtaining of a patent or efforts to protect it by litigation, even though the patent finally proves to be invalid. Such authorities, however, do not go so far as to say that activities indulged in for the purpose of seeking to patent something known by the applicant to be invalid, and as a part of a scheme to create an illegal monopoly or restrain trade would be excluded as evidence in an action seeking to enforce our anti-trust statutes. It was stated in the case of Kellogg Co. v. National Biscuit Co. [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,056], 71 F. (2d) 662 (666):

> "While it doubtless would not be within the anti-trust Acts to bring a suit to assert a patent or trade mark right whatever the motive, if the claim was valid, an atempt to assert a known invalid claim would be a different matter."

If, within the limitations placed upon it by the order to be made pursuant to this opinion, Clinton is able to prove that the obtaining of the patents in question and the infringement action were part of an evil and illegal scheme to create and maintain a monopoly, it should not be foreclosed from relying on such proofs.

Conclusion

[Summary Judgment Denied]

It is, accordingly, the opinion of this Court, and such will be its order, that the motion for summary judgment be denied, except to the extent that upon this trial, Clinton will be foreclosed and estopped from relying upon any charge of misconduct from which it was exculpated by Clinton's counsel in the Iowa litigation; this Court is of the opinion that the concession there made amounted to an adjudication and determination against the factual existence of such claimed misconduct.

An order in conformity with this opinion may be presented for signature.

[¶ 69,497] Harold C. Myers v. P. L. George and National Wrestling Alliance.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. No. 16,188. Dated October 27, 1959.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Trial of Cause—Prejudicial Comments by Court—New Trial.—A wrestler, who alleged that he was deprived of his right to earn a living because of monopolistic activities of a wrestling association, was prevented from having a fair trial by reason of prejudicial comments of the trial court during the trial. The general effect of these comments was to ridicule and belittle the wrestler's calling and his alleged cause of action and tended to make a mockery out of the trial. A judgment for the defendant based on a jury's verdict was reversed, and the wrestler was granted a new trial.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9014, 9015.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Appeal and Error—Court's Comments—Necessity of Objections.—Objections to prejudicial comments by a trial court need not be made in order for the matter to be considered on appeal, where the effect of such comments could not be cured and the objections would have been futile. It would be a manifest miscarriage of justice to refuse to consider such comments on appeal.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9015.

For the appellant: James G. McDowell, Jr.

For the appellees: Harry N. Soffer (Burton M. Greenberg was with him on the brief) for National Wrestling Alliance.

Before Gardner and Vogel, Circuit Judges, and Mickelson, District Judge.

[Antitrust Action]

Per Curiam [In full text]: Appellant Harold C. Myers brought this action against appellees P. L. George and the National Wrestling Alliance to recover damages, alleging that appellees, through their monopoly on wrestling in the United States, deprived appellant of his right to earn a living as a wrestler or to promote wrestling with his carnival in the State of Iowa, in violation of the Anti-Trust Acts, Sections 1 and 2, Title 15, United States Code. The parties will hereinafter be referred to as they were designated in the trial court.

[Grounds for Reversal]

Plaintiff at all times pertinent to the issues was and now is a professional wrestler, while the defendant National Wrestling Alliance is a corporation organized for and on behalf of professional wrestling and bookers and promoters of wrestling. Plaintiff alleged that defendants were bookers and promoters of wrestling and have a monopoly on all professional wrestling. At a pretrial proceeding it was made to appear, either by consent of counsel for the respective parties or by judicial notice, that some two years before the commencement of the instant action suit had been brought against the defendant National Wrestling Alliance by the Government charging violation of the Anti-Trust Acts, and that in that suit a consent decree had been entered against defendant National Wrestling Alliance in which it in effect admitted its monopoly and agreed to refrain from doing so in the future. At the pretrial proceeding the court entered an order directing that "there will be no mention made at the trial of any consent decree entered against National Wrestlers Alliance." The action was tried to the court and a jury and resulted in a verdict for the defendants. From the judgment entered on the jury's verdict plaintiff prosecutes this appeal and seeks reversal on substantially the following grounds: (1) the court erred in making a farce out of the trial of the plaintiff's case by making jocular remarks from the bench, and (2) the court erred in failure to allow the plaintiff to answer an argument by defense counsel that, "if they were guilty of monopoly the Government would have done something about it."

It is earnestly contended that the trial court made a mockery of the trial by reason of certain remarks made during the course of the trial, variously referred to as unsolicited, jocular, belittling, witty, unjudicial, and prejudicial to the cause of the plaintiff.

[Comments by Court]

During the empaneling of the jury the trial judge referred to the professional wrestling game as, "sometimes considered by some people to be a racket anyway." While plaintiff was on the witness stand being examined by his counsel, the following occurred:

"Q. Well, are you, in the wrestling profession, acquainted with the territories that are had by the bookers?

The Court: Unless this witness has his contract here, some paper that denotes what his territory is, it would not be admissible. It would be hearsay, at best.

Mr. McDowell: Well, this is quite important, your honor.

The Court: If the witness knows where Oklahoma is, he can testify to that."

During the examination of a member of the Fair Board of Avoca, Iowa, the following occurred:

"Q. Do you recall in the '54 show or exhibition was Mr. Myers to furnish the referee?

The Court: He certainly wouldn't pay a referee anything here, Senator. They certainly would take care of themselves and not hurt each other."

During the examination of another witness the following occurred:

"Q. Whether you call it an exhibition or a match, as they are both described in this, did that ever come into the Board's mind as to whether or not the fellow that's putting on the show should wrestle the main event and pay his competitors and also pay the referee? A. In 1954 we booked the match Myers and Dusek as a grudge match. They had wrestled in '53 and the blood was drawn and the crowd got a big rouse out of it, so they come back in '54. It was the same thing. We weren't interested in the referee.

The Court: In other words, you were selling blood?

The Witness: That's right, we were selling blood.

Q. And the show was furnished and the wrestlers showed up and the money was paid and the refund was made to you folks, and so forth, isn't that right? A. Yes, right.

The Court: Was there blood?

The Witness: No blood.

Q. You didn't ask Mr. Myers to promote in '55 or '56? A. The wrestling wasn't particularly profitable as far as the Fair was concerned.

The Court: Tell me, how did your people around Avoca possibly survive without it?"

During the examination of another witness the following occurred:

"Q. And as I understand it, you rented the ring for $50 from a man that put on wrestling shows in Atlantic? A. I don't know whether he did or not. He advertised that he had a ring for rent. I don't know what his business was.

Mr. O'Malley: That's all.

Mr. Soffer: No questions, your Honor.

The Court: Hadn't it ever occurred to you that you could rent a race horse much cheaper than that?

The Witness: It does now, sir."

Counsel for the plaintiff announced that he desired to call as a witness a Mr. True, whereupon the court said:

"I can see now that Mr. True is not going to be very good. He is going to belie his name. (Shaking his head.) But he'll be like the old gray mare that I so frequently refer to, except that he's not all hell to get, but he isn't going to be worth a damn when you get him."

During the examination of a witness called by the plaintiff, the following occurred:

"Q. Where do you promote? A. Well, I have a show tonight in Moberly, Missouri. I have one Thursday night in Kansas City, Kansas.

The Court: May I intervene?

The Witness: Yes, sir.

The Court: How did you continue your promoting, your relation with wrestling, and keep your religion?

The Witness: Keep my what?

The Court: Religion.

The Witness: Well, sir, I think that people get more for their money in wrestling than anything in the world. I think we are giving them more for their money than anything in the world, so if you give people what they are paying for then you are honest.

The Court: All right."

During the testimony given by plaintiff with reference to his income from his wrestling bouts, the following occurred:

"Q. Well, how much did you make down there at Kansas City? A. Well, as I said yesterday, you take year in and year out, probably my average would be between fifty and seventy-five dollars a night that I worked. Naturally I had many, many main events there which had good payoffs.

Q. What you you mean, 'good payoffs?' A. Well——

The Court: Suckers. * * *

Q. All right. Now, you say you were taken off of television. Why is that important to a wrestler? A. Why is it important to a wrestler? It's probably one of the biggest monitors of publicity in the wrestling game today. If you are not on television at times, you don't do too well at all. In other words, television more or less puts you out in front of the people's eyes. They see who you are. If they like you or want to come see you, they will come and see you, because it's good publicity. If you just come in from out of a dark corner some place and be on a wrestling card as far as having——

The Court: You mean by that that the women in the home audiences can see the hair on your chest and come out if they want to see you, is that correct?

The Witness: No, sir.

The Court: Well, who does?

The Witness: Either you have ability or you don't have ability. If you have ability that appeals to the public, why naturally they want to come and see you. If you don't you might as well stay where you were.

The Court: Well, I will stay home. * * * We are not trying to build reputations of amateur wrestlers or anything of that kind. We are trying to build a livelihood in a so-called art, which is not an art. It's the art of acting. It gets money and all that, and of course it is wrongful to deprive a man of that pursuit if he wishes to follow it. It's a legal, lawful pursuit. But I may have my little fun about it.

Q. All right. When you were just getting—let me ask you this—were you on your way up in your field in 1954?

A. Definitely.

Mr. O'Malley: Just a moment.

The Court: Just a moment. That would —modesty forbids his saying so. That's true if—I suppose it would be true if the witness said so, providing he was matched right. He has to win his alleged matches. * * *

Q. Now let's get to '56. I hand you what the reporter has marked Exhibit Z-16, and ask you whether or not those are two representations of wrestling programs you have been on in Amarillo, Texas?

The Court: Mr. Myers, did you study the bricklaying trade or something like that in '55 and '56, along there?

The Witness: For my income?

The Court: Yes.

The Witness: No, sir, your Honor, but I will explain that after a while.

The Court: Well, I don't know whether you will or not. I sought to gain an explanation right then.

The Witness: Right then?"

There were other remarks by the court during the trial of an unorthodox character but their recital would, we think, unduly extend this opinion and serve no useful purpose.

[Conduct of Court]

In Bacon's essay on "Judicature", the learned author, in referring to the conduct of a trial judge, among other things said:

"Judges ought to be more learned than witty; more reverend than plausible; and more advised than confident. Above all things, integrity is their portion and proper virtue * * * Patience and gravity of hearing is an essential part of justice; and an over speaking judge is no well-tuned cymbal. * * * The place of justice is a hallowed place; and therefore not only the Bench, but the foot pace and precincts and purprise thereof ought to be preserved without scandal and corruption."

Manifestly, the conduct of the trial judge here under consideration comes far short of meeting the Baconian standard. The rule governing the conduct of the trial judge in the Federal courts is much more liberal than that prevailing in most of the State courts. The procedure in this regard is that prevailing at common law at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and is frequently referred to as the English system. The judge is not a mere moderator. He may summarize and discuss the evidence, provided that he does so in an impartial manner, and he may even express an opinion as to the credibility of testimony, provided always that he makes it perfectly clear that the jury is not bound by his expressed opinion but is the sole judge as to the facts and as to the credibility of all testimony. In Starr v. United States, 153 U. S. 614, the applicable rule is thus stated:

> "It is true that in the Federal courts the rule that obtains is similar to that in the English courts, and the presiding judge may, if in his discretion he think proper, sum up the facts to the jury; and if no rule of law is incorrectly stated, and the matters of facts are ultimately submitted to the determination of the jury, it has been held that an expression of opinion upon the facts is not reviewable on error. * * * It is obvious that under any system of jury trials the influence of the trial judge on the jury is necessarily and properly of great weight, and that his lightest word of intimation is received with deference, and may prove controlling."

In Rudd v. United States, 8 Cir., 173 Fed. 912, this court said:

> "We do not mean to impair in any degree the right of a trial court in both civil and criminal cases to comment upon the facts, to express its opinion upon them, and to sum up the evidence, for that is one of the most valuable features of the practice in the courts of the United States. A judge should not be a mere automatic oracle of the law, but a living participant in the trial, and so far as the limitations of his position permit should see that justice is done. But his comments upon the facts should be judicial and dispassionate, and so carefully guarded that the jurors, who are the triers of them, may be left free to exercise their independent judgment."

While the trial judge may, when the situation warrants, discuss the evidence he must do so impartially and abstain from advocacy for either party. Cook v. United States, 8 Cir., 18 F. 2d 50; Boatright v. United States, 8 Cir., 105 F. 2d 737; Cline v. United States, 8 Cir., 20 F. 2d 494; Stokes v. United States, 8 Cir., 264 Fed. 18; Hurwitz v. United States, 8 Cir., 299 Fed. 449; Weare v. United States, 8 Cir., 1 F. 2d 617. In reversing a judgment of conviction in Cook v. United States, supra, we said, inter alia:

> "The court did tell the jury that his opinion on the facts was not controlling upon them, but that did not in our judgment cure the error. Every one knows that suggestions from the court have great weight with a jury, and the argumentative language used in this instruction must have seemed to the jury an advocacy of the government's case, and impressed upon them the court's desire for a conviction. We think it was not such judicial discussion of the evidence as is permissible. Certainly the language is as argumentative as that used by the court in the case of Cook v. United States (C. C. A.) 14 F. (2d) 833, which this court decided necessitated a reversal of the case."

[Prejudicial Comments-Objections]

In the cases cited reversals were had because of statements made in the court's instructions to the jury. In the instant case the statements were made during the course of the trial. They did not even constitute rulings as to the admissibility of evidence but were voluntary and were clearly prejudicial in their character. The wrestling game was in effect referred to when the jury was being empaneled as a "racket". When plaintiff's counsel announced that he wished to call a witness by the name of True, the court, without any apparent provocation, said:

> "I can see now that Mr. True is not going to be very good. He is going to belie his name. (Shaking his head.) But he'll be like the old gray mare that I so frequently refer to, except that he's not all hell to get, but he isn't going to be worth a damn when you get him."

This certainly could not have assisted the jury in weighing the testimony, though it may have amused the jurors and the courtroom audience. Another expression indicated that wrestling contests are fixed in advance and that people who attend wrestling matches are "suckers". The general effect of these expressions was to ridicule and belittle plaintiff's calling and his alleged cause of action and tended to make a mockery out of the trial. The mere fact that the court in its instructions advised the jury that they were the sole judges as to the facts could not cure the error nor erase its effect upon the jury. It is argued that no objections were made to these remarks, but when made we do not see how their effect could have been cured and objections made would have been futile. The statements of the trial judge here complained of were prejudicial and to refuse to consider them on this appeal would result in a manifest miscarriage of justice. The applicable rule with reference to the conduct of the trial judge in jury cases is well stated in 53 American Jurisprudence, Trials, Section 76, page 75, as follows:

> "In jury trials the trial judge should be cautious and circumspect in his language and conduct before the jury. He must be fair to both sides, and the extent to which he may go in comments and remarks during the trial is governed by the fundamental principle that nothing should be said or done by him which will prejudice the rights of the parties litigant. Especially should he refrain from any remarks that are calculated in any way to influence the minds of the jury or to prejudice a litigant. This includes remarks to counsel touching the management of the case and reflecting on their conduct, as well as those touching the character of the witnesses and the value of their testimony."

It is urged by plaintiff that the court erred in denying plaintiff's counsel the right to reply to an argument of counsel for defendant to the effect that had defendants been guilty of monopoly as alleged by plaintiff the Government would have done something about it. It is without doubt that counsel's argument contained assertions that were not true; that it misled the jury; and that it was contrary to the pre-trial order of the trial court. Of themselves, such remarks would justify the granting of a new trial. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Kelly, 8 Cir., 84 F. 2d 569; London Guarantee & Accident Co. v. Woelfle, 8 Cir., 83 F. 2d 325. However, the objection is not as to the argument of counsel for defendant but as to the refusal of the court to permit counsel for plaintiff to answer the argument. In view of the fact that the case mut be reversed for the reasons heretofore stated, and as it is unlikely that this question will again arise on retrial, we express no opinion as to this ruling of the court.

[New Trial]

We are convinced that plaintiff, by reason of the comments of the trial judge during the trial, was prevented from having a fair trial. The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed and the cause is remanded to the trial court with directions to grant plaintiff a new trial.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—When Recovery May Be Barred—Applicable State Statute of Limitations—North Carolina One-year or Three-year Statute.—A Federal District Court sitting in North Carolina held that a North Carolina three-year statute of limitations (governing actions "upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture"), rather than a North Carolina one-year statute (governing actions "under the statute, for a penalty or forfeiture"), was applicable to a treble damage action under the Federal antitrust laws. Since there was no applicable Federal statute of limitations governing such actions at the time of the filing of the action, the court had to adopt the pertinent state statute. The issue as to which of the two North Carolina statutes applied was seemingly one of first impression in the jurisdiction. However, preliminary to dealing with the applicable North Carolina statute, it was necessary to determine the nature of the right of action. Since the action arose out of the federal antitrust statutes, it was necessary to revert to the decisions of the Federal courts for the answer. The court concluded that, in the majority view, a private action for treble damages under the Federal antitrust laws is not an action to recover a penalty or forfeiture, but an action upon a liability created by statute and is in the nature of an action of tort.

Memorandum Opinion

[Applicable State Statute of Limitations]

Wilson Warlick, District Judge [In full text]: The defendants in this treble damage suit under the Anti-Trust Laws, 15 USCA, sec. 15, have moved for a partial summary judgment seeking to have dismissed all claims embraced in the complaint which accrued or became fixed prior to one year next preceding the filing of the complaint and the issuance of summons, as being barred by the one year Statute of Limitations of North Carolina.

Since there was no statute under the Federal Code that was applicable to threefold damages, at the time of the filing of this action, it is well established that the court must adopt the pertinent state statute. Rules of Decision Act, 1 Stat. 73, 92, as amended, 28 U. S. C. Sec. 1652; Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. City of Atlanta, 203 U. S. 390, 397, 27 S. Ct. 65, 51 L. Ed. 241.

Congress, however, on July 7, 1955, on observing the discrepancies that came about through the various applicable statutes of limitations, and the decisions of the courts thereon, in the several states, effecting a recovery,— for instance, the Tennessee statute of ten years, as is found in the Chattanooga F. & P. Works v. Atlanta case, above cited, and the two years statute in Illinois, as is set out in Schiffman Bros. Inc. v. Texas Company [1952 Trade Cases ¶ 67,270], 196 F. 2d page 695, and the one year statute of limitations as was the holding in Northern Kentucky Telephone Co. v. Southern Bell Telephone and Telegraph Co. [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,063], 73 F. 2d 333, governing actions for conspiracy as apply to treble damage suits under the Sherman Act, and many other cases of like import and sensing the need therefor, amended Sec. 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. Sec. 15, and provided that in every cause of action by private parties under present Sec. 4 shall be forever barred, if not commenced within four years from the time of action accrues. 15 U. S. C. A. Sec. 15b.

[North Carolina Statutes]

The defendants in their motion contend that the One year statute of limitations is applicable.

The plaintiffs contend that the Three years statute applies.

The North Carolina One year statute is as follows:

> "Upon a statute, for penalty or forfeiture, where the action is given to the State alone, or in whole or in part to the party aggrieved, or to a common informer, except where the statute imposing it prescribes a different limitation." N. C. G. S. 1-54(2).

The Three years statute reads as follows:

> "Upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture, unless some other time is mentioned in the statute creating it." N. C. G. S. Sec. 1-52(2).

[Issue]

The issue, therefore, in this case is whether, under North Carolina law, an anti-trust action for treble damages and a reasonable attorney's fee is an action "under the statute, for a penalty or forfeiture," or whether it is an action "upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture."

[Case of First Impression]

This issue seemingly is one of first impression in this jurisdiction, I assume, since no decision is presented to the court in which a federal court has ruled upon the applicable statute of limitations in a private threefold damage action under the Anti-trust laws. Miller Motors v. Ford Motor Company [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,663], 149 F. Supp. 790 [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 68,937], 252 F. 2d 441. (4th Cir.)

[Nature of Action]

Preliminary to dealing with the applicable North Carolina statute, one must determine the nature of the plaintiff's right of action. Since this right of action arises out of the federal antitrust statutes, it is the function of the Federal Courts to decide the point. Judge Nields in Williamson v. Columbia Gas & Electric Corp. (D. C. Del.), 27 F. Supp. 198, 204, aff'd (C. C. A. 3) [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,255], 110 F. 2d 15; cert. den. 1940, clearly states the rule:

> "An action to recover triple damages under the federal anti-trust laws is based upon a federal statute and enforceable only in a federal court. A federal court has the power to determine the nature of the action. Glen Coal Co. v. Dickinson Fuel Co., 4 Cir. 72 F. 2d 885."

Hence we must revert to the decisions of other federal courts for our answer. There we find numerous decisions which decide the nature of this statutory right of action. The majority view is that a private action for treble damages under the anti-trust laws is not an action to recover a penalty or forfeiture but rather is an action upon a liability created by statute and is in the nature of an action of tort. It is remedial and compensatory. Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657; Chattanooga Foundry & Pipeworks v. City of Atlanta, 127 F. 23; 203 U. S. 390; Momand v. Twentieth-Century Fox Film Corp., 37 F. Supp. 649; Wolf Sales Co. v. Rudolph Wurlitzer Co. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,321], 105 F. Supp. 506; Electric Theatre Co. v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,560], 113 F. Supp. 937; Fulton v. Loew's Inc. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,571], 114 F. Supp. 676; Toulmin Anti-Trust Laws, Vol. 2, page 99.

[Three-year Statute Applicable]

So there can be little doubt but that the applicable period in which the plaintiffs can recover is three years, and such the court holds.

In the United States District Court for the District of Maryland. Civil Action No. 10500. Filed July 14, 1959.

Maryland Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement Action in Federal Court—Jurisdictional Amount—Value of Trademark or Amount of Its Impairment as "Amount in Controversy"—Necessity for Proving "Actual Pecuniary Loss."—A Federal District Court sitting in Maryland, in an action under the Maryland Fair Trade Act to enjoin a retail druggist from selling a manufacturer's venereal prophylaxis below fair trade prices, found that the necessary jurisdictional amount ($3,000 when the complaint was filed) was "in controversy," whether the "approach" was (1) that the retailer's conduct would eventually impair the value of the right sought to be protected in an amount in excess of the jurisdictional amount, or (2) that the right to be protected was the value of the "good will" represented in part by, or associated with, the registered trademark. Here, the manufacturer's sales to Maryland wholesalers exceeded $50,000 per year. One of its witnesses testified, without objection, that its trademark was worth $10,000,000. In Seagram Distillers Corp. v. New Cut Rate Liquors, 1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,719, there was language to the effect that "actual pecuniary loss" must be proved. In view of a later case (not a fair trade action) by the same court (United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit) in which the value of the trademark was considered the amount in controversy, the Seagram case may be explained by the fact that the plaintiff there alleged that it could prove actual damages in excess of the jurisdictional amount, but did not do so. However, if that case is not distinguishable on that ground, the instant court would not follow it.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3410.

Fair Trade—Defenses to Enforcement Action—Failure to Diligently Enforce Fair Trade Program—Permitting Retailers to Give Trading Stamps.—A retail drug store charged with violating the Maryland Fair Trade Act failed to substantiate its defense that the fair trader, a manufacturer of venereal prophylaxis, had permitted the giving of trading stamps in connection with the sale of its products at minimum fair trade prices.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Since that allegation was not substantiated, it was unnecessary for the court to determine whether the sale of fair trade items at "an established cash fair-trade minimum price, but with trading stamps, is a violation of the Maryland Fair Trade Act." Rejecting the retailer's contention that the manufacturer's action was barred by "unclean hands" because it had failed to diligently enforce, and had abandoned, its fair trade program, the court noted that the evidence showed the most vigorous enforcement of fair trade policy that had come before it.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3440.22.

Fair Trade—Commodities Which May Be Fair Traded—Products Which Are in Free and Open Competition with Others.—A retail drug store charged with violating the Maryland Fair Trade Act by selling a manufacturer's venereal prophylaxis below fair trade prices failed to sustain its defense that the manufacturer's products were not in "free and open competition with commodities of the same class produced and distributed by others." The court found that at least four other companies produced products which competed with the manufacturer's products and which were designed to accomplish the same result.

[Fair Trade Action]

R. Dorsey Watkins, District Judge [In full text]: This is a typical action for an injunction to restrain alleged violations of the Maryland Fair Trade Act, Maryland Code of Public General Laws, 1957 Edition. Article 83, sections 102-110. As a result of a pretrial conference, stipulations, and uncontested testimony, there are no real issues of fact, the questions being substantially reduced to the legal effect of such facts, which are found as such by the court as hereinafter stated in this opinion.

[Parties]

Plaintiff is engaged in the manufacture, sale and distribution,[1] of commodities of venereal prophylaxis known as "Trojans", and is the owner of the trade-marks, names and brands associated therewith. Defendant operates a retail drug store in Silver Spring, Maryland, selling and offering for sale the usual articles of such operation, including commodities of venereal prophylaxis, and specifically such products manufactured by plaintiff and bearing plaintiff's name and trade-mark.

[Sales Below Fair Trade Prices]

Defendant admits that before the institution of this suit it sold plaintiff's products at prices less than the fair-trade prices if such fair-trade prices were in fact legal.

[Trademark]

The name "Trojans" was registered by plaintiff as a trade-mark in the United States Patent Office on April 29, 1947, and plaintiff since then at all times has been the owner thereof. Such products bearing the trade-mark have been widely distributed and sold throughout the United States.

[Fair Trade Agreements]

Since 1936, plaintiff has stipulated and established minimum prices for the sale at retail in the State of Maryland, pursuant to the Maryland Fair Trade Act, of its commodities. Plaintiff has in Maryland entered into written agreements covering the sale of "Trojans" by retailers to consumers pursuant to the Maryland Fair Trade Act. They include the following stipulations, which at all times in question were in full force and effect:

> "4. (a) The offering or giving of any article of value in connection with the sale by Retailer of any of the Commodities; (b) the offering or making of any concession of any kind whatsoever (whether by the giving of coupons, trading stamps or otherwise) in connection with any such sale, or (c) the sale or offering for sale of any of the Commodities by Retailer in combination with any other merchandise shall constitute a breach by Retailer of Article 1 of this agreement.

[1] Plaintiff sells through wholesalers who sell only to retail drug stores dispensing through registered pharmacists. No sales of plaintiff's products are made through coin machines, or knowingly made through chain stores or other merchandising outlets or devices not under the control and supervision of a registered pharmacist.

"5. Manufacturer in good faith will employ all appropriate means, which in the circumstances shall be reasonable, including legal proceedings if such other means fail, to prevent, and to enforce the discontinuance of, any violation of said minimum retail price stipulations by any competitor of Retailer, whether the person violating or threatening such violation is or is not a party to a Fair Trade Contract with Manufacturer covering said Commodities."

[Notice]

Defendant was, before the occurrence of the alleged violations out of which this suit arose, informed of the existence of such contracts, of the specified minimum retail prices of plaintiff's commodities then in effect in Maryland.

Defendant, with such knowledge, sold and offered for sale plaintiff's products, at prices below the minimum retail prices stipulated in plaintiff's written Maryland contracts then in force.

[Defenses]

Defendant admitted, and there was proved, the requisite diversity of citizenship. Defendant however contested the existence of the requisite jurisdictional amount[2] in controversy; defendant also denied that plaintiff's products were in free and open competition with commodities of the same class produced and distributed by others; and defendant further contended that plaintiff was barred by "unclean hands" in that plaintiff had failed diligently to enforce its Maryland fair-trade agreements and had abandoned its fair-trade program through permitting its fair-traded items to be sold with trading stamps.

Plaintiff called as witnesses its own employees, and also independent Maryland pharmacists. Their testimony establishes to the court's satisfaction that plaintiff sells only through wholesalers who in turn sell to retail druggists, and that sales by plaintiff to Maryland wholesalers exceed $50,000 per year.[3]

Plaintiff advertises its products in all the recognized professional pharmaceutical journals, including the "Maryland Pharmacist". Such products are in competition with products of at least four other companies all of which products are designed to accomplish the same results.

One of plaintiff's witnesses testified, without objection, that plaintiff's trade-mark "Trojans" was worth $10,000,000. There was also testimony, satisfactory to the court, that plaintiff acted on the policy that price cutting was regarded by the public as indicating an inferior product, and that fair-trade violations would produce sale difficulties.

There was also competent testimony by employees of plaintiff and by independent pharmacists, which the court accepts, that purchasers of venereal prophylactics often request them by name or brand;[4] that the price of plaintiff's products is known by the customers;[5] and that if the prospective purchaser asks simply for the desideratum, without specifying the brand, a Trojan would be offered, because of drug store satisfaction with plaintiff's policies, including enforcement and sales program.

[Enforcement Policy]

The evidence offered showed the most vigorous enforcement of fair-trade policy that has come before this court or of which it is familiar through the decided cases or law review articles. Plaintiff's general counsel testified that it was plaintiff's policy to solicit a fair-trade contract from every drug store; that his company was the first to invoke judicial sanctions in the United States; that many years ago he had received a complaint of a fair-trade violation in Westminster, Maryland, which after investigation and conferences was terminated; that the present complaint was the only

[2] $3,000 at the time of the filing of the complaint.

[3] This figure relates to Maryland wholesalers; in addition, sales to Maryland retailers are made in Maryland by wholesalers in adjoining states and the District of Columbia.

[4] One independent pharmacist testified that most—70 to 80%—asked by brand name, usually Trojans; another, a member of the Maryland Board of Pharmacists, testified that a majority asked for a particular brand, and of those who did, 60% requested Trojans.

[5] The price is shown on most of the containers of plaintiff's products, although it is not stated as the fair-trade price. One of the independent pharmacists stated on cross-examination that it was "amazing", but most customers knew the price of plaintiff's articles, and usually would have the correct change ready.

known violation in Maryland prior to the filing of this suit; and that after the filing of the complaint herein, when a shopping indicted another violation, he sent a notice demanding the cessation of violations, and they stopped. He further testified to a general routine under which every complaint is investigated; the violator is sought to be "sold" on the merits of fair-trade; if this is unsuccessful, a formal notice of violation is sent; and if the notice is not heeded, a suit is filed.

Plaintiff's District Sales Manager for five states, including Maryland, testified that except for defendant, he had found no violations in Maryland of plaintiff's fair-trade contracts in the past five years. He regularly shopped in Maryland about ten times a year, shopping five to ten stores a day in the area he covered with his salesmen.[6] On cross-examination he was confronted with affidavits by employees of defendant that a co-operative in the general area of defendant gave coupons[7] with the sale of plaintiff's products. He replied that he had learned of such alleged violation only on the Thursday preceding trial, through defendant's attorney; that the next morning he went to see the co-operative's comptroller who stated that the co-operative showed no profit thus far in 1959; but that nevertheless he (plaintiff's sales manager) had advised the co-operative's comptroller that Trojans had to be taken off the co-operative arrangement, or they could not be sold.

[Trading Stamps]

Defendant's defense that plaintiff had permitted its products to be sold at the minimum fair-trade prices with trading stamps[8] was not substantiated.

[Free and Open Competition]

The court also finds that plaintiff's goods were in free and open competition with commodities of the same class produced and distributed by others. Eastman Kodak Company v. Home Utilities Company, D. Md. 1956 [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,294], 138 F. Supp. 670, 674-677; affirmed on this point, 4 Cir. 1956 [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,382], 234 F. 2d 766, 770-771, cert. granted 1956, 352 U. S. 821, 77 S. Ct. 62, 1 L. Ed. 2d 46, dismissed 1957, 352 U. S. 956, 77 S. Ct. 349, 1 L. Ed. 2d 363.

The primary aim of the Maryland Fair Trade Act is > "to protect the property—namely, the good will—of the producer, which he still owns. The price restriction is adopted as an appropriate means to that perfectly legitimate end, and not as an end in itself." Schill v. Remington Putman Co., 1941 [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,095 and 56,117], 179 Md. 83, 89, 17 A. 2d 175, 22 A. 2d 128, quoting from Old Dearborn Distributing Co. v. Seagram Distillers Corp., 1936 [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,141], 299 U. S. 183, 193, 57 S. Ct. 139, 81 L. Ed. 109.

[Jurisdictional Amount]

Whether the approach be that defendant's conduct unless enjoined, would directly and through its effect on others, in the indefinite future eventually impair the value of the right sought to be protected in an amount in excess of the jurisdictional amount, Lee-Wilson, Inc. v. General Electric Company, 1 Cir. 1955 [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,053], 222 F. 2d 850, 852;[9] or that the right to be protected is the value of the good will, represented in part by, or associated with the registered trade-mark, Calvert Distilling Co. v. Brandon, D. C. S. C. 1938, 24 F. Supp. 857; James Heddon's Sons v. Callender, D. C. Minn. 1939, 28 F. Supp. 643, 644, 645; Miles Laboratories v. Seignious, D. C. S. C. 1939, 30 F. Supp. 146, 147; Sunbeam Corp. v. Richardson, D. C. Ky. 1956 [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,407], 144 F. Supp. 583, 587 reversed on other grounds, 6 Cir. 1957 [1957

[6] He would ask for a prophylactic without specifying the name.

[8] Whether a sale at an established cash fair-trade minimum price, but with trading stamps, is a violation of the Maryland Fair Trade Act, therefore need not be considered.

Ct. 1025, 3 L. Ed. 2d —, holding that where continuing harmful effect (in that case, of a regulatory statute) is alleged, "the jurisdiction of the court is to be tested by the value of the object to be gained. Failure to prove that a sufficient amount of damage has already been sustained will not defeat the remedy if the injury is recurrent or continuous . . ." 159 F. Supp. at 520.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies — Monopolies — Patents — Price Fixing — Licensee's Agreement Not To Sell at Prices More Favorable Than Licensor's Prices—Legality.—A provision of a patent licensing agreement (between two manufacturers of sheet metal fastening devices) under which the licensee agreed to refrain from selling the devices manufactured under the license at prices more favorable than the prices established by the licensor did not violate the antitrust laws. The doctrine of U. S. v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476, which sustains a provision whereby a licensor under a valid patent restricts the price at which its licensee may sell articles manufactured under the license, was not overruled by U. S. v. Line Materials Co., 1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,225, 333 U. S. 287. The Line Material case merely restricted the application of the General Electric case. It involved several cross licensing agreements, concerning complimentary patents, which had price fixing provisions and which forbade the licensees from granting sublicenses without similar provisions. In the instant case, there was only one price fixing agreement, and neither the licensor nor the licensee controlled any substantial part of the industry.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2013.750; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.550.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Violations as Defenses—Attacking Validity of Patent by Licensee—Price Fixing.—Where there was no price fixing provision in the patent licensing agreement being sued upon, the licensee was estopped during the continuance of its use of the license from challenging the validity of the patents upon which it accepted such license. Although there was a price fixing provision in a licensing agreement between the licensor and a third party, there was not a sufficient connection between the two agreements as to make such defense available to the third party usable by the instant licensee.

Before MILLER, Circuit Judge; THORNTON and O'SULLIVAN, District Judges.

[Nature of Action]

O'SULLIVAN, District Judge [In full text]: This cause, designated by plaintiff-appellee as a suit for specific performance of a patent license agreement, was brought by Tinnerman Products, Inc., against defendant-appellant, Prestole Corporation, to obtain an accounting of royalties claimed to be due to plaintiff from defendant. A second cause of action charged infringement of the licensed patents following termination of the license agreement. Defendant claimed breach of the license agreement, misuse of patents by plaintiff, and counterclaimed for damages.

[Judgment Below]

Trial on plaintiff's claim for royalties, and defendant's counterclaim, resulted in judgment for plaintiff on both issues. A separate trial of the infringement action was ordered, and that cause is not here involved. This opinion will refer to plaintiff-appellee as Tinnerman, and defendant-appellant as Prestole.

[License Agreements]

Prior to the execution of the license agreement in question, Tinnerman had sued Detroit Harvester Company for infringement of patents owned by Tinnerman. That suit was settled, and dismissed. On the day of such dismissal, August 18, 1942, Tinnerman licensed Detroit Harvester Company to use two of the patents which, in the lawsuit so settled, Tinnerman claimed had been infringed. The license agreement required Detroit Harvester Company to pay royalties equal to five per cent of the net sales price of all devices covered by the licensed patents to be sold by it during the term of the license agreement.

On the same day that Tinnerman granted the said license to Detroit Harvester, the latter concern licensed Tinnerman to use certain patents owned or applied for by it. The two contracts of that date, August 18, 1942, were, in effect, cross-licensing agreements.

Tinnerman and Detroit Harvester were manufacturers of devices for fastening by means of threaded nuts and bolts, sections of sheet metal, in mass production industries. The patents involved were used in such devices. Both Tinnerman and Detroit Harvester had acquired patents relating to these devices besides the ones immediately covered by the license agreement sued upon.

The issues in this case involve, primarily, two provisions of the agreement by which Tinnerman granted a license to Detroit Harvester. They are as follows:

(a) In paragraph 1, after granting the license, the contract reads,

> "Provided, however, that this license shall not include devices covered by said patents in which the thread-engaging portion comprises a pair of tongues, the ends of which are notched out and formed with screw thread engaging edges intended for and used to receive a screw such as shown and described in Tinnerman Patents Nos. 1,512,653; 1,928,469; 2,221,498; and 2,233,230."

(b) Paragraph 12 provides,

> "In the event that Tinnerman grants a license with more favorable royalty terms, then within thirty (30) days of the execution of such license, a copy shall be delivered to Detroit Harvester and Detroit Harvester shall then have thirty (30) days in which to determine whether it desires to adopt such royalty terms."

On July 15, 1946, while the license agreements were still in effect, Prestole, with Tinnerman's consent, was assigned Detroit Harvester Company's interest in the agreements. Thereafter, the parties continued to operate under the license agreements in suit, Prestole paying royalties to Tinnerman until a last payment was made on September 30, 1953. Thereafter, Prestole continued to manufacture and sell devices upon which they had theretofore paid royalties, but paid no more royalties, claiming for reasons hereinafter detailed that Tinnerman had breached the license agreement. Tinnerman thereupon exercised its right to cancel its license to Prestole, and the agreement was cancelled, effective April 23, 1954. The royalties sought to be recovered in this action are those claimed to have become payable by Prestole to Tinnerman between September 30, 1953, and April 23, 1954.

[Defense and Counterclaim—Basis]

Prestole resists Tinnerman's claim for royalties and bases its counterclaim for damages upon the charge, First, that in 1946, and without notice to Prestole, Tinnerman granted a license for use of the same patents covered by the Prestole license to a concern known as Illinois Tool Works, which license agreement gave the Illinois Tool Works more favorable royalty terms than those extended to Prestole—which action, Prestole claims, breached the Tinnerman-Prestole contract; and, Second, that by reason of certain restrictions in the Tinnerman-Prestole contract and a price fixing provision in the Tinnerman-Illinois contract, Tinnerman was guilty of misuse of the licensed patents.

The following facts are the background to Prestole's defense and counterclaim. On July 23, 1946, Tinnerman requested Prestole to join in an amendment to the existing license agreement whereby Prestole would agree to refrain from selling the devices manufactured under the license at prices more favorable than prices established by Tinnerman. Prestole refused to make the suggested amendment. Following such refusal, and on August 30, 1946, Tinnerman licensed Illinois Tool Works to use a number of patents owned by Tinnerman, including two patents covered by the existing agreement between Tinnerman and Prestole. This contract with Illinois required it to pay royalties of six percent upon the first one million dollars of sales in each calendar year and five percent upon sales in excess of one million dollars. This contract contained a price fixing clause substantially the same as the one which Prestole had refused to accept. Paragraph 16 of the Tinnerman-Illinois contract provided:

> "Tinnerman will, at the request of Illinois, assist Illinois with such information as it may have, in order that production can commence as rapidly as possible and in the event such assistance shall be given by Tinnerman in the plants of Illinois, it shall be at Tinnerman's convenience and Illinois will pay the cost of compensation of such employees for time spent in going to and from and at Illinois' plants."

Tinnerman gave no notice to Prestole of the making of this license agreement with Illinois. It did not advise Prestole of what it gave to Illinois pursuant thereto. Not until the imminence of this litigation was there ever a copy of such agreement made available to Prestole.

Prestole claims that by the quoted paragraph 12 and the services and information actually furnished by Tinnerman to Illinois pursuant thereto, Tinnerman did, in fact, grant a license with more favorable royalty terms than had been granted to Prestole.

From the time that Illinois was given its license to use the Tinnerman patents in 1946 through the year 1955, Tinnerman furnished Illinois with all types of technical information required to get Illinois started producing plaintiff's products, including detailed drawings of parts, assistance on the machinery and equipment necessary to make the licensed products, and know-how which could not be put on paper; Tinnerman sent some of its technical personnel to train Illinois Tool Works in plaintiff's methods of manufacturing fastening devices covered by the license agreement with Illinois; Tinnerman sent some of its personnel to the Illinois plant to transfer technical information, and some Illinois personnel visited plaintiff's plant to obtain technical information regarding production of the licensed fasteners, and particularly with reference to the equipment on which they were made; Tinnerman transferred a great deal of technical information regarding the licensed products, including parts, prints, and drawings of all the fasteners which Illinois desired to produce under the license, and as soon as Tinnerman designed a new fastener within the scope of the Illinois license, Tinnerman furnished technical information respecting that fastener to Illinois.

As a supplement to the Tinnerman-Illinois license contract, Tinnerman, on September 9, 1946, gave Illinois the right to use Tinnerman's trade mark "Speed Nut". Prestole was not given this right. The Tinnerman-Illinois contract did not contain the restrictions against use of the licensed patents in devices containing the Tinnerman style of thread engaging portion, as was the case in the Tinnerman-Prestole contract.

The devices which were manufactured by Illinois and Prestole under the respective license agreements from Tinnerman, were identified as being so-called U and J Nuts and the U and J Nuts manufactured by Illinois pursuant to its license from Tinnerman were manufactured according to Tinnerman's engineering design and had basically the same thickness of metal, dimension, form and shape. The furnishing of such technical information to Illinois by Tinnerman continued from the time of the making of the Tinnerman-Illinois license agreement until some time in the year 1955. Illinois made no payments of any kind to Tinnerman for these special services other than payment of the royalties provided for in the license contract.

Prestole contends that the furnishing of such technical information and engineering service without compensation amounted to a reduction in the royalties actually payable by Illinois to Tinnerman, with the result that Tinnerman had, in effect, granted to Illinois more favorable royalty terms than were available to Prestole. Prestole further contends, and offered evidence in support of such contention, that had Tinnerman furnished Prestole like assistance in its manufacture and production of the devices covered by the patents, the amount of saving effected thereby would have equalled an estimated six percent of the selling price of the devices upon which it paid royalties to Tinnerman. It argues, therefore, that had it had the opportunity to adopt the provisions of the Tinnerman-Illinois contract, the net royalties payable by it would have been greatly reduced if not, actually, eliminated.

To support its claim in the above regard, Prestole put in evidence a computation made by its Secretary Treasurer, who qualified himself as an expert cost accountant. His computation reviewed the engineering expenses shown by the books of Prestole as attributable to the devices upon which royalties were paid to Tinnerman. He used the period from January 1, 1947, to September 30, 1953, substantially covering the time from the commencement of the Tinnerman-Illinois contract to the cessation of royalty payments by Prestole. He concluded that a total amount of $99,600.87 of the engineering expense of Prestole during that period was properly attributable to the manufacture and marketing of the devices upon which royalties were paid by Prestole to Tinnerman. He explained that the above amount was limited to engineering costs which were charged as expense upon the company's books and did not include expenditures made for final tool and die design after the preliminary engineering had been concluded and Prestole was ready to go into production. These final expenditures were capitalized, but he calculated that they amounted to at least as much as the expenditures charged to expense. The total of the two amounts, therefore, was about $200,000. This figure approximates six percent of the total sales upon which royalties were paid by Prestole to Tinnerman during the period covered. A saving in that amount would exceed the five percent royalty payable by it and be equivalent to the six percent royalty rate fixed in the Tinnerman-Illinois contract.

Prestole argues that its computation demonstrates that the Tinnerman-Illinois contract contained more favorable royalty terms —that, in fact, Tinnerman gave Illinois a royalty free license. Prestole claims that the Tinnerman-Illinois license and the conduct of Tinnerman under it was part of a design to remove Prestole as a competitor, after its refusal to join in a price fixing arrangement.

The evidence shows that a saving of six percent of the total sales of Prestole subject to royalties would, during the period of Tinnerman-Illinois operations up to September 30, 1953, amount to $199,201.74. The royalties paid by Prestole during that period totalled $166,001.46. Prestole, therefore, claims that it owes nothing for royalties and asks recovery under its counterclaim of the aforesaid sum of $166,001.46.

Defendant's claim of misuse of patents is as follows:

> First—the license agreement between Tinnerman and Prestole's assignor contained the following proviso:
> "* * * this license shall not include devices covered by said patents in which the thread-engaging portion comprises a pair of tongues, the ends of which are notched out and formed with screw thread engaging edges intended for and used to receive a screw such as shown and described in Tinnerman Patents Nos. 1,512,653; 1,928,469; 2,221,498; and 2,233,230."

Of these Tinnerman patents, No. 1,512,653 had already expired at the time of the license agreement of August 18, 1942, and No. 1,928,469 expired some four years later. Prestole contends that by this limitation upon its use of the license patents, Tinnerman was seeking illegally to extend the monopoly of an expired patent and one that expired during the course of the license agreement.

> Second—in the license agreement between Tinnerman and Illinois there was a price fixing provision which Prestole claims was violative of the antitrust laws. It claims it should be permitted to assert such claimed illegality of the Tinnerman-Illinois contract as a defense in this suit and should, also, because of such claimed illegality be permitted as a part of its defense to attack the validity of the licensed patents.

We shall discuss these contentions in the order in which they are set out above.

(1) More Favorable Royalty Terms

The district judge was of the opinion that, "when the parties, in paragraph 12 of each of the license agreements, used the phrase 'more favorable royalty terms' they intended just that, and did not intend to encompass 'more favorable contract terms'." He concluded, therefore, that Tinnerman's agreement to furnish Illinois information, and its actual furnishing of engineering service, information and other things of value should not be considered as relating to royalty terms. Accordingly, he held that the value of such assistance should not be offset against the specified royalty rate in the Illinois contract in determining whether the end result was not, in fact, a reduction of the royalty payable by Illinois to Tinnerman. We disagree with this conclusion. The trial court quoted two definitions of royalty, as follows:

> "* * * A royalty is a payment proportionate to the use of a patented device. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. American Bell Telephone Co., 125 F. 342, 348." Tesra Co. v. Holland Furnace Co., 73 F. (2d) 553, 554.
> "* * * 'Royalty' when used in connection with a license under a patent, means the compensation paid by the licensee to the licensor for the use of the licensor's patented invention * * *" Hazeltine Corp. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 100 F. (2d) 10, 16.

We think that adopting these definitions of royalty and considering a royalty as the cost, consideration, compensation, or price paid or incurred for a license, the specified rate should not be the sole criterion by which to determine what was in fact the price paid for the license. By furnishing at its own expense the assistance given, Tinnerman certainly was reducing the amount it was receiving, or charging, for the use of its patents, and was likewise reducing the cost, or price paid by Illinois for such use. Royalties, being the price or compensation to be paid, were, therefore, reduced and Illinois was given more favorable royalty terms than the recited six percent.

In the case of Corn Products Refining Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,363], 324 U. S. 726, it was contended by Corn Products Co., charged with violation of the Robinson-Patman Act, that the furnishing of services and other perquisites to a particular customer did not constitute discrimination in price. The Supreme Court, at page 740 of its opinion, stated:

> "Petitioners assert that the practices prohibited by § 2(a) are discriminations in price, and not in the terms and conditions of sale other than price. They rely on the fact that in the course of the progress of the Robinson-Patman Bill through Congress, the phrase 'terms of sale' originally included in the prohibited discriminations, was stricken from the bill. But even if the contention be accepted, we cannot ignore the fact that the present discriminations in the terms of sale operated to permit the favored customers to purchase at a lower price than other customers, so that their only practical effect was to establish discriminations in price, precisely the evil at which the statute was aimed."

The obvious intent and purpose of paragraph 12 of the contract was to protect Prestole against a possible competitive disadvantage in the event of a license to a third party. It paid for such protection. Such was a reasonable and proper objective, and language employed should not be narrowly construed to frustrate that objective. We should look at the entire contract between Tinnerman and Illinois to see whether or not more favorable royalty terms were created by it.

We think the language used in the Tinnerman-Prestole contract indicates an intention that more than the mere recited percentage was to be considered. The contract provides that the licensee, Prestole, should, after being given notice and a copy of a second license agreement, have 30 days within which "to determine whether it desires to adopt such royalty terms." There would be no need for this provision if the licensee were to benefit only when the third party paid a lower percentage of royalty on its sales. In that case, the benefits could be made automatic, since there would be nothing for the licensee to "determine."

We conclude that the value of the information, services and assistance contracted to be given by Tinnerman to Illinois, and that which it actually gave, should be offset against the recited rate of royalty to determine what, in fact, were the royalty terms established by such contract. We further conclude that a fair review of the evidence in this case discloses that Tinnerman intended to, and did, provide more favorable royalty terms to Illinois. Tinnerman was, accordingly, bound under its contract to have given notice to Prestole of such contract and to give Prestole opportunity to adopt its terms.

It might be argued here that there was not sufficient evidence from which it could be determined that the services which Tinnerman contracted to supply Illinois were of sufficient substance to amount to a reduction in royalty terms. The language of paragraph 16 of the agreement with Illinois provides that "Tinnerman will, at the request of Illinois, assist Illinois with such information as it may have, in order that production can commence as rapidly as possible." In considering this, we keep in mind that this is a suit in which Tinnerman is seeking specific performance of its contract with Prestole. It is not in position to maintain such suit if it was, itself, continuously breaching it. Accordingly, we should consider how the above language was implemented by Tinnerman's conduct, not only at the very beginning of its licensing of Illinois, but throughout the continuance of that contract and the contemporaneous enforcement of its contract with Prestole. It is apparent that it intended to, and did, give to Illinois a competitive advantage over Prestole contrary to the intention and to the language of the original Tinnerman-Prestole contract.

Tinnerman contends that notwithstanding that it gave no notice of the making of its license agreement with Illinois, Prestole had knowledge in 1946 and 1947 of this agreement, and failed to take action when it first learned of it; that Prestole is, accordingly, now estopped from relying on lack of notice. It is not necessary here to review in detail the evidence which Tinnerman offered to support such claim. It consisted of letters, trade journal publications and minutes of meetings of Prestole directors. We are satisfied that such evidence did not establish Prestole's knowledge of the terms of the Illinois contract or the extent or character of the assistance which Tinnerman was providing to Illinois. It is sufficient here to quote the trial judge's disposition of this claim, as follows:

> "If * * * certain conditions in the agreement (referring to the Tinnerman-Illinois agreement) are to be looked upon as supplemental royalty terms, then we see no reason why defendant should be charged with knowledge of the existence of the Tinnerman-Illinois agreement and should be required affirmatively to request a copy of the agreement, as contended by plaintiff."

As a matter of fact, in December, 1953, Tinnerman refused to furnish Prestole's attorneys with a copy of any of its license agreements, and it was not until 1954, when the dispute involved in this litigation was in full discussion, that Prestole's attorneys were allowed to inspect the Tinnerman-Illinois contract; they were told nothing of any supplemental arrangements between Tinnerman and Illinois and were given no information as to the nature, quantity or value of the engineering services and assistance furnished pursuant to paragraph 16 of the Tinnerman-Illinois contract.

Tinnerman further contends that it had always interpreted paragraph 12 of the license agreement with Prestole as reserving to Tinnerman the right to decide whether more favorable terms had or had not been granted to a licensee; that only in the event that in Tinnerman's judgment such license included more favorable royalty terms, would it be required to give notice to Prestole. We disagree. If, as a matter of fact, the Tinnerman-Illinois contract did not grant more favorable royalty terms, no notice was required. If it did, notice was required, regardless of Tinnerman's own interpretation of the contract and its own conduct.

One further phase of this subject should be considered. At the time of the making of the Tinnerman-Illinois contract in 1946, Prestole was already producing devices under the Tinnerman license and, accordingly, it is claimed it did not need assistance to get into production. The Tinnerman-Illinois contract provided that Tinnerman would give Illinois, "such information as it (Tinnerman) may have, in order that production can commence as rapidly as possible." Tinnerman argues that like assistance to Prestole was not necessary. The evidence, however, discloses that Prestole had problems of getting into production on each order for the devices in question. It continuously needed, and supplied itself with, the engineering work being contemporaneously supplied gratis to Illinois by Tinnerman. Tinnerman should not escape a charge of substantial breach of its contract by limiting consideration to the rather vague language employed in granting the license to Illinois. We must look, also, to the manner in which Tinnerman and Illinois construed and implemented that language by performance under its auspices.

Tinnerman further claims that its 1946 agreement with Illinois had in it some provisions which were less favorable to the licensee than Prestole's license. These, it argues, should overcome any advantage to Illinois as to royalties. The Illinois agreement is more restricted than Prestole's as to territory; Illinois is bound by a price fixing provision; Illinois was required to proceed in good faith to manufacture and sell fastening devices and diligently build up and extend the business of marketing such devices as rapidly and fully as possible; Illinois was restricted as to its sales of fasteners in foreign countries; Illinois was not permitted to cancel the agreement during the first five years after its execution. These provisions were not in the Prestole contract. Such provisions, however, do not add to, or take away from, the price or consideration to be paid for use of the license. Even if we assume that Prestole, having been given notice of the Tinnerman-Illinois contract, would have had to adopt the above provisions, such assumption would not detract from the fact that Tinnerman failed to give Prestole an opportunity to adopt the Illinois contract with all its terms and, therefore, breached its contract. We conclude that Tinnerman breached its contract with Prestole and, accordingly, is not in a position to be aided by a decree specifically enforcing such contract in its behalf.

(2) Misuse of patents

Defendant claims that Tinnerman misused its patents in two regards, (1) by prohibiting Prestole from using the licensed patents in any device which had a "thread engaging portion" as described in certain patents, one of which had expired, and (2) by the inclusion of a price fixing provision in its license contract with Illinois.

(a) Extension of monopoly of expired patent. Tinnerman and Prestole's assignor, Detroit Harvester Company, had been in the business of manufacturing sheet metal nuts, or fastening devices. Patents involved in this suit had to do with this type of device. Prior to the making of the 1942 license agreement, Tinnerman and Detroit Harvester had used different methods for the "thread engaging portion" of the devices being manufactured by them. Each apparently had patents covering such operation. The cross licensing agreements of August 18, 1942, forbade the respective licensees, Tinnerman and Detroit Harvester, from using the licensed patents in connection with devices containing thread engaging portions which had been the subject of patents owned by the respective licensors. Tinnerman's grant of license to Detroit Harvester provided that:

> "This license shall not include devices covered by said patents in which the thread-engaging portion comprises a pair of tongues, the ends of which are notched out and formed with screw thread engaging edges intended for and used to receive a screw such as shown and described in Tinnerman patents Nos. 1,512,653; 1,928,469; 2,221,498; and 2,233,230."

Of the last mentioned patents, Tinnerman patent 1,512,653 had already expired at the time the above provision was included in the license agreement, and Tinnerman patent 1,928,469 expired some four years later. It is, however, unimportant on the point involved here that some of the mentioned patents had not expired. Our decision is controlled by the fact that one of them had expired. By the above condition in the license agreement, Tinnerman was extending, so far as competition with Prestole was concerned in devices manufactured in combination with the licensed patents, a monopoly in an expired patent. We conclude that such conduct by Tinnerman constituted misuse of the licensed patents. The fact that the general public, other than Prestole, was not thereby forbidden the use of this then unpatented device and that Prestole might employ it in manufacturing equipment not containing the invention of the licensed patents does not, in our opinion, exonerate Tinnerman from a charge of attempting to extend, for its own purposes, a monopoly in an expired patent. We are of the opinion that the misuse thus attempted by Tinnerman was of the character condemned by adjudicated cases which have spoken on the subject. The following language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Scott Paper Co. v. Marcalus Manufacturing Co., Inc., et al., 326 U. S. 249 (255, 256) supports our views in this regard:

> "The aim of the patent laws is not only that members of the public shall be free to manufacture the product or employ the process disclosed by the expired patent, but also that the consuming public at large shall receive the benefits of the unrestricted exploitation, by others, of its disclosures. Kellogg Co. v. National Biscuit Co., 305 U. S. 111, 117-120. If a manufacturer or user could restrict himself, by express contract, or by any action which would give rise to an 'estoppel' from using the invention of an expired patent, he would deprive himself and the consuming public of the advantage to be derived from his free use of the disclosures. The public has invested in such free use by the grant of a monopoly to the patentee for a limited time. Hence any attempted reservation or continuation in the patentee or those claiming under him of the patent monopoly, after the patent expires, whatever the legal device employed, runs counter to the policy and purpose of the patent laws."

We have in mind that after the expiration of a patent, the invention originally protected thereby becomes, for all purposes, an unpatented device. The Courts have uniformly held that existing patents cannot, by conditions attached to license agreements, be used to create or extend a monopoly in unpatented articles.

In the case of Mercoid Corporation v. Mid-Continent Investment Co. et al. [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,201], 320 U. S. 661, an accused infringer interposed as defense to a charge of infringement that the plaintiff, "should be barred from relief because it was seeking to extend the grant of the patent to unpatented devices" (p. 662).

While the facts of that case are not directly in point with the case at bar, the principles involved are sufficiently analogous that the Court's reasoning is apposite here (pp. 664, 665, 666).

> "Ever since Henry v. A. B. Dick Co., 224 U. S. 1, was overruled by Motion Picture Co. v. Universal Film Co., 243 U. S. 502, this Court has consistently held that the owner of a patent may not employ it to secure a limited monopoly of an unpatented material used in applying the invention. Carbice Corp. v. American Patents Corp., supra; Leitch Mfg. Co. v. Barber Co., supra; Morton Salt Co. v. G. S. Suppiger Co., 314 U. S. 488; B. B. Chemical Co. v. Ellis, 314 U. S. 495. In those cases both direct and contributory infringement suits were disallowed on a showing that the owner of the patent was using it 'as the effective means of restraining competition with its sale of an unpatented article'."
> "The necessities or convenience of the patentee do not justify any use of the monopoly of the patent to create another monopoly. The fact that the patentee has the power to refuse a license does not enable him to enlarge the monopoly of the patent by the expedient of attaching conditions to its use. United States v. Masonite Corp., supra, p. 277. The method by which the monopoly is sought to be extended is immaterial."

The following language of the District Judge in the case of U. S. v. Timken Roller Bearing Co. [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,380], 83 F. Supp. 284, 313, was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States by its affirmance in Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. U. S. [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,837], 341 U. S. 593:

> "The proposition of law has been firmly established that the patent does not empower its owner to restrain trade in processes or devices which are not embraced within the scope of his patent."

We conclude, therefore, that Tinnerman's thus described misuse of the licensed patents forecloses it from specifically enforcing the license agreement.

(b) Price fixing agreement. Prestole claims that the price fixing provision of the Tinnerman-Illinois contract violated the antitrust laws. It argues that, therefore, Tinnerman is forbidden here to enforce its license agreement with Prestole. Prestole relies upon the case of U. S. v. Line Material Co. [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,225], 333 U. S. 287, 307, wherein the Supreme Court said:

> "In the absence of patent or other statutory authorization, a contract to fix or maintain prices in interstate commerce has long been recognized as illegal per se under the Sherman Act."

In that case, the Supreme Court was dealing with cross-licensing agreements between patentees whose patents complimented each other and the commercial use of either required it to be used in combination with the other. These cross-licensing agreements each had price fixing provisions, and forbade the respective licensees from granting any sub-licenses except where such sub-licenses contained like price fixing agreements. That Line Material case, however, did not overrule the doctrine of U. S. v. General Electric Co., 272 U. S. 476, which sustains, as against a charge of violation of the anti-trust laws, a provision whereby a licensor under a valid patent restricts the price at which its licensee may sell articles manufactured under the license. The Line Material case restricted the application of General Electric case, but did not in the controlling opinion overrule it. As indicating the extent of its continued applicability, the Court, after reviewing it, stated at page 304:

> "* * * where a conspiracy to restrain trade or an effort to monopolize is not involved, a patentee may license another to make and vend the patented device with a provision that the licensee's sale price shall be fixed by the patentee."

In the case at bar, there was no showing that either Tinnerman or its licensee, Illinois, controlled any substantial part of the industry in the device in question. Only one license containing a price fixing agreement is involved here.

Other cases cited by Prestole dealt with situations where through multiple licensing and other devices monopolistic control was sought, obtained, or made possible. See U. S. v. U. S. Gypsum [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,226], 333 U. S. 364; U. S. v. U. S. Gypsum [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,729], 340 U. S. 76; U. S. v. New Wrinkle, Inc. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,214], 342 U. S. 371; and Newburgh Moire Company v. Superior Moire Company [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,487], 237 F. (2d) 283. We do not consider these cases in point here.

> "Such price maintenance provision is not uncommon and is violative of no law unless a party or parties to the agreement are in a monopolistic position and the effects of the agreement would have a tendency to create a monopoly and thus operate in restraint of trade. There is nothing in the record before us that indicates that plaintiff was in a monopolistic position in the market or in such a dominant position as that the inclusion of such a price maintenance clause in an agreement with the licensee would tend to perfect or maintain a position of monopoly."

We are satisfied that the trial judge, on the record before him, committed no error in making such a finding.

(3) INVALIDITY OF TINNERMAN PATENTS

Additionally, Prestole contends that because under the rule of Katzinger Co. v. Chicago Metallic Mfg. Co. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,524], 329 U. S. 394; MacGregor v. Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,525], 329 U. S. 402; and Sola Electric Co. v. Jefferson Electric Co. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,245], 317 U. S. 173, a licensee under a license agreement containing a price fixing clause may defend a suit for royalties by challenging the validity of the licensed patents, Prestole should here be allowed to defend this action by challenging the validity of the Tinnerman patents. We disagree.

The Tinnerman-Prestole license agreement, here sued upon, does not contain any price fixing provisions. Under the rule of U. S. v. Harvey Steel Co., 196 U. S. 310, and other authorities still recognized as the law, Prestole was estopped during the continuance of its use of the license from challenging the validity of the patents upon which it accepted such license. In the Sola Electric Co. v. Jefferson Electric Co. case, supra, Chief Justice Stone, in discussing this rule of estoppel, said:

> "Where no price fixing stipulation was involved in the license contract, this rule of estoppel, which was not questioned by counsel, was applied without discussion in United States v. Harvey Steel Co., 196 U. S. 310; cf. Kinsman v. Parkhurst, 18 How. 289. We need not decide whether in such a case the rule is one of local law, * * * or whether, if it be regarded as a rule of federal law because the construction and application of the patent laws are involved, it was rightly applied in United States v. Harvey Steel Co., supra."

The Sola, Katzinger and MacGregor cases did not overrule U. S. v. Harvey Steel, supra, which we accept as still the law. Prestole, accordingly, is estopped in this action for royalties from challenging the validity of the Tinnerman patents. Whether Illinois might make such challenge were Tinnerman seeking to enforce its contract with Illinois is not, in our opinion, here involved. We do not think there is such connection between the two contracts as to make such defense available to Illinois usable in this action by Prestole.

(4) DEFENDANT'S COUNTERCLAIM

We affirm the District Judge's disallowance of the defendant's counterclaim. We have accepted the calculations of the defense expert as sufficient to show that Illinois was granted more favorable royalty terms than Prestole. We hold, also, that plaintiff is barred from recovery of royalties because of its misuse of the licensed patents. In its counterclaim, however, the burden was upon Prestole to prove its damages. Its estimate of damages assumed that all of its engineering costs during the period in question would have been supplied to it had it adopted the terms of the Illinois contract. We, however, cannot assume that it would have requested from Tinnerman all of the engineering work actually done by it during the period in question. The integrity of its expert's calculations was not impaired by cross-examination and no proofs in opposition thereto were offered by the plaintiff. These calculations were sufficient, in our opinion, to demonstrate the substantiality of Tinnerman's breach of contract. We do not, however, feel that they were sufficient to permit the giving of judgment to Prestole for the amount of royalties already paid.

In a final assertion of error, Prestole, claiming misuse of patents by Tinnerman, charges that the District Court should have dismissed the plaintiff Tinnerman's action for infringement occurring subsequent to termination of the license agreement. The District Judge granted a separate trial as to this issue and we do not here concern ourselves with it.

Because we are of the opinion that Tinnerman breached its contract with Prestole in granting more favorable royalty terms to Illinois, and because of its misuse of the licensed patents in the licensing agreement, it cannot specifically enforce that contract. Accordingly, the judgment of the District Court is, to that extent, reversed, with direction to dismiss the plaintiff's action for specific performance of the agreement to pay royalties. The Court's disallowance of the defendant's counterclaim is affirmed.

In the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. Civil Action No. 58-817-F. Dated March 18, 1959.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Brokerage Commissions Under Clayton Act, Section 2(c)—Seller's Reduction of Prices by Elimination of its Own Broker—Legality.—A complaint in which a broker charged its principal, a manufacturer of plastic cups, with terminating the broker's services and then selling directly to a buyer at reduced prices was dismissed for failure to state a cause of action under Section 2(c) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. The broker contended that Section 2(c) had been violated since the buyer had, in effect, obtained a commission from the seller. From the facts pleaded, however, it did not appear that the seller paid anything to the buyer; it simply sold at a lower price and eliminated any payment of a commission. The reduction or elimination of a commission or brokerage fee payable by the seller to its own agent, to enable the seller to sell at a lower price, is not forbidden by Section 2(c). The evil aimed at by that section was the evasion of the price discrimination "ban" by using the seller's payment of so-called brokerage fees or commissions to the buyer as a "mask" for what was really a reduction in price. Here, where the price allegedly had been reduced, the broker tried to "reverse the argument" by contending that a price reduction should be considered the payment of an illegal commission.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3520, 3520.375.

Price Discrimination—Clayton Act, Section 2(a)—"Agreeing" to Sell at Reduced Prices—"Quoting" Different Prices to Different Retailers—Failure to Allege Actual Sales and Effect on Competition.—A broker's allegations that his principal, a manufacturer of plastic cups, terminated his services and then "agreed" to sell to a buyer at a "substantially reduced price," and that the manufacturer further "quoted different prices to different retailers" in an area, did not constitute an adequate statement of a violation of Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act. No actual sale was alleged. Also, there was no allegation, much less any statement of facts, indicating that such alleged discrimination had any effect on competition.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3505.470, 3506.250.

Price Discrimination—Knowingly Inducing or Receiving Discrimination Under Clayton Act, Section 2(f)—Failure to Allege Actual Sales and Effect on Competition—Injury to Plaintiff.—A broker's allegation that a buyer of plastic cups induced or received a discriminatory price reduction from a manufacturer (the broker's principal) stated no cause of action under Section 2(f) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, for the same reasons that rendered the charges against the manufacturer under Section 2(a) inadequate. The court found the latter charges insufficient because the broker alleged no actual sales, alleged no adverse effects on competition, and failed to show that he was directly injured by the alleged discriminations.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3526.220.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Necessary Averments—Clayton Act, Sections 2(a) and 2(f)—Injury to Plaintiff—Discrimination Between Buyers as Injury to Seller's Broker—Causation—"Direct" as Contrasted with "Remote" Injury.—A broker who charged that his services were terminated by a manufacturer of plastic cups which agreed to sell directly to a buyer at "a substantially reduced price," and quoted "different prices to different retailers" failed to show that he was a person injured thereby so as to be entitled to sue under Section 4 of the Clayton Act. The broker, claiming that he had not been paid commissions due to him, "implied" that there was an actual sale to a buyer at reduced prices after the termination of his services, and that the loss of the commission on that sale was the injury complained of. However, only a person who has been directly injured by a violation of the antitrust laws is entitled to recover damages under Section 4. Those whose only loss is from the interruption or diminution of a profitable relationship with a party "directly" affected by a violation are injured "only remotely and indirectly." Here, assuming that the seller sold to the buyer at a lower price than it charged the buyer's competitors, this price differential was not the cause of the broker's loss of his commission. The fact that the elimination of the broker's commission may have been, economically, a condition precedent to the granting of the lower price to the buyer did not make the failure to pay that commission a result of the lower price. Thus, the lower price might have been a source of injury to some competitor of the buyer, but it did not cause the broker's injury. Therefore, the complaint stated no cause of action against the seller or against the buyer which allegedly "induced or received" the claimed discriminatory price reduction.

See Private Enforcement or Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9009, 9009.750.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Damages—Measure of Damages Recoverable—Price Discrimination—Brokerage Commissions Lost by Reason of "Illegal" Sale—Antitrust Violations as Defense.—A broker who alleged that his principal, a manufacturer of plastic cups, had terminated his services and then agreed to sell to a buyer at a reduced price, thereby causing the broker to lose commissions, was not, as argued by the manufacturer, trying to collect a commission on a sale which he alleged to be illegal. The broker was not trying to recover the commission as such, but was using the amount of the commission on the allegedly illegal sale as a measure of damages, that is, as evidence of the commission he would or might have earned if the same goods had been sold legally. However, the court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a cause of action.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.640, 9040.20.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Robinson-Patman Act, Section 3—Treble Damages Not Recoverable.—A broker's complaint charging its principal, a manufacturer of plastic cups, with violating Section 2 of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, contained certain language (such as the characterization of a price as "unreasonably low") which read like a charge of a violation of Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act. The court, noting that the broker's counsel, in argument, stated that he did not rely on any such violation, observed that, in any case, a violation of Section 3 would not be a violation of the antitrust laws on which a treble damage action under Section 4 of the Clayton Act could be predicated.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.700.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Jurisdiction of Federal Courts—State and Federal Claims Joined in Single Action—Jurisdiction Over State Claim Where Federal Antitrust Claim Dismissed—"Pendent" Jurisdiction.—A Federal District Court sitting in Massachusetts dismissed a plaintiff's whole case, including claims based on Massachusetts law, where the plaintiff's other claims stated no cause of action under the Federal antitrust laws. Assuming that the state claims were so closely related to the antitrust claims that the court had "pendent jurisdiction" under the doctrine of Hurn v. Oursler, 289 U. S. 238, the question remained as to the proper disposition to be made of the state claims in view of the fact that the antitrust claims had been dismissed. The plaintiff contended that, regardless of what was done as to the antitrust claim, the court had jurisdiction of the "pendent" claims and should retain and try them. In an earlier case it was held that, where a Federal claim was dismissed only after the case had been tried in its entirety, the court should have disposed of the "pendent non-federal claim" on its merits as a matter of judicial economy. However, where the Federal claim is disposed of on a motion to dismiss, it is proper to dismiss the whole case.

Memorandum of Decision on Motion of Defendant, Stanley Home Products, Inc., to Dismiss

[Price Discrimination Action]

FORD, District Judge [In full text]: This is an action brought under 15 U. S. C. A. § 15 to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff because of violations by defendants of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 13.

[Manufacturer's Representative—Termination]

The basic facts alleged in the amended complaint may be briefly summarized. Defendant Gahm, doing business as Plura Plastics, is a manufacturer among other products of plastic cups. Plaintiff is engaged in the business of acting as a manufacturer's representative in the New England area and had an agreement to act as exclusive agent of Plura for the sale of its products in that area and was to be paid a commission on all sales in the New England area whether or not made by him. Plaintiff obtained two orders for plastic cups from defendant Stanley. Stanley then began to negotiate directly with Plura, offering to buy large quantities of cups at a substantially reduced price. Plura thereupon terminated plaintiff's services as its representative and accepted Stanley's offer. No actual sale to Stanley is alleged.

The plaintiff alleges that the price agreed upon by defendants was unreasonably low, was discriminatory in that the price to Stanley was lower than the price offered to other retail dealers in Massachusetts, and was not justified by differences in the cost of manufacture, sale or delivery, and that the transaction amounted to a reduction in price to Stanley by elimination of plaintiff's commission and thus constituted payment of a commission or discount to Stanley, all in violation of 15 U. S. C. A. § 13.[1] Plaintiff also alleges breach of contract by Plura

[1] Certain language, such as the characterization of the price as "unreasonably low" reads like a charge of violation of 15 U. S. C. A. § 13a. However, plaintiff's counsel in argument stated he did not rely on any such violation. In any case, violation of § 13a would not be a violation of the antitrust laws on which an action under 15 U. S. C. A. § 15 could be predicated. Nashville Milk Co. v. Carnation Company [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,915], 355 U. S. 373.

through failure to pay him commissions due, conspiracy between Plura and Stanley to deprive plaintiff of his commissions and divert them to Stanley, and inducement by Stanley to Plura to breach its contract with plaintiff. These three claims are all expressly stated to be based on Massachusetts law.

[Price Reduction as Payment of Illegal Brokerage]

Plaintiff contends that 15 U. S. C. A. § 13(c) has been violated in that in effect Stanley obtained a commission from Plura. This is, of course, only a conclusion of the pleader. From the facts pleaded it does not appear that Plura paid anything to Stanley. It simply sold at a lower price and eliminated any payment of commission. The evil aimed at by § 13(c) was the evasion of the ban on price discrimination by using the payment of so-called brokerage fees or commissions by the seller directly or indirectly to the buyer as a mask for what was really a reduction in price. Here where the price allegedly has been reduced, plaintiff tries to reverse the argument by contending that a price reduction should be considered the payment of an illegal commission. The reduction or elimination of a commission or brokerage fee payable by the seller to its own agent to enable the seller to sell at a lower price is not forbidden by § 13(c). Henry Broch and Company v. Federal Trade Commission [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 69,208], 261 F. 2d 725. The cases relied upon by plaintiff are cases in which the seller paid a commission to the buyer's agent, who in turn passed it on to the buyer. Quality Bakers of America v. Federal Trade Commission [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,060] 114 F. 2d 393; Oliver Bros., Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,212], 102 F. 2d 763.

[No Sales at Different Prices]

The allegations as to a violation of § 13 (a) are rather vaguely stated. Plura is charged with having agreed to sell cups to Stanley at a substantially reduced price. No actual sale is alleged. Plura is also charged with having quoted different prices to different retailers in Massachusetts. Again no sales at different prices are alleged. There is not even an allegation, much less any statement of facts, indicating that such discrimination had any effect on competition. This is not an adequate statement of a violation of § 13(a). Lipson v. Socony-Vacuum Corporation [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,069], 76 F. 2d 213, 217.

[Injury to Plaintiff]

Assuming that such a vague and incomplete statement was sufficient to set forth a violation of § 13(a) by price discrimination, the question arises whether the complaint shows that plaintiff is a person injured thereby so as to be entitled to sue under § 15. Apart from a vague generalization that he has been injured in his business and business reputation, the only specific injury he sets forth is that he has not been paid commissions due to him. Presumably this does not refer to commissions on the two orders allegedly obtained from Stanley by plaintiff before Stanley made an effort to obtain a reduced price. Failure to pay these commissions would have no conceivable connection with any subsequent violation of the antitrust laws. The best that can be made of this statement of injury is that plaintiff implies that there was an actual sale to Stanley at a reduced price after Plura had terminated plaintiff's services as its representative, and that the loss of the commission on this sale is the injury complained of.[2]

[Injury "Remote," Not "Direct"]

Only one who has been directly injured by a violation of the antitrust laws is entitled to recover damages under § 15. Persons whose only loss is from the interruption or diminution of a profitable relationship with the party directly affected by the violation have been held to have been injured only remotely and indirectly. Thus recovery has been denied to the landlord of an injured competitor, Melrose Realty Co., Inc. v. Loew's Incorporated [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,358 and 68,423], 234 F. 2d 518, to a patent licensor whose royalties from an injured licensee were affected, Productive Inventions, Inc. v. Trico Products Corporation, 224 F. 2d 678 [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,104], to employees of a corporation directly injured, Corey v. Boston Ice Co., 207 Fed. 465, or to a corporation supplying materials to another closely related corporation which was directly injured, Snow Crest Beverages, Inc. v. Recipe Foods, Inc. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,602], 147 F. Supp. 907.

[2] Defendant argues that plaintiff is in the position of trying to collect a commission on a sale which he alleges to be illegal. However, under the antitrust portion of the complaint, plaintiff is not seeking to recover the commission as such. At most he would be using the amount of the commission on the allegedly illegal sale as a measure of damages, as evidence of the commission he would or might have earned if the same goods had been sold legally.

It is difficult to see how in this case the claimed injury could be considered the direct result of the alleged violation. Assuming that Plura sold cups to Stanley at a lower price than it charged competitors of Stanley, this price differential was not the cause of plaintiff's loss of his commission. Of course, if Plura under whatever agreement it had with plaintiff was free to terminate his services, or to deal directly with a customer without paying plaintiff any commission on such direct sales, plaintiff has suffered no legal injury, even though he may not have earned a hoped for commission. If under his agreement with Plura plaintiff was entitled to the exclusive right to sell to Stanley or was entitled to commissions on all sales to Stanley even though he played no part in them, then his injury was caused by Plura's breach of contract, or possibly by wrongful interference by Stanley with his contractual relationship with Plura. The lower price allowed to Stanley by Plura may have been a source of injury to some competitor of Stanley. It did not cause plaintiff's injury. The fact that elimination of plaintiff's commissions may have been economically a condition precedent to the granting of a lower price by Plura does not make the failure to pay that commission a result of the lower price.

Plaintiff relies on cases such as Roseland v. Phister Mfg. Co. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,187], 125 F. 2d 417, and McWhirter v. Monroe Calculating Mach. Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,227], 76 F. Supp. 456, to show that a manufacturer's representative may be a person directly injured by a violation of the antitrust laws. In these cases the effect of the antitrust violation was to eliminate competition and thus directly deprive plaintiff of his opportunity to make sales in a competitive market. Such an injury was, of course, a direct consequence of the alleged antitrust violation.

[Inducing Discrimination]

Plaintiff's claim under § 13(f) is based on the allegation that Stanley induced or received the discriminatory price reduction which is charged in his claim under § 13(a) and what has been said as to the § 13(a) claim applies with equal force to the § 13(f) claim. The conclusion must be that the complaint fails to state any claim entitling plaintiff to relief under § 15.

[Claims Under State Law—Jurisdiction]

In the light of the allegations of the complaint that plaintiff is a citizen of Massachusetts and defendant Stanley a Massachusetts corporation and the absence of any allegation as to the requisite amount in controversy, it is clear that this court has no independent jurisdiction of the claims under Massachusetts law. Assuming, however, that these claims are so closely related to the claims under the antitrust laws with which they are joined that this court would have pendent jurisdiction under the doctrine of Hurn v. Oursler, 289 U. S. 238, the question remains as to the proper disposition to be made of such claims in the present position of this case. Plaintiff contends that regardless of what is done as to the antitrust claims, the court has jurisdiction of the pendent claims and should retain them and try them. Strachman v. Palmer, 177 F. 2d 427, relied upon by plaintiff, does not support his contention since in that case the federal claim was dismissed only after the case had been tried in its entirety, and it was held that as a matter of judicial economy and convenience the court should have disposed of the pendent non-federal claim on its merits. But where the federal claim is disposed of on a motion to dismiss, then it is proper to dismiss the whole case. Dixon v. Martin, 260 F. 2d 809; Massachusetts Universalist Convention v. Hildreth & Rogers Co., 87 F. Supp. 822, affirmed 183 F. 2d 497.

[Complaint Dismissed]

Defendant Stanley's motion to dismiss the complaint is allowed.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Corporations' Failure to Appear for Taking of Deposition Through a "Managing Agent"—Court's "Inherent Power" to Dismiss Complaint.—A Federal District Court, dismissing two corporations' treble damage action for their "wilful failure" and refusal to appear for the taking of their deposition, through their "managing agent," upon notice and order of the court, noted that it had "the inherent power in vindication of its authority to summarily impose sanctions upon a party who deliberately flouted its lawful mandate." In a prior ruling, the court had found that the individual to be examined was, in fact, the plaintiffs' "managing agent" and had ordered the taking of the deposition to proceed. However, when he appeared, that individual denied that he was the plaintiffs' "managing agent" and refused to answer questions which were "vital to the defendants' case" and which were relevant to the issues. In dismissing the complaint, the court noted that the defendants could not obtain from any other source the information and evidence which they sought from that individual, and that, in the words of the plaintiffs' own counsel, that individual "has probably . . . more information on the merits of this controversy than any other person."

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

FINDINGS OF FACT[1]

SUGARMAN, District Judge [In full text]: 1. Plaintiffs, Independent Productions Corporation and IPC Distributors, Inc., are the producer and distributor, respectively, of a motion picture film entitled "Salt of the Earth".

2. On June 21, 1956, the complaint herein was filed charging defendants with participation in a conspiracy directed against the plaintiffs' production and distribution of the above-named film. Substantial damages under the Clayton and Sherman Acts are sought.

[Depositions—"Managing Agents"]

3. Plaintiffs moved for an order

"pursuant to § 30(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure debarring defendants from taking the depositions of the plaintiffs by Herbert Biberman and Paul Jarrico and vacating all notices of depositions heretofore served upon the attorneys for the plaintiffs by the defendants or any of them to the extent that such notices seek the depositions of the plaintiffs by and through Herbert Biberman and Paul Jarrico as officers, directors or managing agents of the plantiffs".

4. In an opinion dated May 20, 1959,[2] the court found that Messrs. Biberman and Jarrico were in fact managing agents of the plaintiffs. The said motion was therefore denied.

[1] Perhaps findings of fact and conclusions of law are not required in this matter. 5 Moore's Fed Prac. 52.08, p. 2673, but see Vonder Heydt v. Rogers, 251 F. 2d 17 (C. A. D. C. 1958). In any event, they may be helpful to the appellate courts. Curley v. Wilson, 239 F. 2d 957 (C. A. D. C. 1956).

5. By order dated June 11, 1959, the court inter alia ordered > "that the examination by defendants of plaintiffs by Herbert Biberman as managing agent shall proceed on June 17, 1959 at 10:30 A. M. in Room 601 of United States Courthouse, Foley Square, Borough of Manhattan, City and State of New York . . ."

6. On September 25, 1959, the plaintiffs and certain defendants appeared before the court to argue a motion for an order

> "pursuant to Rule 37 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure compelling plaintiffs by Herbert Biberman to answer the questions propounded on examination before trial . . ."

7. At the hearing of the said defendants' motion it was disclosed to the court that when, on June 17, 1959, Herbert Biberman had appeared at the United States District Court at Foley Square, New York, he was not there in the capacity of a managing agent of the plaintiffs.

8. The motion papers handed up on September 25, 1959, show that during the examination of June 17, 1959, plaintiffs' counsel stated among other things:

> "The position of my clients is that under the circumstances it has done everything it possibly could to comply with Judge Sugarman's order even though it disclaims its validity and legal effect and intends, in due course, to review it on appeal. I desire to make it clear that my clients are not tendering Mr. Biberman in any capacity and do not recognize him as a managing agent of either corporation. To the contrary, we adhere to our position that he has no connection with the plaintiff corporations other than that of having a beneficial interest in a very small percentage of the shares of plaintiff Independent Productions Corporation and a participation in an equally small percentage of the profits derived from the production of SALT OF THE EARTH."
> "As to Mr. Biberman, I will say only this, I will add to my statement only this: Mr. Biberman is not a managing agent of either corporation, with all deference to Judge Sugarman's opinion, and he cannot be made that which he is not."

At that taking of plaintiffs' deposition, in response to the inquiry:

> "Do you represent the officers and managing agents of the plaintiffs' corporation?"

plaintiffs' attorney stated:

> "There are no managing agents."

9. Mr. Biberman at the taking of plaintiffs' deposition upon oral examination on June 17, 1959 refused to answer questions which are vital to the defendants' case and which had been held by Judge Herlands to be relevant to the issues of this litigation.

10. In the words of plaintiffs' counsel, Mr. Biberman

> "has probably more than any other witness in this case, more information on the merits of this controversy than any other person". (S. M. 138, deposition of Herbert Biberman, June 17, 1959)

11. At the hearing of defendants' motion on September 25, 1959 the court entertained a motion to dismiss the complaint as to all defendants for failure of the plaintiffs to comply with the notice and order and granted it.

Conclusions of Law

[Complaint Dismissed]

I. The plaintiffs have wilfully failed and refused to appear for the taking of their deposition upon oral examination upon notice and order of the court.

II. The defendants cannot obtain from any other source the information and evidence which they seek to obtain from plaintiffs through the latters' managing agent, Herbert Biberman.

III. The complaint is dismissed.[3]

Enter judgment accordingly on the order signed simultaneously herewith.

[3] The power to dismiss the complaint herein, in vindication of the court's authority, is inherent. While Societe Internationale v. Rogers, 357 U. S. 197, at first blush might appear to hold the contrary, on closer analysis it is distinguishable from the instant case.

In the Societe Internationale case, the Court was confronted with the propriety of a dismissal of a complaint for failure to comply with an order that the plaintiff, pursuant to F. R. Civ. P. 34, discover and produce certain documents for inspection, etc. As was pointed out (p. 202), the district court in that case dismissed the complaint for failure to comply with the order under Rule 34 by virtue of its "power under Rule 37(b)(2), as well as inherent power, . . ." whereas the Court of Appeals in affirming the district court "found it unnecessary to decide whether Rule 37 authorized dismissal under these circumstances since

Federal Trade Commission Act

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Enforcement of Commission Orders Requiring the Filing of Special Reports—Recovery of Forfeitures—Motion to Strike.—In an action to enforce Federal Trade Commission orders requiring a paper company to file special reports and to recover forfeitures for failure to comply with these orders, a motion to strike the count relating to the recovery of forfeitures was denied. The count was not redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous. Treating the motion as one for summary judgment, it could not be granted because a trial of the fact issues raised by the count involving the enforcement of the orders was necessary. The contention of the company was that the enforcement of the forfeiture provisions of the third paragraph of Section 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act during the pendency of the count for the enforcement of the orders constituted a deprivation of its property without due process, contrary to the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution. However, the company described the property of which it would be deprived without due process as the items of confidential business information which would have to be disclosed and not as the amount of the forfeitures. This goes to the issues raised by the enforcement count which must be tried first. If the company prevails on the enforcement count, then the forfeiture count would fall.

Memorandum

SIDNEY SUGARMAN, District Judge [In full text]: The United States of America commenced an action against St. Regis Paper Company upon the request of the Federal Trade Commission under 15 U. S. C. 49 and 15 U. S. C. 50:

"(1) for the enforcement against defendant of the several orders of the Commission described herein, and attached as exhibits hereto, which orders require defendant and certain other corporations to file special reports with the Commission, and (2) for the recovery of forfeitures because of defendant's failure to comply with the two orders requiring it to file special reports."

The complaint was filed on September 15, 1959.

it ruled that the district court was empowered to dismiss both by Rule 41(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and under its own 'inherent power' ", The Court (p. 207) then stated:

"In our opinion, whether a court has power to dismiss a complaint because of non-compliance with a production order depends exclusively upon Rule 37, which addresses itself with particularity to the consequences of a failure to make discovery by listing a variety of remedies which a court may employ . . ." [Italics supplied]

Thus, the Court held that Rule 37 set forth specifically the consequences flowing from a failure to comply with an order under Rule 34.

The situation presented by the instant case, i.e., the wilful failure of a corporate party to appear for examination by the deposition of its managing agent, appears to be governed by Rule 37(d). That rule provides that such failure "after being served with a proper notice" may be met by a motion on notice to strike the pleading of the defaulter. In the instant case, as the findings of fact point out, after the service of the notice the plaintiffs moved to quash it. That motion was denied and there resulted an order of this court that the plaintiffs be examined by those held to be their managing agents. This they refused to do. Rule 37 appears to be silent as to the power of a court in the situation here presented. Accordingly, this court believes it has the inherent power in vindication of its authority to summarily impose sanctions upon a party who deliberately flouted its lawful mandate.

[Motion to Strike]

Before answer, the defendant now moves for an order

"striking from the complaint herein all of the paragraphs of the complaint under the heading 'COUNT TWO' and designated numbers '12' to '17', inclusive, and the paragraph of the demand for relief designated '2' in their entirety, on the ground that in said portions of the complaint the plaintiff is claiming the right to enforce during the pendency of this action, the provisions of the third (unnumbered) paragraph of Section 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U. S. C. § 50) against this defendant to recover money forfeitures at the rate of $200 per day for alleged defaults in complying with the Commission's orders requiring defendant to file special reports with the Commission, for which a mandatory injunction is demanded herein against this defendant in the FIRST COUNT of the complaint, which provisions, as applied by plaintiff, constitute a deprivation of defendant's property without due process, contrary to the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States . . ."

Motions to strike are authorized by F. R. Civ. P. 12(f). That rule reads:

"f. MOTION TO STRIKE. Upon motion made by a party before responding to a pleading or, if no responsive pleading is permitted by these rules, upon motion made by a party within 20 days after the service of the pleading upon him or upon the court's own initiative at any time, the court may order stricken from any pleading any insufficient defense or any redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter."

Plaintiff's 12-17 are not redundant, immaterial, impertinent or scandalous. The motion as one to strike Count Two is denied.

[Motion for Summary Judgment]

Movant seems to seek, at this early stage, an adjudication of "Count Two" of the complaint, on the merits.

Such a motion might properly be presented by a motion to dismiss "for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted"[1] which, when supported by matters outside the pleading may be treated as one for summary judgment.

Deeming the instant motion to be such as above described, and considering all the matters presented, it is denied.

[Contention]

Defendant's position is stated in its brief to be:

"The property of which the defendant claims it will be deprived without due process is not the amount of the forfeitures . . .

"The property . . . is the extensive amount of items of business information which relates to matters which are plainly confidential, such as reports to the Census of Manufactures, names and addresses of large customers, suppliers and similar kinds of information and business secrets, all of which are of great value to defendant and other corporations whose stocks or assets have been acquired by this defendant, and the disclosure of which could be harmful to defendant and the relations with its customers and suppliers, adversely affect its sales and generally reduce its business. In the circumstances, the constitutional principle . . . is applicable."

[Ruling]

This can only mean that the motion, when deemed one for summary judgment on Count Two, should be granted because defendant will prevail ultimately on Count One. But defendant must await a trial of the fact issues raised by Count One. It must also await a trial on the merits of Count Two.

For, if defendant is correct in its contention that it will prevail on Count One, then Count Two will fall with Count One. If plaintiff recovers the judgment it seeks in Count One, it will be entitled to the penalties sought in Count Two.

It is so ordered. No further order is necessary.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil Action No. 148-370. Filed October 26, 1959.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Jurisdiction over Parties—Extraterritorial Service of Process under the Clayton Act—Voluntary Associations.—Service of process on a voluntary association in an antitrust suit was held improper since it was made beyond the territorial limits of the state in which the court was held. Rule 4(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permits such service of process only when a federal statute so provides. While Section 12 of the Clayton Act authorizes such service in antitrust suits, it applies only to corporations. Persons, as defined in the Clayton Act, are deemed to include corporations and associations, yet Section 12 of the same act, which authorizes extraterritorial service, specifies only corporations. This specificity necessarily excludes individuals and voluntary associations from those amenable to extraterritorial service. However, the association was not entitled to a dismissal of the action. "If, in fact, as the plaintiff contends, the moving defendant is engaged in such activities within this district so that it 'may be found or transacts business' here [citing Clayton Act, Section 12], the venue as to it is proper. In any event, even assuming proper venue in this district, service of process must be made upon the association as required by Rule 4(d) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure."

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9008.

For the plaintiff: Peter M. J. Reilly, New York, N. Y.

For the defendants: Simpson, Thacher & Bartlett; Condon & Forsyth; Hale, Stimson, Russell & Nickerson; Foley, James & Conran; A. Edward Masters; Debevoise, Plimpton & McLean; Chadbourne, Parke, Whiteside & Wolff; Herman I. Meitzer; Hordin, Hess & Eder; Bleakley, Pratt, Walker, Hart & Fruth; and Bernard B. Smith; all of New York, N. Y.

Memorandum

[Service of Process]

Edward Weinfeld, District Judge [In full text]: There appears to be no dispute that the moving defendant is a voluntary association with its headquarters in Washington, D. C., where the summons in this action was served upon its President. Rule 4(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure permits, when a federal statute so provides, service of process beyond the territorial limits of a state in which a District Court is held. While section 12 of the Clayton Act[1] authorizes such service in antitrust suits, it applies only to corporations.[2] This authorization of extraterritorial service of process may not be extended to apply to voluntary associations or individuals. Such appears to have been Congressional purpose.

"Persons", as defined in the Clayton Act, are "deemed to include corporations and associations";[3] yet section 12 of the same act, which authorizes extraterritorial service specifies only "corporation".[4] This specificity necessarily excludes individuals and voluntary associations from those amenable to extraterritorial service.[5]

The motion to quash service of process is granted.

[Venue]

However, the defendant is not entitled to a dismissal of the action. If, in fact, as the plaintiff contends, the moving defendant is engaged in such activities within this district so that it "may be found or transacts business" here,[6] the venue as to it is proper.[7] In any event, even assuming proper venue in this district, service of process must be made upon the association as required by Rule 4(d) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Settle order on notice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Practices Prohibited—Price Fixing—Appliances.—A wholesale distributor of a manufacturer's major appliances and several retailers were prohibited by a consent decree from entering into any contract or program having the purpose or effect of (a) fixing or stabilizing prices, profit margins, pricing systems, markups, discounts, or other terms and conditions of sale for the sale of such appliances or (b) collecting or disseminating prices or price lists among themselves for such appliances.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2011.181, 2011.218.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Practices Prohibited—Boycotts.—A wholesale distributor of a manufacturer's major appliances and several retailers were prohibited by a consent decree from entering into any contract or program having the purpose or effect of (a) boycotting or refusing to deal with any dealer or other person in connection with the sale or distribution of such appliances or (b) hindering or preventing any dealer or other person from purchasing or selling such appliances.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.533.

Resale Price Fixing—Consent Decree—Practices Prohibited—Permissive Provisions—Fair Trade—Selection of Customers.—Although a consent decree permitted a wholesale distributor of a manufacturer's major appliances to exercise its right to choose and select its dealers and to offer suggested resale prices for such appliances, regardless of whether such prices were determined by the manufacturer or the distributor, and to terminate the franchises of such dealers, it prohibited the distributor from terminating the franchise of any dealer or refusing to deal with any dealer who did not observe or agree to observe the prices suggested by the distributor or any other person and from exercising any form of coercion on any of its franchised dealers through the threat of loss of franchise for failure to adhere to the distributor's suggested prices. The decree did not prevent the distributor or defendant retailers from exercising any rights they may have under the Miller-Tydings Act or the McGuire Act, or from unilaterally exercising their rights to select distributors, dealers, consumers, or other persons with whom they will deal.

Final Judgment

FRANK L. KLOEB, District Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on October 20, 1958, and the defendants having appeared and filed their respective answers to such complaint denying the substantive allegations thereof, and all parties hereto by their attorneys herein having severally consented to the entry of this Final Judgment without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein and without admission by any party in respect of any such issue;

Now, Therefore, before any testimony has been taken and without adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and upon consent of all parties hereto, it is hereby:

Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed, as follows:

I

[Jurisdiction]

This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter herein and the parties hereto, and the complaint states a claim upon which relief may be granted against the defendants and each of them under Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, as amended.

II

[Definitions]

As used in this Final Judgment:

(A) "Person" shall mean an individual, partnership, corporation or other legal entity;

(B) "GE major appliances" shall mean refrigerators, freezers, ranges and ovens, water heaters, dishwashers, disposalls, washers, dryers, combination washer-dryers, air conditioners, and television receivers manufactured by the General Electric Company (herein referred to as GE);

(C) "Commercial" shall mean the defendant The Commercial Electric Company.

[Applicability]

The provisions of this Final Judgment applicable to any defendant shall apply to such defendant, its subsidiaries, officers, agents, directors, servants, employees, successors and assigns, and to those persons in active concert or participation with any defendant who shall receive actual notice of this Final Judgment by personal service or otherwise.

IV

[Price Fixing—Boycotts]

Defendants are jointly and severally enjoined and restrained from entering into, adhering to, maintaining or furthering, or claiming any rights under, any contract, combination, conspiracy, agreement, understanding, plan or program with any other person having the purpose or effect of:

(A) Fixing, determining, establishing, maintaining or stabilizing prices, profit margins, pricing systems, markups, discounts or other terms and conditions of sale for the sale of GE major appliances to any third person;

(B) Collecting, preparing, publishing, distributing or disseminating prices or price lists among themselves for GE major appliances;

(C) Boycotting or threatening to boycott, or otherwise refusing or threatening to refuse to deal with any dealer or other person in connection with the sale or distribution of GE major appliances;

(D) Hindering, restricting, limiting or preventing any dealer or other person from purchasing or selling GE major appliances.

V

[Permissive Provisions—Selection of Customers]

(A) Subject to the provisions of Section IV, Commercial may exercise its right to choose and select its dealers and to offer suggested resale prices for GE major appliances to its dealers, regardless of whether such prices are originally determined by General Electric or Commercial, and to terminate the franchise of such dealers, and such choosing, selecting, or termination, standing alone, shall not be considered a violation of Section IV. Provided, however, that Commercial is enjoined and restrained from terminating the franchise of any dealer or refusing to sell GE major appliances to any dealer or other person who does not observe or agree to observe or adhere to or who has failed to adhere to prices suggested by Commercial or by any other person for the sale of GE major appliances, and Commercial is further enjoined and restrained from exercising any form of coercion of any of its franchise dealers through the threat, expressed or implied, of loss of franchise for failure to adhere to or abide by prices suggested by Commercial.

(B) Nothing in this Final Judgment shall be construed:

(1) To prevent any defendant from exercising any rights it may have pursuant to the Act of Congress of August 17, 1937, commonly called the Miller-Tydings Act, or the Act of Congress of July 14, 1952, commonly called the McGuire Act;

(2) To prevent any defendant dealer from unilaterally exercising his or its right to select distributors, dealers, consumers, or other persons with whom he or it will deal.

VI

[Enforcement and Compliance]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice, shall, on written request of the Attorney General, or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to any defendant, made to its principal office, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege, (A) reasonable access, during the office hours of such defendant, to all books, ledgers, accounts, minutes, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of such defendant, relating to any matters contained in this Final Judgment, and (B), subject to the reasonable convenience of such defendant, and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers and employees of such defendant, who may have counsel present, regarding any such matters. Upon such written request the defendant shall submit such reports in writing with respect to any of the matters contained in this Final Judgment as from time to time may be necessary for the purpose of enforcement of this Final Judgment. No information obtained by the means provided in this Section VI shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Executive Branch of the plaintiff, except, in the course of legal proceedings in which the United States is a party, for the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment or as otherwise required by law.

VII

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this Final Judgment to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this Final Judgment, for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, for the enforcement of compliance therewith and for the punishment of violations thereof.

In the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Civil Action No. 4056-54. Dated June 4, 1959.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages and Injunctive Relief —Where Suit May Be Brought—Proper Judicial District—Corporation "Transacting Business" in District.—It was properly held that a railroad was "transacting business" in the District of Columbia within the meaning of Section 12 of the Clayton Act where, in addition to the solicitation of business and the attendance of various meetings by the defendant's representatives, there was, on two occasions, a joint operation of the defendant and other railroads into the District. Those joint operations were sporadic and, standing alone, they might not have been sufficient. However, all of the elements taken together, in the aggregate, constituted the transaction of business. The United States Supreme Court has held that the phrase "transacting business," as used in the Clayton Act, is a broader and looser concept than the phrase "doing business" in some of the other statutes.

Memorandum

[Venue—"Transacting Business"]

JOHN J. SIRICA, District Judge [In full text]: On December 9, 1954, Judge Alexander Holtzoff heard oral argument in connection with a motion filed by the defendant Reading Company to dismiss the action on the ground of improper venue. This motion was heard by him on the facts as presented by Reading Company's affidavits and by its answers to plaintiff's interrogatories, and after full oral argument he denied the motion in an oral opinion from the Bench, which is found on pages 21 and 22 of the transcript of proceedings for that day. Said opinion reads as follows:

"The Court: It seems to the Court that the case of this defendant is to be differentiated from the cases of the other defendants whose motions have so far been granted. Here, in addition to solicitation of business, and in addition to visits of representatives of the defendant to attend meetings of trade associations and similar organizations on two occasions in 1954 there was a joint operation of the defendant and other railroads into the District of Columbia. The Court appreciates that those two joint operations were sporadic and standing alone they might not be sufficient to constitute transaction of business in the District of Columbia. But all of the elements taken together, in the aggregate, in the opinion of this Court, constitute the transaction of business in the District of Columbia, bearing in mind the fact that the Supreme Court has held that the words 'transacting business', as used in the Clayton Act, are a broader and looser concept than the phrase 'doing business' in some of the other statutes.

"This motion will be denied."

[Separate Trial on Issue of Venue]

Thereafter, on October 19, 1956, Judge Henry Schweinhaut filed in this cause the following order:

"The defendant, Reading Company (No. 68), having moved, pursuant to Rule 42(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, for a separate trial on the issue of venue, and the Court having considered fully the points and authorities filed by the plaintiff and by the Reading Company, and it appearing to the Court that the granting of said motion would further the convenience of the Court, as well as other parties to this proceeding, and also would avoid prejudicing the Reading Company, it is this 18th day of October, 1956,

"Ordered: That the Reading Company be, and it hereby is, granted a separate trial on the issue of whether venue is properly laid in the District of Columbia with respect to said defendant."

[Defense Stricken]

Rule 12(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, provided as follows:

"Motion to Strike. Upon motion made by a party before responding to a pleading or, if no responsive pleading is permitted by these rules, upon motion made by a party within 20 days after the service of the pleading upon him or upon the court's own initiative at any time, the court may order stricken from any pleading any insufficient defense or any redundant, immaterial, impertinent, or scandalous matter."

The Court has carefully considered the oral argument presented by respective parties before Judge Holtzoff on December 9, 1954 and his opinion in connection therewith, and the memoranda of points and authorities submitted by the parties in connection with this motion, and all other matters of record in this case. The Court is of the opinion that Judge Holtzoff ruled properly in this case and, therefore, the order heretofore referred to entered by Judge Schweinhaut is set aside. By virtue of Rule 12(f), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the Court order that the Twelfth Defense of the answer of defendant Reading Company filed on February 14, 1955 be stricken.

In the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. Civil Action No. 58-78-S. Dated April 2, 1958.

Clayton and Sherman Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Striking Irrelevant or Prejudicial Matters—Prior Government Case.—Allegations of a treble damage action complaint referring to a nationwide conspiracy and describing a Government antitrust case, which was terminated by the entry of a consent decree, were stricken. The instant case involved nothing more than an alleged local conspiracy and the Government case could have no possible relevance, while reference to it could be prejudicial to the defendants.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.595.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Motion for More Definite Statement—"Co-conspirators."—Where a complaint purported to define the expression "co-conspirators" and listed the names of ten corporations engaged in the exhibition of motion pictures, the defendants were entitled to know the relationship of these corporations to the defendants, the theatres operated by the corporations, and where the theatres were operated.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.170.

For the plaintiff: Peabody, Kaufman & Brewer, by Phil David Fine and John M. Kahn, Boston, Mass.

For the defendants: Nutter, McClennen & Fish, by Robert W. Meserve and John R. Hally, Boston, Mass.

Memorandum

SWEENEY, Chief Judge [In full text]: This is a treble damage action under the antitrust laws. The defendants move to strike certain paragraphs of the complaint and for a more definite statement.

The plaintiff owns and operates the Winchester Theatre near Boston and the defendants are distributors of motion pictures.

[Motion to Strike]

Paragraph 9 of the complaint refers to a nationwide conspiracy and describes the Paramount case, U. S. v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., et al., which was terminated by the entry of a consent decree. The instant case clearly involves nothing more than an alleged local conspiracy and the Paramount case can have no possible relevance, while reference to it may be very prejudicial to the defendants. The motion to strike Paragraph 9 is, therefore, allowed.

The defendants move also to strike all references to "subsidiaries, affiliates, and successors" in paragraphs 4-7. This expression is entirely too general and ambiguous, Reade's Theatres v. Loew's, Inc., S. D. N. Y. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,776], 20 F. R. D. 579, and the motion to strike it is allowed with leave to the plaintiff to amend the complaint at any time by naming the "subsidiaries, affiliates, and successors."

[Motion for More Definite Statement]

The defendants' motion for a more definite statement is directed to three paragraphs of the complaint.

Paragraph 5 alleges that the distributor defendants Warner's, Loew's and Universal are "defendant exhibitors" and that they operated theaters in several towns near Boston. The defendants argue that they are unable to frame an intelligent answer to these allegations since they are not true. If that be so, however, the defendants are in a motion [position] to answer by denying these allegations. The motion for a more definite statement is denied insofar as it is directed to paragraph 5.

Paragraph 6 purports to define the expression "co-conspirators" and lists the names of ten corporations engaged in the exhibition of motion pictures. The defendant is entitled to know their relationship to the defendants and which theatres the corporations operate and where. The motion for a more definite statement is allowed.

Paragraph 10 sets out the offenses complained of and I find that the allegations of paragraph 10 are sufficiently specific to permit the defendants to frame an answer thereto.

[Rulings]

In summary, the motion to strike is allowed in toto. The motion for a more definite statement is allowed with respect to paragraph 6 of the complaint. Insofar as it is directed to paragraphs 5 and 10, it is denied.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Intervention After Judgment—Timeliness of Motion to Intervene.—A petition for intervention in a motion picture exhibitor's action against certain distributors was denied on the ground that the application for intervention was not "timely." The petition, which was filed after a decree had been entered in favor of the plaintiff, and after an appeal had been dismissed pursuant to an "amicable settlement," alleged that "the action of the defendants subsequent to the Court's decree was hurting them and prejudicial to their rights." Intervention after judgment is unusual and not often granted. Here, the court considered not only the time element, but also the circumstances contributing to the delay. Several years had elapsed after the commencement of the suit, the suit was well known to all of the interveners, and the court saw no reason why they could not have sought intervention much earlier. Thus, the applicants for intervention had, in effect, "slept on their rights." The court also noted that it had already taken steps, by its decree, to eliminate the unlawful situation that it found; that no property was being distributed in which the interveners were interested; and that the interveners were not, despite their protestations, "bound by any judgment of this Court."

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.535.

Opinion

[Conspiracy Action—Intervention]

John W. McIlvaine, District Judge [In full text]: In this case the plaintiff, Basle Theatres, Inc., filed its complaint and prosecuted its action against the defendants in which it claimed that they had engaged in a conspiracy in restraint of trade. This Court found that all the defendants except one here engaged in the conspiracy, and it entered what it deemed an appropriate decree. The defendants appealed to the United States Court of Appeals, but while the appeal was pending the plaintiff and the defendants reached an amicable settlement and dismissed the appeal. Thereafter the interveners filed their petition to intervene alleging that the action of the defendants subsequent to the Court's decree was hurting them and prejudicial to their rights. It is significant to note at this point that the principal law suit was well-known to all of the interveners. The case was well publicized in the trade, and the trial lasted over a considerable length of time during which many interested people were present, many of course merely as spectators, but there is no doubt in the Court's mind that those who seek to intervene knew of the pendency of the suit.

[Timeliness of Application]

Before intervention may be had either as a right or permissively, there must be timely application; therefore, the first question that we must determine is whether there was timely application for intervention. Timeliness, of course, does not depend solely on the amount of time that has elapsed since the institution of the action, and in this case it was several years. While intervention has been allowed several years after commencement of a suit, it is in those cases allowed when substantial litigation has not taken place. Where there is substantial litigation, tardy intervention will usually be denied. Intervention after judgment is unusual and not often granted. See Vol. 4, Moore's Federal Practice, § 24.13.

[Decree—Interveners Not Bound]

The interveners here are not despite their protestations bound by any judgment of this Court. The effect of the Court's decree was to order the defendants to cease from their conspiracy and to make their decisions on clearances independently within the broad area set out by the Court's decree.

[Discretion of Court]

Rule 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is silent as to what constitutes timely application, and the question must be answered in each case by the exercise of sound discretion by the trial court. See Vol. 7, Cyclopedia of Federal Practice, § 24.31.

[No Absolute Right of Intervention]

Under the circumstances involved here, we do not think that the application for intervention is timely. In exercising our discretion in this matter, we have considered not only the time element itself, but also the circumstances contributing to the delay. In that regard we might say we do not see any reason why these interveners could not have sought intervention much earlier. The Court should also consider the state of the cause. That is, as we have pointed out, the case has been concluded; a decree entered; and the parties have reached an amicable settlement and dismissed their appeal. The applicants for intervention here have in effect slept on their rights, and now they want this Court in effect to administer the motion picture industry in the distribution of motion pictures in Western Pennsylvania. We do not feel that this is a function of a district court. There is no absolute right of intervention in this case. First, because the application is not timely; and, of course, there is no statute of the United States confirming an unconditional right to intervene. Those seeking to intervene are not parties who have anyone inadequately representing an interest of theirs, and there is no property being distributed by the Court in which they are interested.

[Permissive Intervention]

As to whether there should be permissive intervention, here again we do not feel their application is timely. There is no statute conferring a right upon them to intervene and, of course, the case has been tried to its conclusion; a decree entered; and the original parties to the case have reached an amicable settlement of their differences; and the Court by its decree has taken steps to eliminate the unlawful situation that it found.

If these interveners feel that there is still an unlawful conspiracy being engaged in by these defendants, they being represented by competent counsel surely know how to proceed against any one engaging in an unlawful conspiracy.

[Intervention Denied]

Therefore, their motion to intervene should be and hereby is denied.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Sentences—Corporate Officer's Antitrust Fine Paid by Corporation—Stockholder's Derivative Action Against Officer.—A corporate stockholder, in a derivative action seeking to recover from the corporation's former president an antitrust fine of $75,000 which the corporation had paid on behalf of that officer, was required to post security under a statute providing for such posting where there is "no reasonable probability that the prosecution of the cause of action . . . will benefit the corporation or its security holders." In its ruling, the court noted that "the explanation presented by the defendants with respect to the payment of the * * * fine—following his change of plea from not guilty to nolo contendere—place the action within the doctrine enunciated in McQuillen v. National Cash Register Co., 112 F. 2d 877; cf. Simon v. Socony Vacuum Oil Co., 179 Misc. 202, 38 NYS 2d 270." The court also noted that the corporation received consideration from the officer in return for its payment of his fine.

[Payment of Officer's Antitrust Fine]

The second cause seeks to recover $75,000 paid by Safeway on behalf of Warren, its former president, who was fined this sum in a criminal anti-trust action at Fort Worth.

[Nolo Contendere Plea—"Consideration"]

The explanation presented by defendants with respect to the payment of the Warren fine—following his change of plea from not guilty to nolo contendere—place the action within the doctrine enunciated in McQuillen v. National Cash Register Co., 112 F. 2d 877; cf. Simon v. Socony Vacuum Oil Co., 179 Misc. 202, 38 NYS 2d 270. Safeway received consideration from Warren in return for its payment of his fine.

[Motions Granted]

Accordingly, It Is Ordered that defendants' motions requiring plaintiff to post security be, and the same hereby are granted, in the amount of $100,000.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil No. 137-376. Filed September 3, 1959.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Production of Evidence—Depositions—Cross-examination of Witness in Prior Government Action as "Substitute" for Taking of Deposition.—A laundry corporation, in a private action charging it with antitrust violations, was denied a motion to take the deposition of the plaintiff through an individual who was "the prosecution's chief witness" in a prior Government antitrust action against the same defendants. The court, noting the incorrectness of defense counsel's statement that the court's holding was "that cross-examination of a witness in a prior action, either criminal or civil, is an adequate substitute for the broad examination permitted under Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure," observed that the exercise of its discretion in denying the motion was based upon the fact that, with respect to the antitrust charges against the defendants, the plaintiff's position had been clearly exposed through the prior examination of that witness. The fact that counsel now representing the defendants did not participate in the criminal trial, and the suggestion that, if they had, a different and perhaps more extensive cross-examination of that witness would have been conducted, was not persuasive.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.775.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Discovery—Documents in Possession of Government—Inquiry As to Existence or Nonexistence of Documents—Identity or Location of Persons With Knowledge of Facts.—In a private antitrust action, the court's order for discovery and inspection included documents and records in the possession of the plaintiffs or their agents, and documents and records in the possession of the United States Attorney or any other governmental agency or official. Also, the order could contain provisions specifically permitting inquiry as to the existence or nonexistence of certain documents and records, and inquiry as to the identity or location of any person having knowledge of relevant facts.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.825.

For the plaintiffs: Burton B. Turkus, New York, N. Y.

For the defendants: Rosenman, Goldmark, Colin & Kaye; Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison; Simpson, Thacher & Bartlett; Cahill, Gordon, Reindel & Ohl; and Mervin C. Pollak, all of New York, N. Y.

Memorandum

[Discovery]

Edward Weinfeld, District Judge [In full text]: All documents and records referred to in the affidavit of Justin Colin which he asserts plaintiffs "still' have not produced, whether in the possession of the plaintiffs, their attorneys, accountants, agents or representatives, or the United States Attorney or any other governmental agency or official, are encompassed within the Court's direction for discovery and inspection. In view of the issue which has been raised as to the existence or whereabouts of certain documents or records, the order to be entered herein may contain a specific and appropriate provision permitting inquiry with regard to their existence or nonexistence. The order may also contain a specific provision permitting inquiry as to the identity or location of any person having knowledge of relevant facts. Nothing in the Court's decision warrants a conclusion to the contrary.

[Cross-examination in Prior Trial as "Substitute" for Deposition]

As to other contentions made upon this application for reargument, the fact that counsel now representing the defendants did not participate in the criminal trial, and the suggestion that if they had, a different and perhaps more extensive and thorough cross-examination of Paul Ullman, the prosecution's chief witness, would have been conducted, is not persuasive. The engagement of new counsel by defendants to represent them in this civil action does not change the basis of the Court's disposition of the original motion. The fact is that all defendants herein were defendants in the criminal action, and were there represented by counsel of their own choice who not only conducted a vigorous but, as the record shows, an extensive cross-examination of the chief government witness.

The Court's decision and the exercise of its discretion were based upon the examination of that witness and the clear exposure through him of plaintiffs' position with respect to the antitrust charges against the defendants. It was not intended to foreclose an examination of the plaintiffs by any other officer, director or managing agent or any other person who was not examined as a witness in the criminal prosecution—and the order to be entered may so provide.

In passing, the Court notes that defense counsel's statement that the Court's holding is "that cross-examination of a witness in a prior action, either criminal or civil, is an adequate substitute for the broad examination permitted under Rule 26 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure" is not correct and misinterprets the Court's decision.

[Reargument Granted in Part]

The motion for reargument is granted only to the extent indicated herein and otherwise denied in all respects.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages and Injunctive Relief—Pretrial Procedures—Security for Costs.—In an antitrust action for an injunction and for treble damages in the amount of $18,000,000, the plaintiff was stayed from proceeding further against one of the defendants until it filed a bond for costs in the sum of $500. The rules of the court specified that a non-resident plaintiff, on demand, shall post a $250 bond for costs, unless the court dispenses with the bond or fixes a different amount. In fixing the amount of the bond, the court considered, among other things, the financial condition of the plaintiff and the nature of the claim against this defendant.

Memorandum

[Security for Costs]

Dimock, District Judge [In full text]: Defendant Gimbel Brothers, Inc., has moved, pursuant to Rule 2 of the Civil Rules of this court, for an order requiring plaintiff to give $5,000 security for costs. Plaintiff, a non-resident of New York, brought an action under the anti-trust laws for an injunction and treble damages in the amount of $18,000,000 from Gimbel Brothers, Inc. and eight other defendants.

Since the inception of the suit five of the defendants have made motions for security. Three were awarded $500 each and the other two, who were represented by the same attorney, were awarded $500 jointly. Security in these amounts apparently has been deposited by plaintiff. Plaintiff states that because of defendants' illegal activities which are the subject matter of this suit it is without funds to advance the security requested by Gimbel Brothers, Inc. Plaintiff claims that "even the sum of $500.00, if allowed to each of the defendants individually, would be beyond plaintiff's present financial ability" and would force plaintiff to drop its suit against some of the defendants. Defendant does not deny that it is aware from the prior motions for security that plaintiff is without financial resources to give the $5,000 security. It contends that it is nevertheless entitled to be protected to the extent of the requested security from a harassing $18,000,000 law suit which was brought by a non-resident and which will cost a considerable amount to defend. Its charge that plaintiff's claim is without merit and is being pursued to harass Gimbel Brothers, Inc. is based largely on the uncontradicted affidavit of one of its attorneys that the "almost 2,000 pages of depositions" so far taken in the case contain "not one word of proof linking defendant Gimbel Brothers with the alleged, and apparently nonexistent, conspiracy."

Rule 2(a) makes non-residence of the plaintiff a specific ground for the awarding of security for costs by the following language:

"(a) By non-resident. A plaintiff, who is not a resident of the State of New York, shall file within twenty days after service upon him of a demand therefor, a bond for costs in the sum of $250.00, unless the court, on motion and for cause shown, dispenses with the bond or fixes a different amount. * * *"

On this record plaintiff has certainly not made out a case for departing from the norm and dispensing with security. On the other hand, defendant Gimbel Brothers, Inc. raises a thus far unrebutted inference that the claim against it is based upon the hope that something yet unknown will turn up in the course of the litigation. A defendant in that position is entitled to something more than the norm. A requirement of security in the amount of $500 takes adequate account of plaintiff's plea of poverty.

Plaintiff is, therefore, stayed from proceeding further against Gimbel Brothers, Inc. until such time as it shall have filed a bond for costs in the sum of $500.

So ordered.

[¶ 69,512] Opinion of Attorney General of Nevada.

Opinion of Roger D. Foley, Attorney General, by Ve Noy Christoffersen, Special Deputy Attorney General for the Nevada State Dairy Commission. Opinion No. 104, October 12, 1959. Requested by Clarence Cassady, Secretary of Nevada State Dairy Commission.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Practices—Boycotts—State Regulation Requiring Milk Distributors to Withhold Credit from Certain Wholesalers—Legality of Regulation Under Federal Law.—A regulation promulgated by the Nevada State Dairy Commission which provided that the commission, when notified that any wholesaler has failed to pay for a "delivery" within 15 days, will direct all distributors in a certain market area to "place the said wholesale customer on a cash basis," did not amount to a secondary boycott in contravention of certain Federal statutes. A boycott, which is a form of conspiracy, requires, as an essential element, an "intent to injure." Here, there was no such conspiracy because the distributors, in concertedly withholding credit from a wholesaler, would be acting in concert "in order to conform to a State law or regulation."

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.533.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

[Price Discrimination—Dairy Industry]

There is at present, listed under the Unfair Trade Practices Section of the Stabilization and Marketing Plan of the Nevada State Dairy Commission, two regulations upon which you have asked that the question of their legality be given an opinion by this office. The two regulations are listed as sub-sections c. and d. and are worded as follows:

(c) "Within the boundaries of the Southern Nevada marketing area the granting of an extension or receiving of credit beyond the period of fiifteen (15) days from the date of delivery of any milk, cream, or dairy by-product. Such period of credit extension for any delivery shall be computed from the first date of delivery not previously paid. The giving of any promissory note does not constitute payment within the meaning of this section."

(d) "Within the boundaries of the Southern Nevada marketing area a distributor shall immediately place upon a cash basis any wholesale customer who has failed to pay for any delivery within fifteen (15) days after delivery, or is in default for fifteen (15) days in any other obligation to such distributor, and shall immediately notify the dairy Commission, in writing, of the name of said wholesale customer whereupon the Dairy Commission will notify all other distributors to place the said wholesale customer on a cash basis."

QUESTION

["Boycotts" Under Federal Law]

The question of the legality of these two regulations raises four questions:

4. Do the regulations amount to a secondary boycott and therefore are in contravention of certain Federal statutes?

CONCLUSION

[Concerted Action in Compliance with State Law]

4. The regulations above listed are not in contravention of Federal statutes prohibiting secondary boycott in that a secondary boycott is a form of conspiracy which is absent in the case where the distributors are acting in concert on application of credit in order to conform to a State law or regulation.

ANALYSIS

[Absence of "Intent to Injure"]

4. The question arising as to whether these rules amount to a secondary boycott and therefore are in contravention of certain Federal statutes, has been given serious consideration and investigation. The opinion insofar as a violation of any certain Federal Statute is concerned, is that these rules do not constitute a secondary boycott. A boycott is a form of conspiracy and the following opinions aptly cover the situation here:

In Bedford Cut Stone Co., v. Journeymen S. C. Assn., 274 U. S. 37, the Supreme Court approves the following:

> "An act which lawfully might be done by one may when done by many acting in concert take on the form of a conspiracy and become a public wrong and may be prohibited if the result is hurtful to the public or to individuals against whom such concerted action is directed."

And again we find the following holding applicable to this situation,

> "An essential element of a boycott is intent to injure." Oxley Stove Co. v. Coopers International Union, 72 Fed. 695.
> "It must appear that the means used are threatening and intended to overcome the will of others, and to compel them to do or refrain from doing that which they would not otherwise do." Meier v. Speer (Ark.), 132 S. W. 988.

[No Conspiracy]

It is therefore apparent under the above holdings and definitions that these rules do not and cannot be construed as a boycott or conspiracy in any form.

Fair Trade—Enforcement—Contempt—Plaintiff's Delay in Bringing Case to Trial as Bar to Contempt.—A plaintiff which had not moved in any way to proceed with the trial of a fair trade case for more than a year after the entry of a temporary injunction is denied a motion to punish the defendant for contempt for alleged sales below fair trade prices. The matter should be tried and disposed of after evidence has been heard and the defendant afforded the right of cross-examination.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3380.34.

[Contempt—Delay in Bringing Case to Trial]

CONLON, Justice [In full text]: Motion to punish the defendant for contempt for violation of a temporary injunction in a fair trade case is denied. It appears that the injunction was granted in October of 1958 and the order signed on November 12, 1958. It does not appear that plaintiff has moved in any way to proceed with the trial of the case. In fact it did not even file the bond required until October 5 of this year. In these circumstances, the court believes that the defendant should not be punished for contempt for alleged sales made to shoppers. The matter should be tried and disposed of finally after evidence has been heard and the defendant afforded the right of cross-examination. Settle order providing for an early trial.

Memorandum
[Motions to Compel Answers and for Discovery]

MURPHY, District Judge [In full text]: These are motions by defendants to compel Edward Roberts, Treasurer of the plaintiff to answer certain questions propounded during his deposition and, for discovery and inspection. By agreement between the parties, the only issues left for resolution by the court relate to questions numbered 10, 17 and 18 on the deposition and items 6 and 9 on the motion for discovery.

Question numbered 10 reads "Q. Do you know what the cost was of the building?" How the cost of a building owned and constructed by another corporation unrelated to plaintiff and in which the plaintiff is a tenant is relevant to the subject matter of the action, escapes us, and the objection is sustained.

Question numbered 17 reads "Q. Do you sell any textile mills? What textile mills do you sell?" This relates to item #6 sought to be discovered and will be treated hereafter in the discussion of that item.

Question numbered 18 reads "I wish you would state for me, please, all the reasons that you know why you believe that Empire should be entitled to a jobber's status?" Plaintiff, on oral argument and in its affidavit and its brief, has now abandoned its first cause of action under Sec. 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U. S. C. 13(a)). While it is true that neither the affidavit nor the brief unequivocally withdraw that cause of action, we will treat it as effectively withdrawn, requiring only that plaintiff's counsel reduce such withdrawal to the form of a letter to opposing counsel.

With the first cause of action no longer in suit, question 18 becomes irrelevant.

[Right to Sales Information—Customers' Names]

Item 6 and question 17 are bottomed on the premise that defendants have a right in pre-trial to learn the names of plaintiff's customers, particularly its customers of unprocessed yarn sold in the original containers. Defendants rely on three cases for support: Idle Wild Farm, Inc. v. W. R. Grace & Company [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,053], 22 F. R. D. 334 (S. D. N. Y. 1958); Avon Linen Service, Inc. v. Gratenstein, 16 F. R. D. 469 (D. Conn. 1953); Shawmut, Inc. v. American Viscose Corp. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,844], 11 F. R. D. 562 (S. D. N. Y. 1951).

These cases are not apposite to our case in its present posture. We are of the opinion that defendants are not now entitled to such names although the basic information relative to sales by plaintiff in the original package is discoverable. In other words, with the exception of using code names for the customers, item 6 should in all other respects be granted. Plaintiff's brief indicates no objection to this method of disclosure.

Item 9 relates to plaintiff's purchases of rayon yarn, and that item should properly be granted.

On the argument, plaintiff orally moved for discovery of defendants' customers. We are not clear whether it presses such oral motion in the light of our present disposition or whether it was contingent upon defendants' success with respect to item 6 and question 17. It would appear, however, that plaintiff should be entitled to get a fairly good sampling of the defendants' customers, since the defenses that are raised make their identity and the business that they do quite relevant. Cf. Shawmut, Inc. v. American Viscose Corp., supra.

Accordingly, the defendants' motion to compel answers to questions 10, 17 and 18 is denied, and their motion for discovery and inspection is granted as to item 6, the plaintiff being free to codify the customers' names and addresses. Their motion for discovery and inspection of item 9 is granted. Plaintiff's cross-motion to amend is granted without opposition, with the proviso that the cut-off date of October 1, 1959 be the outside date for supplemental damages.

This is an order, no settlement is necessary.

[Authenticity of Documents—Admissions]

JOHN M. CASHIN, District Judge [In full text]: I will first dispose of the Government's motion which was argued on October 19, 1959, which sought an order, pursuant to Rules 36 and 37 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, that—

(1) the authenticity of all documents, which were the subject matter of the Government's request for admissions dated September 11, 1959, be deemed admitted; or

(2) that the defendants Longines and Wittnauer give further answers to said request, unequivocally admitting or denying the authenticity of the documents; or

(3) that the defendants Longines and Wittnauer be assessed at this time with the prospective costs of proving the authenticity of the documents not admitted.

I find myself constrained to deny the motion of the Government in its entirety. While it is true that there is some authority for ordering further answers to requests for admissions of genuineness of documents, I do not believe that this is the proper case for the exercise of such authority, even if it does exist. On the basis of information presently before the court, except for certain oversights which defendants Longines and Wittnauer have agreed to correct, all documents, whose authenticity is reasonably susceptible of knowledge on the part of Longines and Wittnauer, have been admitted.

Thus, the Government must prepare for trial by the ordinary methods, and must prove the authenticity of the documents it intends to rely upon under the usual rules of evidence. Of course, it may be shown at a subsequent time, most probably at or after the trial of the action, that there were no good reasons for the denial by Longines and Wittnauer of the authenticity of the documents, and that the use of the documents was of substantial importance. In that event, of course, the sanction provided for in Rule 37(c) would be invoked, that is, Longines and Wittnauer would be required to pay to the Government the reasonable expenses incurred in making proof of the authenticity, including reasonable attorneys' fees. Be that as it may, there is no course presently open to me but to deny the Government's motion except insofar as it refers to the documents whose authenticity has been denied by the affected defendants through oversight.

The parties may settle an order in accordance with this ruling.

In the California District Court of Appeal for the Second District, Division Two. Civil No. 23770. Dated July 17, 1959.

Appeal from an order of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County granting a preliminary injunction. JOHN J. FORD, Judge. Affirmed.

California Contracts in Restraint of Trade Law

Combinations and Conspiracies—State Laws—Contract Not To Solicit Customers of Lessor—Confidential Information.—A lease of an industrial catering route, which forbade the lessee from soliciting customers on the route for a year after the termination of the lease, was not a contract in restraint of trade under Section 16600 of the California Business and Professions Code. There was no promise or agreement by the lessee that, after the termination of the lease, he would not engage in any profession, trade, or business. The lease merely provided that he would not solicit those customers made known to him in confidence.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2319.05.

For the appellant: Maurice Rose.

For the respondent: Sweeney, Irwin & Foye, and William R. Sweeney.

[Alleged Restrictive Agreement]

FOX, Presiding Justice [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: Plaintiff, proprietor of a catering route in the industrial area of Los Angeles, leased the same, together with a truck with which to operate it, to defendant. Upon plaintiff's terminating defendant's lease the latter procured other equipment and immediately resumed serving the employees of the plants where he had previously stopped. Plaintiff sought to enjoin defendant's activities. A preliminary injunction was granted. Defendant has appealed.

Plaintiff is engaged in the industrial catering business, which is carried on by vending food and drinks from trucks to the employees of industrial plants as they go in to work, at coffee breaks and at lunch time. Stops are scheduled at various plants to coincide with these periods.

Plaintiff acquired the initial stops on the route in question by purchase from George W. McAttee, Jr., for $1,475. Plaintiff added other stops by hiring a route supervisor who solicited, secured and serviced such new locations.

On July 15, 1957, plaintiff leased the route and truck for its operation to defendant. In accordance with the terms of the agreement defendant received from plaintiff a route list showing the names and addresses of certain industrial concerns that he was to service, the place at which he was to park in order to serve the employees of the particular plant, the time he was due to arrive at each place, the time allocated for each stop, his departure time and the number of employees of each company. These stops were arranged in sequence in point of time. Two or three were added subsequent to July 15, 1957. The agreement between the parties provided, inter alia, that concurrently with the execution thereof and delivery of the route list, the lessor-plaintiff, was "disclosing to lessee [defendant] all pertinent confidential information concerning the type, nature, and amount of food and sundries purchased by customers at each stop"; and "that said Lunch Route and identity of customer stops is conclusively regarded by lessor and lessee to be and is, as between them, a trade secret." The agreement further provided that upon termination of the agreement lessee would not solicit any of the customers on the route for a period of one year. The lease was on a month to month basis but might be terminated by either party at any time for cause.

[Legality]

Defendant's argument that his contract with plaintiff violated section 16600, Business and Professions Code, is without merit. Under this section, "a contract by which anyone is restrained from engaging in a lawful profession, trade or business of any kind is to that extent void." In the instant case there is no promise or agreement by the defendant that, after the termination of the contract, he would not engage in any profession, trade, or business. The contract merely provided that defendant would not solicit those customers made known to him in confidence. Such an agreement is not rendered invalid by section 16600. The following language in Gordon v. Wasserman [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,814], 153 Cal. App. 2d 328, 330, is apposite: "It clearly appears by the terms of the contract that it does not prevent defendant from carrying on a weekly credit, or any other business. He covenants not to use plaintiffs' confidential lists to solicit customers for himself. Similar covenants have been held valid and enforceable. . . ." This principle was reaffirmed in Gordon v. Landau, 49 Cal. 2d 690, 694.

The order is affirmed.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Venue—Foreign Corporation—Transacting Business—Volume of Business as Test—Advertising—"Good Will" Tours.—A Connecticut corporation which had not been "domesticated" in Pennsylvania, and did not solicit orders through salesmen there, was nevertheless "transacting business" there within the meaning of Section 12 of the Clayton Act. The volume of business done in a state has frequently been the controlling factor in determining venue, but it is not the sole test. Here, the corporation's 1957 sales in the District amounted to $12,018, or 1.90 per cent of its total sales. For the first five months in 1958, its sales in the District amounted to $2,335, or 1.37 per cent of its total sales. In addition, it circularized the trade generally by mailing catalogues, mail circulars, and letters into the District, and advertised in magazines having a circulation there. Further, two "good will" tours in the District by one of its officers and other employees could have had only one purpose, namely, to increase sales. Thus, from the average businessman's point of view, the activities of the corporation constituted the transaction of business in the District.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Proper Judicial District—Test for Venue—Transacting Business—Non-Profit Corporation (Rifle Association)—Publication of Magazine—Advertisements.—In a treble damage action commenced in a Federal District Court sitting in Pennsylvania, venue was improper as to a non-profit rifle association incorporated in New York with offices in Washington, D. C. The test for venue, under Section 12 of the Clayton Act, is the "practical, everyday business or commercial concept of doing or carrying on business 'of any substantial character.'" Here, the organization was non-business in character; its purposes, among others, was to promote the national defense and proficiency in the handling of small arms. It had no offices, employees, or agents in Pennsylvania and was not certified to do business in that or any other state. The organization's official journal, a magazine published in Washington, D. C., was sent to members in Pennsylvania, and was sold to Pennsylvania sporting goods dealers on written orders received in Washington, D. C. However, the magazine was provided as an incident to membership in the organization, and its publication was not the organization's chief business. Further, the fact that persons from Pennsylvania placed classified advertising in the magazine did not alter the picture. Probably the strongest argument against the claim that the magazine was commercial in nature was the fact two Congressional Acts had accorded "recognition" to the organization.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9008.210.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Service of Process—"Registered" Foreign Corporation—Failure to Report Change of Address—Service on Warehouse Supervisor.—A New York corporation qualified to do business in Pennsylvania was properly served with process where the Deputy Marshal, finding the corporation's offices were no longer at its registered address, served a "supervisor" in charge of its warehouse at another address. In registering, the corporation had appointed the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania as its statutory agent for the service of process, and service on that officer would have been the simplest, best, and most proper method. However, it was not the exclusive method. The corporation, having changed its registered office address without noting that change in the Office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, was in direct violation of the Pennsylvania Corporation Law and could not profit by its own dereliction. Further, the corporation's president, in an affidavit asserting that the individual served was not its "managing agent," stated that the individual supervised the operation of the corporation's warehouse. Therefore, it followed that the corporation had a place of business in Pennsylvania, and that the individual in question was in charge of it.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9008.350.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Who May Bring Suit—Capacity to Sue—Partnership's Failure to Register "Fictitious Name" Prior to Institution of Suit—Federal Claim as Contrasted with Diversity Case.—A partnership, by reason of its failure to register its "fictitious name" and pay a $25 license fee or fine to the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, as required by a local statute, was not lacking in capacity to bring a treble damage antitrust action in a Federal District Court. The case was not a "diversity" action, but was founded exclusively on a Federal statute, namely, the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts. Therefore, the court was not sitting as a state court. In such a situation, the limitations upon the courts of a state do not control a Federal court sitting in that state.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9005, 9005.40.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Motion to Dismiss—Commingled Causes of Action—Two Claims Stated in Single Count.—A complaint charging, in a single count, that a publishing company and others violated Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act by conspiring to exclude a partnership and other "off-list" dealers from handling gun "scopes," binoculars, and gun accessories, for the purpose of maintaining the price of scopes, did not improperly commingle causes of action. It was contended that the complaint stated two separate and distinct causes of action in a single count in disregard of Rule 10(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. In summarily disposing of the motion to dismiss, the court noted that "the gist of this action is a single conspiracy."

For the plaintiff: McNees, Wallace & Nurick, Harrisburg, Pa.

For the defendants: Nauman, Smith, Shissler & Hall, Harrisburg, Pa., for Popular Science Publishing Co., Inc.; Whiteford, Hart, Carmody & Wilson, Washington, D. C., and Carl F. Chronister, Harrisburg, Pa., for National Rifle Assn. of America; and Stock and Leader, York, Pa., for Lyman Gun Sight Corp.

[Treble Damage Action]

FREDERICK V. FOLLMER, District Judge [In full text]: This is a private antitrust action for treble damages under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. §§ 1 and 2) and Section 12 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. § 22).

[Parties]

It appears from the complaint that the plaintiff, S. A. Wentling, is a partnership composed of Stanley A. Wentling and F. Robert Kreider, with its principal place of business at Palmyra, Lebanon County, in the Middle Judicial District of Pennsylvania; that the defendants herein involved are

(a) Popular Science Publishing Company, Inc. (hereinafter referred to as "Popular Science"), a New York corporation with its principal place of business in New York City, also qualified to do business in Pennsylvania, with its principal registered office in Pennsylvania located at 400 Wyoming Avenue, Scranton.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

(b) National Rifle Association of America (hereinafter referred to as "National"), a New York corporation with its principal office in Washington, D. C.

(c) Lyman Gun Sight Corporation (hereinafter referred to as "Lyman"), a Connecticut corporation with its principal office and place of business at Middlefield, Connecticut.

Action against John Unertl, trading as John Unertl Optical Co., was dismissed by Order of Court on Stipulation of Counsel.

Counsel for plaintiff and Henry Holt and Company, Inc., stipulated that Holt would not be required to answer or further plead until the motions hereinafter referred to were disposed of.

[Motions]

The matter is presently before the Court on

(a) Motion of National to dismiss the action as to it because of improper venue.

(b) Motion of Lyman to dismiss complaint as to it because of improper venue.

(c) Motion of Popular Science to quash the summons and dismiss the complaint as to it because

(1) Improper Service

(2) Because of plaintiff's failure to register under Pennsylvania Fictitious Name Act, plaintiff has no capacity to maintain this action.

(3) Complaint fails to state a cause of action upon which relief may be granted.

(4) Complaint states two separate and distinct causes of action in a single count in disregard of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure No. 10(b).

(5) Complaint fails to state sufficient facts to establish defendant's involvement in any conspiracy as to plaintiff, that plaintiff was injured by defendant, or that any of alleged injuries or damages were caused by defendant.

In the alternative, Popular Science moves for more specific statement.

In the further alternative, Popular Science moves to strike certain alleged scandalous and impertinent statements.

[Conspiracy Charged]

The unverified complaint alleges, inter alia, that plaintiff is a partnership, engaged as a dealer, jobber and distributor of gun scopes, binoculars, guns and various gun accessories, such business being substantially a mail order distribution of such products from its principal place of business located at Palmyra, Lebanon County, Pennsylvania; that beginning about 1950 and continuing through 1956 defendants and others named therein as coconspirators knowingly have entered into and engaged in an unlawful combination and conspiracy, carried out in part within this district, to eliminate and exclude plaintiff and other off-list dealers from engaging in the purchase and sale of scopes, binoculars, and gun accessories for the purpose of stabilizing and maintaining prices of scopes, which combination and conspiracy was in restraint of the therein described trade and commerce among the several states in violation of the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

[Venue]

The applicable venue section of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. § 22) provides in pertinent part as follows:

> "Any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found."

As to National Rifle Association of America

[Non-profit Organization]

Attached to National's motion to dismiss was the affidavit of Frank C. Daniel, its Secretary, to which is attached copy of charter and amendment thereto.

National was incorporated in 1871 in the State of New York, pursuant to Act of April 11, 1865, entitled "An Act for the Incorporation of Societies or Clubs, for certain Social and recreative purposes." It is a nonprofit, nonbusiness, nonstock organization supported by membership dues. Its original objects or purposes are the "improvement of its members in markmanship, and to promote the introduction of the system of aiming drill and rifle practice as part of the military drill of the National Guard of this and other states, and for those purposes, to provide a suitable range or ranges in the vicinity of the City of New York." The charter was amended in 1956 in order to add the following purposes to those stated originally:

"And to promote social welfare and public safety, law and order, and the national defense; to educate and train citizens of good repute in the safe and efficient handling of small arms, and in the technique of design, production and group instruction; to increase the knowledge of small arms and promote efficiency in the use of such arms on the part of members of law enforcement agencies, of the armed forces, and of citizens who would be subject to service in the event of war; and generally to encourage the lawful membership and use of small arms by citizens of good repute."

Defendant's offices are located in Washington, D. C. It has no offices, employees or agents in Pennsylvania, nor has it ever applied for or been required to apply for a Certificate of Authority to do business in Pennsylvania, or any other state, territory or district.

As of December 31, 1957, defendant had some 313,967 individual and 7,644 organization members. Each member of defendant, as a privilege of membership, is entitled to receive the official monthly journal of defendant, "The American Rifleman," which is published and printed in the District of Columbia and is mailed monthly to each member from Washington, D. C. For the month ending December 31, 1957, defendant mailed some 23,035 copies of its journal to addresses in Pennsylvania, of this amount 21,246 copies were mailed to members, 119 copies were mailed to nonmembers (consisting mainly of persons who have sent in the full dues but who have not completed all of the requirements for active membership, a few libraries, and several military units), and some 1,670 copies were mailed to approximately 165 sporting goods dealers for an average of approximately ten copies each. The copies mailed to sporting goods dealers are purchased by them at Washington, D. C., on the basis of written orders received in and accepted in Washington, D. C. These dealers pay defendant twenty-five cents per copy and are free to dispose of the copies as they see fit. The purpose of these sales is to encourage interest in the defendant on the part of the dealers and their customers.

Plaintiff then filed an affidavit, the sole purpose of which was to place in the record a copy of defendant's magazine for October 1958, which it claims is the primary source of the present controversy.

Defendant filed a reply affidavit setting forth, inter alia, that the copy of the magazine attached to plaintiff's affidavit is a representative copy of the October 1958 issue of the magazine with one exception. The "bind-in-reply card" which appears therein was only inserted in the few issues sent to sporting goods dealers as set forth in original affidavit. The reply card is enclosed in these copies as an application for a "subscription" because the Post Office Department has taken the position that Section 132.481 of the Postal Regulations permits such an enclosure but does not permit enclosure of an application for membership. The "subscription rates" on the card are identical to the membership dues of annual members. On the receipt of reply card sender is advised he can become a full member at no further cost on fulfilling the necessary requirements. A detailed analysis of the mailing list of magazines sent into the Middle District of Pennsylvania per month showed

5,214 copies mailed to Annual Members
499 copies mailed to Life Members
58 copies mailed to Affiliated rifle and/or pistol clubs
126 copies mailed to nonconfirmed members as described in original affidavit
282 copies mailed to 37 sporting goods dealers
31 copies go to persons or organizations therein listed, including libraries, military units, State Game Commission, etc.

An analysis of the advertisements disclosed that in the October 1958 issue of the magazine eight classified advertisements (one of which was sent in by plaintiff) and six larger advertisements (one of which was sent in by plaintiff) are from persons in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. The gross revenue from these fourteen advertisements was $865.55 of which $246.30 came from plaintiff.

At the argument on the motion plaintiff stated that for the purposes of the motion it relied upon the facts set forth by defendant in the said affidavits.

[Transacting Business—Test]

The sole issue here is whether plaintiff has established that defendant is transacting business in this district. After proper challenge, as here, the burden of proving proper venue pursuant to Section 12 is upon the plaintiff. Austad v. United States Steel Corp., N. D. Cal., 1956, 141 F. Supp. 437. The test for determining whether a corporation is transacting business within a particular district is stated by the Supreme Court in Eastman Kodak Company of New York v. Southern Photo Materials Company, 1927, 273 U. S. 359, 373,

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

> "* * * a corporation is engaged in transacting business in a district, * * * if in fact, in the ordinary and usual sense, it 'transacts business' therein of any substantial character. * * *"

This test was reaffirmed in United States v. Scophony Corporation of America, et al., 1948 [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,238], 333 U. S. 795, 807. The Court added,

> "* * * The practical, everyday business or commercial concept of doing or carrying on business 'of any substantial character' became the test of venue."

[Publication of Magazine]

Attached to affidavit filed by defendant is a booklet entitled "Your NRA," which, in considerable detail, outlines the aims and purposes of the organization and what it has to offer its members. Its magazine, The American Rifleman, is merely an incident to membership. Certainly the publication of the magazine is not the chief business of the organization. Probably the strongest argument against the claim that the magazine is commercial in nature is the Congressional recognition accorded the organization. By the Act of Congress of August 10, 1956, c. 1041, 70A Stat. 236 and 237, 10 U. S. C. §§ 4308 and 4312, respectively, Congress specifically authorized the sale of Government rifles and associated supplies to defendant's members at cost, and also recognized the basic patriotic nature of the organization by providing that competitions for which tropies and medals are provided by the National Rifle Association of America (this defendant) shall be held in connection with an annual competition called the "National Matches" and consisting of rifle and pistol matches for a national trophy, medals, and other prizes, which competition or matches shall be held as prescribed by the Secretary of the Army.

[Carrying of Advertisements]

The fact that the magazine carries advertisements does not, in my mind, alter the picture; so do the official organs of such service organizations as Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions and indeed The American Bar Association. It could not be seriously contended that the chief purpose of any of those or similar organizations was the publication of its official magazine.

[Venue Improper]

In the light of the foregoing, the motion of defendant National Rifle Association of America to dismiss it from this action on the ground that venue is improper over it in this district will be granted.

As to Lyman Gun Sight Corporation

Attached to Lyman's motion to dismiss, dated June 16, 1958 and filed June 17, 1958, is the affidavit of Henry B. Leader, its attorney. Under date of April 2, 1959, Lyman filed affidavit of its President, Charles Lyman, 3rd, dated April 1, 1959. The Lyman affidavit confirmed and enlarged upon the Leader affidavit and set forth, inter alia, as follows, to wit:

Lyman is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Connecticut, has not been domesticated in Pennsylvania, has no agent in Pennsylvania to receive process and has no subsidiary in Pennsylvania.[1] It does not solicit orders through salesmen in the district, has no resident agent or representatives, nor resident employees of any nature in the district. The Lyman product coming into the district is purchased by independent merchants based on orders received in Connecticut, and accepted or rejected by Lyman in Connecticut; no prices are established in Pennsylvania; no sales made in Pennsylvania, and no payments are received in Pennsylvania. Lyman neither maintains nor owns any office, factory, warehouse or other real estate or installation in this district, and pays no rents in this district. Lyman has no tangible personal property, no telephone listing and pays no business taxes in this district. Lyman has no corporate records or books of account, no bank accounts or stock transfer agent, and does no financing through institutions in the district. None of Lyman's shareholders or directors live in this district and no meetings of either group are held in this district. Lyman's magazine advertising is directed to a national audience and it does no local magazine, newspaper, radio or television advertising in the district.

Plaintiff propounded certain interrogatories to Lyman concerning Lyman's business activities in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. It was later stipulated by plaintiff and Lyman that the scope of the said interrogatories should be limited to the period between January 1, 1957 and May 20, 1958. The answers of Charles Lyman, aforesaid, to the interrogatories thus limited disclosed the following:

Lyman's total dollar volume of sales for the year 1957 was $640,581.00, and for the year 1958 to May 20, was $169,318.00. Lyman's sales in the Middle District of Pennsylvania for the year 1957 amounted to 1.90 per cent of its total sales and to 1.37 per cent of its total sales for 1958 to May 20. During the period in question Lyman did some advertising in the Middle District of Pennsylvania, generally by catalogue, mail circular, letter, and magazine. During the period in question Lyman made no sales or deliveries in the Middle District of Pennsylvania through an agent, employee or distributor for the company. It did make sales at its home office in Connecticut to merchants who were independent contractors. Lyman listed seven merchants with places of business in the Middle District of Pennsylvania, six of whom bought Lyman's product in 1957 to the extent of $12,018.00, and six of whom in 1958 bought to the extent of $2,335.00. During the period January 1, 1957 to May 20, 1958, no employees, agents or independent representatives of Lyman came into the Middle District of Pennsylvania to effect the aforesaid sales. However, in April of 1957, Henry H. Lyman, Jr., Secretary of the company, and in March of 1958 Frank Jury, an employee, J. A. Widner, Jr., an employee, and Henry H. Lyman, Jr., Secretary as aforesaid, made good will tours which extended into this district.

In seeking to determine the question of venue with relation to Lyman, we have again to apply the test of "business of a substantial character" as above indicated originally propounded in Eastman, supra, and reaffirmed in Scophony, supra. The court in Scophony, supra, after noting that refinements such as previously were made under the "mere solicitation" and "solicitation plus" criteria were no longer determinative, and pointing out that in Eastman, supra, under the broader room given by Section 12 venue was held to have been established where under the earlier tests of Section 7 of the Sherman Act the company was not "present" either for the purpose of venue or as being amenable to service of process, then went on to say:

> "Thus, by substituting practical, business conceptions for the previous hair-splitting legal technicalities encrusted upon the 'found'—'present'—'carrying-on-business' sequence, the Court yielded to and made effective Congress' remedial purpose. Thereby it relieved persons injured through corporate violations of the antitrust laws from the 'often insuperable obstacle' of resorting to distant forums for redress of wrongs done in the places of their business or residence. A foreign corporation no longer could come to a district, perpetrate there the injuries outlawed, and then by retreating or even without retreating to its headquarters defeat or delay the retribution due."

The unmistakable trend both by legislation and by court decisions has been to expand the concept of what constitutes doing business in a state by a foreign corporation. While the volume of business done in the state has frequently been the controlling factor in arriving at this determination,[2] certainly it is not the sole test. In 1931 in Jeffrey-Nichols Motor Co. v. Hupp Motor Car Corporation, 1 Cir., 46 F. 2d 623, the court stated, "The sale of goods is not essential to constitute transacting business." See also Abrams et al. v. Bendix Home Appliances, Inc., D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,792], 96 F. Supp. 3. "It is the totality of acts and conduct rather than isolated and fragmented items thereof which must govern." Abrams v. Bendix Home Appliances, supra.

The problem here is well stated in Echeverry v. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co., 2 Cir., 175 F. 2d 900, 902-903, as follows:

> "The published decisions on what constitutes 'doing business' in a State by a foreign corporation are literally legion. Yet, in spite of this vast array of judicial authority, border-line cases still have to be decided each on its own peculiar set of facts, which too often cannot be fitted into a stereotyped pattern. In this field, realism, not formalism, should be dominant; the problem must be solved in the light of commercial actuality, not in the aura of juristic semantics. In United States v. Scophony Corporation, 333 U. S. 795, 810, 68 S. Ct. 855, 863, 92 L. Ed. 1091, Mr. Justice Rutledge spoke of 'the practical, nontechnical, business standard.'"

[2] See Sunbury Wire Rope Manufacturing Company v. United States Steel Corporation, et al., D. C. E. D. Pa., (1955) [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,015], 129 F. Supp. 425.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

In 1957 defendant had gross sales of $640,581.00 of which 1.90% or $12,018.00 represented sales in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. For the period January 1 to May 20, 1958, defendant's total sales amounted to $169,318.00 of which 1.37% or $2,335.00 represented sales in the Middle District of Pennsylvania. During the period in question defendant engaged in a vigorous advertising and sales promotion campaign. It circularized the trade generally by mailing its catalogues, mail circulars and letters into this district and also advertised in various magazines which have circulation in this district. In addition, during April 1957 defendant caused its secretary to make "good will calls" in this district, and again in March 1958 it caused its secretary and two other employees to make similar "good will tours" in this district.

[Money-making Organization]

This defendant is not a philanthropic organization. It is in business to make money. In order to promote sales in this district it caused its catalogues and various advertising material to be circularized through the district, it made extensive use of magazine advertising media. Certainly, the good will calls or tours could have but one purpose, namely, to increase sales.

[Activities Constitute Transaction of Business]

It is my opinion that from the average business man's point of view the activities of this defendant constitute the transaction of business in the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

[Dismissal Refused]

The motion of Lyman Gun Sight Corporation to dismiss it from this action will be refused.

As to Popular Science Publishing Co., Inc.

[Motion to Quash Summons]

As above indicated, Popular Science has moved to quash the summons and dismiss the complaint for reasons stated, in the alternative for more specific statement and to strike certain alleged scandalous and impertinent statements. Defendant has withdrawn its objections to certain paragraphs of the complaint.

Considering the reasons given in support of the motion, seriatim,

[Service of Summons]

(a) Improper service. The Marshal's return reads as follows:

"I hereby certify and return that on the 22nd day of May 1958, I received the summons and served it together with the complaint herein as follows: On the 23rd day of May, 1958, executed the within Summons by serving James Scott, Manager of the Popular Science Publishing Co., Inc., by making known to him the contents thereof and leaving with him a true attested copy of summons together with copy of complaint. Service was made at their office, 1136 Moosic St., Scranton, Pa."

Plaintiff filed of record affidavit of William E. Lavin, the Deputy Marshal who made the service and return. This affidavit sets forth the following:

"* * * WILLIAM E. LAVIN, who being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is a Deputy United States Marshal for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, and that in the course of his duties on May 23, 1958, he attempted to serve a Complaint in the case of S. A. Wentling v. Popular Science Publishing Co., Inc., Civil Action No. 6300 a defendant in said action, at the registered office of said corporation as listed in the Complaint, namely, 400 Wyoming Avenue, Scranton, Lackawanna County, Pennsylvania; that upon arriving at said address it was apparent that there were no offices there at the time as the building was being remodeled and the window sign formerly indicating Popular Science Publishing Co. had been removed and the said defendant had no office at that address; that he then looked in the City Directory for the City of Scranton, Pennsylvania, and determined that there was set forth therein an address for said company at 1136 Moosic St., Scranton, Lackawanna County, Pennsylvania; and that he then served the said Complaint on May 23, 1958, upon one James Scott, at the office of said defendant at 1136 Moosic St., Scranton, Pennsylvania; and that the said James Scott was or held himself out to be the manager or person in charge of said place of business."

Attached to defendant's motion to quash summons and dismiss complaint was affidavit of Ralph H. Flynn, President of defendant. This affidavit set forth that James Scott is an employee of defendant whose sole duty consisted of supervising the operation of defendant's warehouse at 1136 Moosic Street, Scranton, Pennsylvania; that he is not an officer, director or managing agent of defendant; that his duties consist of being responsible for the inventory in the warehouse; that he has no discretionary power and receives orders from defendant's New York office; that he has no authority to enter into any contracts on defendant's behalf or to make business commitments of any kind on defendant's behalf.

["Registered" Foreign Corporation]

Popular Science is a foreign corporation and it appears to be agreed was duly registered in accordance with the Business Corporation Law of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, Act of May 5, 1933, P. L. 364, art. X, § 1011, 15 P. S. § 2852-1011, in the Office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, appointing the said Secretary as its statutory agent for the service of process and giving its registered office as 400 Wyoming Avenue, Scranton, Pennsylvania.

[Failure to Report Change of Address]

While it is difficult to understand why the plaintiff did not take the obviously simple, best and most proper method of making service on the Secretary of the Commonwealth, it is not the exclusive method. Furthermore, the defendant having changed its registered office address and having failed to note the change in the Office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth, is in direct violation of the Act and should not be permitted to profit by its own dereliction.

Goodrich-Amram, Standard Pennsylvania Practice, § 2180(a)-9, states, inter alia:

"* * * The statutes permitting the registration of foreign corporations and similar entities to do business in the Commonwealth likewise require the designation of such an office. Therefore, in all cases except those where the corporation or similar entity is violating the statute or is exempt from registration, there will be on file, with a state official, an officially designated office of the corporation or similar entity. Most of the statutes permit this 'office' to be changed on application to an appropriate State officer, but the change may be effected only upon the simultaneous designation of a new office within the Commonwealth. For these reasons, it would not lie in the mouth of the corporation or similar entity to deny the validity of the existence of the office at the place specified in the registration papers. Service at such an 'office' could not be attacked by the corporation or similar entity as being a service made at a place which was not in fact the 'office.'"

Significantly, the affidavit of Ralph H. Flynn attached to defendant's motion states that Scott, the person upon whom service was made, supervises the operation of defendant's warehouse in Scranton, Pennsylvania, that other employees of defendant who work at the same location are the assistants of Scott. It therefore would obviously follow that defendant had a place of business in the Commonwealth and that Scott was in charge of it. It further appears that Scott was, or held himself out to be, the manager or person in charge of the said place of business.

[Service Proper]

I think the service was proper.

[Capacity to Sue—Filing of Fictitious Name"]

(b) As to plaintiff's failure to register its fictitious name prior to the institution of this action.

The complaint was filed May 20, 1958, the fictitious name was filed in the Office of the Prothonotary of Lebanon County, Pennsylvania, on May 22, 1958, and in the Office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth on May 21, 1958.

The Act in question, Act of May 24, 1945, P. L. 967, § 4, 54 P. S. § 28.4, provides, inter alia, that:

"* * *, Before any such person or persons may institute any action in any of the courts of this Commonwealth or before any justice of the peace or magistrate thereof, on any cause of action arising prior to the filing of the application provided for in this section, such person or persons shall pay to the Secretary of the Commonwealth for the use of the Commonwealth a license fee or fine of twenty-five dollars ($25.00). * * *."

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

In neither instance was the fine provided by the statute paid.

[Not Diversity Case]

This is not a diversity case. It is founded exclusively on a Federal statute. Accordingly, in this case this Court is not sitting as a State court.

Dealing with a similar situation, the court in O'Donnell v. Elgin, Joliet & Eastern Ry. Co., 1942, 7 Cir., 193 F. 2d 348, 352, held as follows:

"* * * But it is different where the action, as in the instant case, is predicated upon a Federal right. As stated in Angel v. Bullington, 330 U. S. at page 192, 67 S. Ct. at page 662, 91 L. Ed. 832: 'Of course, where resort is had to a federal court not on grounds of diversity of citizenship but because a federal right is claimed, the limitations upon the courts of a State do not control a federal court sitting in the State.'"

[No Lack of Capacity to Sue]

Popular Science's motion to dismiss complaint on ground of lack of capacity to sue because of failure to file a fictitious name registered prior to the institution of this action is without merit and will be denied.

[Allegations Sufficient]

Defendant's (Popular Science) reasons (3), (4), and (5) above set forth, together with its alternative motion, can be summarily disposed of. The gist of this action is a single conspiracy. Defendant is fully advised. Whether plaintiff will succeed in establishing a conspiracy as charged is a horse of another color.

[Dismissal Denied]

Defendant's (Popular Science) several motions will be denied.

Appeal from an order and judgment of the United States District Court for the Northern District of New York. BRENNAN, Chief Judge.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Power of Court to Dismiss Where It "Appears" Plaintiff Will Be Unable to Prove Allegations.—A trial court, in dismissing a treble damage action after the plaintiff had failed to satisfactorily comply with a pretrial order to furnish certain factual information, erroneously relied on Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. That Rule, which authorizes the court to direct the parties to appear for a pretrial consideration of certain matters, was apparently invoked by the trial court on the theory that dismissal at the pretrial stage is proper "where it clearly appears that plaintiff will be unable to prove the allegations of its complaint." Rule 16 confers no special power of dismissal not otherwise contained in the rules. Rule 41(b), which the trial court also relied upon in dismissing the complaint, authorizes dismissal for noncompliance with a pretrial order, but here the trial court did not regard the plaintiff's response to the order for further information as sufficiently contumacious, in and of itself, to justify dismissal. Thus, there appeared to be no reason to believe the dismissal motion would have been granted except for the trial court's erroneous reliance on Rule 16. Rule 56, which provides for summary judgment, played no part in the trial court's decision to dismiss. However, when matters outside the pleadings are considered in disposing of a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cognizable claim, or for judgment on the pleadings, Rules 12(b) and 12(c) make it mandatory that the motion be disposed of as a motion for summary judgment.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.440, 9013.675.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedure—Pretrial Order to Furnish Facts Supporting Charges—Non-compliance as Basis for "Precluding" Evidence.—A trial court, having entered a pretrial order directing a radio station to produce facts to support its charges that two newspapers (1) circulated false statements among the station's advertisers, (2) refused to publish news items favorable to the station, (3) gave "discriminatory advantages" to another radio station, and (4) discriminated in advertising prices in favor of that other radio station, correctly entered another pretrial order "excluding" certain items of evidence which allegedly supported those charges. Other such items, however, were improperly excluded by the trial court. Where the station should have, but did not, comply with the court's order to produce facts, the "preclusion" order was proper. However, where the station's compliance was sufficient under the circumstances, the "preclusion" order was improper. The case was a "big" one (approximately 6300 pages of record had been produced and the case had not yet gotten to trial), and the trial court was correct in taking "vigorous measures" to see that the issues were clearly defined so that the case might be kept within manageable proportions. However, a "preclusion" order is a drastic remedy, and should be exercised only to the extent necessary to achieve a just disposition of the case in a speedy and efficient manner.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Necessary Averments—Interstate Commerce—Whether Plaintiff Engages in Interstate Commerce—Volume of Interstate Commerce Involved—Relevance.—In order to establish jurisdiction under Section 4 of the Clayton Act (providing for the recovery of treble damages for violations of the antitrust laws), it is only necessary to allege acts in restraint of interstate commerce and injury to the plaintiff resulting therefrom. Once this is done, the volume of interstate commerce which might be affected is irrelevant, as is the question of whether or not the plaintiff himself engages in interstate commerce.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9009.275, 9009.600.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Motion to Compel Admission of Facts—Motion Applicable Only to Undisputed and Peripheral Issues of Fact.—A trial court properly denied a plaintiff's motion to compel the defendants, under Rule 36 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, to admit as true the alleged statements of fact contained in a document which enumerated a series of more than thirty acts, each of which the plaintiff claimed was a violation of the antitrust laws. Rule 36, which was designed to eliminate the necessity of proving essentially undisputed and peripheral issues of fact, had no bearing on the instant situation.

Before: SWAN, MEDINA and WATERMAN, Circuit Judges.

After our former remand [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,468], 236 F. 2d 522, and subsequent proceedings below, plaintiff now appeals from an order and judgment dismissing its complaint for treble damages under 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 13, 13a and 15, United States District Court for the Northern District of New York, Brennan, Chief Judge. Opinion below not reported. Plaintiff also appeals from earlier orders precluding evidence and setting side appellant's demand that defendants admit facts. The judgment dismissing the complaint is reversed, the preclusion order is ordered modified, the order setting aside appellant's motion to admit facts is affirmed, the cause is remanded.

[Newspaper Advertising—Conspiracy and Price Discrimination]

WATERMAN, Circuit Judge [In full text]: In November of 1952 plaintiff, the Syracuse Broadcasting Corporation, filed suit in the Northern District of New York against Samuel I. Newhouse, the Herald Company, the Post-Standard Company, and the Central New York Broadcasting Corporation, alleging violations of the Sherman and Clayton Acts. Plaintiff (WNDR) and the Central New York Broadcasting Corporation (WSYR and WSYR-TV) are broadcasting corporations located in Syracuse, New York. The other two corporate defendants are the sole daily and Sunday newspapers in that city. The Post-Standard Company is wholly owned by the Herald Company. Herald Company and Central New York Broadcasting Corporation in turn are in the control of the individual defendant Samuel I. Newhouse. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on one of plaintiff's claims and dismissed the others for failure to state claims upon which relief could be granted. On appeal, Syracuse Broadcasting Corporation v. Newhouse [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,468], 236 F. 2d 522 (2 Cir. 1956), we agreed with the district court that plaintiff was not entitled to go to trial on its monopoly charge under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. 2, its complaint of mergers and interlocking directorates in violation of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. §§ 18 and 19, and its allegation that defendant newspapers refused to accept advertising unless WSYR was also patronized. However, we reversed the judgment below in part and remanded the cause to the district court for further proceedings below. We held that the "interests of justice" required a trial of the remaining issues—i.e., the charge of discrimination in violation of Section 2 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. § 13; and the charge under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. § 1, that a conspiracy existed to restrain trade to plaintiff's damage by the use of a unit rate for advertising in the two newspapers, by the circulation of false rumors about plaintiff, by the refusal to publish in the newspapers items favorable to the plaintiff, and by the giving of discriminatory advantages to WSYR.

[Pretrial Order to Furnish Facts—Dismissal]

After the remand pre-trial hearings were held; and, on February 12, 1957, on motion of the defendants, the district court, so as to particularize the issues involved, directed plaintiff to furnish defendants with the factual information upon which it based its claims. Extensions of time were granted and early in April plaintiff submitted a lengthy compliance document together with a demand that defendants admit all the facts contained therein. Conferences and argument were had with respect to plaintiff's compliance with the court's direction, and, after the submission of a further compliance document by plaintiff on June 20, the district court entered orders, dated July 27, 1957. These orders struck out plaintiff's demand that the defendants admit facts and also precluded plaintiff from presenting evidence with respect to those areas of alleged wrongdoing where the court believed that plaintiff had not properly complied with the pretrial order to furnish factual information. Plaintiff did nothing until October when it moved that the preclusion order against it be modified in certain particulars and that the order striking its demand that defendants admit facts be vacated. After lengthy argument these motions of plaintiff were denied without prejudice to subsequent compliance. On November 14 the defendants moved to dismiss the complaint in its entirety on the grounds that plaintiff had failed to comply with an order of the court and that there was complete legal insufficiency in plaintiff's proof. At the same time plaintiff moved once more to have the preclusion order of July 27 modified, and also moved to have vacated the order striking its demand that the defendants admit facts. In a memorandum decision, dated January 10, 1958, the district court denied all plaintiff's requests; and, in granting defendants' motion, dismissed the complaint.

On this appeal plaintiff contests the order dismissing its complaint, the order precluding the admission of evidence, and the order setting aside its demand that the defendants admit facts. We shall deal with these contentions in that order.

I

DISMISSAL OF ACTION

[Power to Dismiss at Pretrial Stage]

In dismissing the action the district court relied upon Rules 16 and 41(b). Rule 16 appears to have been invoked on the theory that dismissal at the pretrial stage is proper where it clearly appears that plaintiff will be unable to prove the allegations of its complaint. We hold, however, that Rule 16 confers no special power of dismissal not otherwise contained in the rules. Rule 12(b) and Rule 12(c) provide that summary judgment, under Rule 56, is mandatory when matters outside the pleadings are considered in disposing of a motion to dismiss for failure to state a cognizable claim, or for judgment on the pleadings. Disposition under Rule 56 would appear to be no less mandatory when analogous motions are considered at the pre-trial stage. Rule 56 played no part in the court's decision to dismiss. This is clear inferentially from the fact that the court did not rule upon defendants' motion for summary judgment which accompanied the motion to dismiss. Moreover, the court expressly stated that a reason for dismissal was plaintiff's failure to bring the action to the stage where the factual issues became clear.

[Non-compliance with Pretrial Order]

While we do not question that Rule 41(b) authorizes a court in a proper case to dismiss a complaint for non-compliance with a pre-trial order,[1] we observe that here the district court did not regard plaintiff's response to the order for further information as sufficiently contumacious in and of itself to justify dismissal. Absent the court's erroneous reliance on Rule 16, there appears to be no reason to believe that the dismissal motion would have been granted. Dismissal with prejudice is a drastic sanction to be applied only in extreme situations, Gill v. Stolow, 240 F. 2d 669 (2 Cir. 1957); Producers Releasing Corp. de Cuba v. PRC Pictures, 176 F. 2d 93 (2 Cir. 1949), and here the preclusion order seems an ample penalty for any lack of cooperation on plaintiff's part.

[Dismissal Improper]

We hold that dismissal was improper.

II

PRECLUSION ORDER

[Size of Case]

Interested persons have long been aware that the "big" case, such as is often encountered in antitrust and patent litigation, requires special administrative treatment. See The Report on Procedure in Anti-Trust and Other Protracted Cases Adopted by the Judicial Conference of the United States, 13 F. R. D. 62; Seminars on Protracted Cases for United States Circuit and District Judges, 21 F. R. D. 395, 23 F. R. D. 319. Especially is this true with respect to the situation that confronted the district court here—the formulization of the issues to be tried.

> "It is not practical to proceed in these cases as in a lawsuit of ordinary complexity and bulk; that is, to let the parties exhaust the cross fire of pleading, to conduct open court pre-trial hearings, or to let counsel try the case as they please. The potential range of issues, evidence and argument is so great, and the necessities of adversary representation so compelling, that the activities of counsel will result in records of fantastic size and complexity unless the trial judge exercises rigid control from the time the complaint is filed * * *
> "Whatever may be the objections and difficulties to the specification of issues in ordinary actions, the necessity for such specification in the case with which this report is concerned is so great as to require that it be done no matter what the objection or difficulty. Unless it is done, the hearing cannot be confined to its proper limits, counsel are at a loss as to their positions, and the judge is unable to relate the evidence to issues which are in dispute or to limit it to that which is relevant." Report of Judicial Conference, supra, pp. 66-67.

That this is a "big" case is apparent, both from the comments in our prior opinion

[1] It has been suggested that language in Societe International, etc. v. Rogers, 357 U. S. 197, 207 (1958) restricts Rule 41(b) to orders made during trial. In the context wherein this language occurred the Court merely indicated that Rule 41(b) was inapplicable to the disobedience of discovery orders because Rule 37(b)(2) was there expressly applicable and Rule 41(b) conferred no greater power than the power contained in Rule 37(b)(2). To hold that Rule 41(b) only applies to orders made at trial would not only overrule a long standing interpretation to the contrary, First Iowa Hydro Electric Corp. v. Iowa-Illinois Gas & E. Co., [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,726], 245 F. 2d 613, 628 (8 Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 355 U. S. 871; Blake v. DeVilbiss, 118 F. 2d 346 (6 Cir. 1941); Wisdom v. Texas Co., 27 F. Supp. 992 (N. D. Ala., 1939), but would ignore the fact that in the same sentence permitting dismissal for disobedience of an order, Rule 41(b) permits similar disposition when plaintiff fails to prosecute his action. This latter provision could hardly be construed as applying only after the commencement of trial.

[1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,468], 236 F. 2d 522, 526, and the approximately 6300 pages of record which have been produced before this case has even gone to trial. Consequently, the district court was correct in taking vigorous measures to see that the issues were clearly defined so that the whole case might be kept within manageable proportions.

[Discretion of Court]

At the same time, however, it must be remembered that a preclusion order is a drastic remedy, Mathany v. Porter, 158 F. 2d 478 (10 Cir. 1946), and while the district court clearly has the power to issue such an order, Walker v. West Coast Fast Freight, Inc., 233 F. 2d 939 (9 Cir. 1956), 3 Moore's Federal Practice 1130 (2d edition 1948), that power should be exercised only to the extent necessary to achieve the desired purpose—that is, an entirely just disposition of the case in a speedy and efficient manner. Of course, in view of its intimate knowledge of the facts, discretion must be accorded the district court in its resolution of these administrative problems. This of necessity must be so, but when we are convinced that the court below has exceeded a proper discretion in that the order imposed was too strict or was unnecessary under the circumstances, we would be remiss in our duties if we did not set that order aside.

[Specific Objections]

With these considerations in mind we examine each of plaintiff's objections to the preclusion order of July 27, 1957.

By the court order of February 12, 1957 plaintiff was required to produce further factual information. The information to be furnished was set forth in numbered itemized paragraphs of that order. This numbering system was preserved in the preclusion order of July 27, 1957. On appeal plaintiff objects to the court's treatment of plaintiff's offered compliance with the demands set forth in paragraphs I(e), I(g), III(a), IV(b), V(b), V(d), V(e) and VI(a). Items I(e) and I(g) deal with the extent of interstate commerce involved in the case. Item III(a) relates to rumors and false statements allegedly circulated by defendants. Item IV(b) concerns defendants' alleged refusal to publish news items favorable to plaintiff. Items V(b), V(d) and V(e) require specification of plaintiff's charge that defendant newspapers gave discriminatory advantages to defendant radio station WSYR. Item VI(a) involves allegations of price discrimination.

1. Volume of interstate commerce. Plaintiff objects to Items I(e) and I(g) of the order requiring it to produce further information. Item I(e) seems to call for a statement of the total volume of interstate commerce that involved those products concerning which plaintiff alleged a restraint within the geographic area the court had previously established as applicable. Item I(g) calls for a statement of the extent of plaintiff's participation in this commerce. We have grave doubts as to the relevance of each of these items. We understand that to establish jurisdiction under 15 U. S. C. A. § 15 it is only necessary to allege acts in restraint of interstate commerce and injury to plaintiff resulting therefrom. Having done this, the volume of interstate commerce which might be affected is irrelevant, Times-Picayune Pub. Co. v. United States, [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,494], 345 U. S. 594, 611 (1953), as is also the question of whether plaintiff himself engages in interstate commerce, Ring v. Spina, 148 F. 2d 647, 651 (2 Cir. 1945), cert. denied, 335 U. S. 813.

Possible irrelevance, however, does not destroy the validity of a preclusion order. If in fact the items are irrelevant no prejudice can result from preclusion of evidence as to them. The possibility that the objecting party may be incorrect in his claim of irrelevance suggests that the prudent course would be for it to comply with the order for further information while at the same time stating clearly its objection that the information required is irrelevant.

Item I(g) relates to matters peculiarly within plaintiff's knowledge. Plaintiff failed to comply with the order to produce this information, and the preclusion order with respect to this item is justified. Item I(e), however, relates to a larger and less definite subject. Plaintiff stated that it had no special knowledge of the total amount of interstate commerce in the fields of newspaper publishing and radio broadcasting in the established geographic area. Moreover, the court below seems to have regarded this information it sought from plaintiff as relevant, not to plaintiff's case, but to an issue which is essentially a matter of defense. We conclude that it was error at this stage of pre-trial examination to preclude plaintiff, even though it failed to comply with this portion of the order for further information, from at any time introducing whatever evidence might become available to it on this point.

2. Circulation of false statements among plaintiff's advertisers. Item III(a) of the order for further information requires the plaintiff to substantiate its accusation that defendants have circulated false statements in an effort to drive plaintiff out of business. Information was ordered produced relating to the nature of such statements, the time and place each such statement was made, the name of defendants' representative who initiated it, and the person to whom each statement was communicated. Item III(a) relates to two types of alleged false statements or rumors: articles appearing in defendant newspapers casting doubt upon plaintiff's ability to remain in business, and similar oral statements originated and circulated by defendants' agents. In attempted compliance with this order plaintiff, in Exhibit M, listed eighteen instances where its negotiations with advertisers had been broken off after the advertiser had read allegedly false and malicious articles in defendant newspapers concerning plaintiff's financial condition and its ability to remain in business. Plaintiff also listed several instances of alleged oral statements claimed to have been circulated by defendants' agents. We hold that evidence as to statements set forth in newspaper articles should not be precluded, and we affirm Judge Brennan's disposition of the allegations concerning oral rumors.

3. Refusal to publish news items favorable to plaintiff. Plaintiff alleged that the defendant newspapers consistently refused to publish news items favorable to plaintiff. Item IV(b) of the order for further information called for plaintiff to specify the news items submitted and the date and manner of their rejection. The court held that plaintiff's compliance, found principally in Exhibit N, was insufficient, and therefore evidence on this point was ordered precluded. From a reading of Item IV(b) of the preclusion order, the court appears to have objected to Exhibit N because copies of the rejected news items were not submitted and the manner of each rejection was not stated with sufficient precision. Since Exhibit N alleges that most of the news items were submitted orally to defendant newspapers, and orally rejected, greater specificity as to those items in Exhibit N would appear to be impossible. Therefore Item IV(b) of the preclusion order must be set aside to that extent. However, the court was correct in precluding evidence of items contained in another exhibit, Exhibit R, since there is no suggestion that these items were submitted for publication. As to still other exhibits, Exhibits I and K, the basic compliance document alleges sufficient incidents of submission and rejection. Therefore evidence as to these items should not be precluded.

4. Discriminatory advantages given WSYR. Item V(b) of the order for further information requires plaintiff to enumerate the general methods by which defendant newspapers gave discriminatory advantages to defendant radio station WSYR. The court held that plaintiff's compliance was such as to preclude all evidence of alleged discriminatory practices save as to the issues of free advertising,[2] specifically treated in V(c); preferred page position, specifically treated in V(d); and secret rebates, specifically treated in V(e). The court acted properly in ordering that evidence of any other alleged discriminatory practices be precluded.

Item V(d) of the preclusion order deals with the issue of preferred page position. Notwithstanding Item V(b), discussed in the preceding paragraph, Item V(d) seems to preclude all evidence tending to support this allegation. Even so broadly construed, however, the preclusion order is correct. Plaintiff's exhibits do not indicate the dates on which the alleged discriminatory acts occurred, nor do they allege that plaintiff was denied page locations which it sought.

Item V(e) relates to secret rebates. We find no error in the way this point was disposed of by the district court.

[2] See discussion infra under "Price Discrimination."

"Free advertising" is not spelled out by court or counsel, but we would think the plaintiff's evidence on this point should not be restricted. Plaintiff's allegations relative to free advertising are two-fold—free advertising given to WSYR and free advertising given to WSYR's advertisers. We understand the preclusion order does not prevent evidence as to each. We further understand that the term "advertising" is sufficiently elastic so as to encompass such avenues of communication as entertainment columns, general news articles, and the like.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

5. Price discrimination. The only alleged method of price discrimination now in the case relates to the free advertising alleged to have been given WSYR by the two defendant newspapers. Item V(c) of the preclusion order clearly states that plaintiff's right to introduce evidence on this issue has been in no way curtailed. Hence plaintiff may not object to Item VI(a) which precludes evidence as to other methods of price discrimination.

MOTION TO COMPEL ADMISSION OF FACTS

["Violations" Need Not Be Admitted]

In response to the order for further information plaintiff submitted a "compliance document" with appended exhibits. This document enumerates a series of more than thirty acts and plaintiff claims each one constitutes a violation of the anti-trust laws. The document is comprehensive and represents a summary of plaintiff's cause of action. Upon submission of this document plaintiff moved that under Rule 36 defendants be compelled to admit as true the statements of fact contained therein. The motion was denied. In so doing the court was clearly correct. Rule 36 was designed to eliminate the necessity of proving essentially undisputed and peripheral issues of fact. It has no bearing on the present situation. See 4 Moore, Federal Practice § 36.04 (1950 Ed.).

[Reversed and Remanded]

The decision below is reversed and the case remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Washington Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Constitutionality of Washington Fair Trade Act—Nonsigner Provision—Washington Constitution.—The nonsigner provision of the Washington Fair Trade Act was held invalid under the Washington Constitution as an improper exercise of the police power. The case of Sears v. Western Thrift Stores of Olympia, Inc., 1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,152, was expressly overruled insofar as it validated the nonsigner provision. A theory of the Sears case "was that the manufacturer of a trade-marked product retains a proprietary interest in that product by reason of the fact that he owns the trademark and the good will associated therewith, when he sells that product to a retailer, even though the retention of such an interest is not made a part of the contract of sale. If the manufacturer does have an interest in the portion of good will which goes with the trade-marked product, then he is entitled to sue and recover that portion of the resale price which is attributable to such good will, and we do not think it can be seriously contended that he has such a right. In selling the product to the retailer, the manufacturer exacts a price for the use of his trademark and the benefit of the good will associated with it, as well as for the physical components of the product, and unless he also exacts an agreement that the retailer will not resell the product at less than a stipulated price, we can see no equity which should entitle him to the special protection of the law." The court noted that there was no showing that the hardship to manufacturers and retailers resulting from the overruling of the Sears case would be great enough to warrant the perpetuation of an erroneous decision.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3085.51, 3258.51.

[Fair Trade Act—Constitutionality]

ROSSELLINI, Judge [In full text]: This action was brought to enjoin the defendants from selling certain products below the price set by the plaintiff, pursuant to the Washington fair trade act. There is no dispute in regard to the facts. The defendants willfully and knowingly advertised, offered for sale, and sold at retail, firearms and ammunition which were manufactured by and bore the trademark, brand, or name of the plaintiff as the producer of the products. The prices at which the defendants advertised, offered for sale, and sold these products were less than the retail prices established by the plaintiff in its contract with other retailers, of which the defendants had knowledge. At the time of trial, the plaintiff had in effect approximately five hundred seventy fair trade agreeements with retailers in the state of Washington. All of the contracts are identical and give the plaintiff the sole right to determine and modify the resale price of all products covered by the contracts.

None of the defendants at any time entered into fair trade contracts of any nature with the plaintiff or with any other person. The parties to the action have stipulated that the damage suffered by either party in the event of success in this action, shall be the sum of one dollar. The plaintiff contends that the defendants are bound to sell at the price fixed for its products by virtue of the "nonsigner" provision of the fair trade act, Laws of 1937, chapter 176, § 3, p. 685 (RCW 19.89.030), which provides:

> "Wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale or reselling any commodity at less than the price stipulated in any contract entered into pursuant to the provision of section 1 of this act, whether the person so advertising, offering for sale or selling is or is not a party to such contract, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby." (Italics ours.)

The trial court enjoined the actions of the defendants and granted the plaintiff one dollar in damages. The defendants appeal. We are asked to re-examine Sears v. Western Thrift Stores of Olympia, Inc. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,152], 10 Wn. (2d) 372, 116 P. (2d) 756 (1941), upholding the constitutionality of this provision.

To obtain the proper perspective for this appeal, we must first look to the act itself. In general, it provides that a producer or owner of a commodity which bears the trademark, brand, or name of the producer or owner of such commodity, and which is in free and open competition with commodities of the general class produced by others, may fix and enter into price maintenance contracts. The "nonsigner" provision, supra, which provides that willfully and knowingly advertising, or reselling such commodity at less than the price stipulated in a contract of this sort constitutes unfair competition whether such seller is or is not a party to the contract. The act also provides that it shall not apply to any contract or agreement between producers or between wholesalers or between retailers as to sale or resale prices.

In Sears v. Western Thrift Stores of Olympia, Inc., supra, this court held in accord with the weight of authority, that the act, providing as it did for "vertical" price fixing rather than "horizontal" price fixing, did not contravene Art. XII, § 22, of our state constitution, prohibiting monopolies.

The court further held, without discussing the relation of the act to the public welfare, that the nonsigner provision was valid as an exercise of the police power.

[Nonsigner Provision—Police Power]

Several constitutional objections are raised on this appeal; however, we rest our decision on a re-examination of the latter holding of the Sears case, pertaining to the validity of the provision as an exercise of the police power.

This case is not concerned with the unfair practices act (RCW chapter 19.90) which deals with the unjust discrimination involved in loss leader sales and sales below cost, and prescribes a method of computing cost. See State v. Sears [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,043], 4 Wn. (2d) 200, 103 P. (2d) 337 (1940). Neither is it concerned with the right of a manufacturer to fix the retail price of its product by contract with the retailer, as was Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson, 76 Wash. 649, 137 Pac. 144 (1913).

The United States Supreme Court, in Old Dearborn Distributing Co. v. Seagram-Distillers Corp. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,141],

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

299 U. S. 183, 81 L. Ed. 109, 57 S. Ct. 139 (1936), sustained the constitutionality of the fair trade act of Illinois, including the nonsigner clause; however, the court recognized that such price fixing was still illegal in interstate commerce, being contrary to the provisions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 26 Stat. 209.

To validate vertical price-fixing agreements, Congress passed the Miller-Tydings Act, of 1937, 50 Stat. 693, amending the Sherman Anti-Trust Act; however, in Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Distillers Corp. [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,823], 341 U. S. 384, 95 L. Ed. 1035, 71 S. Ct. 745 (1951), the nonsigner provision was held invalid under the act. The court used the following language:

". . . If a distributor and one or more retailers want to agree, combine, or conspire to fix a minimum price, they can do so if the state law permits. Their contract, combination, or conspiracy—heretofore illegal—is made lawful. They can fix minimum prices pursuant to their contract or agreement with impunity. When they seek, however, to impose price fixing on persons who have not contracted or agreed to the scheme, the situation is vastly different. This is not price fixing by contract or agreement; that is price fixing by compulsion. That is not following the path of consensual agreement; that is resort to coercion. . . .

"Contracts or agreements convey the idea of a cooperative arrangement, not a program whereby recalcitrants are dragged in by the heels and compelled to submit to price fixing."

The McGuire Act, of 1952, 66 Stat. 632, approved the subjection of nonsigners to price-fixing agreements in interstate commerce, where such restrictions are imposed by state law. This act was upheld in Schwegmann Bros. Giant Super Market v. Eli Lilly & Co. [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,516], 205 F. (2d) 788 (C. A. 5th, 1953), certiorari denied 346 U. S. 905, 98 L. Ed. 369, 74 S. Ct. 71.

The United States Supreme Court has not decided whether the fact that some states have laws of this type while others do not, tends to create an undue burden on interstate commerce, although it might well be argued that this is the case.

This court held, three judges dissenting, in Sears v. Western Thrift Stores of Olympia, Inc., supra, that the nonsigner clause of the fair trade act was a valid exercise of police power. But, as stated before in this opinion, the court did not point out how the health, safety, morals, or welfare of the public was affected by the legislation.

[Health, Safety, Morals, Welfare]

In 16 C. J. S., Constitutional Law, 939-945, § 195, it is stated:

". . . The limit of a state's exercise of the [police] power is reached when the regulation transcends public necessity. . . .

"In order that a statute may be sustained as an exercise of the police power, . . . the courts must be able to see that the enactment has for its object the prevention of some offense or manifest evil or the preservation of the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare, that there is some clear, real, and substantial connection between the assumed purpose of the enactment and the actual provisions thereof, and that the latter do in some plain, appreciable, and appropriate manner tend toward the accomplishment of the object for which the power is exercised. . . . The legislature may not exercise the police power for private purposes, or for the exclusive benefit of particular individuals or classes. . . . A statutory provision which is not a legitimate police regulation cannot be made such by being placed in the same act with a police regulation, or by being enacted with a legislative declaration of a purpose which would be a proper object for the exercise of that power. . . ."

Thus, it is seen that to justify any law upon the theory that it constitutes a reasonable and proper exercise of police power, it must be reasonably necessary in the interest of the health, safety, morals, or welfare of the people. This exercise of police power must pass the judicial test of reasonableness.

After Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Distillers Corp., supra, legal scholars re-examined the reasonableness and validity of the fair trade acts in the light of the actual operation of these acts. See 49 Yale L. Jour. 607, 21 Chicago L. Rev. 175, 46 Ill. L. Rev. 349, 60 Yale L. Jour. 929.

In respect to this phase of the problem, the supreme court of Oregon in General Elec. Co. v. Wahle [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,333], 207 Ore. 302, 296 P. (2d) 635 (1956) stated:

"In 49 Yale LJ 607 and in 21 Chicago L. Rev. 175, are to be found exhaustive and well-written articles concerning the Fair Trade statutes by two eminent scholars, viz., Harry Shulman, Sterling Prof. of law, Yale Law School, and Carl H. Fulda, Prof. of Law, Rutgers University, respectively. From the facts and statistics given, the accuracy of which seem beyond question, it is plainly apparent that the consumer is not benefited, but on the contrary is harmed by the operation of the Fair Trade Act. The consumer is the public. He is compelled to pay a higher price for a given commodity in order that the retailer may be guaranteed a higher fixed, and often unreasonable, profit. If Professors Shulman and Fulda are correct in their observations, and we have no reason to believe otherwise, it is obvious that the whole scheme of the Fair Trade Acts is one for private, rather than public, gain, a scheme fathered by highly organized groups of distributors and retailers, interested not in the public weal, but only in their own selfish ends. Manifestly, such a scheme bears no relation whatever to the public morals, health, safety, or general welfare."

Since May, 1951, sixteen state supreme courts have declared acts of this kind unconstitutional. Generally, the acts were found unconstitutional on the grounds that legislative power had been unlawfully delegated and that they constituted improper use of the police power in that they bore no reasonable relation to the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the public.

The supreme court of New Mexico said in the case of Skaggs Drug Center v. General Elec. Co. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,823], 63 N. M. 215, 315 P. (2d) 967 (1957):

". . . In substance, therefore, what is the real purpose of the Fair Trade Act? No matter what high-sounding terms are used, such as 'free and open competition,' 'unfair competition,' and 'protection of good will,' it is a matter of common knowledge that it is a price-fixing statute, designed primarily to destroy competition at the retail level. The high-sounding phrases used with respect to the trade-mark owners are simply excuses and not a reason for the law."

Then in declaring the nonsigner clause of the New Mexico fair trade act unconstitutional, the court said:

"In view of the above, it will be determined that § 2, Chapter 44 of the Laws of 1937, . . . [identical with § 3, chapter 176, Wash. Laws of 1937] is unconstitutional and void as an arbitrary and unreasonable exercise of the police power without any substantial relation to the public health, safety or general welfare insofar as it concerns persons who are not parties to contracts provided for in [the fair trade act]."

In Rogers-Kent, Inc. v. General Elec. Co. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,810], 231 S. C. 636, 99 S. E. (2d) 665 (1957), the South Carolina court declared the nonsigner clause of the fair trade act to be unconstitutional and stated:

"The right of an owner of property to fix the price at which he will sell [his property] is an inherent attribute of the property itself.

"This legislation can be justified only upon the theory that it constitutes a reasonable and proper exercise of the inherent police power of the State. We have held that such power can only be exercised where it is reasonably necessary in the interests of the public order, health, safety, morals or general welfare."

The court in holding that the fair trade act had no reasonable relation to the public order, health, safety, morals or general welfare, stated:

"It is difficult to find any justification for this legislation based upon considerations of the public health, safety, morals and general welfare. It applies to every product bearing the trade-mark, brand or name of the producer. No distinction is made between commodities affected with a public interest and those which are not. Under the terms of the act, a non-signer has no voice whatsoever in fixing the price at which he will sell his property. By entering into a contract with a single retailer, the trade-mark owner may fix the price for all retailers, without regard to their interests or welfare. The manufacturer is not required to take into consideration the cost of his article. He may change the retail price at will or even terminate the contract and remove any article from the operation of the statute. It is solely up to him to say whether or not there shall be a law controlling the price at which his trade-marked article shall be sold."

In Shakespeare Co. v. Lippman's Tool Shop & Sporting Goods Co. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,303], 334 Mich. 109, 54 N. W. (2d) 268 (1952), the Michigan court initiated the trend of the courts to declare the nonsigner clause of the fair trade act unconstitutional. That court held the act unconstitutional as an unlawful exercise of the state's police power for the reason that it bore no reasonable relation to the public health, safety, morals or general welfare.

The supreme court of Arkansas in Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. White River Distributors, Inc. [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 67,953], 224 Ark. 558, 275 S. W. (2d) 455 (1955), ruled that the nonsigner clause of the fair trade act was unconstitutional as it was not protective of the public welfare and was in violation of the due process clause of the state constitution. The Arkansas court stated that it was its specific task to determine whether or not it could be reasonably said that the provisions of the nonsigner clause in any way promoted the general welfare of the people of the state. The court stated:

> "It is a generalization, but not an overstatement, to say that the effort to 'fix prices' is made by groups who desire to sell something for more than the sponsoring group believes that the purchasing public would pay for that 'something' without an enforced fixed price. It would seem apparent that the principal objective of minimum price maintenance is the protection of profit margins for retailers and distributors unable or unwilling to meet the pressure of competition."

The Arkansas court analyzed the effect of the act and made the following observation:

> "What the act does. Considering the Act in relation to this particular case, it virtually gives appellant the absolute right to fix the price at which Prestone must be sold to the consuming public in Arkansas without regard to the cost of manufacture or distribution. We are not forgetting that it must first contract with one retailer in the state and appellee must have knowledge of contract and the fixed price, but these provisions consist more of form than substance and merely indicate a desperate attempt to hedge against the charge of unconstitutionality. Nobody doubts the feasibility of appellant acquiring one contract dealer out of the hundreds of retail dealers in the state, or the feasibility of bringing this information to all other dealers. If securing a contract with one dealer binds all others, then the corollary would be that, absent such contract, the others are not bound. It is frightful to think a device so easily concocted could destroy the constitutional bulwark protecting our personal liberties and the public welfare."

In Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp. v. Francis [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,463], 134 Colo. 160, 301 P. (2d) 139 (1956), the Colorado court sitting en banc declared the act unconstitutional on several grounds. With respect to the subject under discussion, the exercise of the police power, the court made the following comment:

> "The right to contract is a property right, protected by the due-process clause of the constitution, and cannot be abridged by enactment. The police power of the state exercisable by the General Assembly, while very broad, is exercisable only within the limits of the constitution. To sustain the price fixing power attempted by the General Assembly in the statute involved, under a claimed exercise of the police power, would be to place the power of the legislature above the constitution."

In concluding its decision which, as indicated, was based on several constitutional grounds, the Colorado court made the following comment, which is similar to comments found in the other decisions:

> "During a recent decade numerous attempts were made to regiment the general public and in each instance they were struck down as violative of the constitutional rights of a free people. We have not yet arrived at the place in America where the many must yield to the few, so that the latter may make ever increasing profits at the expense of those who still believe in the principle of free and competitive trade and commerce, untrammeled by legislative fiats."

In the case of Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. Bargain Fair, Inc. [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 68,920], 167 Ohio St. 182, 147 N. E. (2d) 481 (1958), the Ohio supreme court ruled that the nonsigner clause of the fair trade law was not within the police power of the legislature.

> ". . . a part of the . . . Act represents an unauthorized exercise of the police power in a matter unrelated to the public safety, morals or general welfare."

[Manufacturer's Interest After Sale]

A theory of the Sears case, supra, adopted from the opinion of the United States supreme court in Old Dearborn Distributing Co. v. Seagram-Distillers Corp., supra, was that the manufacturer of a trade-marked product retains a proprietary interest in that product by reason of the fact that he owns the trademark and the good will associated therewith, when he sells that product to a retailer, even though the retention of such an interest is not made a part of the contract of sale. If the manufacturer does have an interest in the portion of good will which goes with the trade-marked product, then he is entitled to sue and recover that portion of the resale price which is attributable to such good will, and we do not think it can be seriously contended that he has such a right. In selling the product to the retailer, the manufacturer exacts a price for the use of his trademark and the benefit of the good will associated with it, as well as for the physical components of the product, and unless he also exacts an agreement that the retailer will not resell the product at less than a stipulated price, we can see no equity which should entitle him to the special protection of the law.

It is urged that the court should not overrule Sears v. Western Thrift Stores of Olympia, Inc., supra, because it has been the law for eighteen years and a substantial number of contracts have been made in reliance upon the Sears decision. By this, it is undoubtedly meant that many manufacturers have neglected to obtain contractual undertakings from their retailers to adhere to the prices set by the manufacturer. If so, it should be a simple matter to correct this practice in the future, and the amount of the agreed damages in this action indicates that the loss sustained by the manufacturer is not severe. At any rate, there is no showing that the hardship to manufacturers and retailers resulting from the overruling of the Sears case would be great enough to warrant the perpetuation of an erroneous decision.

The language of Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, in the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U. S. 429, is quoted with approval in State ex rel. Bloedel-Donovan Lbr. Mills v. Savidge, 144 Wash. 302, 258 Pac. 1 (1927):

> "'Manifestly, as this court is clothed with the power, and entrusted with the duty, to maintain the fundamental law of the Constitution, the discharge of that duty requires it not to extend any decision upon a constitutional question if it is convinced that error in principle might supervene.'"

[Nonsigner Provision Invalid]

The nonsigner clause of the fair trade act, Laws of 1937, chapter 176, § 3 (RCW 19.89.030) is declared invalid as an improper exercise of the police power, and the case of Sears v. Western Thrift Stores of Olympia, Inc., supra, is expressly overruled insofar as it validates the nonsigner clause.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: WEAVER, C. J., MALLERY, J., HILL, J., and FOSTER, J.

[Dissenting Opinions]

HUNTER, J. (Dissenting)—The appellants contend that the fair trade act in question should be held unconstitutional; that the case of Sears v. Western Thrift Stores of Olympia, Inc. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,152], 10 Wn. (2d) 372, 116 P. (2d) 756 (1941), should be overruled, and if it is not overruled, the act should be held unconstitutional on other grounds not considered in the Sears case. Being in disagreement with the views of the majority that the Sears case should be overruled, all of the contentions raised by the appellants will be considered in this dissent.

[Delegation of Legislative Authority]

The appellants first contend the act is in violation of Art. II, § 1, as amended by the seventh amendment of the constitution of the state of Washington, in that it delegates legislative authority to private persons without requiring the conformance to any standards prescribed by the legislature.

In the early case of C. W. & Z. R. R. Co. v. Commissioners of Clinton County, 1 Ohio State 77 (1852), that court made this distinction in regard to a delegation of powers as opposed to a mere grant of rights under a completed law:

> ". . . The true distinction, therefore, is, between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made."

We have in essence followed the same reasoning in this state in regard to an unlawful delegation of legislative power. In the case of State v. Storey, 51 Wash. 630, 99 Pac. 878 (1909), we made the following statement in regard to a contention of unlawful delegation, which was also approved in Rover v. Public Utility Dist., 186 Wash. 142, 56 P. (2d) 1302 (1936), and Port of Tacoma v. Parosa, 52 Wn. (2d) 181, 324 P. (2d) 438 (1958):

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

". . . The mere fact that the act does not take effect until the contingency arises, does not indicate a delegation of legislative power, even where the contingency depends upon the action of certain persons. . . . In such cases it cannot be said that legislative authority is delegated. The local judgment merely accepts or rejects the operation of the legislative act. . . ."

In the instant case the legislature enacted a complete law; the mere fact that it does not become binding on others until it is invoked by a producer, does not constitute making a law as a result of the producer's act. The producer has only the option to take advantage of the fair trade law enacted by the legislature, if his commodity is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced by others.

In jurisdictions outside of this state there is a sharp division of authority as to fair trade acts similar to ours constituting an unlawful delegation of legislative power to private individuals. The line of authorities followed by the California court in its recent opinion of Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Skaggs Pay Less Drug Stores [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,234], 45 Cal. (2d) 881, 291 P. (2d) 936 (1955), is in conformity with the thinking of this court as expressed in State v. Storey, supra, which I believe to be the better rule. In the California case, the same contention of unlawful delegation was made upon the fair trade act of that state which is similar to our act. That court stated:

". . . Here the acts of private parties in entering into contracts for the sale of commodities constitute the facts in contemplation of which the Legislature acted, and upon the existence of which the provisions of the enactment were to be applicable. The private contracts are no more legislative in character than are other acts or conduct of private parties undertaken as a prerequisite to the application of a statute. The consequence that the statute has become applicable, and conduct in violation thereof has become actionable is in no way due to the exercise of any assumed legislative power on the part of the contracting parties. . . ."

I see no unlawful delegation of legislative authority in our fair trade act in derogation of the state constitution.

[Police Power]

It is appellants' second contention that the act has the effect of depriving persons of liberty and property without due process of law and constitutes legislation beyond the scope of the police power of the state, having no relation to the public health, safety, welfare or morals, all contrary to Art. I, § 3, of the state constitution which provides:

"No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

In the Sears case, supra, we said:

"Does the act represent a valid exercise of the legislative power? If it does, we cannot hold it to be invalid merely because it may be an unwise law and of questionable expediency, or because it may be unable to correct the supposed evils that it is intended to remedy, or because of any other objection directed to its wisdom. This court is interested only in whether there has been a subversion of rights as guaranteed by the constitution."

We then proceeded to decide the exact issue tendered here by stating:

"That this act is a valid exercise of the police power of the state is clearly established. We held in State v. Sears, 4 Wn. (2d) 200, 103 P. (2d) 337, 118 A. L. R. 506, that the police power extends not only to the preservation of the public health, safety, and morals, but also to the preservation and promotion of the public welfare. Moreover, we stated that the legislature is vested with a wide discretion in determining what the public interest requires, and what measures are necessary to protect those interests. In the case at bar, the legislature decided that trademark owners, distributors of identified commodities, and the public needed protection against injurious and uneconomic practices. . . ." (Italics mine.)

Passing upon this same question the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Old Dearborn Distributing Co. v. Seagram-Distillers Corp. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,141], 299 U. S. 183, 81 L. Ed. 109, 57 S. Ct. 139 (1936), held that the Illinois fair trade act, which is virtually the same as our enactment, did not violate the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal constitution. The court there said:

"First. In respect of the due process of law clause, it is contended that the statute is a price-fixing law, which has the effect of denying to the owner of property the right to determine for himself the price at which he will sell. Appellants invoke the well-settled general principle that the right of the owner of property to fix the price at which he will sell it is an inherent attribute of the property itself, and as such is within the protection of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. [Citations omitted.] These cases hold that, with certain exceptions, which need not now be set forth, this right of the owner cannot be denied by legislative enactment fixing prices and compelling such owner to adhere to them. But the decisions referred to deal only with legislative price fixing. They constitute no authority for holding that prices in respect of 'identified' goods may not be fixed under legislative leave by contract between the parties. The Illinois Fair Trade Act does not infringe the doctrine of these cases.

"Nor is § 2 so arbitrary, unfair or wanting in reason as to result in a denial of due process. We are here dealing not with a commodity alone, but with a commodity plus the brand or trade-mark which it bears as evidence of its origin and of the quality of the commodity for which the brand or trade-mark stands. Appellants own the commodity; they do not own the mark or the good will that the mark symbolizes. . . ."

I am of the opinion that appellants' second contention cannot be sustained, and that we correctly decided the question of due process in the Sears case, supra. Appellants argue, however, that if the act when it was enacted bore any relation to the public health, safety, or general welfare, such relationship has long since disappeared.

It appears to be clear that the fair trade act was a valid and necessary exercise of the police power for the protection of the general welfare. Our fair trade act was enacted in 1935 and reenacted in 1937 (Laws of 1937, chapter 176, § 3 (RCW 19.89.030). The compelling reason for such legislation was aptly stated in 34 Mich. L. Rev. 691 (1936):

"It will be recalled that this practice [retail price cutting], which began its phenomenal growth shortly before the beginning of the present century, created what many believed to be two serious evils. Because it made the price of nationally advertised products vary from store to store and city to city, it forced the producer of such goods into virtual competition with himself, allowed others to capitalize on his extensive advertising campaigns, and eventually lowered his article in the eyes of the consumer. But worse than this, it drove to the wall many small retail merchants who, because of large overheads and small turnovers, could not compete. This latter not only seriously affected the public but deprived the trade-mark owner of available markets and tended to fetter competition in the retail trade." (Footnotes omitted.)

Assuming, arguendo, these dangers to the general welfare no longer exist in our economy is not a reason for concluding that the act no longer bears a reasonable relation to the general welfare; but rather is a reason for concluding it has been effective as a protection from the dangers in the past and is effective as a protection from the same dangers that may arise from our economy in the future. It is inconceivable that a statute is a valid exercise of the police power when it functions to cure an existing evil, but becomes an invalid exercise of the police power when the evil no longer exists and the statute functions only to prevent recurrence of the same evil.

If, as appellants contend, the relation of the statute to the general welfare no longer exists, this does not make it incumbent upon the court to decide that the statute is an unreasonable exercise of the police power, because the reasonableness of the statute need not be tested by the facts which do now exist but by the facts which might reasonably be conceived to exist. We stated in Shea v. Olson, 185 Wash. 143, 53 P. (2d) 615 (1936):

"In determining whether a law comes within the police power of the state, it is not incumbent upon the court to find that facts which would justify such legislation actually exist. If a state of facts which would justify the legislation can reasonably be conceived to exist, the court must presume that it did exist and that the law was passed for that purpose. [Citations omitted.]"

This court cannot now say that such a state of facts can no longer reasonably be conceived to exist to justify this legislation. If the appellants believe the law is of questionable expediency, their appeal should be made to the legislature and not to this court.

[Special Class of Persons]

The appellants next contend that the nonsigner clause of the fair trade act is in violation of Art. I, § 12, of the constitution of the state of Washington, in that it grants special privileges to a class of citizens, which privileges do not equally apply to all citizens.

In State ex rel. Bacich v. Huse, 187 Wash. 75, 59 P. (2d) 1101 (1936), we said:

> "The aim and purpose of the special privileges and immunities provision of Art. I, § 12, of the state constitution and of the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal constitution is to secure equality of treatment of all persons, without undue favor on the one hand or hostile discrimination on the other.
> "To comply with these constitutional provisions, legislation involving classifications must meet and satisfy two requirements: (1) The legislation must apply alike to all persons within the designated class; and (2) reasonable ground must exist for making a distinction between those who fall within the class and those who do not."

See, also, Adams v. Hinkle, 51 Wn. (2d) 763, 322 P. (2d) 844 (1958).

Here the act meets these requirements as above set forth, (1) it applies equally to all persons selling an identified commodity in free and open competition with other commodities of the same general class, and (2) reasonable grounds exist for the designation of the class by their investment and property right in the article and good will associated with it, as distinguished from the class of those producing an article which does not bear a trademark, brand, or name.

[One Subject in Act]

Appellants also contend that the fair trade act is in violation of Act. II, § 19, of the constitution of the state of Washington, in that the act embraces more than one subject and the subject embraced is not expressed in the title.

The above section of the constitution reads as follows:

> "BILL TO CONTAIN ONE SUBJECT. No bill shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title."

The title to the fair trade act reads as follows:

> "An Act to protect trade-mark owners, distributors and the public against injurious and uneconomic practices in the distribution of articles of standard quality under a distinguished trade-mark, brand or name."

In State ex rel. Toll Bridge Authority v. Yelle, 32 Wn. (2d) 13, 200 P. (2d) 467 (1948), we said:

> "It is to be noted that this constitutional provision contains not merely one prohibition or direction to the legislature, but two, viz: (1) No bill shall embrace more than one subject; and (2) the subject of every bill shall be expressed in the title."

In the case of Casco v. P. U. D. No. 1, 37 Wn. (2d) 777, 226 P. (2d) 235 (1951), we quoted with approval this portion of American Jurisprudence, 50 Am. Jur. 178, Statutes, § 197:

> "'. . . To constitute plurality of subject, an act must embrace two or more dissimilar and discordant subjects, that by no fair intendment can be considered as having any legitimate connection with or relation to each other. Within the meaning of the constitutional provision, matters which apparently constitute distinct and separate subjects are not so where they are not incongruous and diverse to each other. Generally speaking, the courts are agreed that a statute may include every matter germane, referable, auxiliary, incidental, or subsidiary to, and not inconsistent with, or foreign to, the general subject or object of the act.'"

In Randles v. State Liquor Control Board, 33 Wn. (2d) 688, 206 P. (2d) 1209 (1949), we made this statement in holding a title sufficiently complied with the foregoing constitutional provision:

> "A title does not need to be an index to the contents of a measure. The purpose of a title is to call attention to the subject matter of the act, so that anyone reading it may know what matter is being legislated upon, and is sufficient when it is broad enough to accomplish that purpose. All incidentals germane to a title may be brought within the legislation although not specifically referred to in such title . . . ."

In applying these rules, it is my conclusion that the Washington fair trade act embraces only one subject: the prevention of injurious and uneconomic practices involving articles distinguished by a trademark, brand or name; and that the subject is adequately expressed in the title.

[State Antitrust Provision]

The last contention of the appellants is that the fair trade act is violative of Art. XII, § 22, of the constitution of the state of Washington, in that it authorizes contracts for fixing the price of products and commodities.

Art. XII of our constitution is entitled "CORPORATIONS OTHER THAN MUNICIPAL" and § 22 of Art. XII provides:

> "MONOPOLIES AND TRUSTS. Monopolies and trusts shall never be allowed in this state, and no incorporated company, copartnership, or association of persons in this state shall directly or indirectly combine or make any contract with any other incorporated company, foreign or domestic, through their stockholders, or the trustees or assignees of such stockholders, or with any copartnership or association of persons, or in any manner whatever for the purpose of fixing the price or limiting the production or regulating the transportation of any product or commodity. The legislature shall pass laws for the enforcement of this section by adequate penalties, and in case of incorporated companies, if necessary for that purpose, may declare a forfeiture of their franchises." (Italics mine.)

The appellants rely on the following language of § 22, supra: ". . . or in any manner whatever for the purpose of fixing the price. . . ."

We made this statement in the Sears case, supra:

> "That the framers intended that § 22 of Article XII should deal with monopolies is clearly established by its reference to 'MONOPOLIES AND TRUSTS.' Moreover, a reading of § 22, giving to each word its ordinary meaning, indicates that the language relating to price fixing cannot be lifted out of its natural context and considered apart from the rest of the provision. The entire section must be read, construed, and applied as a whole. Thus the language in § 22 with reference to price fixing must relate to the essential purpose of the provision, namely, the prohibition of monopolies." (Italics mine.)

The best mode of ascertaining the meaning affixed to any word or sentence by a deliberative body is by comparing it with the words and sentences with which it stands connected, and a constitutional provision or a phrase in a constitutional provision must be read in connection with the context. Noscitur a sociis is a rule of construction applied to all written instruments. The obscurity of any particular word may be removed by reference to associated words. And the meaning of a term may be enlarged or restricted by referring to the object of the whole clause in which it is used. 11 Am. Jur. 663, § 53.

Language may not be lifted out of context to be considered independent of the remainder of the constitutional provision. It must be regarded as a whole, with effect and meaning given to every part subjected to construction. Sears v. Western Thrift Stores, supra; State ex rel. Wolfe v. Parmenter, 50 Wash. 164, 96 Pac. 1047 (1908); Chlopeck Fish Co. v. Seattle, 64 Wash. 315, 117 Pac. 232 (1911).

I do not believe that the framers of the constitution meant anything more than to prohibit monopolies and trusts when they enacted this provision. Price maintenance is but one facet of a monopoly, as is the limitation of production or the regulation of transportation of a product or commodity, but it does not follow that price maintenance per se constitutes a monopoly.

In the case of Fisher Flouring Mills Co. v. Swanson, 76 Wn. 649, 137 Pac. 144 (1913), we held that a manufacturer, who has given a reputation to particular goods which he creates, has the right to fix in his contract of sale to retailers a reasonable minimum price at which those goods will be sold to consumers. We said:

> ". . . Contracts fixing prices as incidental to some main contract, and involving less than a controlling part of a given commodity in a given market, not proceeding from, nor tending to create, or to maintain a monopoly, will be sustained when the restriction is, under the circumstances of the particular case, reasonable in reference to the interests of the parties, and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public; that is to say, when the price fixed is fairly necessary to the protection of the covenantee, and fair to the public in that it furnishes only a reasonable profit to the contracting parties. Lacking these elements, such contracts are invalid as contrary to public policy. . . ." (Italics mine.)

In the case of Group Health Cooperative of Puget Sound v. King County Medical Society [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,201], 39 Wn. (2d) 586, 237 P. (2d) 737 (1951), this court, in a unanimous En Banc decision, said:

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

"There is a well-settled rule, however, that Article XII, § 22, does not condemn price fixing and the limitation of production per se, but only when either of these results is brought about in connection with a monopoly, with resulting unreasonable restraint upon competition. Sears v. Western Thrift Stores, supra; Washington Cranberry Growers' Ass'n v. Moore, 117 Wash. 430, 201 Pac. 773, 204 Pac. 811, 25 A. L. R. 1077. It is therefore necessary to determine whether respondents' combination or arrangement by which production is limited and prices are fixed with respect to prepaid medical service, amounts to a 'monopoly' in the constitutional sense." (Italics mine.)

The supreme court of South Dakota, in the case of Miles Laboratories, Inc. v. Owl Drug Co. [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,078], 67 S. D. 523, 295 N. W. 292 (1940), held that their fair trade act, which is in substance the same as the Washington fair trade act, did not violate the following provision of their state constitution:

"'Monopolies and trusts shall never be allowed in this state and no incorporated company, co-partnership or association of persons in this state shall directly or indirectly combine or make any contract with any incorporated company, foreign or domestic, through their stockholders or the trustees or assigns of such stockholders, or with any co-partnership or association of persons, or in any manner whatever to fix the prices, limit the production or regulate the transportation of any product or commodity so as to prevent competition in such prices, production or transportation or to establish excessive prices therefor.

"'The legislature shall pass laws for the enforcement of this section by adequate penalties and in the case of incorporated companies, if necessary for that purpose may, as a penalty, declare a forfeiture of their franchises.'" (Italics mine.)

The South Dakota court said:

"A monopoly such as is meant by Section 20 of Art. 17 of our Constitution exists only where all or so nearly all of a product or commodity within a community or district is brought into the hands of one man or set of men, as to practically bring the handling or production of the commodity within such single control, to the exclusion of competition or free traffic therein [citation omitted]. To render the protection against monopoly more effective, this constitutional provision prohibits certain combinations and agreements dealing with the production, transportation and price of commodities insofar as they tend substantially to stifle competition. The 'Fair Trade Law' does not purport to give the producer the right to stifle competition in a commodity. The right to stabilize the price of a 'brand' in the manner described in the act may only be acquired or maintained if the commdoity [sic] remains in free and open competition. SDC 54.0402. An act which grants rights conditioned upon the maintenance of free competition does not purport to authorize the making of a 'contract * * * or in any manner whatever to fix the prices, * * * of any product or commodity so as to prevent competition * * * . . . .'"

In the case of Frankfort Distillers Corporation v. Liberto [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,654], 190 Tenn. 478, 230 S. W. (2d) 971 (1950), the court, in citing Sears v. Western Thrift Stores, supra, among other decisions, held the Tennessee fair trade act did not violate the state constitutional prohibition against monopolies.

In the case of State ex rel. Banker v. Clausen, 142 Wash. 450, 253 Pac. 805 (1927), we quoted with approval this portion of Ruling Case Law, which is now embodied in 11 Am. Jur. 659, § 50, as follows:

"'A cardinal rule in dealing with constitutions is that they should receive a consistent and uniform interpretation, so that they shall not be taken to mean one thing at one time and another thing at another time, even though the circumstances may have so changed as to make a different rule seem desirable. In accordance with this principle, a court should not allow the facts of the particular case to influence its decision on a question of constitutional law, nor should a statute be construed as constitutional in some cases and unconstitutional in others involving like circumstances and conditions. Furthermore, constitutions do not change with the varying tides of public opinion and desire. The will of the people therein recorded is the same inflexible law until changed by their own deliberative action; and therefore the courts should never allow a change in public sentiment to influence them in giving a construction to a written constitution not warranted by the intention of its founders.' 6 R. C. L. 46." (Italics mine.)

It has been the settled law in this state, by consistent and uniform interpretation, that Art. XII, § 22, of our constitution does not prohibit price maintenance per se, but is a prohibition against monopolies and trusts, and I fail to see that the fair trade act constitutes a monopoly or trust, thereby violating this provision of the constitution.

I am aware that there is a division of authority in other jurisdictions where the constitutionality of enactments similar to ours has been tested on the grounds we have considered. I believe, however, that the authorities sustaining the thinking expressed in this dissent are the better reasoned cases.

The Sears case, supra, which the appellants ask us to overrule, has been the law of this state for eighteen years, and I find no reasons more compelling in this appeal than we did then for holding the fair trade act unconstitutional, or in now overruling the established law of this state.

The determination of the trial court that the challenged act is constitutional should be affirmed.

I concur, OTT, J.

[Police Power]

DONWORTH, J. (Dissenting)—In my opinion, this court should not be concerned with the legislative problem of whether or not the "nonsigner" provision of the fair trade act now cures an economic evil which should be curbed under the police power of the state. It is for the legislature, not the court, to declare the public policy of this state in such matters.

In 1937, the legislature determined this matter of policy, and, in 1941, this court upheld the validity of its action as being within the police power.

What we said in State v. Sears [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,043], 4 Wn. (2d) 200, 103 P. (2d) 337 (1940), with respect to the constitutionality of the unfair practices act is equally applicable to the "nonsigner" provision of the fair trade act now before us:

> "We may or may not agree with the economic philosophy of the unfair practices act, but it is no part of the duty of this court to determine whether the policy embodied in a statute is wise or unwise. It is primarily a legislative, and not a judicial, function to determine economic policy. If it be the declared legislative policy to curb unrestrained and harmful competition, by measures which are not arbitrary or discriminatory, it is not for us to say the rule is unwise. With the wisdom of the policy adopted, with the adequacy or practicability of the law to enforce it, the courts are both incompetent and unauthorized to deal."

Having held in 1941, in Sears v. Western Thrift Stores of Olympia, Inc. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,152], 10 Wn. (2d) 372, 116 P. (2d) 756 (1941), that the "nonsigner" provision was within the police power, I think that we should not now declare that statute to be invalid simply because, upon a re-examination of our former decision, it now appears to a majority of the court that that provision is not a reasonable exercise of the police power and that it is detrimental to the best interests of the people. Although our conception of what is for the public good may differ from that of the legislature, it is not within our province to determine such matters of legislative policy.

Furthermore, the scope of police power should not change with the personnel of the court. The portion of our decision in State ex rel. Banker v. Clausen, 142 Wash. 450, 253 Pac. 805 (1927) (quoted near the close of Judge Hunter's dissenting opinion), relating to the need for consistency and uniformity in constitutional interpretation by the courts, is, in my opinion, applicable to the present case.

I would adhere to our decision in the Sears case and affirm the judgment of the trial court.

We agree with the views expressed hereinabove. FINLEY, J., and OTT, J.

Clayton and Sherman Antitrust Acts

Combinations and Conspiracies—Proof of Conspiracy—Legality of Motion Picture Runs and Clearances—Discrimination.—Motion picture distributors and a chain exhibitor in the Minneapolis area were found to have conspired to establish and maintain preferential circuit runs for theatres operated by the chain, to grant such a preferential run to a theatre operated by the chain, and to impose an unreasonable clearance upon an independent theatre in favor of the chain theatre. These practices had the effect of unreasonably restraining trade in that they deprived the independent theatre of the opportunity to compete with the chain theatre for a better playing position by independent negotiations in a free market. Prior government judgments and decrees, which established that these distributors had engaged in a national conspiracy which had among its objectives the granting of preferential runs to the exhibitors affiliated with the major distributors, were prima facie evidence against the defendants in the instant action. This national conspiracy was carried out on a local level by the establishment and maintenance of a clearance schedule based on admission price. This uniform schedule was well known to and followed by all of the distributors in the area and was established and existed with the approval and cooperation of these distributors. The evidence did not support the contention that the chain theatre was entitled to a preferential run. While the court recognized that distributors, acting separately, could legally determine that where two theatres are in competition, circumstances may justify the granting of a preferential run to one of them and that where several distributors place a theatre on a particular availability, others generally follow the same plan to have an even flow of pictures on the same availability, it held that the instant situation did not arise because of such circumstances. Here the discrimination existed merely because one theatre was a chain and the other was an independent. The fact that the two principal shareholders of the independent theatre were the lessors of the chain theatre did not show any consent to the preferential arrangement. Demand on one of the defendants for an equal availability was not necessary where the evidence clearly showed that such defendant was a member of the conspiracy and that any demand would have been futile. Under the circumstances of the case, the mere failure of the independent theatre to protest could not immunize the distributors from any wrong.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.360, 2005.410, 2005.553.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Who May Be Liable—Parties Defendant—Subsidiaries—Effect of Prior Government Decrees.—A motion picture distributing company which did not participate in a local conspiracy to establish preferential runs and clearances was not a proper defendant in a civil damage action based on the local conspiracy. It was immaterial that this company was a wholly-owned subsidiary of a company which allegedly participated in the local conspiracy. The subsidiary would not be liable for the wrongdoing of its parent. The fact that the two corporations had a common directorate and employed some of the same workers did not destroy their distinct corporate existence. Since no contention was made that the corporations were not bona fide and since the parent was amenable to suit at the time of the institution of the suit, the subsidiary was not a proper defendant. It was also immaterial that this subsidiary distributing company was a defendant in litigation involving a similar conspiracy on a national scale. Decrees and judgments from that prior litigation could not attach liability to this company for the local conspiracy. In order for them to have that effect, the parties to the first suit must have known of and participated in the local wrong. In the instant case, the company did not participate in the local conspiracy and was not even doing business in the area during the time of the conspiracy.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9006, 9012.410.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—When Recovery Under Antitrust Laws May Be Barred—Statute of Limitations—Tolling the Period of Limitations.—The running of a six-year statute of limitations against one defendant, a chain exhibitor of motion pictures, was not tolled during the pendency of a Government antitrust suit since this defendant was not a party to the Government suit. The fact that such exhibitor was a wholly-owned subsidiary of a defendant in the Government suit was immaterial.

Thus, the exhibitor was liable only for damages accruing within the six years prior to the bringing of the instant action. However, as to the other defendants, who were defendants in the prior Government suit, the period of limitations was tolled.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9010.275.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Damages Recoverable —Apportionment of Damages.—In an action where there were two damage periods applicable to different defendants, the contention that the court could not apportion damages among tort feasors, but must hold that all defendants are jointly and severally liable for the damages incurred, was rejected. A six-year statute of limitations was personal to one of the defendants and was not applicable to the remaining defendants. The court ruled that there was no good reason why damages could not be assessed against the various defendants in the amounts and according to the liabilities established.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.520.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Damages Recoverable —Measure of Damages—Motion Picture Runs and Clearances.—Where it was found that a motion picture theatre was damaged as a direct and proximate result of a conspiracy, pursuant to which a theatre of a defendant was granted a preferential run and an unreasonable clearance was imposed on the plaintiff theatre, the court ruled that damages may be calculated by adding the boxoffice grosses of the two theatres for the years involved, assigning one-half of this total to the plaintiff theatre, deducting a fair allowance for film rental, and then determining the difference between the net thus arrived at and the actual net receipts of the plaintiff theatre. The court had found that a fair and reasonable basis for determining the amount of damages was to assume that the combined boxoffice grosses of the two theatres would not have been increased over the amounts actually secured by them had there been no conspiracy and had the plaintiff theatre secured a more advantageous playing position as the result of independent negotiations in a free market. It found that the plaintiff theatre's net loss was $56,123 during the damage periods.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.400.

For the defendants: Mandt Torrison, James C. O'Neill, and Bundlie, Kelley & Maun, St. Paul, Minn., for Paramount Film Distributing Corporation and Minnesota Amusement Company; and Philip Neville and Neville, Johnson & Thompson, Minneapolis, Minn., for the remaining defendants.

Memorandum Decision

[January 27, 1959]

[Parties]

Gunnar H. Nordbye, Chief Judge [In full text]: This action was brought under the Sherman and Clayton Anti-trust Acts and came on for trial before the undersigned without a jury.

Charles Rubenstein, Inc., is the owner of the Hollywood Theatre, hereafter called Hollywood. When it commenced operations on October 26, 1935, it was a newly constructed, attractive motion picture theatre situated in a suburban area of Minneapolis with a seating capacity of 950. Charles Rubenstein was President of the corporation. The principal shareholders at the time Hollywood was built were Louis Rubenstein, father of Charles, and A. A. Kaplan. Louis Rubenstein held 208 shares; A. A. Kaplan, 260 shares; Charles Rubenstein, 50 shares; and Anna, wife of Louis, 2 shares. Louis Rubenstein and A. A. Kaplan also were in business as a partnership under the name of Rubenstein and Kaplan and owned a theatre building known as the Arion, which was situated on a busy commercial street in northeast Minneapolis about one mile from the location of the Hollywood. Rubenstein and Kaplan, at the time the Hollywood was built, had leased the Arion Theatre to the Minnesota Amusement Company, hereafter referred to as

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

MAC, the largest operator of motion picture theatres in Minneapolis and throughout the State and in some of the neighboring States. It was a wholly owned subsidiary of Paramount Pictures, Inc., one of the largest distributors of motion pictures. Its theatres were commonly referred to as the circuit theatres or Publix theatres. The other defendants are the principal distributors of motion picture films in the United States. The jurisdiction of this Court is not in issue.

[Theatres Compared]

In 1935, before the Hollywood opened, the Arion was a 932 seat theatre charging 15 cents admission and on a playing position of 112 days after first run. Shortly before Hollywood opened, Arion advanced its admission price to 20 cents and changed its playing position to 70 days after first run. When Hollywood opened on a 25 cent admission, it obtained a 56 day playing position after first run. MAC, as the lessee of Arion in 1935, had permitted that theatre to become run down and in need of improvements. It was in poor shape to compete with the brand new and attractive Hollywood.

These two theatres were in substantial competition with each other, and it is evident that MAC recognized the inroads which Hollywood would make on the business of Arion. At first it proposed to Rubenstein and Kaplan, the lessors of Arion and the principal stockholders of Hollywood, that the two theatres should form a pool whereby the two theatres would be operated jointly and the net profits divided equally between them. This proposal was set forth and recorded in a memorandum by MAC in the following language:

> "Film is to be bought for these houses on the same basis, or approximately the same basis, as is now done for the Uptown and Granada [two theatres operated by MAC],—namely, giving the Hollywood the first choice of pictures, and playing the repeat runs on the big pictures, and also the sluff pictures, at the Arion. This would give the Hollywood every break and definitely classify the Arion as a cheaper type house."

[Change in Playing Position]

Rubenstein and Kaplan demurred to this plan, and suggested that the business of the Arion was being jeopardized by the failure of the lessees to keep the theatre in proper repair which MAC was required to do under the lease. When the proposed pooling arrangement was not consummated, MAC expended in September, 1936, some $16,000 on Arion for improvements. Arion then went on a 25 cent admission price and announced to the distributors that it would be on a 49 day playing position, 7 days ahead of Hollywood. The letter of August 28, 1936, from MAC to the branch manager of Metro Goldwyn Mayer illustrates the summary manner in which the changed policy of the Arion was announced. It reads:

> "Mr. W. H. Workman
> Metro Goldwyn Mayer
> Minneapolis, Minn.
> Dear Mr. Workman:
> Please be advised that the Arion Theatre, Minneapolis, will close after the last performance Sunday night, September 13, 1936. We will advise you as soon as possible the definite reopening date.
> For your information, the admission price at the Arion Theatre after reopening will be 25¢. We will therefore play pictures according to the 25¢ schedule of all our theatres—49 days after first run—giving this theatre seven days protection over other theatres listed in the clearance charging the same admission.
> Yours very truly,
> (Signed) J. A. Branton"

[Clearance Pattern]

At this time there was nothing startling about the rather casual manner in which this announcement of policy was made to the distributors. For some years MAC's suburban theatres charging 25 cents admission were the only theatres in Minneapolis receiving a 49 day availability after first run. Preferential runs long had been accorded to MAC theatres by the distributors, and when requested it was taken for granted that it would be fulfilled. In view of all the circumstances, to suggest that the preferential run accorded Arion was brought about by independent negotiations by MAC with each of the distributors seems highly improbable. Reference may be made to the clearance pattern in Minneapolis as noted by the manager of Metro Goldwyn Mayer to his home office in August, 1936. This is the schedule that all of the distributors followed:

"25 cent houses	49 days Publix [MAC Circuit Theatres]
25 cent houses	56 days Independents

20 cent houses 63 days Publix
20 cent houses 70 days Independents
15 cent houses 105 days Publix
15 cent houses 112 days Independents"

[Proof of Conspiracy]

It is not claimed that any of the distributor defendants offered or even considered a request for a better run for Hollywood during the period in controversy. All of them, though not all at the same time, followed the pattern of preference to MAC theatres. The language in the following cases is apposite here:

In Interstate Circuit v. United States [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,205], 306 U. S. 208, 226-227, the Supreme Court stated,

> "It is enough to warrant a finding of a 'combination' within the meaning of the Sherman Act, if there is evidence that the persons, with knowledge that concerted action was contemplated and invited, give adherence to and then participate in a scheme."

Also, in United States v. Paramount Pictures [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,244] 334 U. S. 131, 142, will be found the following:

> "* * * It is not necessary to find an express agreement in order to find a conspiracy. It is enough that a concert of action is contemplated and that the defendants conformed to the arrangement."

There is conflict in the testimony as to whether Hollywood made any objection to the preferential run accorded Arion in September, 1936. But there is substantial and credible evidence that protests were made by Hollywood's booking agent, Charles Rubenstein, to many of the distributors, and there is every reason to believe that vigorous objections were made. For a year Hollywood had been on a 56 day availability as a 25 cent house and, without any forewarning, Arion announced after some improvements to the theatre that it would change its policy from a 20 cent house to a 25 cent house and operate on an availability of 7 days ahead of Hollywood. Certainly, Hollywood was a theatre superior in appointments and attractiveness as compared to Arion. Arion was built in 1913. Hollywood was built in 1935, and generally was considered one of the most attractive suburban theatres at that time in Minneapolis. The only advantage that Arion had may be attributed to its location on a commercial street where residents in the area would go to shop and look for entertainment. But the evidence is wanting to support any contention that Arion was entitled to a preferential run over Hollywood. Admittedly, the unusual situation exists of the principal stockholders in Hollywood being the lessors of Arion to MAC. The Arion lease did not expire until 1943, and it is quite evident that MAC wanted to retain Arion as one of its suburban theatres in that particular locality. Louis Rubenstein died in 1939, so we do not have the benefit of his testimony. His interest, after his death, in the Rubenstein and Kaplan partnership inured to his widow, Anna Rubenstein. A. A. Kaplan was not active in the booking of films for Hollywood. Charles Rubenstein, the son of Louis, was a young man of 23 years of age in 1936, but he was in active charge as manager of Hollywood. He testified that he repeatedly protested to the branch managers of most of the distributors as to the preferential run granted Arion and requested that Hollywood be accorded the same availability as Arion. All of the circumstances would indicate that such protestations were made, at least to some of the distributors. Warner Bros. points out that the record is silent as to any specific request by Hollywood directed to it for an availability equal to that of Arion. But the failure of any demand by Hollywood to the defendant Warner Bros. to cease the illegal practice of granting a MAC circuit theatre a preferential run cannot release this defendant from liability for any unlawful acts or legalize such practices. Congress Building Corp. v. Loew's, Inc. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,799], 246 F. 2d 587, 595. Hollywood was placed in the same slot as other independent 25 cent houses competing with MAC theatres. Indeed, it would have been quite futile to have made any demand for a better run.

It is vigorously urged, however, that Hollywood consented to or acquiesced in the arrangement in that the two principal stockholders of Hollywood were the lessors of the Arion. Hence, it is reasoned that a successful operation of Arion by MAC was to the interest of Louis Rubenstein and Kaplan, and they were quite content to operate the Hollywood on a 56 day run. But that reasoning is not bottomed upon any affirmative evidence, nor is it persuasive. The lease returns on the Arion were in no way contingent upon the earnings of the theatre. As stated, the lease did not expire until 1943. MAC was a solvent lessee. It is true that the record does not disclose any written protest to the distributors or MAC by Hollywood as to its run. However, the bald facts are that Hollywood had been operating on an availability ahead of Arion for almost a year and its gross returns exceeded that of Arion, and then upon Arion's being accorded a preferential run, Arion's gross receipts began to exceed Hollywood's. Charles Rubenstein, though young, had been connected with the operation of motion picture theatres for some years. The impact of the favored run to Arion upon Hollywood's gross receipts was noticed by him immediately, and there is every reason to believe that protests were made. Not only was he aware of what was happening to Hollywood's receipts, but the distributors were aware of the situation as well. This is apparent from a letter written by the branch manager of Metro Goldwyn Mayer as early as November 17, 1936, which stated,

> "Since the Arion started to play ahead of the Hollywood, the Hollywood has been going substantially backward as could quite naturally be expected in the same manner as the new Arion last year went back when Hollywood was playing our product ahead of them."

The evidence is entirely wanting in any support of defendants' contention that Hollywood was content with the situation because of its relationship with MAC. In any event, under the circumstances here, mere silence on Hollywood's part could not immunize the defendants from any wrong which proximately resulted from their illegal actions.

[Reasonableness of Preferential Runs]

That there had existed in Minneapolis for some time prior to 1936 a local system of runs and clearances dominated by MAC due to its economic power is so strongly established by the evidence that any lengthy discussion of the situation seems wholly unnecessary. The various license agreements between the MAC theatres and the distributors reflect the preferential runs granted the circuit theatres. The entrenched preferential runs of MAC theatres existed with the approval and cooperation of all the defendant distributors doing business in this State at the time. It is idle to suggest that the distributors negotiated independently with MAC for the preferred run granted to Arion over Hollywood, or that Arion was granted that run because it agreed to pay the distributors a higher film rental than Hollywood. The arrangement made in 1936 with reference to Arion's run over Hollywood was a mere consummation of the standing arrangement between MAC and the distributors; that is, when there were two theatres in substantial competition operating at the same admission price, one an independent theatre and the other a circuit theatre operated by MAC, the latter upon request of the distributors received the preferential run. There can be no real question that this tacit arrangement between MAC and the distributors was in violation of the anti-trust laws of the United States. That these defendant distributors controlled the distribution of motion pictures in interstate commerce in the United States is admitted. Hollywood was denied a free market in which to deal to its detriment and to the benefit of Arion. The door was closed to it by the concerted action of the motion picture distributors and MAC, and it could not compete with Arion free from the unreasonable runs and clearances designed and followed by the distributors and MAC. The language of this Court in Homewood Theatre v. Loew's, Inc. [1952 Trade Cases ¶ 67,333], 110 F. Supp. 398, 407, is appropriate here:

> "An impartial consideration of the record here not only amply justifies, but requires, a finding that the defendants acted in concert in the establishment of a uniform system of runs and clearances in the licensing of motion pictures to the various motion picture houses in the City of Minneapolis, and one of the purposes of the establishment of uniformity and the acting in concert in the formation of a system of runs and clearances was to grant the local M. A. C. theatres a preferred position in runs and clearances. Such action presumably was prompted by the fact that the M. A. C. was the largest circuit exhibitor of motion pictures in this area and thus the source of a large revenue to the distributors."

Under no reasonable construction of the evidence can it be held that the clearance of the Arion over the Hollywood was reasonable. No attempt was made by the distributors to afford Hollywood an opportunity to meet Arion's percentage rental terms. And here we are not required to base the finding of a conspiracy on mere parallelism of action on the part of the distributors in dealing with Arion. Hollywood possessed at least an equal potential for theatre patronage to insure the distributors a rental percentage-wise on boxoffice returns comparable to that of Arion's, but it was afforded no opportunity by the distributors to compete with Arion in a free market.

The Court is not unmindful that distributors, acting separately, could determine, without infraction of the anti-trust laws, that where two theatres are in substantial competition, circumstances may well justify the granting of a preferential run to one of them. Moreover, it is well recognized among distributors, as well as exhibitors, that where several distributors have placed a certain theatre on a particular availability, other distributors generally follow the same plan because the particular theatre, in order to operate successfully, should have an even flow of pictures on the same availability. But the Arion-Hollywood situation as to runs and clearances did not arise on account of such circumstances. Here, a clear discrimination as to Hollywood existed merely because Arion was a circuit theatre and Hollywood an independent theatre.

[Effect of Lease Arrangement]

Defendants assert that plaintiffs' subsequent conduct after 1936 lends support to their position that Hollywood became more interested in obtaining lower film rental for its theatre and a renewed lease on the Arion than in objecting to its assigned run or demanding any redress for any claimed wrong by reason of the preferential run granted to Arion. This position requires a short recital of the events which took place after 1936. As stated, Louis Rubenstein died in 1939. His widow succeeded to his interest as a lessor of Arion. Apparently Kaplan was then the dominating partner in the partnership. Charles Rubenstein went into the military service in September, 1942, and remained there until April, 1946. During that period, one Martin Lebedoff was in charge of the booking and buying of film for Hollywood. However, the partnership, Rubenstein and Kaplan, from 1943 on, operated the Hollywood. In 1942, MAC began to negotiate for a ten-year renewal of its lease on Arion, which lease expired in 1943. The partnership of Rubenstein and Kaplan also owned the Granada Theatre in Minneapolis, which theatre was likewise leased to MAC. MAC contends that it was sustaining a net loss in the operation of both the Arion and the Granada. Moreover, MAC asserts that the partnership was making a fair return from its investment on the leases of the Arion and the Granada theatres. That the partnership was making a profit on the leases of these two theatres is not denied. On the other hand, MAC apparently wanted to renew the leases on both theatres. Satisfactory rental terms were agreed upon and the Arion lease was continued for ten years at $12,000 per year. In the rental negotiations in 1942, Charles Rubenstein represented his mother and there is no contention that the lessors attempted in any way to impose any restrictions or conditions in the Arion lease upon the playing position of the Arion with respect to Hollywood. Defendants urge with great earnestness that, if the plaintiffs were dissatisfied with the Arion's preferential runs, some demand or covenant in the Arion lease would have been inserted requiring MAC to cease its illegal activities in that regard and that the lessors' failure to do so indicates that they recognized that they were the beneficiaries of the preferential run granted Arion in that Arion's prosperity benefited them. They assert, therefore, that Hollywood, by strong inference, was entirely satisfied with the situation with respect to the allotted runs accorded to these two theatres. In other words, defendants assert that plaintiffs clearly have assented to any injury which may have resulted to Hollywood by reason of Arion's preferential run.

But defendants' position in this regard cannot be sustained after a fair consideration of all the circumstances. The prior rent on the Arion had been $15,000 per annum. The renewed rent in 1943 was $12,000. MAC does not contend that anything was said or done by plaintiffs which led it to believe that Hollywood was satisfied with its run or that MAC relied on anything that took place during the negotiations for the renewal of the lease which could constitute an estoppel. MAC received no specific encouragement from the plaintiffs that Hollywood was satisfied with its run, nor was it lulled into any understanding that its past wrongdoings were forgiven. Of course, the partnership of Rubenstein and Kaplan was not the owner of Hollywood. Its operation of Hollywood under a lease after the Arion lease was renewed for ten years was brought about primarily by reason of Charles Rubenstein's entering into the military service. The evidence here will not permit a finding that the agreement to lease Arion to MAC, without more, constitutes an acquiescence to use that theatre in discrimination against another theatre in which the lessors as stockholders had a controlling interest. The upshot of the matter is that the futility of further protest against the economic power of MAC in the control of runs and clearances in Minneapolis was apparent to all the exhibitors during the period in question, and it was not until the national conspiracy as disclosed in the Paramount cases had ended by final decrees that any hope of redress for the independent exhibitors became apparent. If the only evidence of discrimination against independent theatres in Minneapolis was this isolated instance of the preferential run accorded to Arion, then one might be tempted to infer that it arose from the relationship between the lessors of Arion and the operators of Arion. However, in that Arion's run over Hollywood was merely a following of the pattern set as to preferences granted to the circuit theatres, no such inference is warranted.

[Damages]

That Hollywood sustained damage by reason of Arion's preferred run is unmistakably clear. However, the arrival at a fair standard of damages is fraught with many vexatious problems. At the outset, it should be stated that every informed person in the motion picture industry recognizes that, as between two theatres in substantial competition, the earlier playing position is highly desirable. Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures [1946-1947 Trade Cases ¶ 57,445], 327 U. S. 251. The following account of the gross earnings throughout the immediate years before and after Arion had the preferred run is the most persuasive testimony in that regard:

	Hollywood	Arion
1935 (after 10-26)	$11,274	$ 7,948
1936 (to 9-5)	39,396	28,632
1936 (after 9-5)	18,522	19,031
1937	48,241	59,580

And this comparable disparity of gross earnings between the two theatres continued as long as Arion had the preferred run. Plaintiffs must recognize that the situation would not justify the favoring of Hollywood with a preferential run as long as the two houses were charging the same admission price. In fact, all that Hollywood ever demanded was a day and date run with Arion; that is, equal availability. Most exhibitors, as well as distributors, consider that a day and date run for two competing theatres is not economically sound because obviously the potential drawing patronage of the two theatres simply would be divided between the two and each would suffer a depletion of earnings. On the other hand, equal availability does not necessarily mean a day and date exhibition of the same picture. Self interest of the theatres involved would prompt them to arrange their bookings so that day and date exhibition would not occur too frequently. No doubt, therefore, some plan of booking as between the two theatres as to certain pictures released would or could be arranged in order to avoid day and date exhibitions. Hollywood takes the position that if it had been accorded a 49 day availability, as well as the Arion, the latter would not have been able to compete with the former for a playing position, and Hollywood would have continuously played ahead of the Arion as it did for the first ten and one-half months of its operation. But there is no sound basis for that assertion. During the first ten and one-half months of Hollywood's operation, Arion was in a rundown condition operating as a 15 cent and then a 20 cent house on a substantially later availability than Hollywood. Moreover, Hollywood's novelty as a new theatre would attract patronage during its early operations which would not necessarily indicate a basis for the subsequent patronage of the theatre. Arion did have the advantage of being on one of the main commercial streets of the City leading into the loop, with heavy vehicular traffic and pedestrian congregation. Hollywood was a neighborhood theatre situated in a residential area.

In addition, however, plaintiffs emphasize that a group of pictures either played day and date with Arion or ahead of Arion during the period in question, and they attempt by a comparison of boxoffice grosses to establish Hollywood's greater drawing power as a theatre. But there are many factors which militate against plaintiffs' conclusion that these 30 pictures scattered in showings over a period of twelve years demonstrate the superiority of Hollywood over Arion in producing boxoffice grosses. Some of the pictures played at Hollywood before Arion. At other times on Saturday nights Hollywood was playing double features and its receipts include the entire Saturday night receipts, while the Arion receipts are limited to the particular pictures in question and do not include the entire receipts for the particular Saturday nights in question. During some of the years (October, 1940, to January 6, 1943), Hollywood was charging a less admission price than Arion when the same pictures were played at both theatres day and date. Obviously, when two neighborhood theatres in substantial competition are playing the same pictures day and date, the theatre playing at a less admission price may garner the higher boxoffice grosses.

Plaintiffs assert that on a 49 day availability Hollywood would have grossed 125 per cent of Arion's actual grosses during the periods when Hollywood was playing behind Arion. This prediction is based largely upon the experience of the two theatres from October, 1935, to September, 1936, and in the year 1952 (a period after the impact of the conspiracy). It is apparent that the comparison of the earnings of the two theatres from October, 1935, to September, 1936, affords no basis for the computation of damages. This was the period before Arion's improvements. It was operating on a 112 and 70 day availability, and Hollywood was the newly constructed theatre on a 56 day availability. During 1952 Arion was operating on a 42 day availability for a portion of the year and Hollywood was playing on an availability of 28 days for some 6 months. Moreover, it is evident that the selection of that year for a comparison of grosses of these two theatres, some four years after the conspiracy had ended, is not a persuasive or safe guide for the determination of damages. Many changes had taken place in the Minneapolis motion picture theatre situation since 1948. The heavy competitive impact of television was present. Suburban areas were growing by leaps and bounds. Take the year 1951, for instance. Arion was operating on a 28 day availability, and Hollywood, except for a period from March 7 to July 18, 1951, when it was on a 35 day availability, was playing on a 56 day availability. Nevertheless, the difference in the boxoffice gross for that year was about $1,000 in favor of Arion. If we should use the year 1951 as a guide in assessing damages, the losses to Hollywood by reason of Arion's preferred run would appear to be very moderate.

[Government Decrees]

The question of damages requires a consideration of the Paramount decrees, the statute of limitations, the divisibility of any judgment of damages to be entered herein and which of the defendants named were a part of, and are liable for, the conspiracy which existed. The complaint in this action was filed November 6, 1952. At that time the Clayton Act contained the following provision:

> "Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity or criminal prosecution is instituted by the United States to prevent, restrain, or punish violations of any of the antitrust laws, the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under said laws and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof." 15 United States Code § 16.

The Court has admitted in evidence the so-called Paramount decrees. The positions of the courts as to the national conspiracy are to be found in 66 F. Supp. 323 [1946-1947 Trade Cases ¶ 57,470]; 70 F. Supp. 53 [1946-1947 Trade Cases ¶ 57,526]; 334 U. S. 131 [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,244]; 85 F. Supp. 881 [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,473]; 339 U. S. 974. The Court is of the opinion that the Paramount decrees are admissible and have evidentiary value herein. The so-called national conspiracy had as one of its objectives the granting of preferential runs to the exhibitors affiliated with the major distributors. This was carried out on a local level with reference to the preferential runs granted to MAC, a wholly owned subsidiary of Paramount Pictures, Inc. The government action in the Paramount case was instituted on July 20, 1938, and terminated in 1948, 1949 and 1950, the dates being different as to the several defendants therein. The earliest termination of the government suit as to any one of the defendants was on November 8, 1948, as to RKO.

[Tolling the Period of Limitations]

The preferential run was granted to Arion in September, 1936. From that date until the government suit was instituted on July 20, 1938, about one year and ten months had elapsed. From November 8, 1948, when the RKO decree was entered until the filing of the present action on November 6, 1952, approximately four years elapsed. In view, therefore, of the tolling of the statute of limitations by 15 U. S. C. § 16, it follows that plaintiffs may recover whatever damages Hollywood sustained from September 6, 1936, to the end of the conspiracy. However, this Court in Rubenstein v. Columbia [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,789], 154 F. Supp. 216, has determined that as to MAC, plaintiffs can recover damages only for the six-year period prior to November 6, 1952. This is bottomed primarily on the premise that MAC was not a party to the government suit, and hence the statute of limitations was not tolled as to it. Defendants contend that the Court cannot apportion damages among tort feasors, but must hold that all defendants are jointly and severally liable for the damages which plaintiffs have sustained. But the six-year statute of limitations is personal to MAC; it is not applicable to the remaining defendants. There is no good reason why damages may not be assessed against the various defendants in the amounts and according to the liabilities established. See Rule 20(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and Electric Theatre Co. v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp. [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,560], 113 F. Supp. 937.

[Demand]

Before arriving at the method of computing damages herein, certain motions made by individual defendants should be determined. First, Warner Bros. seek a dismissal because the evidence does not affirmatively establish that Hollywood ever made a demand upon it for a better run during the period in question. However, it is clear that Warner Bros., a member of the national conspiracy, also was a member of the conspiracy on the local level which had for its objective the granting to MAC theatres a preferential run over the independent theatres charging the same admission price. In view of the clarity of the evidence in that regard and the apparent futility of any demand on the part of independent theatres to terminate that concert of action, Warner Bros. cannot be immunized from its wrongdoing merely because Hollywood did not demand that it withdraw from the illegal combination.

[Proper Party Defendant]

The next motion, however, made by the Paramount Film Distributing Corporation (hereafter called Paramount Film) for judgment in its behalf because it is not a proper defendant, requires a somewhat extended discussion. Paramount Film was incorporated in 1939. It was the wholly owned subsidiary of Paramount Pictures, Inc. It was licensed by its parent corporation to distribute Paramount products from branch offices where Paramount Pictures, Inc., did not itself distribute its pictures. Paramount Pictures, Inc., distributed its own pictures in the State of Minnesota during the years in question and did so until it was dissolved on or about December 31, 1949, in accordance with the directive of a consent decree in United States v. Paramount, supra. Paramount Film distributed the pictures of Paramount Pictures in certain States other than Minnesota up to January 1, 1950. Paramount Pictures, Inc., under the directive for its dissolution, transferred all of the production and distribution assets to a newly formed New York corporation called Paramount Pictures Corporation, which became the new parent of Paramount Film. This new corporation expressly assumed the anti-trust liabilities of Paramount Pictures, Inc. Paramount Film did not assume such liabilities. It was not until January 1, 1950, that Paramount Film began to do business in Minnesota. It did receive, however, through its new parent, Paramount Pictures Corporation, the so-called production and distribution assets in this State formerly owned by Paramount Pictures, Inc.

By reason of its dissolution, Paramount Pictures, Inc., ceased doing business in Minnesota on December 31, 1949, and filed its certificate of withdrawal from this State on January 10, 1950. Under Minnesota law, Paramount Pictures, Inc., was amenable to service of process in this State for a three-year period thereafter. Consequently, Paramount Pictures, Inc., was amenable to suit at the time this proceeding was instituted on November 6, 1952. However, plaintiffs failed to avail themselves of the provision of the statute to which reference has been made and did not make Paramount Pictures, Inc., a party to this suit. Instead, they served Paramount Film, which company was not authorized to do business in this State until January 1, 1950, which date as will hereafter be indicated, was after the conspiracy had terminated as to Hollywood.

Plaintiffs advance several grounds as to why Paramount Film should be held liable for damages herein to the same extent as the other distributor defendants. They point out that Paramount Film was named as a defendant in the national conspiracy litigation (the Paramount cases), and they urge that that fact alone is sufficient to render this company responsible for the local acts of its fellow conspirators. But Paramount Film had nothing to do with this local conspiracy. It was not authorized to do business in this State during that period. The Paramount decrees alone cannot be the basis for a recovery of every unlawful act performed on a local level as to those who may have been parties to the national conspiracy. If that doctrine were to be applied, then any exhibitor or distributor defendant named in the Paramount cases could, without more, be held liable for the impact of any local conspiracy throughout the Nation although they were not doing business in the particular area and in no way participated in or even knew of the wrong which was committed.

Paramount Pictures, Inc., was the parent of Paramount Film. No contention is made that these corporations were not bona fide. The common directorate of the two corporations and the fact that some of the employees worked for both corporations will not permit their district corporate existence to be disregarded. No fraud or other illegal activities were practiced so as to estop either the parent or the subsidiary from urging its separate corporate existence. Here, plaintiffs seek to make the subsidiary, Paramount Film, liable for the wrongdoing of its parent. Plaintiffs had ample opportunity to sue the parent corporation, but it neglected to do so. The advent of Paramount Film into the State of Minnesota as a distributor of films for Paramount Pictures Corporation after the conspiracy had ended will not sustain plaintiffs' contention that it is liable for the acts of its former parent in a local conspiracy. Moreover, the isolated instances when Paramount Film's license contracts, sent from the State of Wisconsin where Paramount Film was authorized to do busines, may have been used in Minnesota during the period in question when the Minneapolis office was short of license contract forms is of no particular significance. And the assignment by Paramount Pictures Corporation, the new parent of Paramount Film to the latter of certain production and distribution assets in this State formerly owned by Paramount Pictures, Inc., when it too over the Minneapolis Exchange, is likewise of no help to the plaintiffs in their attempt to hold Paramount Film liable for the acts of its parent. At least, Paramount Pictures, Inc., would be an indispensable party. There is no evidence here as to the amount or value of the local assets of Paramount Pictures, Inc., turned over to Paramount Film. That the similarity of names of the Paramount companies may have caused confusion even to those employed by the various Paramount companies may be admitted. But there is no showing that plaintiffs were in any way misled or confused by the similarity of the names. Certainly, there was no confusion over the fact that Paramount Pictures, Inc., was dissolved on December 31, 1949; that it filed its certificate of withdrawal from the State on January 10, 1950; that a three-year period existed thereafter for suits to be brought against it; that Paramount Pictures Corporation assumed the liabilities of Paramount Pictures, Inc.; and that Paramount Film was not authorized to do business in this State until January 1, 1950. There is an absence of any sound premise in the record upon which any liability for Hollywood's damages herein can be thrust upon Paramount Film.

[Termination of Conspiracy]

As indicated above, the showing requires a finding that the preferential run obtained by Arion over Hollywood came to an end in 1948. Certain of the distributors in that year, at least, had entered upon a new plan of runs and clearances in Minneapolis, and although the plan of runs and clearances may be said to have been in a state of flux during that year, the break of the impasse theretofore maintained by the distributors in their refusal to accord independents equal availability with circuit theatres charging the same admission had taken place. A final decree had been entered in the Paramount cases and the national conspiracy was restrained. The evidence of the change in runs and clearances granted by the distributors in Minneapolis began to appear in 1948. At that time one Lowell Kaplan was the booking agent for Hollywood. Apparently, he made no attempt to obtain a better run for this theatre until April 6, 1949. He wrote a letter to all the defendant distributors on that date in behalf of Hollywood, as well as the Alhambra and El Lago theatres in Minneapolis, requesting a 28 day availability after the first run. On April 21, 1949, Paramount, while stating that it did not believe its best interests would be served by negotiating a 28 day availability, informed Kaplan that it would be willing to negotiate on the basis of a 42 day availability. However, on May 5, 1949, Kaplan wrote Paramount in answer to a letter of May 4, 1949, as follows:

> "In answer to your letter of the 4th regarding your release 'El Paso' for the Alhambra, El Lago and Hollywood theatres, please be advised that we will not at that date be ready for the 28 day availability."

Arion was then on a 28 day availability. On May 6, 1949, Fox offered Hollywood an opportunity to bid competitively with Arion on a certain picture, but Hollywood took no action on the offer. Metro Goldwyn Mayer offered Hollywood, some time before September 26, 1949, an opportunity to bid on 14 pictures on a competitive basis for a 26 day availability. However, no bids were received from Hollywood. Plaintiffs' response is that all the distributors had not evidenced sufficient interest in response to Kaplan's letter requesting a 28 day availability, and hence Hollywood was justified in concluding that it could not obtain an even flow of sufficient pictures to justify a change from the 56 day availability which it then had. However, the evidence is quite clear that the distributors had abandoned their concerted effort to favor the circuit theatres by the end of the year 1948. Homewood, for instance, an independent theatre, was on a 28 day run by Paramount in April, 1949. Riverside, likewise an independent theatre, was also at that time on a 28 day availability by Paramount. It is fair to find, therefore, that whatever differences there may have been in 1949 with reference to the availability granted to theatres in Minneapolis charging the same admission price, such differences were due to independent negotiations by the distributors and not by reason of any illegal combination. In any event, the Court is abundantly satisfied that, if Hollywood had attempted early in 1949 to negotiate for a better availability than 56 days after first run, it could have obtained a better run from sufficient distributors to enable it to maintain its theatre with an even flow of sufficient pictures. And the evidence is impelling that the strait jacket of runs and clearances which had been applied to Hollywood had been removed by the latter part of 1948. The unexpected freedom of market in that year may have confounded Hollywood as to its future policy. But such circumstances should not be charged against the defendants.

[Measurement of Damages]

Presumably, the determination of Hollywood's damages, simply stated, is the computation of the net gross box office returns that it would have obtained but for the conspiracy. But obviously that computation is laden with many difficulties. That Hollywood would have had to pay a higher film rental on a 49 day availability is evident. Moreover, that there would have been competitive bidding between the two theatres on many films is also highly probable. These occasions would tend to increase the film rental over that which Hollywood paid on a 56 day availability, and when some pictures would be played at each theatre day and date, the box office grosses of each theatre would be diminished. It is, of course, difficult to predict with any degree of certainty the various situations which would have arisen if these two theatres in substantial competition had been on an equal availability. It is entirely possible that during some years Hollywood, as a new and more attractive theatre, would have outstripped Arion in patronage. On the other hand, when Charles Rubenstein was in the military service and during the war years, Arion, on a busy commercial street, may have far out-distanced Hollywood in gross boxoffice receipts.

As an alternative method of computing damages, plaintiffs have set forth the net boxoffice returns of Hollywood and Arion during the years in question and has computed the difference as Hollywood's pecuniary loss. In this schedule plaintiffs have listed Hollywood's average film rental as 25 per cent and Arion's average film rental as 29.4 per cent. However, there are many considerations which tend to emphasize the fallaciousness of that method of computing damages. From October 1, 1940, until January 7, 1943, Hollywood voluntarily lowered its admission price from 25 cents to 20 cents and then raised it to 22 cents, and during that period was on a 70 day availability. Moreover, during that period it was playing some 14 days behind the Columbia Heights Theatre, one of its substantial competitors. The boxoffice grosses of Hollywood indicate a substantial slump during this particular period. In 1939, Hollywood's boxoffice grosses totaled $47,864; in 1940, 1941 and 1942, $42,865, $42,905 and $42,839 respectively. In 1943, however, when it returned to the 25 cent admission, its boxoffice grosses jumped to $49,278. When Charles Rubenstein was in the military service from 1943 to 1946, other management controlled the policy of Hollywood, and with the advent of gas rationing during the war years and the advantages which accrued to theatres located in the bright-light commercial areas, the disparity between the boxoffice gross of the two theatres is striking. In 1941, Arion's boxoffice grosses exceeded those of Hollywood by less than $5,000. In 1942, the excess of Arion over Hollywood was over $11,000; in 1943, Arion's excess was over $18,000; in 1944, the excess jumped to some $23,000; and in 1945, it was approximately $20,000. And in 1946 the spread in the grosses between the two theatres reached the all-time high of some $30,000. These differences in grosses cannot be attributed solely to the differences in their availabilities for pictures after first run. That there was a substantial impact upon theatre patronage during the war years is well established. Moreover, it seems evident that, when there was a change in management of Hollywood's policy and the experience with a lower admission price resulting in a 70 day run some 14 days behind Columbia Heights, one must conclude that the difference between the grosses in the two theatres must be attributed in part to causative factors and conditions other than the preferential run granted to Arion.

Once it is recognized that the record will not justify a finding that Hollywood would have obtained a preferential run during this entire period over Arion but for the conspiracy, we are confronted with many uncertainties in attempting to arrive at a fair measure of damages. It is reasonably certain, however, that if these two theatres had been given the same availability by the distributors, there would have been just so much theatre patronage for them in the area in which they were operating. In all probability, the combined box-office grosses of the two theatres would not have been increased over that which the records now reflect. Some years Hollywood's may have exceeded Arion's, and on the other hand, during some years Arion's undoubtedly would have exceeded Hollywood's. It is to be doubted that during the twelve year period with the many changing conditions and the probable fluctuations between the two theatres as to their playing positions, there would have resulted a greater joint gross boxoffice return than that which actually was received. As stated heretofore, MAC once proposed that the net boxoffice grosses of the two theatres be pooled and divided between the theatres on an equal basis. It seems reasonable to consider that plan and utilize it as a means of determining Hollywood's loss herein. Under such an arrangement, the total gross returns of the two theatres would have to be totaled and a reasonable film rental deducted therefrom, and the balance then divided between the two theatres. The one which has not received its full share of the net boxoffice returns should be replenished as a measure of the damages sustained as a direct result of the conspiracy. A computation of damages on that basis appeals to the Court in light of all the evidence as a fair and equitable disposition of a most difficult problem. Granted that there may be other methods of arriving at the damages herein which probably could be supported by the record and which might increase or decrease the pecuniary loss arrived at by the method of pooling the earnings of the two theatres, the Court concludes, after a great deal of consideration and reflection, that the so-called pooling of gross boxoffice returns should be adopted. But the Court does not concur in defendants' contention that the actual joint gross returns should be subject to an arbitrary percentage diminution. Defendants contend that the combined grosses of the two theatres would have been diminished by at least twelve and one-half per cent if they played on an equal availability. But that percentage figure is not based upon any evidence, and defendants assume to proceed with an equally unsupported theory of damages when they assert that Hollywood sustained no pecuniary loss whatsoever by reason of being deprived of an equal run with Arion. The fact of damages is clearly established. The difficulty is to arrive at a sum which is realistic and sound. In any event, the Court is clear that substantial justice will be accorded Hollywood if the pecuniary loss it sustained is computed from September 6, 1936, to January 1, 1949.

This brings up the question of the formula for the film rentals which should be applied and deducted from the total grosses. Hollywood paid on an average of substantially 25 per cent of its gross as film rental, and Arion 29.4 per cent. It is reasonable to conclude that, with the granting of the 49 day availability to these two theatres in substantial competition, there would be an effort, and a successful one on their part, to bring the film rental below the average rate paid by Arion. The selection of the mean average of 27.2 per cent as film rental seems justified.

Plaintiffs challenge the accuracy of the records of MAC as to the film rental actually paid by Arion. However, there is no reason to believe that MAC was not attempting to obtain as reasonable film rental as it could from the various distributors, and there is no reason to assume that the books during the period in question do not reflect the actual film rental paid. Certainly, there is no basis for plaintiffs' assertion that MAC had some sinister purpose in entering fictitious film rentals on its books as to Arion's operations. The so-called blanket deals for films which MAC may have had with some of the distributors were relatively few and do not destroy the verity of MAC's computations on its books as to the film rental Arion paid from its gross boxoffice returns.

The following table will illustrate the Court's findings as to damages and the method employed in arriving at Hollywood's pecuniary loss. In that MAC by reason of the six-year statute of limitations has only a six year damage period, to wit, six years prior to November 6, 1952, a break is indicated in the schedule as to MAC's liability for damages beginning November 6, 1946.

In considering the method of computing damages as above set forth, it may be urged that the Court has given no effect to the war years when Arion's boxoffice gross probably would have exceeded Hollywood's if these two theatres had been playing on an equal availability. That is, of course, true. But, on the other hand, the Court has given no consideration in its computation to the years when Hollywood, by reason of its attractiveness as a new theatre, probably would have exceeded Arion's boxoffice gross. The fluctuation in the grosses of the two theatres, if they had operated on an equal availability, would be fairly balanced, and the Court's computation of damages is reasonably determinative of the pecuniary losses sustained by Hollywood as a direct result of the conspiracy.

MAC has interposed a counterclaim herein. It is not necessary to discuss its nature in that no evidence was offered in support thereof. Plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to a dismissal of the counterclaim. In view of the Court's conclusions as to plaintiffs' failure to sue Paramount Pictures, Inc., and instead joined Paramount Film Distributing Corporation, not a party to this local conspiracy, that company cannot be held for any damages sustained by Hollywood and it follows that a dismissal should be entered in its behalf.

Findings of fact and conclusions of law consistent herewith may be presented by plaintiffs upon ten days' notice. At that time the motion of plaintiffs as to attorneys' fees to be allowed herein likewise may be noticed for hearing. Orders granting the dismissals above referred to also may be presented. Exceptions are reserved.

Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and Order for Judgment

[March 24, 1959]

The above entitled action having been duly tried to the Court without a jury, the trial herein having been held on various dates from September 4, 1957 to December 21, 1957, the Court having heard and considered the testimony and evidence and the arguments and briefs of the respective parties, and the Court having made and filed its Memorandum Decision herein on January 27, 1959, which Memorandum Decision is hereby made a part hereof and incorporated herein by reference, now, upon the record herein the Court does hereby make the following:

Findings of Fact

I.

[Parties]

Columbia Pictures Corporation is a New York corporation organized on January 10, 1924. Its name has not been changed and it has been engaged in the distribution of motion pictures, and, directly or through affiliated corporations, in the production of motion pictures at all times relevant to this controversy. It is generally referred to in the record and herein as "Columbia".

II.

Loew's Incorporated is a corporation organized in Delaware on October 18, 1919, and its name has not been changed. It has been engaged, either directly or through subsidiaries, in the production and distribution of motion pictures, and, until recent years, in the exhibition of motion pictures. Loew's has been affiliated with a subsidiary corporation known as Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Corporation; and Loew's has been referred to in the industry also as "MGM" and as "Metro". It is variously referred to in the record under all three names, "Loew's", "MGM" and "Metro". It is referred to herein as "Loew's".

III.

Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, the corporation named as a defendant herein originally, was a corporation organized in the State of New York on February 1, 1915 as "Fox Film Corporation". It changed its name to Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation on August 22, 1935. It was engaged in the business of producing and distributing motion pictures until 1952; and it was dissolved on December 1, 1952. Said corporation was known in the trade and was generally referred to in the record and herein as "Fox". Just prior to the dissolution of Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation (New York) its name was changed to TCF Film Corporation and a new corporation named Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation was incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware on July 22, 1952. On or about September 27, 1952, the production and distribution assets, including the distribution assets within the State of Minnesota, of said New York corporation were transferred to said Delaware corporation, which has held them since that time, and the Delaware corporation undertook to pay the liabilities of the New York corporation. Both TCF Film Corporation and Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation (Delaware) have made general appearances as parties defendant herein; and said Delaware corporation has stipulated to secure payment of any judgment against said New York corporation in this action.

IV.

Universal Film Exchanges, Inc., is a corporation organized in Delaware on May 20, 1918, and has not changed its name. It has been engaged in the business of distributing motion pictures since its organization. It has been a wholly owned subsidiary of Universal Pictures Company, Inc., which latter company produced motion pictures that were distributed by Universal Film Exchanges, Inc. Said defendant is generally referred to in the record and herein as "Universal".

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

V.

United Artists Corporation is a corporation organized in Delaware on April 17, 1919, and its name has not been changed. It has been engaged since the time of its organization in distributing motion pictures produced by other persons or firms, and it differs from the other motion picture distributors that are defendants in this case in having had no studios or production facilities owned by it or any affiliated corporation, and in having confined its activities to releasing and distributing facilities. It is generally referred to in the record and herein as "United Artists" or "UA".

VI.

Warner Bros. Pictures Distribution Corporation is a corporation organized under the laws of New York on April 6, 1915. It has had two changes of name. From 1919 until 1944 said defendant was known as Vitagraph, Inc., and since 1944 it has been known as Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation. It has been a wholly owned subsidiary of Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., which was engaged in the production of motion pictures that were distributed by Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation. During the period prior to 1950 it was affiliated with corporations engaged in the exhibition of motion pictures. Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation is referred to in the record and herein both as "Warner Bros." and as "Warners".

VII.

RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., is a corporation organized in Delaware on June 7, 1921. It has had various changes of name, and on July 3, 1930 its name became RKO Radio Pictures, Inc. This remained the name of the corporation until December 30, 1955 when the name was changed to RKO Teleradio Pictures, Inc. Until February 1957 the corporation was engaged in the production and distribution of motion pictures. During some period prior to October 31, 1936, RKO pictures were also distributed through an affiliated corporation known as RKO Distributing Corporation. During the period prior to 1950 this defendant was affiliated with corporations engaged in the exhibition of motion pictures. This defendant is generally referred to in the record and herein as "RKO".

VIII.

Minnesota Amusement Company is a corporation organized in Delaware on September 19, 1932 and has not changed its corporate name. It was a wholly owned subsidiary of Paramount Pictures, Inc., from its incorporation until December 31, 1949. In 1932 Minnesota Amusement Company acquired a circuit of about 112 theatres from another corporate subsidiary of Paramount Pictures, Inc., known as Publix Northwest Theatres, Inc. By 1951 the number of theatres operated by this defendant had dropped to 73. During the period in controversy here, Minnesota Amusement Company has been the largest exhibition circuit in this area, and it has operated numerous first and subsequent run theatres in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Minnesota Amusement Company has been referred to in the industry and in the record as "Publix", as "the circuit", as "Paramount theatres" and as "MAC". It is sometimes referred to herein as "MAC".

IX.

(A) Paramount Film Distributing Corporation was incorporated in Delaware on January 26, 1939. From the time of incorporation until December 31, 1949, said defendant, herein sometimes called "Paramount Film", was a wholly owned subsidiary of Paramount Pictures, Inc.

(B) Paramount Film distributed pictures produced by Paramount Pictures, Inc., from branch offices where Paramount Pictures, Inc., did not itself distribute pictures until on or about December 31, 1949. Paramount Pictures, Inc., distributed its own pictures in the State of Minnesota until its dissolution on or about December 31, 1949, in accordance with the directive of a decree in the case of United States v. Paramount, referred to hereinafter.

(C) Paramount Film did not begin to do business within the State of Minnesota until January 1, 1950.

X.

Charles Rubenstein, Inc. is a corporation organized under the laws of Minnesota July 10, 1935. Charles Rubenstein has been the president and principal executive of the corporation since its organization, and has also been a shareholder in the corporation during the same period. Principal shareholders in the corporation were Louis Rubenstein, the father of Charles Rubenstein, and A. A. Kaplan. Louis Rubenstein and A. A. Kaplan also were in business as a partnership, operating under the name of Rubenstein and Kaplan. They owned a theatre known as the Arion Theatre, and each of the partners owned a half interest in a corporation which owned the Granada Theatre in Minneapolis. At the death of Louis Rubenstein in 1939, his partnership interests devolved upon his sons, Charles, Sheldon and Arnold, and upon his widow, Anna Rubenstein. His interest in the Arion Theatre devolved upon his widow, Anna Rubenstein. All of the Rubenstein-Kaplan theatre interests were owned and operated as a two family interest with A. A. Kaplan owning one half and the members of the Rubenstein family the other one half in various percentages from time to time.

XI.

[Plaintiff Theatre]

The Hollywood Theatre was built by Charles Rubenstein, Inc., in the summer and early fall of 1935 on land owned by the corporation at 2815 Johnson St. Northeast, in the City of Minneapolis, Minnesota. Hollywood Theatre was operated by Charles Rubenstein, Inc., until the beginning of the year 1943, when Charles Rubenstein was called into military service. At this time the operation of the theatre was taken over by a partnership called "Rubenstein and Kaplan", and composed of Charles Rubenstein, Anna Rubenstein, Arnold Rubenstein, Sheldon Rubenstein and A. A. Kaplan. After the beginning of 1943 the Hollywood Theatre was operated by the partnership of Rubenstein and Kaplan under the lease from Charles Rubenstein, Inc.

XII.

From the fall of 1936 until Louis Rubenstein's death, the principal stockholders of Charles Rubenstein, Inc., Louis Rubenstein and A. A. Kaplan, were the owners of the Arion Theatre. This was built in 1913, located on Central Avenue between 23rd and 24th Streets in Minneapolis, Minnesota, and leased by plaintiff A. A. Kaplan and his then partner, Louis Rubenstein, to the Minnesota Amusement Company. The Arion was operated by Minnesota Amusement Company and it and the Hollywood Theatre were located about one mile apart and were in substantial competition with each other at all times relevant hereto. The lease on the Arion Theatre (as well as the Granada Theatre) expired in the early part of 1943. These leases were renewed in the early part of 1942 for an additional ten-year period.

XIII.

[Defendants' Business]

During the entire period relevant hereto, the defendants Columbia, Loew's Fox, Universal, United Artists, Warners and RKO were engaged in the distribution of motion pictures all of which were produced outside the State of Minnesota, and most of which were produced in the State of California. These motion pictures were shipped and transported by the respective distributor defendants named from the places of production to the State of Minnesota, and other states of the United States for exhibition. A substantial number of such motion pictures were so transported in interstate commerce in each of the years involved in the present controversy, and substantially all of such motion pictures were transported in interstate commerce to the State of Minnesota and exhibited therein.

XIV.

A substantial amount of interstate commerce was involved in the activities of said distributor defendants, and said defendants do not deny that said activities constitute and involve interstate commerce.

XV.

Pictures so distributed by said distributor defendants and by Paramount Pictures, Inc., were exhibited by MAC and by the plaintiffs in the Arion Theatre and Hollywood Theatre, respectively, and most of the motion pictures exhibited in these two theatres during the period in controversy here were motion pictures so distributed by said distributor defendants and Paramount Pictures, Inc. The product of the distributor defendants, or their predecessors then operating in this state, was necessary to the successful operation of a suburban theatre in Minneapolis during the period in controversy here.

XVI.

Motion pictures are distributed by the leasing of a print of a picture by a distributor to an exhibitor for a stipulated amount, known as "film rental" and which may be stated in terms of dollars, in terms of percentage of boxoffice gross, or in terms of some other formula or method of calculation. Motion pictures are exhibited in a given community on successive "runs", the first exhibition being the "first run", the second exhibition in the community being the "second run", and so forth. The time elapsing between successive runs of a picture is known as "clearance" or "protection". The "availability" is the date on which a picture will be offered to a given theatre by a distributor for exhibition. The availability of subsequent run theatres is usually expressed in terms of days after first run, so that a "56 day availability" means that a theatre will be offered pictures for exhibition 56 days after first run. The term "break" is also used to mean the same as "availability", and the playing position of a subsequent run theatre is often expressed in terms of a "run", which in this context means the same as availability. Thus a "56 day run" means an availability or playing position 56 days after first run.

XVII.

[Runs and Clearances]

The Hollywood Theatre commenced operations on October 26, 1935. It was then a newly constructed, attractive motion picture theatre situated in a suburban area of Minneapolis and with a seating capacity of 950. It was generally considered one of the most attractive suburban theatres at that time in Minneapolis.

XVIII.

In 1935, before the Hollywood opened, the Arion was a 932 seat theatre charging 15 cents admission and on a playing position of 112 days after first run. Shortly before Hollywood opened, Arion advanced its admission price to 20 cents and changed its playing position to 70 days after first run. MAC, as the lessee of Arion in 1935, had permitted that theatre to become run down and in need of improvements; and it was in poor shape to compete with the brand new and attractive Hollywood.

When the Hollywood Theatre commenced operations its playing position was 56 days after first run and it charged 25 cents admission. Shortly after this, MAC proposed to shareholders of Charles Rubenstein, Inc., that the Arion and Hollywood operations should be pooled, the two theatres be operated jointly, the Hollywood should play the better pictures, and the net profits of the operations should be divided equally between the two theatres. This proposal was rejected.

XX.

In 1936 MAC expended about $16,000 on renovating the Arion, with the consent of the lessors, Louis Rubenstein and A. A. Kaplan. The Arion then went on a 25 cent admission price and announced to the distributors that it would play on a 49 day playing position, 7 days ahead of the Hollywood.

XXI.

The clearance schedule followed by all of the motion picture distributors in Minneapolis at this time, was, as stated in a memorandum of one of the distributors:

25 cent houses	49 days Publix (MAC Circuit Theatres)
25 cent houses	56 days Independents
20 cent houses	63 days Publix
20 cent houses	70 days Independents
15 cent houses	105 days Publix
15 cent houses	112 days Independents

XXII.

This clearance schedule or plan was well known to and followed by all of the distributors in Minneapolis for some time prior to 1936. This clearance schedule involved establishing the playing position of a theatre by the admission price charged and involved giving a preferential run to MAC theatres whereby the circuit theatres upon request were permitted to play 7 days earlier than independent theatres charging the same admission price. The preferential runs of MAC theatres were established and existed with the approval and cooperation of all the defendant distributors doing business in Minnesota at this time.

XXIII.

As a result of the clearance schedule established and adhered to by action of all the defendant distributors then doing business in this State and of the preferential runs accorded the MAC theatres pursuant to this clearance schedule, the Arion Theatre was given a playing position 7 days earlier than the Hollywood Theatre.

XXIV.

After the Arion Theatre was given a preferential playing position ahead of Hollywood Theatre, Charles Rubenstein, as the manager in active charge of the Hollywood, repeatedly protested in the years 1936 and 1937 to the branch managers of most of the distributors against the preferential run of the Arion and requested that the Hollywood be accorded the same availability as the Arion. There is no evidence of protests to Warners. Such protests as were made were rejected and the requests refused.

XXV.

None of the plaintiffs at any time consented to or acquiesced in the grant to the Arion of a preferential playing position ahead of the Hollywood.

XXVI.

[Government Suit—Conspiracy]

A suit or proceeding in equity was brought by or on behalf of the United States to prevent or restrain violation of the antitrust laws in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York in the case of United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., et al., Equity No. 87-273, on July 20, 1938. Defendants in said action included Columbia, Loew's, Fox (the New York corporation), Universal, United Artists, Warners, RKO, Paramount Film, and Paramount Pictures, Inc. Various and protracted proceedings were had in this action. The proceedings are reported in United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 66 F. Supp. 323 [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,470]; 70 F. Supp. 53 [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,526]; 334 U. S. 131, [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,244]; 85 F. Supp. 881 [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,473]; and 339 U. S. 974. Final decrees were entered against Columbia, Loew's, Fox (the New York corporation), Universal, United Artists, and Warners on February 8, 1950, against RKO on November 8, 1948, and against Paramount Film and Paramount Pictures, Inc., on March 3, 1949, all to the effect that said defendants had violated the antitrust laws of the United States.

XXVII.

Columbia, Loew's, Fox (New York), Universal, United Artists, Warners, RKO, Paramount Film, Paramount Pictures, Inc., and other corporations not involved in this case, are shown by the aforesaid proceeding to have been engaged in a national conspiracy which had among its objectives the granting of preferential runs to the exhibitors affiliated with the major distributors.

XXVIII.

The national conspiracy referred to in Finding XXVII above was carried out on a local level by the establishment and maintenance in Minneapolis, Minnesota of the clearance schedule set forth in Finding XXI above. Defendants Columbia, Loew's, Fox (New York), Universal, United Artists, Warners, RKO and MAC combined and conspired among themselves and with Paramount Pictures, Inc., to carry out in Minneapolis the national conspiracy and to establish and maintain the local schedule of clearances referred to herein.

XXIX.

The granting of preferential circuit runs to MAC theatres in Minneapolis, Minnesota, during the period specified herein, and the granting of a preferential run to the Arion Theatre by which it played ahead of the Hollywood Theatre were parts of, purposes of and results of both the national and local conspiracies as set out in the foregoing findings among the parties respectively named therein.

XXX.

The clearance granted to the Arion Theatre over the Hollywood Theatre was unreasonable, and was also collusive and discriminatory.

XXXI.

The unreasonable, collusive and discriminatory clearance of the Arion Theatre over the Hollywood Theatre established and maintained by MAC and the distributor defendants then doing business in Minnesota began in September 1936 and ended about the end of the year 1948. The evidence indicates that the Hollywood could have obtained a better playing position by independent negotiations with the distributors some time early in 1949.

XXXII.

Had it not been for the conspiracy above described, the establishment and maintenance of the uniform clearance schedule in

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Minneapolis and the granting of the preferential circuit run and clearance to the Arion Theatre as set forth above, the Hollywood Theatre would have had an earlier and more advantageous playing position and would not have been forced to play pictures after its competitor the Arion Theatre had first exhibited them, during the period September 6, 1936 to January 1, 1949.

XXXIII.

[Damages]

The expenses of operation of the Hollywood Theatre, other than film rental, would not have been increased had it played on an earlier or more advantageous playing position during the period involved herein.

XXXIV.

In general, the earlier the playing position a motion picture theatre enjoys the more favorable it is, since it is preferable to exhibit pictures before they have been shown to the public in other theatres in the competitive area. For subsequent run theatres, during the period involved here, an earlier playing position generally involved higher admission prices and larger box office gross receipts, as well as larger net receipts and profits.

XXXV.

The Hollywood Theatre was certainly and clearly damaged as a direct and proximate result of the conspiracy among the defendants referred to above, the preferential run granted to the Arion and the clearance of the Arion over the Hollywood.

XXXVI.

There are many problems in attempting to arrive at a measure of the amount of damages to the Hollywood. However, the Court concludes and finds that a fair and reasonable basis for determining the amount of such damages is to assume that the combined box office grosses of the Arion and the Hollywood would not have been increased over the amounts actually secured by those theatres had there been no conspiracy and had the Hollywood secured a more advantageous playing position as the result of independent negotiations in a free market. Upon such an assumption, damages may be calculated by adding the box office grosses of the two theatres for the years involved, assigning one-half of this total to the Hollywood, deducting a fair allowance for film rental, and then determining the difference between the net thus arrived at and the actual net receipts of the Hollywood during the period from September 6, 1936, to January 1, 1949.

XXXVII.

During the said damage period the average film rental of the Hollywood was 24.74% of its box office gross and the average film rental of the Arion was 29.37% of its box office gross. It is reasonable to conclude that with the granting of equal availability to these two theatres in substantial competition the film rental would have been a mean average of these amounts or 27.055% of box office gross.

XXXIII.

The following table sets forth the Court's findings as to damages and the method employed in computing Hollywood's pecuniary loss, which is the amounts set forth in the final column headed "Difference", which amounts the Court finds to be the amounts of net loss to the plaintiffs during the respective periods indicated caused by the conspiracy and acts of the defendants set forth in the preceding findings:

	Combined Gross	One-Half to Hollywood	27.055% Film Rental	Net Gross to Hollywood	Actual Hollywood Net Gross	Difference
1937	$107,821	$53,910	$14,585	$39,325	$36,816	$ 2,509
1938	109,417	54,708	14,801	39,907	38,012	1,895
1939	102,531	51,265	13,870	37,395	35,816	1,579
1940	93,540	46,770	12,654	34,116	31,247	2,869

	Combined Gross	One-Half to Hollywood	27.055% Film Rental	Net Gross to Hollywood	Actual Hollywood Net Gross	Difference
1945	$119,009	$59,504	$16,099	$43,405	$36,607	$ 6,798
1946 to 11/5	125,425	62,712	16,967	45,745	37,374	8,371
1946 after 11/5	23,737	11,868	3,211	8,657	7,320	1,337

Total, 11/6/46 to 1948, incl.						13,528
Total, 1937 to 1948, incl.						$56,123

XXXIX.

The combination and conspiracy of the defendants found to have conspired and the acts of said defendants in granting a preferential circuit run to the Arion Theatre and imposing an unreasonable clearance upon the Hollywood Theatre, as set forth above, have unreasonably restrained trade and commerce among the several states in motion pictures and the distribution of motion pictures, and have injured the plaintiffs in their business and their property in the amount of $42,595 during the period January 1, 1937, to November 5, 1946, inclusive, and in the amount of $13,528 during the period from November 6, 1946, to December 31, 1948, inclusive.

XL.

[Subsidiary Corporation—Liability]

Paramount Film Distributing Corporation was not engaged in business in the state of Minnesota prior to 1950. It did not participate in the local conspiracy in Minneapolis, Minnesota, or in the establishment or maintenance of uniform Minneapolis clearance schedules or the preferential circuit run granted to the Arion Theatre or to the clearance of the Arion Theatre over the Hollywood Theatre. Paramount decrees alone cannot be the basis for recovery for the unlawful acts performed on the local level as to those who may have been parties to the national conspiracy but did not participate in the local conspiracy. The fact that Paramount Pictures, Inc., which did participate in the local conspiracy, was a parent of Paramount Film does not permit the distinct corporate existence of the two to be disregarded nor permit holding the subsidiary, Paramount Film, liable for the wrong-doing of its parent.

XLI.

[Counterclaim]

No evidence whatever has been offered herein that plaintiffs, or any of them, have conspired against MAC or engaged in any other illegal conduct with respect to it, or in support of any of the allegations of the counter-claim of MAC herein.

XLII.

[Attorneys' Fees]

A motion has been made by plaintiffs for the allowance of attorneys' fees, and affidavits and arguments have been presented to the Court in connection with that motion. The Court has taken this matter under advisement and will make a separate order embodying appropriate findings and an allowance for attorneys' fees. The order of the Court allowing attorneys' fees, when duly made and filed, shall be considered a part of the Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and Order for Judgment herein.

XLIII.

The Court has heretofore made and filed a Memorandum Decision herein on January 27, 1959. Said Memorandum Decision is hereby incorporated in and made a part of these Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law for all purposes.

Conclusions of Law

1. The distribution and exhibition of motion pictures by defendants as described above constitute trade and commerce among and between the several states of the United States within the meaning of the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act and laws amendatory thereof.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

2. This Court has jurisdiction of this cause under the provisions of the Clayton Act and the Judicial Code.

3. This Court has jurisdiction of each of the defendants named above.

4. The several final judgments and decrees rendered and entered in the proceeding by the United States against the several respective defendants in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York referred to above are prima facie evidence against the defendants herein who are also named as defendants in that proceeding, except Paramount Film, to the effect that said defendants have combined and conspired to establish and maintain preferential playing positions for theatres affiliated with national distributors, including those in Minneapolis, Minnesota, in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States.

5. The running of the applicable statute of limitations in respect of plaintiffs' cause of action herein was suspended as to the defendants in said government action during the period of pendency of said proceeding against them in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, and the period of such suspension was from the filing of said action on July 20, 1938, until February 8, 1948, as to RKO, and until February 8, 1950, as to Columbia, Loew's Fox (New York), Universal, United Artists and Warners.

6. The period of time established by the statute of limitations applicable to the present case within which the plaintiffs may recover damages for injury to their business and their property is six years.

7. Pursuant to the applicable statute of limitations, plaintiffs may recover damages from MAC only for injuries suffered or damages incurred on and after November 6, 1946.

8. Pursuant to the applicable statute of limitations and the suspension thereof by the pendency of said government action, plaintiffs may recover damages from the other defendants for all injuries suffered and damages incurred at any time after September 6, 1936.

9. The Court herein is authorized to enter judgment against the various defendants in the amounts and according to the respective liabilities established.

10. The defendants, except Paramount Film and Fox (Delaware), agreed combined and conspired among and between themselves concertedly to establish and maintain preferential circuit runs for theatres operated by MAC, to grant such a preferential circuit run to the Arion Theatre, and to impose an unreasonable clearance upon the Hollywood Theatre in favor of the Arion Theatre, during the period from 1936 until the end of 1948, and thereby have agreed, combined and conspired unreasonably to restrain trade and commerce among and between the several states in violation of the Antitrust Laws of the United States.

11. Paramount Film Distributing Corporation not being a party to the local conspiracy is not liable for any damages sustained by the Hollywood and is entitled to judgment of dismissal.

12. As a direct and proximate result and consequence of the combination and conspiracy and the other acts of the said defendants in restraint of trade and commerce as described above, the plaintiffs have been injured in their business and property and have been damaged in the amount of $42,595 during the period from January 1, 1937, to November 5, 1946, inclusive, and in the amount of $13,528 during the period from November 6, 1946, to December 31, 1948, inclusive.

13. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover three-fold the damages sustained by them.

14. The plaintiffs are also entitled to judgment for reasonable attorneys' fees, the amount of which will be determined by the Court by a separate order, and which shall be added to the judgment herein when so determined and allowed by the Court.

15. The plaintiffs herein are entitled to judgment as follows:

(A) Against Columbia Pictures Corporation, Loew's Incorporated, RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., TCF Film Corporation, Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, United Artists Corporation, Universal Film Exchanges, Inc., and Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation in the amount of $127,785 for damages sustained during the period January 1, 1937, to November 5, 1946, inclusive.

(B) Against Columbia Pictures Corporation, Loew's Incorporated, RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., TCF Film Corporation, Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, United Artists

Corporation, Universal Film Exchanges, Inc., Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation, and Minnesota Amusement Company in the amount of $40,584, for damages sustained during the period November 6, 1946, to December 31, 1948, inclusive.

(C) That the counterclaim of Minnesota Amusement Company against plaintiffs herein be dismissed with prejudice.

(D) Against Columbia Pictures Corporation, Loew's Incorporated, RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., TCF Film Corporation, Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation, United Artists Corporation, Universal Film Exchanges, Inc., Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corporation and Minnesota Amusement Company for attorneys' fees in the amount allowed by the Court, and for plaintiffs' costs and disbursements herein.

16. Paramount Film Distributing Corporation is entitled to judgment of dismissal on the merits, together with its costs and disbursements herein.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civ. 86-27. Filed November 10, 1959.

Case No. 1163 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act and Wilson Tariff Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Suit for Injunctive Relief—Production of Documents—Area and Product Limitations—Narrowing of Issues in "Big" Case—Oppressiveness of Government's Demands—Size of Industry.—A trial court, in ordering oil companies charged with conspiring to monopolize international commerce in oil to comply with the Government's demand for the production of documents (some of which were in foreign countries), noted its awareness of the necessity for taking "vigorous measures" to keep "big" cases within manageable proportions, but held that it was unable, at the present time, to effectuate any narrowing of the issues here. Thus, the court refused to require the Government to remove the "crude oil" phase of the industry from its case, or to limit the required "file searches," even in the first instance, to certain "major consuming areas." Earlier, the court had ordered the companies to answer the Government's interrogatories, holding in abeyance the production motions in the hope that the answers to the interrogatories would help in narrowing the issues. That hope had not materialized. Hence, the court did not regard as feasible the companies' proposed plan of ordering production from the "major consuming areas" and then, after that information had been used to narrow the issues, ordering further production within the framework of those narrowed issues. As to the contention that the demands were oppressive, the court noted that the industry which the companies were charged with unlawfully controlling was one of vast size.

Opinion

[Production of Evidence]

CASHIN, District Judge [In full text]: On December 2, 1958 I filed an opinion [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,206] concerning the production motions addressed to all of the defendants and objections to interrogatories by all of the defendants, except Gulf. My opinion disposed of the objections to interrogatories and, as implemented by an order dated January 14, 1959, directed the answering of substantial portions of the interrogatories. Decisions on the motions for production were held in abeyance in the hope that the answers to the interrogatories would enable at least a preliminary narrowing of the issues and thus enable the admittedly vast amount of documents demanded in the production motions to be considerably reduced.

[Narrowing of Issues]

In accordance with the order of January 14, 1959 the defendants, with certain minor exceptions apparently necessitated by non-disclosure provisions of foreign law,* have fully answered the interrogatories. The hope expressed in the opinion of December 2, 1958 has not, however, proved availing. Plaintiff contends that, while the answers to the interrogatories are of considerable help to it in the preparation of its case, they are not at all useful in narrowing the issues. The argument supporting this conclusion is basically that many inferences can be drawn from the statistical data supplied in the answers to the interrogatories but that no conclusions can be drawn as to the precise nature or scope of the charged conspiracy. Thus, it contends the production previously demanded (as altered by the concessions made by the Government during pre-trial conferences held during the Summer and Fall of 1958) should be ordered.

[Area and Product Limitations Proposed]

The defendants, on the other hand, have adhered to their original contention, which is basically that no production whatsoever should be ordered until the Government has more precisely stated its claims, thus narrowing the issues and consequently the scope of production. The defendants, however, possessing at least as much information concerning their activities as the Government, have not suggested any substantial way in which the issues can be narrowed. True it is they have suggested that any question of crude oil be eliminated from the case and that production be limited, at least in the first instance, to certain major marketing areas, which areas consume the vast majority of the product marketed by the defendants.

[Crude Oil]

The argument that crude oil be no longer part of the case is attempted to be supported by statistics garnered from the answers to the interrogatories, which defendants contend is inconsistent with any conspiratorial plot. The Government, however, argues that the statistics are equally consistent with a cleverly contrived scheme. I cannot say on the evidence presented that there is no conspiracy with respect to crude oil, as charged, and, thus, I will not order the Government to remove that phase of the industry from its case. Indeed to do so would appear to be granting, unwarrantedly, a motion for partial summary judgment which has not, in form, been made.

["Major Consuming Areas"]

In the course of further argument on the production motions, held on October 5 and 6, 1959, I requested that plaintiff attempt further to limit the number of countries in which file searches would be necessary. The plaintiff, in compliance with the request, has, as to four of the defendants, eliminated certain countries relatively large in number but relatively small in importance. The defendants persist in their contention that further countries be eliminated and the file searches in the first instance be limited to major consuming areas on the theory that, if a conspiracy can be proved, such proof would necessarily be found in the major consuming areas. In addition, defendants contend that the fact that a small number of personnel are available who can intelligently conduct the requisite file searches, precludes the possibility of the files of all of the countries being searched simultaneously. Thus, defendants suggest production in the major consuming areas be presently ordered and the remainder of the production motions be held in abeyance in accordance with the scheme utilized in my prior decision and order. The plan, therefore, would be that production be ordered from the major consuming areas and that, based upon the information available from the documents produced, as well as from the answers to the interrogatories already on hand, the issues be narrowed and any further production be ordered only within the framework of such narrowed issues. I do not think that the defendants' proposal is feasible. The production motions are clearly ripe for decision. Therefore, the plaintiff's motion for production, as amended, is granted.

* The plaintiff has not as yet made any contention that any defendant has not made a good faith attempt to obtain permission from foreign authorities for waiver of the non-disclosure laws.

["Good Cause"]

In granting the motion I, of course, find that there is "good cause" for the production of the documents. The only really substantial argument made against the existence of "good cause" is that the allegations of the complaint are much too broad. This argument has already been disposed of.

[Oppressiveness—Size of Industry]

The defendants, in opposing the motion, have also invoked the provisions of Rule 30(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, asserting that the production, as demanded, is oppressive. However, the industry, which the defendants are charged with unlawfully controlling, is of a vast size. The defendants' claim of oppressiveness has already been adequately disposed of in a prior phase of this case wherein it was stated—

> "But the laws, which have helped protect the movants as they grew in size, are also designed to permit an investigation of them, if the proper authorities are of the impression circumstances so warrant it." (In Re Investigation of World Arrangements, etc., (D. C. D. C. 1952) [1952 TRADE CASES ¶67,358], 13 F. R. D. 280, 287).

[The "Big" Case]

In ordering this considerably widespread production I am not unaware of the admonition of the Judicial Conference of the United States contained in The Report on Procedure in Anti-Trust and Other Protracted Cases Adopted by the Judicial Conference of the United States, 13 F. R. D. 62, to the effect that in the so-called "big" case a limiting of the issues is sooner or later, in any event, prior to trial necessary. This admonition has been repeated as recently as November 5, 1959 when the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit stated that the District Court should take "vigorous measures to see that the issues were clearly defined so that the whole case might be kept within manageable proportions". (Syracuse Broadcasting Corporation v. Samuel I. Newhouse, et al., Docket No. 25074, October Term, 1958 [1959 TRADE CASES ¶69,519], at p. 2365). However, for the reasons stated above I am unable at this time to effectuate any narrowing of the issues.

[Foreign Law—Trade Secrets]

Any difficulty encountered concerning the foreign law or trade secrets shall be met in the manner outlined in my prior opinion of December 2, 1958 [1958 TRADE CASES ¶69,206], I cannot, on the basis of the information presently before me, compose an order which would set forth any timetable for the production. Accordingly, counsel are directed to confer in an attempt to reach an agreement on the form of the order. If full agreement cannot be reached, the court will, upon request of any party, schedule a hearing on the form of the order. Any order submitted for signature shall incorporate therein all concessions that the plaintiff has already made.

Appeal from the Louisiana Supreme Court. FOURNET, Chief Justice.

Louisiana Orderly Milk Marketing Act

Sales Below Cost—Louisiana Orderly Milk Marketing Act—Constitutionality—Appeal Dismissed—Want of a Substantial Federal Question.—An appeal from a decision of the Louisiana Supreme Court sustaining the constitutionality of the Louisiana Orderly Milk Marketing Act (prohibiting, among other practices, the sale of milk products below cost) was dismissed by the United States Supreme Court "for want of a substantial federal question." The Louisiana Supreme Court had held that the Act, by permitting the Louisiana Commissioner of Agriculture and Immigration to fix minimum prices to go into effect only if approved by two-thirds of the producers of milk products in a given marketing area, did not delegate to private persons the legislative power to fix prices in violation of the "due process" guarantees of the Louisiana and United States Constitutions.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Patents—Combining Non-competing Patents in Single Licensing Agreement—Giving Non-exclusive Licensee Veto Power in Selection of Other Licensees—Legality.—A patent licensing agreement under which two patentees of related but non-competing patents (one covering the "basic unit," a tractor "cover" designed to deflect engine heat around the operator, and the other relating to that part of the "cover" which surrounded the operator) granted separate, non-exclusive licenses to three manufacturers, and agreed that no licenses would be granted to others without the consent of the two patentees and the three licensees, was per se violative of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Patent rights give no protection from the prohibitions of the Sherman Act when they are asserted, controlled, or used in consequence of an agreement that is in restraint of trade. Here, the agreement was invalid according to Sherman Act standards because it was an agreement by a patentee which gave a non-exclusive licensee a veto power in the selection of other licensees. Also, the agreement was unlawful under Section 2 because it manifested an attempt to monopolize by combining non-competing patents in a single agreement, by competitors. Further, it gave to the parties to the agreement, both the patentees and the licensees, veto power over patent rights that were not referrable to their individual businesses, the patents, or the licenses granted. The fact that the licensees might have continued to compete with each other made no difference. They were jointly given an exclusive market and control thereover by the terms of the agreement "and not singularly as a consequence of patent privileges acquired."

Further, it was no defense that each of the patentees had the right to individually license their respective patents.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2013.430, 2013.600; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2515, 2610.550.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Patents—Conspiracy Between Patentees and Licensees—Concerted Refusal to License Another Manufacturer—Legality.—Patentees of related but non-competing patents violated the Sherman Antitrust Act by concertedly refusing to license a manufacturer in furtherance of an agreement in which the patentees and their licensees, three manufacturers, had agreed that no licenses would be granted to others without the consent of all the parties. That agreement was illegal per se under the Sherman Act.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2013; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Patents—Instituting Infringement Suit—Concert of Action—Legality.—A patent licensing agreement under which patentees of related but non-competing patents granted separate, non-exclusive licenses to three manufacturers, agreed that they and the licensees would act jointly with respect to infringements of either patent, and set up and used a "litigation fund" for that purpose constituted an unlawful use of the patent monopolies in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Under the agreement, each party, including both the patentees and the licensees, was given a separate and collective right to bring and control infringement actions, when no such right or power legally existed in the licensees or the "opposite" patentee under the patent laws. The action of the parties in the giving of infringement notices to alleged infringers and their dealers was intended to curtail and ultimately stop the manufacture of tractor covers by the alleged infringers. The licensees were the major manufacturers in the field and held a "dominant" position therein. The monopoly granted to them gave them virtual control of the market and made it impossible for others to obtain any rights under the patents or to legitimately enter the field. It was no defense that each of the patentees had the right, under patent law, to give notices of infringements of their respective patents and institute infringement actions. A conspiracy or combination having as its object or effect a restraint of trade, whether accomplished by legal or illegal means, falls within the ambit of the Sherman Act. Here, it was the fact of combination and concert of action that spelled out the unlawful use of the patent monopolies.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2013.225; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.525.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Violations as Defense to Patent Infringement Action—Use of Patent As Basis for Agreement in Restraint of Trade.—A patentee of a tractor "cover" designed to deflect engine heat around the operator was barred from recovering for an alleged infringement of his patent because that patent had been used as a basis for an agreement in restraint of trade in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The patentee, along with a patentee of a related but non-competing patent, had granted a separate, non-exclusive license to three manufacturers and had agreed with that patentee and the licensees that no license would be granted to others without the consent of all the parties to the agreement. Such misuse of patent rights bars any recovery for patent infringement. The court also found that the patent was invalid for want of patentable invention.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9044.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Damages Recoverable—Defense of Conspiratorial Patent Infringement Action—Attorneys' Fees as Part of "Damages" to Be Trebled Under Antitrust Laws.—A manufacturer of tractor "covers" and one of its officers, having successfully defended a patent infringement action instituted as a part of a conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws, and having successfully prosecuted an antitrust counterclaim against the patentee, were entitled to attorneys' fees incurred in the defense of the infringement action, but those fees were not to be trebled as an element of "damages" under the antitrust laws. Instead, they were awarded by reason of counsel's representation of the successful parties in the infringement action, and by reason of the "exceptional circumstances" involved in the case concerning the validity of the patent and its use by the patentee and his licensees. The defendants showed no authority to support their claim for the inclusion of such fees as an element of antitrust "damages".

In addition to an award of $28,244.31 in attorneys' fees for the defense of the infringement action, the defendants were also awarded reasonable attorneys' fees ($25,000) for the services of their attorneys in the prosecution of the antitrust counterclaim. In fixing the latter amount, the court noted that it was bound by the authorities relative to the matter of fixing attorneys' fees in such actions, and that the defendants' claim for $141,035.00 for prosecution of the antitrust counterclaim did not bear a "realistic relation" to the $28,244.31 compensatory damage award.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.725.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Antitrust Violations as Defenses—Unlawful Patent Licensing Agreement—Treble Damage Counterclaim by Alleged Party to Conspiracy.—A manufacturer of tractor "covers" and one of its officers, in a treble damage counterclaim charging a patentee with conspiring to violate the antitrust laws, were not estopped from contesting the validity of the patent or claiming damages for the patentee's antitrust violations by reason of their alleged "unclean hands." The counterclaimants, having requested and been refused a license under the patent, had manufactured the tractor covers under a "working arrangement" with the patentee's licensee. However, the counterclaimants operated only as suppliers for that licensee, and did not become licensees themselves or parties to the conspiracy. Yielding to the pressure imposed by a conspiracy does not make the one who thus yields a party thereto. While the counterclaimants had met with the patentee and its co-conspirators in an effort to secure a license under the patent, they had no knowledge of the illegal conspiracy, no agreement was reached at the meeting in question, and any proposals made to the counterclaimants at that meeting were in furtherance of a conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9041.155.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Damages for Antitrust Violations—Damages Recoverable—Measure of Damages—Loss of "Potential Sales"—Accountant's Computations—Work Stoppage—Financing and Advertising Costs.—A manufacturer of tractor "covers" and one of its officers, having successfully defended a patent infringement action and successfully prosecuted an antitrust counterclaim against the patentee, were entitled to recover for (1) a direct loss in salaries, wages, and other expenses of a "shutdown" caused by the conspiracy, (2) "financing" costs, for continued operation, which had to be dropped by reason of the shutdown, (3) "advertising" costs which were rendered valueless by the forced shutdown, and (4) a direct loss of sales to two customers (based on sales in prior years and "the actual average net profit" to the manufacturer from such sales) which was caused by infringement notices sent to those customers pursuant to the conspiracy. As to the manufacturer's further claims for alleged loss of "potential sales," the court found that the theory propounded by the manufacturer's president and its accountant was unrealistic and would have led the court into too much speculation and conjecture. The evidence was insufficient to support the conclusion that, except for the interference of the conspirators, the manufacturer could have sold the number of tractor covers indicated by its "estimate of potential sales."

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011.350, 9011.400.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Antitrust Counterclaim—Costs of Suit.—A patentee who instituted an infringement action against a manufacturer in furtherance of a conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws was not "exonerated" from the payment of a just portion of the attorneys' fees and costs by the manufacturer's "covenant not to sue" the patentee's co-conspirators and the court's dismissal, pursuant to a settlement agreement, of the manufacturer's antitrust counterclaim against those co-conspirators. On the theory that attorneys' fees were a part of "costs," the patentee had contended that the dismissal order, which provided that each party would pay its own costs, precluded the successful counterclaimant from recovering such fees and costs. The court also rejected the contention that the major portion of the costs were attributable to a phase of the litigation in which the patentee had no interest. The counterclaimant was allowed "costs" as to fees and mileage for certain witnesses, a transcript of the evidence, the reproduction of certain documents, certain docket fees in connection with the filing of depositions, the taking of certain depositions, and certain Patent Office records. However, a portion of a counterclaimant's salary, travel expenses, and telephone charges which were allegedly chargeable to "litigation matters" was an attempt to retry the "damage" issue. Also, travel and telephone expenses of the counterclaimants' attorneys were "personal" expenses, and charges made by an accountant were a part of their preparation expenses. Also, the court disallowed a claim for witness fees for the individual counterclaimant and his attorney and the costs of taking the adverse party's deposition.

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

[Infringement Action—Antitrust Counterclaim]

WILLIAM E. STECKLER, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: The above entitled cause came on regularly for trial, and the court having duly considered the evidence, together with the post-trial briefs of the parties, the proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and the oral argument had thereon, and the court being fully advised in the premises, now makes its findings of fact and conclusions of law by adopting substantially the proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law as submitted by the defendants, with the exception however, of certain amendments and deletions as made by the court in order to more accurately reflect the views of the court in regard to the issues and the evidence pertaining thereto. The court's findings of fact and conclusions of law are therefore as follows:

Findings of Fact

1. Plaintiff, Clyde E. Clapper, is a resident of near Blue Springs, Missouri.

2. Defendant, Stanley Williams, is a resident of near Arlington, in the County of Rush, State of Indiana.

3. Defendant, Original Tractor Cab Company, Incorporated, is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Indiana and having its principal place of business at Arlington, Indiana.

[Patent Action]

4. Plaintiff filed this action under the Patent Laws of the United States, U. S. Code, Title 35, Section 281, to enjoin the defendants from infringing patent No. 2,452,834, granted to the plaintiff on November 2, 1948.

[Antitrust Counterclaim]

5. The defendant, Original Tractor Cab Company, Incorporated, in answer to the complaint, included a counterclaim for damages claimed to have been caused by the plaintiff and others as a result of violation of the antitrust laws of the United States, under U. S. Code, Title 15, Section 15.

[Amended Complaint]

6. Thereafter, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint seeking (1) a declaratory judgment that the defendants were estopped from denying the validity and infringement of the plaintiff's patent and further that the defendants were estopped from charging a violation of the antitrust laws; (2) claiming an infringement of the plaintiff's patent and unfair competition; (3) that the defendants have, for the purpose of deceiving the public, falsely marked articles of manufacture with the patent number of the plaintiff's patent; (4) that the defendants have breached an agreement entered into with the plaintiff; and (5) that the defendants have been unjustly enriched, which latter was dismissed voluntarily by the plaintiff prior to trial.

[Jurisdiction]

7. The court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the causes of action presented.

[Trial]

8. All of the causes of action presented by the pleadings between plaintiff and defendants were presented to the court in a trial which consumed twelve full days, and all evidence presented by the parties with respect to all of such issues has been received by the court.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

9. Thereafter, briefs were filed on behalf of the plaintiff and defendants, together with proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. After the post-trial briefs and proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed, the proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law were subjected to oral argument for the benefit of the court.

[Causes Abandoned]

10. In his briefs, the plaintiff has abandoned the causes of action for unfair competition and false patent marking, and the amended complaint will be dismissed as to these causes of action.

[Alleged Invention—Tractor Covers]

11. In 1945, the plaintiff and one Lee Flora, of Danville, Illinois, separately claimed to have made inventions in tractor covers for deflecting the heat from the engine of the tractor around the operator, and each filed an application for a patent thereon. In 1946, one Michael A. Halligan, of Fort Dodge, Iowa, claiming to have made a like invention, filed an application for a patent thereon.

["Interference" Declared]

12. During the pendency of these three patent applications, the Patent Office, recognizing that they claimed substantially the same invention, declared an interference between all three of them, for the purpose of determining priority of invention as to said three patent applicants. It also declared a separate interference between the Flora and Halligan applications on an auxiliary feature of that tractor cover.

[Licenses Granted]

13. While his application for patent was pending, Clapper had granted an exclusive license to Bearing Distributors Company to manufacture and sell the tractor cover included in his patent application and the patent to be granted thereon. Later that company's corporate name was changed to Comfort Equipment Company.

14. Flora had granted an exclusive license under his patent application to the Cabette Company, of Danville, Illinois, to manufacture and sell the tractor cover included in his application and the patent to be granted thereon.

15. Halligan likewise had granted an exclusive license to the Fort Dodge Tent & Awning Company to manufacture and sell the tractor cover included in his patent application and the patent to be granted thereon. Later that company's corporate name was changed to Burch Manufacturing Company.

[Manufacture and Sale]

16. After licenses were granted to the above corporations, Comfort began manufacturing and selling tractor covers in 1945 and Burch and Cabette began like operations in 1946, sales being made largely through distributors located throughout substantial portions of the United States.

[Chicago Meeting—Priority of Invention]

17. In April, 1948, after the declaration of the aforesaid patent interferences, representatives of the above named licensees and the three named inventors and their respective attorneys met in Chicago, Illinois, in an effort to settle their differences with respect to priority of invention. At the outset of said meeting and prior to disclosure between themselves of the respective dates of invention, it was agreed by all of the parties there present, or represented by others, that each of the corporate licensees under the then pending patent applications would have a right to a license under each patent application then pending and under any letters patent that might be granted thereon, upon the same terms as granted to the others.

18. Thereafter, at said meeting some evidence of priority of invention was adduced and discussed by the parties, but the discussion was concerned more particularly with the question of royalties to be paid by the respective licensees to the respective patent applicants. At the conclusion of the meeting, although specific agreement was not reached thereon, by reason of the earlier filing date of his patent application, it was generally understood that Clapper should have priority of invention to the basic unit of a tractor heat deflector; that Flora, who was second in point of time in filing his patent application, should have priority as to the part of the tractor cover that surrounds the operator; and that if Halligan had any priority of claim with respect to an invention, it was minimum.

[St. Louis Meeting]

19. The parties were unable to settle at that meeting the question of priority of invention and the amount of royalty to be paid by the respective licensees, and it was agreed that another meeting be held by the interested parties or their representatives to formulate specific agreements regarding the question of royalties to be paid by the respective licensees to the several patent applicants. Later, two such meetings were held in St. Louis, Missouri, at which the interested parties or their representatives and their attorneys attended. At these meetings in St. Louis, Missouri, various topics were discussed, such as the amount of royalties to be paid, the establishment of a litigation fund, costs of manufacture and the selling price per unit of tractor covers and other related subjects.

[Des Moines Meeting—Agreements of August 3-4]

20. From the conferences had in said meetings in St. Louis, Missouri, and correspondence later passing between the interested parties, a final meeting was agreed to be held at Des Moines, Iowa, when the License Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, was formally executed by or on behalf of said three aforesaid inventors and their several respective licensees.

21. At that same meeting in August 3-4, 1948, "Priority Award Agreements" were consummated by the three inventors, whereby Clapper was awarded priority of invention on the counts involved in the three-way interference, and Flora was awarded priority of invention on the counts involved in the two-way interference. Thereafter, on November 2, 1948, Clapper was granted Letters Patent No. 2,452,834; and on February 15, 1949, Flora was granted Letters Patent No. 2,461,974. No patent was granted on the Halligan application.

[Unlawful License Agreement]

22. By the terms of the License Agreement executed at Des Moines, Iowa, on August 3-4, 1948, the priority of Clapper and Flora to their respective inventions was recognized and agreed upon. Cabette, Fort Dodge and Bearing were each granted a separate license to manufacture and to sell heating units embodying the Flora and Clapper inventions, subject to the following conditions, among others: (1) that the licensees manufacture such heating units "at their respective addresses and in no other place or places except upon written consent" of the owner of the respective patents; (2) that the licensees pay Clapper $1.00 "as a royalty fee on each and every unit sold and shipped by them" and pay a proportionate royalty on parts, including specifically a royalty of 15¢ on "windshields when sold separately from completed unit"; (3) that the licensees pay Flora 25¢ on each and every unit sold by them, and also a "proportionate royalty" on parts, the same as Clapper; (4) that if any party to the Agreement made, or became the owner of any "improvements in said heating units," then Cabette, Fort Dodge and Bearing could manufacture and sell the improvements without paying any further royalty, except as set forth in paragraph 18 of the Agreement; (5) that Flora and Clapper would not grant any licenses under any patent that may be issued to them, respectively, "or any other patents that might fall within (the) license agreement, without first obtaining the written consent thereto of the remaining parties to (the) Agreement," and each of the licensees agreed not to grant any sub-licenses or any licenses on "any other patent that might fall within (the) License Agreement, without * * * the consent thereto of the remaining parties"; (6) Flora and Halligan agreed to "file applications for Canadian patents" on the subject matter of their respective United States patent applications, and Clapper and Flora granted licenses and the right to "manufacture and sell" heating units under their respective Canadian patent applications "then on file or to be filed"; (7) that if any patent was issued on the "Halligan application" or "any improvement made by Halligan relative to the subject matter of his application" then Bearing and Cabette would have an option "to take a license under such patent" and to pay royalty therefor on equal terms with Fort Dodge; (8) Sections 13, 14 and 15 of said license agreement read as follows:

"13. In the event any of the claims included in patents that may be issued on said FLORA, CLAPPER or HALLIGAN application, or any patents issued covering any improvements thereon, are infringed or in the event any party to this agreement is sued for infringement for the manufacture of heating units under said patents, then any party to this agreement having knowledge of such infringement or any party to this agreement who is sued for infringement shall send written notice thereof to the remaining parties and within a reasonable time thereafter, not to exceed twenty days, all of the parties hereto agree to discuss said infringements for the purpose of arriving at a mutually agreed upon procedure for their disposition.

"14. To prosecute infringers and defend against infringement, the parties hereto agree to set up a litigation fund of $8,000.00 in the following manner: coincident with the execution of this agreement, CLAPPER shall pay into the said fund $3,000.00 and CAB-ETTE, FORT DODGE and BEARING the sums of $1,000.00 each; that CAB-ETTE, FORT DODGE and BEARING shall pay into said fund the additional sum of 5¢ on each heating unit sold by them, respectively, from and after the 1st day of August, 1948, and said CLAPPER shall pay into said fund the sum of 5¢ for each $1.00 royalty by him received from and after the 1st day of August, 1948, until the funds amount to $8,000.00. That if at any time during the life of this agreement said fund shall be depleted to the sum of $6,000.00, then in any such event, the said parties hereto shall again contribute to said fund at the rate of 5¢ per unit as hereinabove in this paragraph provided, until said fund shall again amount to the sum of $8,000.00. The monies to be paid into said fund as above provided shall be paid to CLAPPER, who shall deposit and hold the same in trust in the Commerce Trust Company of Kansas City, Missouri, for the prosecution of infringers and the defending against infringement of any patents because of the manufacture, by CAB-ETTE, FORT DODGE, or BEARING of heating units under the above recited patent applications, or patents issuing therefor, or any future patents that may fall within the terms of this agreement. That said funds are to be used for the prosecution of infringements of any of said patents only upon the approval of a majority of the parties to this agreement. That said fund shall also be used to defray the expense that may be necessarily incurred in the investigation of claimed infringements and the necessary correspondence, negotiations and the giving of legal notice of infringement to infringers. That in the event any of the parties to this agreement shall claim an infringement materially affecting their business and shall have given notice thereof to the other parties hereto as provided in paragraph numbered 13 hereof, and a majority of the parties hereto agree that such claimed infringement should be prosecuted, then such prosecution shall be instituted within ninety days, but if a majority of the parties hereto shall fail to give their approval to the prosecution of such an infringement within a period of ninety days after the giving of such notice, then in that event, such party hereto claiming to be materially affected as aforesaid shall have the right and privilege at its own expense to prosecute such infringement without any claim to any of the monies in the said fund in this paragraph provided for, unless such prosecution shall have been finally resolved in favor of the complainant, in which event said complainant shall be entitled to be reimbursed from said fund for their expense incurred in the prosecution of such infringement. That in the event a majority of the parties agree to the prosecution of any infringement, or to undertake the defense of any claimed infringement by any of the parties hereto, that in any such event, the owner of the patent being infringed shall, and with the aid and advice of the remaining parties hereto if he so chooses, select and engage required counsel. That CLAPPER shall render unto CAB-ETTE, FORT DODGE and BEARING upon request an itemized statement of all sums, if any, withdrawn from said fund accompanied by a copy of the bank statement thereof. That the liability of FLORA, CLAPPER and HALLIGAN to prosecute infringements or to defend against infringements shall be limited to the monies in said fund in this numbered paragraph provided for. Upon the termination of this agreement by expiration of the patents issued to FLORA and CLAPPER on U. S. applications 617,049 and 583,345, respectively, or otherwise, or by the mutual consent of the parties, said fund shall be liquidated by dividing among the parties the monies in said fund in proportion to the amounts paid in by said parties as herein provided for.

"15. That in the event a patent shall be issued for improvements upon said heating units to persons other than parties to this agreement, then in such event, it is agreed that the parties hereto shall call a meeting and act as a unit in the negotiation for the use of such improvement, if desired, so as to make the same mutually available and on the same terms to all parties to this agreement, but that if the majority of the parties to the agreement determine not to contract for such improvement, then the parties to this agreement are privileged to contract therefor individually or collectively."

(9) said agreement was "based not only on the patents to be issued on said Clapper or Flora application which (were) the "subject matter of (said) agreement, but also upon those issued upon any renewals, continuations, divisions of, or substitutes for, said applications, and also on any reissues or extensions of said patent or patents"; and (10) that unless otherwise terminated, the licenses granted were to "extend to the latest expiration date of any patent issued on said Clapper and Flora applications."

[Volume of Business—Royalties]

23. Under the original license that Comfort had from Clapper; Cab-ette had from Flora; and Burch had from Halligan; and the license agreement executed by plaintiff on August 3-4, 1948, the licensees, Comfort, Cab-ette and Burch, built up substantial businesses, each doing several million dollars of business, in interstate commerce, manufacturing and selling tractor heating units during the time referred to herein. Each had numerous distributors in this country and Canada. Their collective sales value of tractor covers ranged from $200,000.00 to over a million dollars a year. Royalties paid to the plaintiff have amounted to over five hundred thousand dollars.

24. Adhering to the agreement of August 3-4, 1948, the licensees and Clapper set up a "Litigation Fund" as therein provided, for the purpose of defraying the expense of investigating and prosecuting infringers and defending against infringements of the Clapper and Flora patents. Said fund continued in existence from 1948 and the parties proceeded to use and control the same jointly as provided in said license agreement until on or about May 8, 1953. On that date the "Litigation Fund" was disbursed to Clapper and Flora, proportionately and the agreement of August 3-4, 1948, was terminated by the execution of a "Termination Agreement" which mainly resulted from a civil anti-trust action instituted against the licensees and Flora and Cab-ette by the United States, in the United States District Court, Western District of Missouri, Western Division, entitled United States of America v. Bearing Distributors Company, et al., Civil Action No. 6895. 11 F. R. D. 591, 18 F. R. D. 228.

25. Thereafter, separate non-exclusive licenses were granted by the patentees, Clapper and Flora, to Burch, Comfort and Cabette, under which these three corporations conducted their business operations in tractor covers, and any and all interim effects of the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, thereafter ceased to exist on May 6, 1953.

[Infringement Notice]

26. On November 24, 1948, plaintiff served notice on the defendant, Original, of infringement of the aforesaid Clapper patent, No. 2,452,834. However, no action was taken immediately against the said defendant.

27. During all of the times herein mentioned, the plaintiff was represented by Mr. Fred M. Roberts, an attorney with offices in Kansas City, Missouri. After consummation of the License Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, and establishment of the litigation fund provided for therein, Roberts, under instructions from Clapper and with full knowledge and understanding of the other parties to the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, caused the notices of infringement to be sent to the defendant, Original, and to all of the known distributors who were selling tractor covers manufactured by the defendant. Notices of those and other claimed infringements were sent to Roberts by the plaintiff and by the licensees and from various other sources. When knowledge of a claimed infringement was made known to Roberts, he caused infringement notices to be served on the alleged infringers. Copies of said notices were sent to the plaintiff and to the licensees and they were generally informed by Roberts of the giving of said notices of infringement and were consulted from time to time with respect thereto.

[Second Notice]

28. In August, 1949, a second notice of infringement was sent Mr. Fred M. Roberts, as attorney for the plaintiff, Clapper, to the defendant, Original, and a number of letters were sent by Roberts to the distributors for the defendant, informing said distributors that the tractor covers manufactured by the defendant, Original, were infringements of Clapper's Letters Patent, whereby the sale thereof by such distributors constituted an infringement, and subjected the said distributors to infringement actions by the said patentee.

[Sales Curtailed by Infringement Notices]

29. As a consequence of such infringement notices, the defendant, Original did cease for a time the manufacture and sale of tractor covers, and also some of the distributors thus notified of infringement also ceased selling tractor covers manufactured by the said defendant and began the sale and distribution of tractor covers manufactured by Comfort Equipment Company; whereby the sale of the tractor covers by the said defendant to the public were thereby directly curtailed and limited.

30. Clapper and Roberts were obligated under Section 13 of the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948 to give notice and to take action against claimed infringement of Clapper's Letters Patent within ninety days after notice thereof was received from the licensees or from any other source, and generally did so by serving notices of infringement. Clapper, as trustee of the litigation fund, built by himself and the licensees, expended $15,288.24 from the litigation fund with the approval of Flora and the licensees, to defray the costs incurred in the giving of infringement notices and the prosecution of infringement actions, including the one here involved instituted against the defendants.

[License Denied to Defendant]

31. After the giving of notice of infringement by the plaintiff to the defendant, Original, the defendants sought a license under the Clapper patent, but all such requests were denied by the plaintiff because of his obligations to Flora and the licensees, parties to the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948.

[Meeting Between Plaintiffs and Defendants]

32. After the notices of infringement were sent by Roberts in August, 1949, to the defendant, Original, and to its distributors as aforesaid, the defendants were invited to a meeting held in Chicago, Illinois, on September 12, 1949, with the plaintiff, together with Flora and the several licensees under said License Agreement, their representatives and attorneys, for the purpose of discussing the license requested.

[Concerted Action—Economic Duress]

33. At the meeting on September 12, 1949, the defendant, Williams, sought to persuade the plaintiff, together with Flora, and representatives of and attorneys for their several licensees, that a license should be granted to the defendant, Original, but such request for a license was rejected by those present acting in concert.

34. The parties to the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, including the plaintiff, acting through Roberts and through the spokesman for the group at the meeting on September 12, 1949, concertedly acted to stop the defendants from manufacturing and selling tractor covers in infringement of the Clapper patent. The full extent of all economic duress thus imposed by the plaintiff together with Flora and the licensees, the other parties to the said Agreement, in respect to that matter through the giving of notices to the defendant and to its distributors, was that if such claimed infringement was not abated, patent infringement proceedings were imminent.

[No Contract Between Plaintiffs and Defendants]

35. The spokesman for the several parties to the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, upon rejecting the application of the defendants for a license under the Clapper patent, in the meeting on September 12, 1949, informed the defendants that the defendant, Original, would be given a limited period of time within which to dispose of its stock of tractor covers then in course of manufacture and that if the defendants then ceased the manufacture of tractor covers, no action for patent infringement would be instituted. The evidence does not establish that an agreement was reached between the plaintiff and defendants in that meeting in Chicago on September 12, 1949, or subsequently. Any proposals made to the defendants in that meeting were in furtherance of a conspiracy in violation of antitrust laws, with respect to which the court will elaborate further in subsequent findings herein. Plaintiff has alleged and relies upon the theory that a contract was entered into between the defendants and the several parties to the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, and that he, plaintiff Clapper, has been damaged as a result of the breach of said contract on the part of the defendants. There is no evidence in the record of damages to the plaintiff flowing from the alleged breach, even if it were assumed that an agreement was reached, which the court does not find.

36. Thereafter, the defendants entered into a working arrangement with Cabette, formed for the use of the Original facilities to manufacture parts of tractor covers for Cabette, which working arrangement became effective the latter part of October, 1949. A proposed contract to formalize the working arrangement was reduced to a writing dated November 4, 1949. Before the execution thereof by both parties, disagreement arose, and the proposed contract was not executed. The working arrangement was terminated by mutual consent. A proposed settlement contract dated November 28, 1949, was prepared. Before the execution by both parties, a controversy arose, and the contract was unexecuted by both parties.

[No Knowledge of Unlawful License Agreement]

37. The defendants prior to the filing of this action by the plaintiff, had no knowledge of the terms and provisions of the License Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, except with respect to the place of manufacture of the tractor covers with the permission of Clapper.

["Working Arrangement" with Licensee]

38. The defendants discontinued the manufacture and sale of the Original products and entered into a working arrangement with Cabette. This arrangement was made in order to afford Cabette the working facilities of Original whereby Original could manufacture parts for Cabette, and at the same time, it was a means of keeping Original in operation.

39. During the working arrangement between Cabette and the defendants, the defendants notified the plaintiff that they were discontinuing the manufacture and sale of tractor covers in accordance with the direction by the spokesman for the group at the meeting in Chicago, as aforesaid, on September 12, 1949, which notice was retracted, however, after the discontinuance of the working arrangement with Cabette in November, 1949.

[Defendants Not Parties to Conspiracy]

40. During the working arrangement with Cabette, the defendants operated only as suppliers for Cabette by direction of the latter and did not thereby become licensees under the Clapper patent nor parties to the conspiracy; whereby the defendants are not estopped from contesting the validity of the Clapper patent nor from claiming damages for violation of the antitrust laws, according to the first cause of action of the amended complaint.

[Action Instituted]

41. Thereafter, upon the insistence of the licensee, Comfort, a meeting of the parties to the License Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, was held early in the year 1950, to determine what course of action should be followed with respect to the claimed infringement by the defendants; and subsequently, in accordance with an understanding reached by the parties to the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, at that meeting, this action was instituted in April, 1950, claiming infringement of the Clapper and Flora patents. Thereafter, this action was dismissed as to the Flora patent.

[Patent Invalid]

42. The Clapper patent application was filed March 17, 1945, on which patent No. 2,452,834 was granted on November 2, 1948.

43. This patent disclosed a conventional farm tractor, indicated generally at 10 in Fig. 1 [not reproduced herein], with a rear deflector member 44 (Fig. 1) extending over the superstructure 26 of the tractor and down along opposite sides of the operator's station at the seat 30. The rear open side of the deflector 44 is supported by a bow 36 (Fig. 7), adapted to be mounted on the rear axle housing 20 of the tractor and extending upward in front of the operator on the seat 30. A separate front deflector member 88 extends on opposite sides of the engine 22 of the tractor and down beneath the bottom of the engine as an extension of the deflector, so as to increase the supply of heat to the operator when needed. This deflector 88 is removable for the purpose described in the patent of varying the amount of heat to be supplied to the operator (see column 3, lines 55-56). The Clapper hot air deflector takes advantage of the known principle that the fan of the tractor would blow air over the engine during operation and be heated thereby, which heated air is then channeled back to the region of the operator.

54. The evidence shows, and the Court so finds, that the construction of a heat deflector for channeling the heat of the engine back to the operator of a tractor, and mounting it by a bow or metal frame on the tractor, would have been obvious to a person skilled in the art, at a date when Clapper claims to have made his invention.

55. The fact that almost identical devices were conceived by the several patent applicants, Clapper, Flora and Halligan, at about the same time, and apparently without knowledge of the developments of each other, is corroborative of the inescapable conclusion that this was an obvious adaptation, and that it did not amount to a patentable invention.

56. In any event, Clapper's contribution clearly lacked patentable merit as a combination. Every element was old in the prior art, the tractor, the heat deflector or cowl section of canvas, and the metal bow or frame. The manner of use of these in combination was what would have been expected in putting them together in the manner set forth in the Clapper patent. This is the type of device which is unpatentable as a combination, because the combination was not new nor the elements individually.

[No Infringement]

57. Since the Clapper patent is invalid, as indicated above, the question of infringement is moot. There can be no infringement of an invalid patent.

[Antitrust Violation—Bar to Infringement Action]

58. Moreover, this Clapper patent has been used as a basis for an agreement in restraint of trade in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Such misuse of patent rights bars any recovery for patent infringement.

["Elements of Illegality"]

59. By the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, the patentees, Clapper and Flora, granted a non-exclusive and non-transferable license to Comfort, Cabette and Burch to manufacture and sell tractor covers. The limitations imposed on the licensees by said Agreement, that the licensees would manufacture the inventions "at their respective . . . named addresses and in no other place or places"; and that no other license would be granted "without obtaining the written consent thereto of the remaining parties to the Agreement"; that if a license so granted was terminated, as provided in Paragraph 8 thereof, Flora or Clapper, respectively, shall be at liberty to license other licensees; that the parties would "mutually agree upon procedure for the disposition" of infringement suits; and that the parties set up a "litigation fund" to be used for that purpose, all are elements of illegality when used for an illegal purpose, as they were.

[Giving Licensee Power in Selecting Other Licensees]

60. An agreement by a patentee which gives a non-exclusive licensee a veto power in the selection of other licensees is invalid according to Sherman Act standards, Sections 1 and 2.

[Combining of Non-competing Patents]

61. The Agreement is also violative of Section 2 of the Act, in that it manifests an attempt to monopolize by the combining of non-competing patents in the single agreement by competitors and gives to the parties to the agreement veto power over patent rights that are not referrable to their individual businesses, the patents or licenses granted, and this is true even though the licensees may have continued to compete with each other in the manufacture and sale of tractor covers after the execution thereof. They were jointly given an exclusive market and control thereover by the terms of said Agreement, and not singularly as a consequence of patent privileges acquired.

[Unlawful Use of Patent Monopoly]

62. By Section 13 of the Agreement, the parties agreed to and the evidence establishes that they did act jointly in respect to "infringements" of the letters patent in question, and "mutually agree upon procedure for their disposition." In Section 14, Clapper and the licensees set up a "Litigation Fund" to be used for the prosecution of infringements of both said letters patent, upon approval of a majority of the parties to the agreement, and the evidence is that said fund was actually used by them for that purpose. The clear intent of the parties, gleaned from the verbiage contained in paragraphs 13 and 14, supra, and from the evidence herein was giving to each party thereto a separate and collective right to bring and control infringement actions, when no such right or power legally existed in the licensees, or opposite patentee, so to do under patent law; that they jointly and cooperatively intended to and did unite in the prosecution, and use of the "Litigation Fund" for that purpose. The action of the parties as revealed by the evidence is that they did, pursuant to the said agreement, join hands, through Roberts, in the giving of infringement notices to defendant and its dealers, and in so doing they intended to curtail and ultimately stop the manufacture and distribution of tractor covers by defendants, and sale thereof by defendants' distributors.

[Dominant Position in Field]

63. The evidence clearly establishes that the licensees were the major manufacturers of tractor covers and held a dominant position in that field of interstate trade and commerce, and that if the Agreement of August 4, 1948, was carried out by the parties, according to its terms, as it was, that the monopoly granted to said licensees gave them virtual control of that market and made it impossible for defendants to obtain any rights under the patents in issue, or legitimately enter the field of manufacturing and selling tractor covers. It is the fact of combination and concert of action by the parties to do the very things that they claim they had a right to do under said agreement, collectively and jointly, that spells out unlawful use of patent monopoly by them, in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

["Separate" as Contrasted with "Concerted" Action]

64. It is no defense of the Agreement of August 4, 1948, or for the giving of infringement notices and bringing of the infringement action as mentioned above, to say that Clapper and Flora had the right to grant separate licenses to defendants and that said patentees had the right under patent law to give notices of infringements of their respective patents, and to bring infringement actions. It is conceded that such are legal rights accruing to a patentee, or his assign or assigns. But what may be legally done by a patentee, or his assign, singularly or collectively, is no criterion for the measurement of legality of the agreement of August 4, 1948, and what was actually done by the plaintiff and his licensees in furtherance thereof as shown by the evidence. What Clapper or Flora, separately, might legally have done and what was done by them in concert of action with each other and with the licensees herein are two different matters. The fact that concert of action, violative of the Sherman Act, is accomplished by legal means, does not remove the terminal result thereof from the prohibitions of the Act.

[Patent Rights—Sherman Antitrust Act]

65. A conspiracy or combination having as its object, or effect, a restraint of interstate trade and commerce, whether accomplished by legal or illegal means, falls within the ambit of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and is condemned thereby. Patent rights give no protection from the prohibition of the Sherman Act, when they are asserted, controlled, or used in consequence of an agreement that is in restraint of interstate trade or commerce. Cf. United States v. New Wrinkle, Inc. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,214], 342 U. S. 371. When two individual patentees combine their patent monopolies and contract between themselves and with their licensees to secure mutual benefits for themselves and their licensees that are not given to them by the patent laws, and which agreement gives to the opposite patentee and the licensees a right of control over patent rights that may be asserted, and is used in restraint of interstate trade and commerce, the purpose and result of such an arrangement and conduct is clearly in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Cf. United States v. United States Gypsum Company [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,226], 333 U. S. 364; United States v. Line Material Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,225], 333 U. S. 287; and United States v. New Wrinkle, Inc., supra.

[Loss of Potential Sales—Damages]

66. The evidence shows that the impact of this conspiracy on the defendants has been substantial, has caused a direct loss of customers, a shutdown in business, and it is inescapable as a conclusion from all of the evidence that it has caused a material reduction in the potential sales of the defendant, Original. However the evidence before the court upon which to estimate the loss of potential sales is such as to preclude the court from relying upon it, and only for that reason is the court not able to fix the damages suffered by the defendants for loss of potential sales in each of the years in question.

67. The evidence is that the defendant, Original, sustained damage as a direct result of the actions of the plaintiff in concert with others. The impact of that conspiracy resulted in damages to the business and property of the defendant, Original.

[Work Stoppage]

68. The evidence shows direct loss was suffered by the defendant, Original, in salaries, wages and other expenses of shutdown from August 22 to September 28, 1949, in the total amount of $2,561.45. Defendant, Original, also claims an average cost of $116.43 per day for eleven days' stoppage of production from November 18 to December 1, 1949, following the termination of a working agreement with Cabette. This would amount to $1,280.73. The defendant, Original, also claims the sum of $3,830.00 for the loss it sustained as a result of the unsuccessful working arrangement it had with Cabette from the latter part of September to on or about November 23, 1949.

["Unsuccessful Working Arrangement"]

In regard to the working arrangement, the court finds the facts to be:

(1) that the arrangement was voluntarily brought about by the mutual desire of the officers of Cabette and Original;

(2) it was a business expedient for both parties;

(3) its termination came about through disagreement of the parties to the arrangement;

(4) there is not a preponderance of the evidence to indicate that the plaintiff Clapper and his licensees, through any conspiratorial act, caused the termination of the working arrangement.

Accordingly, defendant, Original, is not entitled to loss claimed for the eleven days' work stoppage and the claimed loss of $3,830.00 arising out of the unsuccessful working arrangement.

["Financing" Costs]

69. The evidence shows that the defendant, Original, had negotiated for financing for continued operation which had to be dropped entirely by the shutdown following the notices sent by the plaintiff in concert with others, in August, 1949, the cost of which to the defendant, Original, was $317.20, which it is entitled to recover.

[Advertising Costs]

70. The evidence shows that the defendant, Original, had expended for advertising the sum of $4,563.70, which was rendered valueless by the forced shutdown in August, 1949, as a result of said notices of infringement sent to the defendant and to its distributors.

[Attorneys' Fees in Defending Conspiratorial Suit—Not to Be "Trebled"]

71. The evidence shows that the defendant, Original, has incurred in fees and expenses obligations for $28,244.31 in defense of the patent infringement action instituted by the plaintiff and Flora as a part of the conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws. The court finds these legal fees and expenses to be reasonable for the services rendered by counsel for the defendant, Original, in the defense of the patent infringement litigation, and should be awarded to defendant's counsel for such services. Said sum, however, is not to be included as an element of damages in the antitrust action to be increased threefold, as defendants would have the court do. It is to be awarded counsel for the defendants by reason of their representing the successful parties in the patent infringement action, and by reason of the exceptional circumstances involved in the case concerning the validity of the patent and its use by the patentee and his licensees, all as found in these findings of fact.

[Loss of Sales]

72. The evidence shows that there has been a direct loss of sales by defendant, Original, to Farm Equipment Sales Co. and Stover-Winsted Co. as a consequence of the notices of infringement sent pursuant to the conspiracy created by the License Agreement of August 3-4, 1948. Defendant, Original, has vigorously contended and attempted to show that it also sustained loss of sales to Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. as a consequence of notices of infringement sent pursuant to the aforesaid conspiracy. In respect to the latter company, the court fails to find from the record sufficient evidence to support the defendants' claim of loss of sales to Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. by reason of the notices of infringement sent pursuant to the conspiracy.

Following the time Stover-Winsted Co. and Farm Equipment Sales Co. stopped doing business with the defendant, Original, the evidence shows that during the years 1949 through the first eleven months of 1956, Farm Equipment Sales Co. purchased from Comfort Equipment Company 9,084 covers. Such purchases were as follows:

Farm Equipment Sales Co.

Year	Comfort Covers Purchased
1949	1,339
1950	1,452
1951	1,985
1952	1,494
1953	982
1954	732
1955	649
1956 (11 months)	451
	9,084

Following the time Stover-Winsted Co. stopped doing business with the defendant, Original, it made the following purchases of Comfort covers from Comfort Equipment Company:

Stover-Winsted Co.

Year	Comfort Covers Purchased
1949	1,410
1950	1,425
1951	2,361
1952 (Jan. thru May)	660
	5,856

[Certainty of Damages]

The evidence shows that during said years the actual average net profit to defendant, Original, on the sale of half/Cabs amounted to $1.35 per unit. Accordingly, the loss sustained by defendant, Original, in respect to the loss of sales to Farm Equipment Sales Co. amounted to $12,263.40, and the loss of sales to Stover-Winsted Company amounted to $7,905.60. Where there is certainty as to the fact of damage which is thus established, there may be uncertainty as to the amount of damages. It is reasonable to conclude that the defendant, Original, could have sold at least an equal number of tractor covers to Farm Equipment Sales Co. and Stover-Winsted Co. had said companies not ceased to do business with the defendant, Original, as a result of the notices of infringement sent to them pursuant to the conspiracy created by the License Agreement of August 3-4, 1948. Therefore the court finds that the defendant, Original, has been damaged by reason of the loss of sales to said companies in the total amount of $20,169.00.

[Defendants' "Theory" as to "Potential" Sales]

73. The evidence shows that an estimate was made by the defendant, Williams, president of the defendant, Original Tractor Cab Co., Inc., as to the total number of tractor covers that could have been manufactured and sold by the said defendant, Original, but for the interference with the business of the defendant, Original, by the plaintiff, together with Flora and their licensees acting in concert. A very considerable amount of time and record was devoted to the explanation of the defendants' theory upon which the asserted right to recover for loss of potential sales is predicated. Briefly and generally, the theory of the defendant, Original, as explained by its president, Williams, and its accountant, Morgan, involved the process of taking the number of dealers the defendant, Original, had prior to the summer of 1949, at which time it changed its sales methods from dealers over to distributors. Williams explained he was very careful in making his calculations in order to stay on the conservative side. In his survey of existing dealers, he found there were 901 dealers listed. But of the 901 listed dealers he could find only 684 cards showing actual sales to such dealers. Therefore in his calculations he used the figure of 684 dealer cards as the basis from which to test the average potential sales to the established dealers. Among the 684 dealers, he found that 336 had sent orders in and had purchased half/Cabs. The 336 dealers purchased 1,275 half/Cabs. By taking the number of purchases of half/Cabs and relating them to the number of dealers who had actually purchased half/Cabs, he found that the company sales amounted to three and eighty hundredths half/Cabs per dealer. By relating the company sales of half/Cabs to all of its dealers, he found that the company's average sales of half/Cabs per dealer amounted to 1.86 half/Cabs.

After the establishment of the distributorships, Williams made a survey in order to determine the total number of dealers served by the distributors. It was found that the distributors serviced 17,450 dealers. Commencing with the year 1949, the first year defendant, Original, had distributors, and the first year of the impact of the conspiracy, the defendant, Original, estimated the sale of one unit to each dealer served by its distributors. Thus, it estimated its potential sales for the year 1949 at 17,450 units. Taking the year 1950 as the base year and applying the annual percentage growth in tractor population in the United States and applying such percentages of tractor population growth to the subsequent years to and including the year 1956, and by applying the estimated unit sales per dealer of 1.86, defendant thereby arrived at the respective total unit potential sales for the years 1950 through 1956. Page 8A of Defendants' Exhibit JJJ sets forth the computation of the number of units of potential Original half/Cab sales as estimated by Williams and the accountant Morgan. They are as follows:

Computation of Number of Units of Potential Original Half/Cab Sales

Year	Tractor Population	Per Cent of Base Year (1950)	Estimated Unit Sales per Dealer	Total Unit Potential Sales
1949	3,230,000	.....	1	17,450
1950	3,442,000	100.00	1.86	32,457
1951	3,778,000	109.76	...	35,625*
1952	3,859,000	112.12	...	36,391*
1953	3,950,000	114.75	...	37,244*
1954	4,122,000	119.75	...	38,867*
1955	4,198,000	121.96	...	39,585*
1956	4,320,000	125.50	...	40,784*
				278,353

* Increased by percentage of tractor population over base year, 1950.

By eliminating what defendant's accountant determined to be abnormal operating expenses by reason of the impact of the conspiracy and the attendant litigation, the accountant arrived at an adjusted net unit profit per half/Cab. By further applying the estimated unit potential sales as estimated by Williams according to his estimated sales per dealer as related to tractor population growth, defendant established a different and higher net unit profit through the commensurate savings in overhead costs per unit due to the greater estimated production. By applying the greater net unit profit to the respective annual estimated potential sales, the accountant arrived at the total dollar profits which defendants claim could have been realized on potential sales except for the impact of the conspiracy for the period 1949-1956, which amounted to $1,364,200.10. From this was deducted the actual profit realized from sales of half/Cabs as reflected by the accountant's proforma earnings statement adjusted to eliminate the abnormal effects of the conspiracy and litigation. The realized profits from actual sales of half/Cabs during the period amounted to $79,996.17. Subtracting the realized profits from the total estimated profits, the accountant arrived at the figure of $1,284,203.93, which the defendants claim represents the total profits that could have been realized on the estimated potential sales except for the antitrust violations by plaintiff Clapper, together with Flora and their licensees.

[Theory "Unrealistic"]

The court has spent numerous hours analyzing and weighing the defendants' evidence in regard to the damages sustained, and although it is convinced, even beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Original Tractor Cab Co., Inc., has been damaged as a result of the impact of the conspiracy of the plaintiff Clapper, and Flora and their licensees, the court is firmly of the opinion that the Williams-Morgan theory of computing the estimated potential sales is unrealistic and is based upon assumptions and conclusions which would lead the court into too much speculation and conjecture if reliance were to be placed upon it. For example, in order to rely upon the theory, it must be assumed that each of the distributors and the dealers included in Williams' estimate would continuously and consistently handle and sell the Original product, and that they would do so throughout the years involved. As a matter of fact, the record discloses that Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., whose stores were included among the 17,450 dealers, completely discontinued the sale of tractor cabs either in the year 1952 or 1953. Likewise, in order to rely upon the Williams-Morgan theory, it must be assumed that all of the dealers operate in states having climatic conditions wherein tractor covers would have sales potential. Further, it must be assumed that the sales of the defendant, Original, would consistently increase annually and that there would be no peaks and valleys in its annual sales. The evidence in the case indicates that this was not true in the case of any of the defendant, Original's, competitors who were engaged in the tractor cover business in each of the years here involved. In short, the formula upon which the defendant, Original, would have the court find its loss of profits is so fraught with pitfalls as to render it completely unreliable as an aid to the court in estimating reasonably the damages defendant, Original, has sustained. The court must have before it such facts and circumstances, or comparisons, for example, as to enable it to make an estimate of damage based upon judgment and not upon conjecture or guesswork. The evidence as a whole is not sufficient from which to draw a reasonable inference to support the conclusion, that except for the interference with the business of the defendant, Original, by the plaintiff and Flora and their licensees, the defendant, Original, could have sold the number of tractor covers indicated by the estimate of potential sales with the resultant profit claimed thereon.

[Compensatory Damages Allowed]

74. The losses heretofore stated resulted in damage to the business and property of the defendant, Original, as a consequence of the illegal conspiracy of the plaintiff Clapper, and Flora and their licensees acting in concert. For such damage, defendant, Original, is entitled to recover the following amounts of compensatory damages:

(1) Costs resulting from forced stoppage of production, from August 22, 1949 through September 23, 1949	$ 2,561.45
(2) Expenses incurred in finance negotiations	317.20
(3) Advertising costs rendered useless by reason of forced work stoppage	4,563.70
(4) Loss of potential sales to Farm Equipment Sales Co. for the years 1949 through the first eleven months of 1956	12,263.40
(5) Loss of potential sales to Stover-Winsted Co. for the years 1949 through the first five months of 1952	7,905.60
TOTAL	$27,611.35

[Attorneys' Fees for Defending Infringement Action]

75. The licensees under the Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, were added to this action as cross-defendants. Thereafter, the counterclaim was dismissed as to said licensees and Flora and the defendants entered into covenants not to sue upon payment by those parties to the defendants the amount of $110,000.00. Those covenants not to sue are plainly intended by their terms not as releases but only covenants not to sue, and it is expressly set out that the amount paid was not satisfaction which would discharge the liability of the remaining tort-feasor, Clapper. However the amount paid should be considered as a pro tanto credit, which in this instance, exceeds the liability of the plaintiff Clapper to the defendant, Original, even after trebling the amount of compensatory damages sustained by the defendant, Original, as a result of the plaintiff and his coconspirators' antitrust violations. That is to say, by trebling the compensatory damage sustained by the defendant, Original, the figure of $82,834.05 is obtained. By crediting against this sum the amount of $110,000.00, the amount paid the defendants under the covenants not to sue, the liability on plaintiff Clapper for compensatory damage to defendants is completely liquidated. But even though there is no further liability on the plaintiff Clapper for compensatory or general damages, there still remains his liability for the payment of defendants' attorney's fees for services rendered in defending the patent infringement action, which the court finds to fall within the category of "exceptional cases" as evidenced by the whole of the findings herein. As heretofore found, a reasonable attorney fee and reimbursement of counsel for miscellaneous expenses in rendering legal service in the patent infringement phases of this case is the sum of $28,244.31. As a part of the judgment in this proceeding, the plaintiff Clapper will be ordered to pay such sum to defendants' counsel of record. In addition to the payment of attorney's fees in connection with the patent infringement action, the defendants are entitled to have and recover from the plaintiff Clapper, reasonable attorneys' fees for the services of their attorneys in the prosecution of defendants' counterclaim and crosscomplaint for antitrust violations on the part of plaintiff Clapper and Flora and their coconspirators. Such attorneys' fees will be fixed by the court upon petition of counsel for the defendants and after hearing thereon.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Costs—Defense and Counterclaim]

In addition to the foregoing attorneys' fees, defendants are entitled to recover fully the costs of suit laid out and expended by them in their defense to each cause of action brought against them in the five paragraphs of complaint, and in the prosecution of their counterclaim and crosscomplaint for the antitrust violations.

[Release]

76. The general release dated November 23, 1949, between the Cabette Company and Original Tractor Cab Co., Inc. was executed and signed by Cabette but was not executed by Original or Williams.

77. The unexecuted general release was prepared as and for settlement of the controversy between the parties thereto. It did not contemplate or involve any settlement for violation of the antitrust laws and would not settle such matter. Consequently it does not release the plaintiff from liability for damages to the defendant, Original.

[Yielding to Duress—Unclean Hands]

78. Some evidence is in the record tending to indicate that tractor covers sold during the working arrangement between Original and Cabette in 1949 were identified as "half/Cabs" rather than "Original Cabettes", as contemplated by the parties. If this was a violation of the arrangement between Original and Cabette, it is nothing of which the plaintiff may complain and does not constitute, without more, any evidence of unclean hands with respect to the subject matter of the counterclaim for damages for violation of the antitrust laws. The evidence does not show that the defendants had knowledge of the illegal conspiracy at and subsequent to the meeting in Chicago on September 12, 1949. The acts of the defendants under the economic duress imposed by such conspiracy in yielding to the pressure imposed by the conspiracy does not make the one who thus yields a party to the conspiracy. The evidence does not show unclean hands on the part of the defendants with respect to this action for damages.

Conclusions of Law

From the foregoing facts the court concludes:

[Jurisdiction]

1. That this court has jurisdiction over the parties and the subject matter in this cause of action.

[Dismissal of Causes]

2. The first cause of action for declaratory judgment, having been withdrawn by the plaintiff, is dismissed.

3. The charge of unfair competition included in the second cause of action is dismissed.

4. The third cause of action, for false patent marking, having been withdrawn by the plaintiff, is dismissed.

[Breach of Contract]

5. There was no valid agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants entered into on September 12, 1949, or subsequently, with respect to discontinuance of manufacture of tractor covers, and judgment on the fourth cause of action, for breach of contract, is entered for the defendants.

[Patent Invalid]

6. The Clapper patent is invalid.

7. The subject matter of the Clapper patent was fully anticipated in the art, was an obvious adaptation, and an unpatentable aggregation.

[Infringement Question Moot]

8. Whether the Clapper patent has been infringed by the defendants is moot in view of the court's conclusion of law that the Clapper patent is invalid.

9. The plaintiff's second cause of action is dismissed.

[Sherman Act, Section 1]

10. The Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, is per se violative of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

[Sherman Act, Section 2]

11. The Agreement of August 3-4, 1948, also violates Section 2 of the Sherman Act, in that it manifests an attempt to monopolize, by the combining of non-competing patents in a single agreement by competitors, and gives to the parties to the agreement veto power over patent rights that are not referrable to their individual businesses, or licenses granted, even though the licensees may have continued to compete with each other, after the execution thereof. They are jointly given an exclusive market and control thereover by the terms of the agreement, and not singularly as a consequence of patent privileges acquired.

[Patent Rights Under Sherman Act]

12. A conspiracy or combination having as its object or effect a restraint of interstate trade and commerce, whether accomplished by legal or illegal means, falls within the ambit of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, and is condemned thereby. Patent rights give no protection from the prohibitions of the Sherman Act, when they are associated, controlled, or used in consequence of an agreement, that is in restraint of interstate trade or commerce.

[Patent Control by "Opposite" Patentee]

13. When the two individual patentees, Clapper and Flora, combined their patents, they monopolized and contracted between themselves and with their licensees, to secure mutual benefits for themselves and their licensees, that are not given to them by the patent laws, and which agreement gave to the opposite patentee and licensees, a right of control over patent rights that may be associated and used in restraint of interstate trade and commerce; the purpose and result of such an arrangement and conduct was a violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

[Concerted Refusal to License]

14. The patentees and their licensees had no legal right to act in concert and join hands in an agreement shown to be in violation of the Sherman Act, thereby refusing a license to another manufacturer in the field, even though the latter was carrying on some business in violation of those patents.

[Damages]

15. Defendants are entitled to recover damages from the plaintiff as a result of losses suffered as a result of actions of the plaintiff, together with Flora and their licensees, and resulting to the business of the defendant, Original, in the following amounts:

(1) Costs resulting from forced stoppage of production, from August 22, 1949 through September 23, 1949	$ 2,561.45
(2) Expenses incurred in finance negotiations	317.20
(3) Advertising costs rendered useless by reason of forced work stoppage	4,563.70
(4) Loss of potential sales to Farm Equipment Sales Co. for the years 1949 through the first eleven months of 1956	12,263.40
(5) Loss of potential sales to Stover-Winsted Co. for the years 1949 through the first five months of 1952	7,905.60
TOTAL	$27,611.35

[Damages Trebled—Credits]

16. The damages assessed against the plaintiff shall be increased threefold in accordance with the Clayton Act; however as against that threefold amount, the plaintiff Clapper is entitled to credit the sum of $110,000.00 heretofore paid by Flora and the cross-defendants.

[Covenants Not to Sue]

17. The covenants not to sue entered into between the defendants and Flora and the cross-defendants, were not releases, and do not discharge the liability of the plaintiff for violation of the antitrust laws.

[Estoppel]

18. The defendants are not estopped from asserting their counterclaim for damages under the Clayton Act by the arrangement made with the Cabette Company in October, 1949.

19. The third cause of action for breach of contract is dismissed.

[Attorneys' Fees and Costs]

20. Judgment shall be entered for the defendants on the counterclaim, and in the judgment it shall be ordered that the defendants have and recover of the plaintiff Clapper, attorney fees and reimbursement of miscellaneous legal expense in the amount of $28,244.31 for the services of defendants' counsel in their defense to the patent infringement action in this case. It shall also be ordered that defendants are entitled to reasonable attorney fees, to be fixed by the court upon petition and hearing, covering the services of defendants' counsel in the prosecution of the counterclaim and cross-complaint for antitrust violations on the part of plaintiff Clapper, together with Flora and their co-conspirators. In addition to the payment of the attorney fees aforesaid, the defendants shall fully recover of the plaintiff their total costs of suit laid out and expended in this cause.

Let judgment be entered accordingly.

Correcting Entry for January 14, 1958

After the court entered its findings of fact and conclusions of law herein, it occurred to the court that in finding and concluding that defendants were entitled to have and recover from plaintiff Clapper, reasonable attorney fees for the services of their attorneys for prosecuting the defendants' counterclaim and cross-complaint, that the court erred in including services rendered by defendants' counsel in the prosecution of defendants' cross-complaint against the cross-defendants.

Accordingly, it is now ordered that the findings of fact and conclusions of law heretofore entered by the court in this cause be amended to exclude from consideration, attorney fees for defendants' counsel covering services rendered in the prosecution of the defendants' cross-complaint against the cross-defendants. That is to say, the attorney fees to be allowed defendants' counsel in connection with the prosecution of the antitrust phases of this action will be limited to services rendered upon the defendants' counterclaim.

Memorandum Entry

[Attorneys' Fees—Costs]

This cause is now before the court upon the following matters:

(1) The fixing of attorneys' fees to be awarded defendants' attorneys for prosecuting the counterclaim for antitrust violations.

(2) Motion of defendants for admission of attorneys' itemization.

(3) Motion of plaintiff for an order requiring defendants' counsel, John F. Linder, to file an itemization of his charges for services on the antitrust cause of action.

(4) Motion of defendants to amend findings of fact and conclusions of law.

(5) Plaintiff's post-hearing brief anent attorney fees, and motion to amend findings of fact and conclusions of law, etc.

(6) Plaintiff's objections to defendants' bill of costs.

[Covenant Not to Sue and Settlement with Other Conspirators]

The court will stand on its prior ruling whereby it has found that the plaintiff has not been released as a tort-feasor by the terms of the settlement and covenant not to sue executed by the defendants in connection with their settlement with the other alleged joint tort-feasors. Moreover, Plaintiff's proffered Exhibit 200, the waiver and release of attorneys' lien, would not give aid to the plaintiff in his contention that he is absolved from payment of attorneys' fees by reason of his claimed release based upon this construction of the covenant not to sue. The waiver and release of attorneys' lien amounted to no more than what it purported to accomplish, i. e., to cause

Defendants' counsel not to look to Comfort Equipment Company, Burch Manufacturing Company, Cab-Ette Company and Lee Flora, Plaintiff's co-conspirators, for the payment of any fees whatsoever, in any of the then pending litigation in three different district courts, in consideration of the execution of the agreement of settlement. The defendants, Williams and Original, were not parties to the waiver and release of attorneys' lien. Only their attorneys had such a lien to waive and release. Surely Plaintiff cannot seriously contend that by such action on the part of Defendants' counsel, the defendants are now precluded from recovering as a part of their statutory remedy, a reasonable attorneys' fee and costs as provided by the antitrust laws. Such an argument seems frivolous beyond words when considered in the light of the entire record in this case. Suffice to say that this court believes that the defendants as parties litigant are still entitled to recover a reasonable attorney fee for the use of their attorneys against their remaining defeated adversary in this long and expensive litigation.

[Attorneys' Fees—Antitrust Counterclaim]

The court will next take up the matter of fixing the attorney fees to be awarded Defendants' attorneys for their services in prosecuting the counterclaim for damages sustained by Defendants as a result of Plaintiff's violation of the antitrust laws.

Defendants' counsel have submitted evidence by way of expert testimony and itemized statements tending to show that they have earned attorneys' fees for services in their antitrust cause of action totaling $141,035.00. This they are claiming in addition to the attorneys' fees in the amount of $28,244.31 heretofore fixed by the court for their services in the defense of the patent infringement action.

The court has awarded compensatory damages to the defendants in the amount of $27,611.35 which, when trebled, amount to $82,834.05. Against this sum has been credited $110,000.00 received by the defendants from Plaintiff's co-conspirators for a covenant not to sue. Thus the court now finds what remains to be done is the fixing of Defendants' attorneys' fees in the antitrust phase of the lawsuit.

[Complexities of Case—Authorities on Fixing of Fees]

The court has carefully considered the evidence and post-trial briefs relating to attorneys' fees in the antitrust cause of action. The court is not unmindful of the complexities of the case, nor of its far-flung reaches. The case has been in process for over eight years and has consumed hundreds of hours of the court's time. Nor is the court overlooking the fact that it is convinced that this action was brought as a furtherance of the conspiracy, which the court believes had its inception prior to the granting of the patent in issue. Notwithstanding all of this, the court is bound by the authorities relative to the matter of fixing attorney fees in this type of action, particularly the rule as followed in the Seventh Circuit. See Milwaukee Towne Corp. v. Loew's, Inc., et al., (7 Cir. 1951) [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,891], 190 F. 2d 561. See also Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp., et al. v. Brookside Theatre Corp., (8 Cir. 1952) [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,218], 194 F. 2d 846.

[Relation to Damages Awarded—Fees as "Damages"]

With the Milwaukee Towne Corp. case as a guide, the court concludes, and therefore finds, that the request for attorneys' fees in the amount of $141,035.00 for services of Defendants' attorneys in the antitrust cause of action, does not bear a realistic relation to the amount of compensatory damages awarded. With regard to this finding, the court is not in accord with the views of the defendants whereby they would have the court include as a part of the basis of compensatory damages, the amount of $28,244.31, the attorney fees fixed for their services in defending the patent infringement action. No convincing authority has been shown to support their position in that regard. Nor does the court agree with the defendants in respect to their position that the court ought to readjust the credit allowed on the damages awarded. Defendants would have the court deduct their expenses and claimed attorneys' fees in connection with the venue issue from the $110,000.00 paid Defendants pursuant to the covenant not to sue, using the balance as a credit against the trebled compensatory damage. Likewise, as in their claim that the attorneys' fees for defending the patent action should be included as a part of the compensatory damage in computing the treble damages, they have shown no authority to support their position and the court has been unable to find any.

[Attorneys' Fees as "Costs"]

Approaching the issue of attorneys' fees from the other side, Plaintiff would have the court disallow all fees for Defendants' attorneys prior to the entry of December 14, 1954, the order of dismissal, whereby the complaint was dismissed by Flora as against the defendants, Williams and Original, and the counterclaim and cross-complaint dismissed by Williams and Original against Flora, Comfort, Burch and Cab-Ette. This is on the theory that attorneys' fees are to be included as part of the costs and that item four of the order of dismissal provides, "That no costs be awarded to any party litigant designated in this order, the respective parties litigant bearing their own costs." This theory, as so many others proffered by Plaintiff, at first blush might seem to have some merit, and the court is not wholly ignoring it. But the plaintiff does not stop there, he goes on and asks to be completely exonerated from payment of all costs and attorneys' fees incurred during the three-year period devoted to the venue issue involving his co-conspirators and the appeal taken from the order of this court in respect thereto. He would have the court believe his hands are stainless of the part he played in the conspiracy. During that time he was as much of a litigant in the antitrust cause of action as at any other time throughout the long course of this controversy. It was he who reaped the greatest benefits from the conspiracy. The presence of the co-conspirators before the court, more than anything else, made it possible for the court to ascertain the true relationship between them and the plaintiff and thus the existence of the conspiracy. Not only that, it should be borne in mind that the District Court for the Western District of Missouri, on October 27, 1953, had enjoined and restrained the plaintiff from instituting any proceeding, judicial or administrative, for infringement of Plaintiff's patent alleged to have occurred prior to such date. It can be concluded from that injunctive decree that the Missouri District Court intended to deprive the plaintiff of the fruits of his patent during the period of the existence of the conspiracy, which this court has also found to have existed prior to the Missouri District Court action. And this court has found that by the bringing of this action in the Southern District of Indiana, the conspiracy was furthered, that this action was a part of the conspirators' scheme to effectively carry forth their conspiracy and help bring it into complete fruition. Why the Missouri District Court made no mention in its decree of the "maintenance" of any pending infringement action at the time of its decree is unexplained. But to say the least, it is not logical to believe that that court intended to exempt this action in this district merely because it had been brought prior to the date of its injunctive decree. Since there is no conclusive evidence on this point before this court, it is assumed that the Missouri District Court, out of judicial conservatism and comity, left the matter of the pendency of this action to the discretion of this court in view of the pending counterclaim and cross-complaint. The decree there was a consent decree without the benefit of findings of fact and conclusions of law. Certainly the spirit of that court's decree would dictate that this action for patent infringement especially in view of the record in this proceeding, should have abated at the time of that decree. Instead of withdrawing the complaint for patent infringement, the plaintiff and his co-conspirator, Flora, chose to pursue the action beyond the date of that decree, even though they knew it was a remnant of their earlier conspiratorial actions.

Of course the plaintiff does not agree with such a construction of that decree, and the court here being somewhat in doubt as to its full meaning, concluded that this entire litigation should be heard on the merits. Except for such doubt, this court should have dismissed the complaint here in suit.

With the foregoing in mind, the court concludes that its order of December 14, 1954, did not relieve Plaintiff from payment of a just portion of the attorneys' fees and costs during the pendency of the venue litigation. Out of fairness, however, the court should not fail to consider as a weight factor in determining a reasonable attorney fee for Defendants' attorneys in the antitrust litigation, the recovery made and the attorneys' fees received in connection with the $110,000.00 paid by Plaintiff's co-conspirators. Though the arrangement between Defendants and their counsel was a private one, not subject to the control of the court at the time of payment, nonetheless, it cannot be altogether ignored in the separate matter of assessing attorneys' fees at this time.

[Amount Awarded]

Therefore, considering the evidence in the light of the court's firsthand knowledge of much of the services performed by Defendants' attorneys, and the value thereof, the court finds that a reasonable fee for their combined services should be, and is hereby fixed in the amount of $25,000.00. As to the division of such amount, counsel will be left to their own discretion.

The court is well aware that this sum represents just a little less than the compensatory damage found to have been sustained by Defendants, but except for the difficulty of proof, it is ventured that the actual damage suffered as a direct result of the violation of the antitrust laws by the plaintiff and his co-conspirators would have been found to be far greater.

Motion of Defendants for Admission of Attorneys' Itemization, and Motion of Plaintiff for an Order Requiring Defendants' Counsel, John F. Linder, to File an Itemization of his Charges for Services on the Antitrust Cause of Action

[Mootness]

Since the court has now disposed of the matter of fixing the amount of attorneys' fees for the defendants' attorneys in prosecuting the antitrust cause of action, the motion of Defendants for admission of attorneys' itemization, and motion of Plaintiff for an order requiring Defendants' counsel, John F. Linder, to file an itemization of his charges, are considered to be moot.

Motions to Amend Court's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

Next the court turns to the respective motions filed by each side for amendment of the court's findings of fact and conclusions of law. Their motions and supporting briefs have been carefully read and considered. After such consideration and further review of the pertinent parts of the record, the court concludes that it will stand on the findings of fact and conclusions of law heretofore made.

Plaintiff's Objections to Defendants' Bill of Costs

[Bill of Costs—Objections]

The court now turns to the plaintiff's objections to the bill of costs submitted by the defendants. Their bill of costs was filed on January 27, 1958. On February 11, 1958, the plaintiff filed objections thereto. Due to the complex issues involved, many of which were previously argued, the clerk of the court made no attempt to tax the costs. Therefore, this matter is not being considered on review of the actions of the clerk, but by the court in the first instance.

The bill of costs totals $39,257.26, and with certain minor exceptions, the plaintiff objects to the whole thereof. Following is a categorical breakdown of the items listed in the original bill of costs:

Item 1	Fees of the court reporter for all or any part of the transcript necessarily obtained for use in the case	$ 1,453.76
Item 2	Fees for witnesses (28 U. S. C. 1821)	75.28
Item 3	Fees for exemplification and copies of papers necessarily obtained for use in case	207.98

Since filing the original bill of costs, Defendants were ordered to itemize with greater particularity Items 1, 3 and 5 of the bill. In their response to that order, which, incidentally was not a satisfactory response and therefore required an additional itemization, defendants called the court's attention to "slight differences" in the amounts of court reporter charges and deposition charges, and asked that the amounts as set forth for such items in the original bill of costs be changed to show the sum of $1,733.64 for court reporter charges, and the sum of $1,050.04 for costs incident to taking of depositions. After such correction, the total amount of the bill of costs would amount to $39,510.09, an increase of $252.83. However, it is apparent that these figures must further be amended in view of Defendants' "Further Itemization of Costs" which was filed on May 20, 1958. According to the last itemization, the charges for court reporter amount to $1,688.73, and the costs incident to the taking of depositions amount to $1,049.64. The court will therefore treat the bill of costs to be amended as requested and according to the latest itemization amounting to $39,464.78.

[Court's Intentions as to Costs]

Before taking up the objections to the various items in the bill of costs, it would be helpful to the parties if the court would set aright what appears to be a misgiving on the part of the defendants with respect to the meaning of certain language used in the court's findings of fact and conclusions of law dated January 13, 1958. In its findings and conclusions, the court stated,

> "In addition to the payment of attorneys' fees aforesaid, the defendants shall fully recover of the Plaintiff their total costs of suit laid out and expended in this cause."

This was not the best choice of words in view of what the court had in mind at the time. The court intended merely to have the statutory costs, including the reasonable costs incident to the taking of depositions, assessed against the plaintiff. It was not the intent of the court to go beyond what is normally and customarily included in the assessment of costs in this type of action. Therefore a great bulk of the defendants' bill of costs will be disallowed in fixing the costs to be taxed against the plaintiff.

[Alleged "Exoneration"]

Perhaps it would also be well at this point to dispose of certain objections which the plaintiff interposes and which flow to the question of whether the defendants should be permitted to recover any costs after the date of the settlement with the plaintiff's co-conspirators, and to the question of whether Plaintiff should be taxed with any of the costs incurred in connection with the trial and disposition of the issue of venue. These objections affect all of the items of costs and must be considered in addition to the specific objections to the respective items.

[Dismissal of Co-conspirators]

Plaintiff says that by reason of the terms of the agreement made in connection with the execution of the covenant not to sue and the order of the court of December 14, 1954, approving the simultaneous dismissal of the complaint on behalf of Flora as against the defendants, Williams and Original, and the counterclaim and cross-complaint on behalf of said defendants as against Flora, Comfort, Burch and Cab-Ette, he, the plaintiff, is exonerated from the payment of costs. Then, moreover, the plaintiff says he took no active part in the trial and disposition of the issue of venue. He says that during the period "from the spring of 1951 through the fall of 1954 the venue dispute occupied the stage, with the Clapper issue completely sidetracked." He claims that he did not participate in the long venue battle in any way, that during the long period of delay the battle was confined to the defendants on the one hand and the cross-defendants on the other.

The settlement agreement which was made at the time the covenant not to sue was given by the defendants to all of the co-conspirators, except the plaintiff Clapper, provided that the dismissals

> "shall be entered without an award or payment of costs . . . all parties paying their own costs."

The court's order of dismissal of December 14, 1954 specified,

> "4. That no costs be awarded to any party litigant designated in this order, the respective parties litigant bearing their own costs."

In view of the terms of the agreement and the court's order of dismissal, Plaintiff concludes that the defendants are thereby bound to bear their own costs up to the date of the order, December 14, 1954. Now in addition to the foregoing, Plaintiff further contends that he is in fact released from all liability because the agreements and the covenant not to sue constitute a legal release of Plaintiff's joint tort-feasors, and by operation of law, he too is released.

A similar position was taken by the plaintiff in his opposition to the matter of awarding attorneys' fees to Defendants for the services of their attorneys in the antitrust phase of this case. What the court has said in that regard will not be fully repeated here. The court disagrees with the theory of the plaintiff, first, because throughout the pendency of this action the plaintiff has been a most active litigant in the antitrust phase of the suit. Actually that phase of the suit has overshadowed the patent infringement action, both from the activities of the plaintiff and the defendants. Had it not been for the fact that the plaintiff's co-conspirators were brought into this court, the scope and effect of the conspiracy might never have been known. Plaintiff's argument that he took no active part in the case during the venue battle does not bear weight.

["Apportioning" Costs Among Joint Tort-feasors]

Plaintiff seems to take the position that since he did not participate in the venue dispute as much as the other litigants, he should only be taxed, if at all, in proportion to the extent of his participation. Bearing in mind the court has found him guilty of violation of the antitrust laws, there is no logical reason why he, as one of the joint-wrongdoers, should not be held accountable for the full amount of the court costs. It is only in rare cases where one of several joint-wrongdoers is absolved from full liability for court costs. In the case of Vrooman v. Penhollow, (6 Cir. 1911) 186 F. 495, a patent infringement action, one of three defendants made a motion that the costs adjudged them be distributed among them in proportion to the extent of their participation in the infringement complained of. In the trial below, the evidence was scant as to the extent of the participation of this particular defendant in the infringement. This minor issue received little attention during the trial because of the larger contest over patent infringement. In denying the motion of the complaining defendant, the court said:

> "It is apparently true that in some rare cases where there were several wrongdoers, some of whom had participated in doing the wrong only in a trivial or almost wholly unrelated manner, the court has exercised its discretion in their favor and cast the heavier burden of the costs to which all are liable upon the more guilty parties. But such cases are exceptions to the general rule upon very special circumstances. We think the position which Baker has taken and held in this matter has not been such as ought to induce the court to exercise its discretion in his favor. We have the conviction that he was the most potent factor in the infringement and that it was mainly because of his countenance and encouragement that the other defendants persevered in it."

And so it was in the case at bar. The plaintiff Clapper was the dominant figure in the conspiracy. He stood to gain the most and did gain the most from the fruits of the joint-wrongdoings. How, then, can this court exercise its discretion in his favor and shift the costs incident to the venue question over and upon the successful defendants? Certainly not merely because the plaintiff says he did not participate very much in that part of the litigation.

[Recovery of Costs Not Precluded]

The terms of the agreement and the order of dismissal of December 14, 1954, do not preclude at this stage of the litigation the taxing of the defendants' costs against the plaintiff. Plaintiff was not a party to the agreement nor the covenant not to sue, and he was not included in the order of dismissal. Nor did the court by entering the order of dismissal intend it to have the legal effect Plaintiff now claims. The court knows of no rule or theory of law that would preclude the defendants from agreeing with a part of the other litigants that they would bear their own costs up to the time the covenant not to sue was executed and the dismissal entered, and look forward to an ultimate recovery of such costs from their remaining defeated opponent, should they be successful. Whether the court in assessing costs under such circumstances should take into account the prior consideration paid for the covenant not to sue, seems to be a matter to be left to the sound discretion of the trial court.

Throughout Plaintiff's argument he fails to draw a distinction between such costs as should be awarded the successful defendants in connection with the patent infringement issue, and the costs which should be awarded in regard to the antitrust phase of the case. Keeping in mind all of the issues in this action, it is doubtful whether such a distinction can be accurately drawn. The court, therefore, must weigh and evaluate the respective items of cost and the objections made thereto, whether such items were incurred prior or subsequent to the dismissal as against the other parties, or whether in connection with the patent or antitrust issues.

The court has previously ruled that the agreement and covenant not to sue did not constitute a legal release but was only a covenant not to sue.

For these reasons the court now holds that the plaintiff has not been relieved of paying the defendants' legitimate costs of suit.

The court will now deal with the items of costs as they are listed in the bill of costs and consider them in the light of Plaintiff's objections.

[Court Reporter's Fees]

Item 1	Fees of court reporter for all or any part of the transcript necessarily obtained for use in the case	$ 1,688.73

Plaintiff objects generally to the allowance of this item but particularly objects to the assessment of any costs against the plaintiff for an extra copy of the transcript of the testimony taken during the trial. Plaintiff argues that such extra copy of the transcript was merely for the convenience of counsel and therefore not necessarily obtained for use in the case. By inference Plaintiff also objects to the cost of the original stenographic transcript furnished the court. This is on the premise that the court did not order a transcript of the evidence. Plaintiff, for authority in support of the first proposition, cites Hope Basket Co. v. Product Advancement Corp., (Mich. 1952) 104 F. Supp. 444; Dept. of Highways v. McWilliams Dredging Co., (La. 1950) 10 F. R. D. 107; Kenyon v. Automatic Instrument Co., (Mich. 1950) 10 F. R. D. 248; Stallo v. Wagner, (2 Cir. 1917) 245 F. 636. For his second proposition, Plaintiff cites and relies upon Firtag v. Gendleman, (D. C. 1957) 152 F. Supp. 226; Marshall v. Southern Pacific Co., (Cal. 1953) 14 F. R. D. 228, and Cooke v. Universal Pictures Co., (N. Y. 1955) 135 F. Supp. 480. From a reading of these and other cases, one thing is made abundantly clear; the fixing and allowing of court costs vary in different districts and according to the judicial discretion of the various judges in view of the varying circumstances in the respective cases. Of course there are generally fixed standards which should be followed, but in each case the matter of allowing costs must be determined according to the peculiar facts and circumstances.

In this court it has been a custom of long standing, amounting to an unwritten rule, that in any case when a party orders a transcript of the evidence, the original transcript must be furnished the trial judge and the expense thereof must be borne by the party ordering the same, or, as the court otherwise directs. In the case at bar, since the court early in the proceedings made it known to counsel that in view of the complexities of the case they would be required to prepare and submit proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, it is nothing more than reasonable that counsel and the parties should have anticipated the need of a transcript of the evidence and the cost incident thereto. Therefore the court concludes that Defendants are entitled to recover as costs in this proceeding their expenditures toward the cost of the original stenographic transcript of the evidence and minutes of the trial. Also, the cost of one copy for the use of their counsel in the conduct of the trial and in the post trial procedures which were required by the court. The court will not, however, order the plaintiff to pay the costs of reporters' fees and charges for transcripts of oral arguments which were had at various times through the pendency of this action. Such transcripts, it is felt, were principally for the convenience of counsel and should be borne by the party requesting them.

With these pronouncements as a guide, the following costs under Item 1 of the bill of costs will be taxed against the plaintiff, but in respect to all other costs thereunder the plaintiff's objections are sustained:

May 18, 1953	Walene E. Shields Transcript from trial of venue.

Total Allowed—Item 1			$1,391.49

Item 2—Fees for Witnesses (28 U. S. C. 1821)—$75.28

[Witness Fee and "Mileage" for Defendant]

Plaintiff objects to the allowance of this item of costs except with respect to Ralph L. Morgan—$19.20, Ray Steffey—$8.62, and Harold B. Hood—$4.00. As to the witness fee and mileage for the defendant Williams, Plaintiff points out that he being a party to the action and a real party in interest, attended throughout the whole of every day of both sessions of the trial, and actively participated in the management thereof; that therefore he did not, in other words, attend merely as a witness. Such being the case, the claimed witness fee and mileage for him is not allowable. Plaintiff cites Barnhart v. Jones, 9 F. R. D. 423 (W. Va. 1949); Picking v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 11 F. R. D. 71 (Pa. 1951); Ryan v. Arabian American Oil Co., 18 F. R. D. 206 (N. Y. 1955), and Tuck v. Olds, 29 F. 883 (Mich. 1886).

[Witness Fee for Counsel]

Similarly, as to the witness fee for Defendants' counsel, Messrs. Swecker, Linder and Ernest, Plaintiff argues that since all of them were attorneys of record in this case and actively participated in the conduct of the trial, they should not be permitted to shift position from counsel table to witness chair and thereupon be entitled to witness fees. The court agrees with the plaintiff. Accordingly only the following costs will be allowed under Item 2 of the bill of costs:

Ralph L. Morgan	$19.20
Ray Steffey	8.62
Harold B. Hood	4.00
Total Allowed—Item 2	$81.82

Item 3—Fees for exemplification and copies of papers necessarily obtained for use in case.—$207.98

[Lack of Itemization]

To this item the plaintiff objects because there has been no itemization of the amount sought. Plaintiff relies upon Judge Hincks' ruling in Perlman v. Feldman, 116 F. Supp. 102, 112 (Conn. 1953). There, upon timely objection Judge Hincks disallowed an item of costs covering the making of copies of unidentified documents. This court would be inclined to rule similarly on the item here at hand except for the court's own knowledge of the manner in which the parties dealt with each other in providing copies of the very great number of letters and documents here involved. The court recalls the many conferences and informal agreements among counsel with respect to furnishing each other documents or copies of documents. Admittedly it would be far better for the problem now presented if the defendants had kept an itemized list identifying each letter, invoice, circular, catalog page, work sheet, etc., which they had reproduced, with a further explanation as to how it was used in the case.

Counsel for the defendants point out that this item covers photostatic and other reproduction costs of literally hundreds of letters, invoices and many different types and kinds of papers for use in this case only. A part of the cost here involved was actually paid Mr. Scofield, counsel for Plaintiff, for copies of the Clapper letters that he furnished. Defendants say that when the plaintiff demanded and received large quantities of records taken from the defendant, Original, letters, invoices, purchase orders, shipping notices, etc., photostatic copies were made of those and the cost thereof is here included. Counsel for the defendants say it would be the work of supererogation to list all of the many documents thus copied, even if the court had the time to read such a list. In other words, it would be beyond what is required. The court agrees.

In view of the court's own knowledge of the many, many documents used in the case, and since this is a matter within the court's judicial discretion, and further in view of the oath of Defendants' counsel that the item of $207.98 is correct and necessarily incurred in this action, this item of costs will be ordered taxed.

Amount of Item 3 Allowed..... $207.98

Item 4—Docket Fees under 28 U. S. C. 1923—$72.50

[Filing Depositions]

Objection is made on the basis that this lump sum item is not broken down. Defendants in their brief say that they filed twenty-one depositions and are charging merely the $2.50 statutory fee per deposition. The remaining portion of the $72.50 item represents the $20.00 statutory attorneys' docket fee.

In this court no charge is ever taxed by the clerk for filing a deposition. The attorneys' docket fee will be allowed as a part of this item.

Amount of Item 4 Allowed..... $20.00

Item 5—Costs Incident to Taking of Depositions—$1,049.64

Quoting the plaintiff, his objection to this item is as follows:

"Most of the items under the heading 'Depositions' reflect disbursements made in 1951 and 1952, and these of course cannot be allowed in view of the court's order of December 14, 1954 requiring the defendants to bear their own costs as to all matters up to that date. Some of these deposition expenses would not be allowable for the further reason that they were discovery depositions not introduced into evidence in the case. Insofar as the amounts reflect disbursements for carbon copies of depositions obtained by plaintiff's counsel for their own convenience (the original being on file with the Clerk), no allowance for the copy would be proper."

Defendant goes on to object to the items of expense covering the depositions of the plaintiff Clapper, and the defendant Williams, and also the expense of the carbon copy of the deposition of McVicar taken at Bloomington, Illinois.

Insofar as the objection is based on the court's order of December 14, 1954, by reason of what the court has previously said in this memorandum, it follows that the objection must be overruled. As to the expense covering the extra copies of the various depositions, the court is firmly of the view that it was not merely convenient for counsel to have them, but it was imperative that they have them. This case, in the experience of the court, stands out singularly. Never before has the court witnessed such vehemence on the part of counsel and the parties. Throughout all the proceedings there has been an absence of the customary trust and professional reliance a court is accustomed to see on the part of counsel. Not infrequently, accusations of misrepresentation, falsification and fraudulence have been leveled by counsel at each other. From their conduct and lack of trust in each other, there should be little wonder as to why they wanted copies of everything, including every statement made during their oral arguments. In this setting and with such a background, the court is of the view that the extra copies of the depositions were reasonably necessary for the use of counsel in this case. This applies both with respect to the pre-trial procedures and in connection with the trial and post-trial procedures. Therefore, the court holds that Defendants are entitled to recover the costs incident to the taking of the depositions listed in the itemization of this item of the bill of costs, including one carbon copy. Moreover, the court recalls how often it was required to call upon counsel to brief and argue certain points which necessarily required reference to the various depositions.

[Carbon Copies—Deposition of Adversary]

The court, although with some reluctance, agrees with the plaintiff in his objections to the costs of the deposition of the plaintiff Clapper taken by the defendants and the cost of the carbon copy of the deposition of the defendant Williams. It is felt that these depositions fall largely within the rule precluding the recovery of the costs of depositions taken solely for the convenience of counsel in the preparation of their case. Consequently, these two items of expense will not be allowed as a part of Defendants' bill of costs.

Therefore, as to Item 5 of the bill of costs, the court will allow the following:

Item 6—Schedule I. Services, travel and telephone expense of defendant Williams—$27,189.53

["Damages"]

This item is made up of expense purportedly incurred by the defendant, Original Tractor Cab Company, Incorporated, and may be broken down into three categories:

(a) The portion of defendant Williams' salary estimated to be chargeable to what are identified as "litigation matters."

(b) Travel expenses of the defendant Williams in connection with such "litigation matters."

(c) Telephone charges for calls also pertaining to "litigation matters."

There is little doubt in the mind of the court that the defendant, Original, did in fact suffer material damage as a result of this litigation. But the defendants had their opportunity during their day in court to establish such damage. They attempted to establish the damage suffered by the corporation, but the court was not convinced by their method and theory. Now is not the time to retry this element of their case. Nor is the taxing of costs of suit the proper means of fixing such damage. For this and the reason earlier set out in this entry, all of Item 6 will be disallowed.

Amount of Item 6 Allowed..... $0.00

Item 7—Schedule II. Travel and telephone expenses of Defendants' attorneys.

["Personal" Expense]

As authority for its objection to this item Plaintiff cites Manley v. Canterbury Corp. 17 F. R. D. 234 (Del. 1955); Hope Basket Co. v. Product Advancement Corp., 104 F. Supp. 444, 451 (Mich. 1953), and Brookside Theatre Corp. v. Twentieth Century Fox, 11 F. R. D. 259 (Mo. 1951). Upon the authority of these cases Plaintiff says it is well settled that an attorney's travel and telephone expenses are not allowable. Stated as the general rule, the court would agree.

That this is the general rule is borne out by the weight of authorities. It is only in exceptional and compelling circumstances that courts are prone to depart from the general rule. Gibson v. International Freight Corp., 8 F. R. D. 487 (Pa. 1947). Such compelling circumstances do not appear in the case at hand. Travel expense of counsel in the preparation of suit and in attending the court proceedings must generally be classified as personal expense. The same is true in respect to long distance telephone expense. Neither of these items can rightfully be classified as "costs of suit." Accordingly Item 7 of the bill of costs is disallowed.

Amount of Item 7 Allowed..... $0.00

Item 8—Schedule III. Expense for services of Defendants' accountant.

[Preparation]

This item represents charges for Defendants' accountant in the preparation of Defendants' statement of losses and for attending hearings, conferences and trial. Such services were a part of the defendants' detailed preparation and presentation of their counterclaim, and, as such, cannot be allowed as costs. It is true, a part of his time was spent in furnishing Plaintiff's accountants with information they needed in making an audit of the defendants' operations. However, there is no specification in the bill of costs as to how much time was so spent. The court will hazard no estimate. For these reasons Item 8 of the bill of costs is disallowed.

Amount of Item 8 Allowed..... $0.00

Item 9—Schedule IV. Miscellaneous costs of certified copies of Patent Office records and notary fee—$251.95

[Necesary Part of Record]

All of the charges enumerated in Schedule IV are objected to with the exception of the certified copy of the Clapper file wrapper and interference ($24.55). Plaintiff concedes that the notary fee of $3.00 may be allowable if identified and shown to be applicable to this case. He also concedes that the defendants may be entitled to a portion but not all of the costs of patent copies ($78.25).

Defendants counter by pointing out that some of the copies of patents were foreign patents and photostatic copies had to be obtained, which increased the cost. A certified translation of the Swiss patent was required. A book of patents was offered in connection with the motion for summary judgment, as well as at the trial. They go on to say that the Alverson file wrapper was made necessary "by the misrepresentation of Plaintiff's counsel with respect to it."

The court was materially aided in making its final determination as to patent validity through the earlier presentation and disposition of Defendants' motion for summary judgment. By the time of the trial the court was well acquainted with the history of the prior art in this field.

The court availed itself of the Alverson file wrapper after the dispute arose with respect to the Alverson patent application. It was a necessary part of the record.

As to the file history of the Clapper patent for use of Defendants' counsel during trial, in view of the manner in which the interference and concession of priority were handled as between the applicants, who later were found to be in conspiracy, the court is inclined to believe the extra copy of the history of the Clapper patent was necessary for Defendants' counsels' use in the trial. All of Item 9, Schedule IV, will be allowed.

Amount of Item 9 Allowed.....$251.95

chaser of a boxing stadium and two boxing clubs to modify a final judgment requiring dissolution of the clubs was denied. It was contended that the dissolution would result in the loss, for tax purposes, of an "operating deficit" of $218,000. The court held that this situation did not represent a "hardship so extreme and unexpected" as to make the movant a "victim of oppression." Factors affecting the court's determination were (1) the loss accrued after the entry of judgment, and thus while the club was engaged in activities found to be violative of the antitrust laws, (2) the real parties in interest on the motion were not the defendants and normally one who is neither a party to the suit nor a beneficiary of the decree has no standing to seek a substantial modification of the final judgment, (3) the movant had notice of the provisions of the decree when he purchased the club, although he did not have notice of the loss, and (4) dissolution of the club was an integral part of the relief required by the evidence, and a vital and essential provision of the judgment. The tax loss was an unconsequential development in view of the ends sought to be accomplished by the judgment.

[Modification of Final Judgment]

RYAN, District Judge [In full text]: The defendants Madison Square Garden Corporation and International Boxing Club of New York, Inc., have moved to amend the final judgment entered in this suit on July 2, 1957. The motion is addressed to Paragraph "21", which provides:

> "21. Defendants International Boxing Club, Inc., an Illinois corporation, and International Boxing Club of New York, Inc., a New York corporation, are hereby ordered immediately to take appropriate steps to cause their dissolution in accordance with the laws of their respective states of incorporation."

The motion as originally made sought modification of the final judgment (1) by eliminating the requirement of dissolution of International Boxing Club of New York, Inc., and by substituting a provision requiring a change of name from International Boxing Club of New York, Inc., to either Madison Square Garden Boxing Club, Inc., or Madison Square Boxing Inc., and by amending Paragraphs 15 and 22 of the judgment to conform to the modifications *; or, in the alternative (2) by eliminating the requirement of dissolution of I. B. C.-N. Y. and substituting in its place a provision requiring a change of name from I. B. C.-N. Y. to Madison Square Garden Iceland Corporation, and enjoining that corporation from ever promoting any professional boxing contest. At the hearing on the motion, the first request was withdrawn and we have before us, therefore, only an application for the alternative relief.

[Claimed Basis for Amendment]

A provision of the final judgment directed the defendants Norris and Wirtz to sell all their stock in the Madison Square Garden Corporation. After affirmance of the judgment by the Supreme Court [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,231], (358 U. S. 242), this Court, on February 19, 1959, approved the sale of the Norris and Wirtz stock to Graham-Paige Corporation. The ground urged to justify the relief sought is that as of August 15, 1959, I. B. C.-N. Y. had an operating deficit of approximately $218,000, which would be lost for federal income tax purposes if I. B. C.-N. Y. is dissolved. We have assumed, for the purposes of this motion, that this is the fact.

* Par. 15 enjoined defendants Norris and Wirtz and Madison Square Garden Corporation from jointly promoting professional boxing contests; Par. 22 enjoined I. B. C.-N. Y. and I. B. C.-Illinois, pending their dissolution, from promoting any professional championship boxing contest.

This tax loss, we are informed, accrued during the fiscal year ended May 31, 1959 and during the period from June 1, 1959 to August 15, 1959. The President of Graham-Paige has testified that, when he negotiated to buy the Norris and Wirtz stock, he knew there was an outstanding final anti-trust judgment requiring dissolution of I. B. C.-N. Y., and that, although he had examined some financial statements of corporations related to Madison Square Garden, he was not aware of this loss in I. B. C.-N. Y. The negotiations to purchase the Garden stock took place on January 28 and 29, 1959. He further testified that the first time Graham-Paige learned of the tax loss was two or three days after on February 19, 1959, when the transfer was approved by this Court.

The following testimony was also given by him:

"Q. Do you mean that when you discussed the financial operations of I. B. C. with Mr. Wirtz you were just interested in history, what their average had been over a course of years?

"A. As far as I. B. C. was concerned, it was a minor influence in our interest in buying the Garden."

[Criteria for Amendment]

The Supreme Court in United States v. Swift & Co. [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,005], 286 U. S. 106, 119 (1932), has stated the criteria to be considered on an application to modify a final anti-trust decree.

"No doubt the defendants will be better off if the injunction is relaxed, but they are not suffering hardship so extreme and unexpected as to justify us in saying that they are the victims of oppression. Nothing less than a clear showing of grievous wrong evoked by new and unforeseen conditions should lead us to change what was decreed after years of litigation . . .".

We cannot say that the situation here represents a "hardship so extreme and unexpected" as to make Graham-Paige a "victim of oppression", or that "a grievous wrong" has been the result of "new and unforeseen conditions".

[Parties in Interest]

It must be borne in mind that the real parties in interest on this motion are Graham-Paige and the other stockholders of Madison Square Garden Corporation. They are not the defendants in this suit and the judgment addressed itself to correct wrongs committed by the named defendants. Rarely, if ever, may it be held that one neither a party to the suit, nor a beneficiary of the decree, has standing to seek a substantial modification of the final judgment reached by the Court after trial.

Prior to the entry of the final judgment, we expressed our views concerning the two I. B. C. defendants:

"These corporations are the promotional arms of the defendants, conceived and used to enable defendants to restrain and monopolize promotion of championship boxing contests. Their assets are of but nominal value except for the goodwill attaching to their names by virtue of the conspiracy."

On appeal, the Supreme Court concurred in the conclusion to decree dissolution because "the creation of the combination is itself the violation."

[Tax Loss]

The tax loss accrued to I. B. C.-N. Y. after the entry of judgment and while it was continuing to operate pending appeal. The loss occurred while I. B. C.-N. Y. was continuing to engage in activities which had been found to be in violation of the anti-trust laws. This hardly appeals to the Court as a basis for amending the final judgment.

Addressing attention to the argument by defense counsel concerning the tax problems created by the proposed judgment, on the hearing as to the scope of the relief to be provided for in the final judgment, we said:

"The Court: I don't attempt to regulate the tax problems of these defendants, but offhand it would seem to me to present no great difficult problem . . . It is a problem that has arisen because of wrongful acts and I cannot concern myself too much with it, if by concerning myself with it I make the decree ineffective."

This is still our view.

The decree was carefully fashioned to deal with the specific violations found to exist. Dissolution of I. B. C.-N. Y. was not only an integral part of the relief required by the evidence, but was a vital and essential provision of the judgment. The tax loss, accruing after entry of the final judgment, is an inconsequential development in view of the ends sought to be accomplished and the ending of the unlawful monopolization of professional championship boxing contests.

When Graham-Paige purchased the Garden stock from Norris and Wirtz, it was aware of the outstanding final judgment and of the particular terms and provisions of the judgment requiring dissolution of I. B. C.-N. Y. By that time, the directors of the Garden had already initiated action to dissolve I. B. C.-N. Y. Graham-Paige gave little or no consideration to I. B. C.-N. Y. in deciding to purchase the Garden stock. To modify the final judgment under these circumstances would amount to granting Graham-Paige and the other stockholders of the Garden stock relief at the expense of the integrity of the Court's final judgment. This cannot be made the justification for the modification sought.

Motion denied; so ordered.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, PHILIP L. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief and Treble Damages—Necessary Averments to State a Cause of Action—Injury to Plaintiff—Acquisitions of Stock or Assets Under Section 7 of Clayton Act.—A steel manufacturer, including two of its subsidiaries, which allegedly acquired various companies in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act was properly granted summary judgment where the plaintiff, a purchaser and user of steel products, failed to show any specific damages to his business or property which resulted from the acquisitions. General allegations that the defendant's control of raw materials and outlets for steel lessened the opportunity of others to enter the field of supplying steel, narrowed the sources from which the plaintiff could obtain steel, and resulted in less favorable treatment of him as a customer were not sufficient to show actual injury to his business. It was essential for him to allege specific injury differing from that sustained by him as a member of the community.

Affirming a decision of the U. S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, 1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,327.

Before SCHNACKENBERG, KNOCH and CASTLE, Circuit Judges.

[Treble Damage Action]

CASTLE, Circuit Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff-appellant, John Blaski, hereinafter referred to as plaintiff, filed a complaint in the District Court charging defendants-appellees, Inland Steel Company, Inland Steel Products Company and Joseph T. Ryerson & Son, Inc.,[1] with violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A. § 18). Treble damages under 15 U. S. C. A. § 15 and an order of divestiture under 15 U. S. C. A. § 26, were sought. The defendants took plaintiff's deposition and moved for summary judgment on the complaint and deposition. The District Court granted defendants' motion and dismissed the action, holding that the complaint and deposition failed to make any showing of damage to the plaintiff. Plaintiff appealed.

[1] Referred to as Inland, Products and Ryerson, respectively.

[Issue]

This appeal presents a single issue: Did the District Court err in ruling that the complaint and deposition failed to show any injury to plaintiff resulting from the acquisitions about which plaintiff complains?

[Allegations]

The complaint alleges that plaintiff is engaged in fabricating and selling steel building products and as such is a purchaser of steel sheets, galvanized steel sheets and steel angles. It alleges that Inland is primarily an operating company which with its subsidiaries constitute an integrated unit of the iron and steel industry; that Inland and its subsidiaries Products and Ryerson manufacture, sell and distribute steel products. The complaint describes in detail the development and expansion of Inland since its incorporation in 1917 as successor to an 1893 establishment, including Inland's 1935 acquisition of Ryerson, a steel service organization; its 1939 acquisition of Products, a manufacturer and seller of sheet metal products consisting primarily of building materials, metal buildings and building products such as roofing, siding and steel roof deck; and the acquisition over the years of three manufacturers of steel products and varying degrees of control or interest in seventeen companies engaged in mining ore, seven companies which mine coal and produce coke, two which mine limestone and fluorspar, as well as a rolling mill company, a rail rerolling mill and a steel post company. It is alleged that the effect of these acquisitions by Inland have been "substantially to lessen competition or to tend to create a monopoly" in the production, distribution and sale of steel products in the United States or in the Chicago area, in violation of the antitrust provisions of 15 U. S. C. A. § 18. Actual and potential elimination of competition is alleged and that plaintiff as a purchaser and user of steel products is damaged.

In his deposition the plaintiff testified that prior to World War II he purchased some steel from Ryerson and some angles from Inland but the bulk of his purchases was from other warehouses and mills. That for some years following World War II plaintiff's demand for steel was practically negligible. Only during the three years prior to his deposition have his operations required the use of steel in substantial quantities. This was for the purpose of making metal decking. Purchases of steel for this use were made from Sharon Steel Company, Rolled Steel Products Company, U. S. Steel Company and some from Ryerson. All orders placed with Ryerson were filled. Plaintiff's principal supplier during 1957 and 1958 was Sharon Steel Company; previously purchases were made wherever the "best proposition" could be obtained. The extent of plaintiff's contact with Inland was a general discussion aimed at the possibility of obtaining a "position on Inland's books" i. e., establish a supplier—customer relationship for the purchase of steel directly from the mill. The approach to Inland was made at a time when steel was in short supply. Inland advised that it was unable to take on new customers at that time. Its position in this respect was the same as that taken by other steel companies contacted at the same time by the plaintiff.

Plaintiff testified that in order to obtain steel sheets rolled to tolerances as close as desired by him he was compelled to purchase from Sharon Steel Company and pay higher prices. That purchases from warehousemen such as Ryerson could be made only at prices higher than the price of purchases direct from the steel mills such as Inland. Plaintiff's steel decking business terminated shortly after Acme Steel Company entered the field of fabricating steel metal decking in 1956 or 1957.

[Damages]

When asked to state what actual damage he had sustained plaintiff was unable to do so. He pointed out that Products being a subsidiary of Inland and a competitor of plaintiff in the manufacture of steel decking, was in a position to receive favorable treatment from Inland in obtaining steel to tolerances it desired or at better prices; that Inland was in a position to favor its subsidiaries Products and Ryerson; that Inland's control of sources of raw materials and of outlets for its steel lessened the opportunity of others to enter the field in competition with Inland as a steel supplier and narrowed the sources from which steel fabricators like plaintiff could obtain the steel required for their operations. Plaintiff, however, was unable to show in what particular way he had actually been damaged or injured.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

In order for plaintiff to maintain an action under 15 U. S. C. A. § 15 it was necessary that he show injury to his business. In Beegle v. Thompson, 7 Cir., [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,291], 138 F. 2d 875, (cert. den. 322 U. S. 743) we stated:

"Section 15, allowing private parties treble damages for injury accruing to their business from violation of the Anti-Trust Act, embraces, as one of the essentials to such action, injury to plaintiff's business. The complaint must affirmatively show this injury. It is not enough to allege something forbidden and claim damages resulting therefrom. Allegation of the specific injury suffered by plaintiff differing from that sustained by it as a member of the community is essential. The manner, nature, character and extent of the injury sustained and the facts from which injury accrues and upon which damages may be assessed as well as those with regard to the effect of the alleged violation upon plaintiff's business, must be pleaded. The mere existence of a violation is not sufficient ipso facto to support the action, for no party may properly seek to secure something from another without allegation and proof of facts demonstrating pecuniary loss springing from or consequent upon the unlawful act."

[Holding]

Plaintiff's complaint and deposition are insufficient to show an antitrust violation which has resulted in specific damages to the plaintiff's business or property.

The District Court's entry of summary judgment for the defendants-appellees was proper and is affirmed.

Affirmed.

[¶ 69,527] David W. Erickson, doing business as Erickson Hair and Scalp Specialists v. Federal Trade Commission.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. No. 12635. Dated November 19, 1959.

Petition for Review of an Order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Unfair Practices—Misrepresenting Quality or Character of Product—Hair Preparations and Treatments—Sufficiency of Evidence.—A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting a producer of hair preparations from advertising that his products and treatments could prevent or overcome baldness, cause hair to grow thicker, cause new hair to grow, cause fuzz to develop into longer and stronger hair, and permanently eliminate dandruff, itching, and irritation of the scalp was affirmed where substantial evidence showed these representations to be false. The uncontradicted medical evidence showed that neither respondent's preparations nor any others would accomplish those results. Qualified medical witnesses testified that most cases of baldness are accounted for by a condition known as "male pattern" baldness which is most common in the male adult. Its precise cause has not been proven and there is no medical evidence that it would respond to the external application of various chemical and cosmetic preparations as far as loss of hair is concerned. While certain of respondent's witnesses testified as to the efficacy of his preparations, it was not shown that any of them suffered loss of hair due to male pattern baldness. Further, the fact that respondent had satisfied customers was not a defense to Commission action for deceptive practices.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5081.816, 5081.817.

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Court Review—Substantial Evidence to Support Commission's Findings—Medical Evidence.—In affirming a Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting the false advertising of hair preparations and treatments, the court held that it was the Commission's task to appraise the credibility of witnesses, weigh the evidence, and draw inferences therefrom, and that it was the court's task to determine whether the findings were supported by substantial evidence. Here, the Commission's finding was supported by such evidence, namely, opinion evidence based on general and pharmacological knowledge. A conflict of medical opinion concerning the effectiveness of the preparation, the meaning of the representations to the public, and the tendency or capacity of such representations to mislead were questions of fact to be determined by the Commission, and should be upheld by the court unless arbitrarily or clearly wrong.

See FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8611.27, 8621.690.

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Court Review—Scope of Order.—A Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting a producer of hair preparations from falsely advertising the preparations and treatments described in the findings or "any other preparation for use in the treatment of hair and scalp" was held not to be broader than the findings would permit or to be in excess of the Commission's authority. The only prohibition as to "any other preparations" related to the false representations contained in the respondent's advertising found to be deceptive. If the Commission's order was not broad enough to cover all preparations, the respondent could change the formula of his preparation and continue with the deceptive practices. If he should discover a cure for male pattern baldness, he may seek modification of the order. It was held that the Commission has a wide discretion in its choice of a remedy to cope with the unlawful practices, and its orders are intended to prevent such practices in the future. "If the Commission is to attain the objectives Congress envisioned, it cannot be required to confine its road block to the narrow lane the transgressor has traveled; it must be allowed effectively to close all roads to the prohibited goal, so that its order may not be by-passed with impunity".

See FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8611.91.

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Prejudicial Error—Hearing Examiner—Bias.—In affirming a Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting the false advertising of hair preparations and treatments, the court found no prejudicial error in the challenged rulings of the hearing examiner. It was found that he was not prejudiced or biased, and did not improperly restrict the respondent's efforts to present evidence or his right of cross examination.

See FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8611.62.

Affirming and enforcing a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order in Dkt. 6499.

Before HASTINGS, Chief Judge, SCHNACKENBERG and KNOCH, Circuit Judges.

[Prior Proceedings]

HASTINGS, Chief Judge. [In full text]: This is a petition to review and set aside an order of the Federal Trade Commission requiring petitioner, David W. Erickson, doing business as Erickson Hair and Scalp Specialists, to cease and desist from falsely advertising petitioner's medicinal and cosmetic preparations in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U. S. C. A., § 45, et seq.

The Commission's complaint charged petitioner (respondent below) with disseminating, through the United States mails and by various means in interstate commerce, false advertisements concerning his preparations, all to the prejudice and injury of the public; it further charged that such conduct constituted unfair and deceptive acts and practices within the intent and meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Petitioner answered the complaint, admitted the composition of his preparations and the fact that he advertises, denied generally the other allegations, and included an averment that the acts and practices complained of were not in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

Hearings were held and evidence was presented by both parties. The Hearing Examiner issued an initial decision and a proposed order to cease and desist, and petitioner appealed to the Commission. Upon consideration of briefs and oral argument, the Commission denied the appeal and adopted the Hearing Examiner's findings and proposed order. That part of the order we are asked to review directs petitioner forthwith to cease and desist from,

[Order]

"1. Disseminating or causing to be disseminated by means of the United States mails or by any means in commerce, as 'commerce' is defined in the Federal Trade Commission Act, any advertisement which represents directly or by implication:

"(a) That the use of said preparations alone or in conjunction with any method of treatment will:

(1) Permanently eliminate dandruff, itching or irritation of the scalp,

(2) Cause fuzz to be replaced with long or strong hair,

(3) Prevent or overcome excessive hair loss or baldness or cause new hair to grow, or cause hair to grow thicker or otherwise grow hair, unless such representations be expressly limited to cases other than those known as male pattern baldness and unless the advertisement clearly and conspicuously reveals that in the great majority of cases of baldness and excessive hair loss, respondent's said preparations and treatments are of no value whatever,

"(b) That respondent, his agents, representatives or employees have had competent training in dermatology or other branches of medicine having to do with the diagnosis and treatment of scalp disorders affecting the hair, or are trichologists.

"2. Disseminating or causing to be disseminated by any means, any advertisement for the purpose of inducing or which is likely to induce directly or indirectly the purchase of said preparations in commerce, as 'commerce' is defined in the Federal Trade Commission Act, which advertisement contains any of the representations prohibited in Paragraph 1 hereof."

[Facts Established]

From the record before us we find that the following relevant facts were well established. Petitioner's principal place of business is in Chicago, Illinois, from which he distributes through interstate commerce home treatment kits of various medicinal and cosmetic preparations designed for external use in the prevention of baldness, the growing of hair and the elimination of various scalp disorders. The total value of his business from his Chicago office is from $60,000 to $80,000 annually.

In conducting his business petitioner or his representative visits various cities throughout the United States where he conducts a so-called hair and scalp "clinic," usually in the room of a local hotel. Prior to visiting a particular city, petitioner places an advertisement in a local newspaper of that city inviting prospective customers to call on him for free consultation and advice about their hair and scalp problems. A substantial number of such newspapers are distributed in interstate commerce. Petitioner accepts for treatment 95% of the persons who respond to his advertisements and, when agreeable to the prospect, sells him a home treatment kit containing his various preparations which is mailed directly to the purchaser from petitioner's Chicago office.

In some of these newspaper advertisements petitioner refers to himself as a "trichologist." A typical advertisement purports to be a newspaperman's report of an interview with petitioner and contains a picture of petitioner attired in a type of white jacket customarily worn and associated with members of the medical profession. The picture shows petitioner pointing to what appears to be a clinical chart depicting the human scalp with relation to hair and hair follicles. In this advertisement petitioner states that he has directed some of the largest "clinics" in the United States and Canada. Two of the Commission's expert medical witnesses testified that to bear the title "trichologist" properly, a person should be a dermatologist. Petitioner has had no medical training, and his college education was limited to one semester in "marketing."

Without attempting to quote further from the several exhibits before us, we think it is fair to say that in his advertisements petitioner represents that he can, without qualification, through the use of his preparations and method of treatment prevent or overcome baldness, cause hair to grow thicker, cause new hair to grow, cause fuzz to develop into longer and stronger hair, and permanently eliminate dandruff, itching and irritation of the scalp. The uncontradicted medical evidence of record shows that neither petitioner's preparations nor any others will accomplish these results.

The Commission's qualified medical witnesses testified that most cases of baldness are accounted for by a condition known as male pattern baldness. It is said to be most common in the male adult, and its precise cause has not been medically proven. Various conflicting theories have been advanced as to its cause but there is no medical evidence that male pattern baldness will respond to the external application of various chemical and cosmetic preparations as far as the progression of loss of hair is concerned. Admitting that certain of petitioner's consumer witnesses testified as to the efficacy of his preparations, it was not shown that any of them had suffered loss of hair due to male pattern baldness.

[Substantial Evidence]

Petitioner's chief contention is that there is no credible, reliable or substantial evidence to sustain the Commission's findings on which the cease and desist order is based or to support such an order against petitioner. We disagree.

It is for the Commission to appraise the credibility of witnesses, to weigh evidence and to draw inferences therefrom. On review, our task is to determine whether the findings are supported by substantial evidence. Keller v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,322], 132 F. 2d 59, 60 (1942). If the findings are thus supported, Aronberg v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,324], 132 F. 2d 165, 170 (1942), they are conclusive and binding on us. Opinion evidence based on general medical and pharmacological knowledge constitutes substantial evidence. Dr. W. B. Caldwell, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,305], 111 F. 2d 889, 891 (1940). Whether there is a consensus of medical opinion is a question of fact; a conflict of medical opinion concerning the effectiveness of a preparation also presents a question of fact, United States v. Kaadt, 7 Cir., 171 F. 2d 600, 603 (1948), and is therefore to be resolved by the Commission.

Likewise, as Chief Judge Duffy said in Kalwajtys v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,525], 237 F. 2d 654, at page 656 (1956):

> "The meaning of advertisements or other representations to the public, and their tendency or capacity to mislead or deceive, are questions of fact to be determined by the Commission and should be upheld by a reviewing Court unless arbitrarily or clearly wrong. Rhodes Pharmacal Co., Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,607], 208 F. 2d 382, 387; Parker Pen Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,519], 159 F. 2d 509, 511."

Further, it is sound to say that the fact that petitioner had satisfied customers is not a defense to Commission action for deceptive practices. Independent Directory Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, 2 Cir., [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,817], 188 F. 2d 468, 471 (1951).

Tested by these well-established standards and on the record before us, we hold that the findings and order of Commission are supported by substantial evidence. We agree with the conclusions of the Commission that petitioner was engaged in unfair and deceptive practices in commerce.

[Scope of Order]

Petitioner also contends that the Commission's order is broader than the findings will support and is in excess of its statutory authority. This is predicated on the proscription in the order of advertisements "of any other preparations for use in the treatment of hair and scalp conditions." However, we think that a reading of the preamble of the order and the whole of paragraph 1 will show that the only prohibition as to "any other preparations" relates to the false representations contained in petitioner's advertising found to be deceptive. "Unless the Commission's order is broad enough to cover all preparations petitioner need only to change the formula of his present preparations and continue to engage in the same false and deceptive practices condemned by the Commission," as Government counsel aptly points out. If petitioner does discover some method of curing male pattern baldness in the future, under Commission rules, he may seek modification of the order.

It is settled beyond dispute that in formulating its order to cease and desist, the Commission is empowered to determine the appropriate remedy according to the nature and character of the unfair practice. Keller v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,322], 132 F. 2d 59, 61 (1942). Orders of the Federal Trade Commission are intended to prevent illegal practices in the future. "In carrying out this function the Commission is not limited to prohibiting the illegal practice in the precise form in which it is found to have existed in the past. If the Commission is to attain the objectives Congress envisioned, it cannot be required to confine its road block to the narrow lane the transgressor has traveled; it must be allowed effectively to close all roads to the prohibited goal, so that its order may not be by-passed with impunity." Federal Trade Commission v. Ruberoid Co., [1952 TRADE CASES ¶67,279], 343 U. S. 470, 473 (1952). The Commission "has wide discretion in its choice of a remedy deemed adequate to cope with the unlawful practices" disclosed, Seigel Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 327 U. S. 608, 611 (1946), and "the courts will not interfere except where the remedy selected has no reasonable relation to the unlawful practices found to exist." Id. at 613, and followed in Ruberoid, 343 U. S. at page 473. See also Federal Trade Commission v. National Lead Co. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶68,629], 352 U. S. 419, 428 (1957).

We hold that the Commission's order is valid and does not exceed its statutory authority.

[Prejudice]

Petitioner finally charges that "the Hearing Examiner was prejudiced, showed bias and improperly restricted petitioner's efforts to present evidence and his right of cross-examination." We have carefully considered this contention and find that it is without merit. We find no prejudicial error in the challenged rulings of the Hearing Examiner. See, Dolcin Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, D. C. Cir., [1954 TRADE CASES ¶67,791], 219 F. 2d 742 (1954).

[Holding]

The petition to review and set aside the cease and desist order of the Commission will be denied, and enforcement of the order of the Commission is now ordered.

Enforcement Ordered.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. No. 16,328. Dated November 16, 1959; amended December 7, 1959.

On petition for review and to set aside an order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Reopening of Cases—Public Interest.—The Commission reopened a proceeding against persons engaged in selling and distributing skip-trace forms, which are used to gather information about defaulting debtors, in order to modify a cease and desist order entered against them. The case was reopened and the order modified on the ground that the public interest so required it, which is a statutory ground for reopening a proceeding where, as here, the time for reviewing such an order has expired. There were two reasons why public interest required this reopening: (1) The outstanding order had given rise to confusion and controversy as to the compliance required. While the Commission said that the purpose of the order had always been to require the discontinuance of forms "which do not make the recipients aware of the true purpose for which information is being requested", the defendants interpreted the order as merely requiring that no false purpose be stated or implied. Regardless of whether the confusing nature of the order was due to ineptness of expression or whether the Commission changed its mind as to its intention, a clarification of the meaning of the order was shown to be in the public interest. (2) The forms now being sent under the order have the tendency and capacity to mislead and deceive persons to whom they may be sent. Stipulated facts as to the actual results of those forms sent out and an examination of the forms themselves were sufficient to support this conclusion. Thus, the admission of certain other evidence pointing to the same conclusion, whether or not admissible, was not prejudicial.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5089.15; FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8611.55, 8611.62, 8611.74.

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Reopening of Cases—Estoppel—Passage of Time—Acceptance of Compliance Report.—The Commission was not estopped to modify its original order by its asserted failure to act within a reasonable time after accepting and approving the defendant's compliance report. While the acceptance of the report may have caused the defendants to acquiesce in the order instead of seeking review of it, they no longer acquiesced in the order as modified and were exercising their right to review it. Thus, they were not aggrieved by the fact that they were originally lulled into inaction by the acceptance. Although there was a five month delay between acceptance of the report and the institution of the show cause proceeding, the Commission began to question the defendant's compliance approximately two months after acceptance of the report. In any event, section 5(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act authorizes the reopening of the cease and desist proceeding and the altering, modifying, or setting aside of such orders "at any time". Thus, estoppel based on passage of time could not be a defense available against the Commission.

[Skip-Trace Forms—Modifying Order]

Hamley, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This matter is before us on the petition of Mitchell S. Mohr and Sydney Floersheim to review and set aside an order of the Federal Trade Commission. In this order the Commission reopened a proceeding involving petitioners, and modified a cease and desist order which had been entered therein.

Petitioners argue here that on the showing made the Commission was without jurisdiction or authority to reopen the proceedings. They also contend that the Commission was estopped to modify the original order; that the modified order is too broad, considering the facts of the case and the scope of the act; that certain Commission findings are insupportable; and that evidence was erroneously admitted at the Commission hearing.

Mohr and Floersheim are engaged in the business of selling and distributing in interstate commerce so-called skip-trace forms. These forms are intended to be used by creditors and collection agencies in obtaining information concerning the whereabouts of defaulting debtors. The forms are sent to the last known address of the debtors in the hope that the debtors will return them with the desired information. If this information is supplied, the creditors or collection agencies are enabled to proceed with their collections.

[Prior Proceedings]

In a complaint filed with the Commission on October 11, 1954, it was charged that the forms which Mohr and Floersheim were selling and distributing contained false and misleading statements and implications. It was alleged that as a result many persons were induced to give information which they otherwise would not have supplied.

Administrative proceedings were had, leading to the issuance of a decision and order sustaining the allegations of the complaint.[1] In the order Mohr and Floersheim were required to cease and desist from making certain specified representations, and to cease and desist from:

> "Using or placing in the hands of others for use, any form, questionnaire, or other material, printed or written, which represents, directly or by implication, that the purpose for which the information is requested is other than that of obtaining information concerning delinquent debtors;"

The Commission order also required Mohr and Floersheim to file within sixty days a report indicating compliance with the cease and desist order. Petitioners did not petition this court to review the June 1, 1956, order. On July 26, 1956, they submitted a report of compliance to the compliance division, office of the Commission's general counsel. By letter dated August 1, 1956, the general counsel advised them that on the basis of the representations made in their report they were then in compliance with the cease and desist order.

On October 2 and 12, 1956, the Commission's assistant general counsel for compliance wrote to petitioners stating that their forms continued to create misunderstanding among some recipients. It was indicated that the matter would be reviewed by the Commission. On February 13, 1957, the Commission wrote to petitioners advising that all forms submitted with the July 26, 1956, report of compliance were in violation of the cease and desist order.

On February 6, 1958, the Commission ordered Mohr and Floersheim to show cause why the public interest does not require that the Commission reopen Docket No. 6236 and alter the quoted paragraph of the cease and desist order to read as follows:

> "Using, or placing in the hands of others for use, any forms, questionnaires or other materials, printed or written, which do not clearly reveal that the purpose for which the information is requested is that of obtaining information concerning delinquent debtors." [2]

After Mohr and Floersheim had filed a response to this show cause order, a hearing was held before an examiner at which a stipulation of facts, exhibits, and oral testimony were received.[3] The exhibits included copies of forms then being sold and distributed by petitioners and certain sales materials. The oral testimony consisted of the testimony of twelve residents of the District of Columbia and the adjacent area. They were each shown copies of the forms being sold by petitioners, and testified that they could not determine therefrom why the information was being requested. None of these witnesses had actually received such a form through the mail. It was stipulated that during the first six months of 1958 approximately 700,000 forms were sold and approximately 80,000 of them were returned from the addressees.

On September 12, 1958, the hearing examiner made his report and recommendations, and certified the record to the Commission. In his report the examiner stated that it was apparent from the testimony of the twelve witnesses that none of them was aware that the purpose of these forms was solely to locate delinquent debtors. The examiner concluded that the cards then being sold and distributed by petitioners fail to reveal the true purpose thereof, and "actually mislead and deceive the recipients to the extent that they do not know why the information is being requested." The examiner therefore recommended that paragraph 1 of the cease and desist order be modified as provided in the order to show cause, quoted above.[4]

On November 14, 1958, the Commission rendered an opinion in which it adopted the findings, conclusions, and recommendations of the hearing officer. On the same day the Commission ordered Docket No. 6236 reopened, and modified the order to cease and desist in the manner indicated. It is this order which is now under review.

[2] This order to show cause contains several recitals, including the following:

"WHEREAS, the Commission intended, and believed that it had, by said language, required respondents to discontinue use of skip-trace forms and materials which do not make the recipients aware of the true purpose for which information is being requested, thereby selecting, in the public interest, the remedy in its opinion most suitable to the correction of a deceptive act and practice charged in the complaint, and in which the respondents were found by the hearing examiner and the Commission to have engaged, namely, the obtaining of information concerning delinquent debtors by deceit, and

"WHEREAS, it now appears to the Commission that there is reasonable doubt that the language of Paragraph 1 of said order has remedied the foregoing situation and will effectuate its said intent and purpose to remedy it, in that such language appears to be susceptible to the interpretation that it merely requires respondents to refrain from affirmatively stating any purpose, thereby permitting respondents to continue the use of skip-trace forms and materials which do not make the recipients aware of the true purpose for which the information is being requested . . ."

[3] Except for their participation in the stipulation of facts, Mohr and Floersheim presented no evidence at the show cause hearing.

[4] Indicating the view that the public interest required reopening of the proceeding to make this change in the order, the examiner stated in his report:

"Since the cards currently in use by Respondents have the tendency and capacity to mislead and deceive persons to whom they may be sent, and since Paragraph 1 of the Commission's outstanding order to cease and desist has given rise to confusion and controversy as to the compliance required, the public interest demands that said paragraph be revised to insure, beyond question, that such deception shall cease."

[Public Interest]

Petitioners contend that on the showing made the Commission was without jurisdiction or authority to reopen the proceedings for the purpose of modifying the cease and desist order in the manner indicated.

The Commission reopened the proceeding and modified the cease and desist order on the ground that the public interest so required. This is one of the two statutory grounds for reopening such a proceeding and modifying a cease and desist order where, as here, the time had expired for reviewing that cease and desist order.[5]

[Outstanding Order—Confusion]

Two reasons were given why the public interest required the reopening and modification. One of these was that the outstanding cease and desist order had given rise to confusion and controversy as to the compliance required.

If supported by the record, this is sufficient to sustain the finding that public interest required the reopening and modification. The public interest requires that a cease and desist order be clear and explicit in all of its terms. Otherwise it is ineffective in correcting the abuses with which it is intended to deal, and is unfair to the parties charged with compliance.

The record, as summarized above, amply supports the Commission's assertion that the outstanding order had given rise to confusion and controversy. The Commission states that the original intention, to which it still adheres, was to require discontinuance of the use of forms "which do not make the recipients aware of the true purpose for which information is being requested." But petitioners interpreted the original order as merely requiring that no false purpose be stated or implied.

That the Commission's general counsel originally interpreted the order in this same way is indicated by his letter of August 1, 1956, referred to above. In the Commission's brief filed in this review proceeding it is conceded that the cease and desist order is reasonably subject to the interpretation petitioners have given to it. In the face of this confusion and controversy as to the meaning of the original order, a clarification thereof would be in the public interest.

[Current Misleading Forms]

The second reason given by the Commission for requiring the reopening and modification was that the forms in current use by petitioners have the tendency and capacity to mislead and deceive persons to whom they may be sent.

Assuming that it is substantiated by the record, this too is a sufficient reason to support the finding that public interest required the reopening and modification. If experience with the forms in current use proved that they were deceptive, the public interest required that the proceeding be reopened and that the order be modified to prevent the use of such forms. Moreover, the statute is broad enough to authorize a requirement that the true purpose of the forms be affirmatively disclosed.[6]

[Evidence]

The record also supports this reason for asserting that public interest required the action taken. The parties stipulated that of 700,000 forms sent out during a six-month period in 1958, 80,000 had been returned. The Commission could reasonably find, without the aid of evidence on the subject, that people do not ordinarily supply information when they know it will be used against them. See Bennett v. Federal Trade Commission, D. C. Cir. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,372], 200 F. 2d 362. It was proper for the Commission to conclude from the substantial response to these forms that the effect of omitting an affirmative statement of purpose therefrom was to cause recipients

[5] Under the stated circumstances, the reopening of such a proceeding is governed by the last sentence of section 5(b) of the act, 15 U. S. C. A., § 45(b), which reads in part as follows:

"After the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition for review, if no such petition has been duly filed within such time, the Commission may at any time, after notice and opportunity for hearing, reopen and alter, modify, or set aside, in whole or in part, any report or order made or issued by it under this section, whenever in the opinion of the Commission conditions of fact or of law have so changed as to require such action or if the public interest shall so require . . ."

to take action they would not otherwise have taken.[7]

The Commission also had before it the forms in actual use and was entitled to find from an examination of these forms that recipients would be thrown off guard as to the true purpose of the forms. Such a finding based on examination of the forms does not require the support of oral testimony or other evidence. See Dejay Stores v. Federal Trade Commission [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,407], 200 F. 2d 865, at page 867.

The public interest in terminating deceptive practices, even though such practices result in bringing delinquent debtors to task, is not here specifically questioned. But in any event the Commission's implied finding to this effect will not be judicially overturned.[8]

[Reasons for Confusing Order]

One may wonder why, if the Commission's original intention was to require an affirmative disclosure of purpose, it did not find a more forthright way to say so in its original cease and desist order. But ineptness of expression in the original order would not stand in the way of reopening the proceeding and modifying the order. It would in fact dictate that the order be clarified.

If it be assumed, on the other hand, that the Commission's original intention was not what it now says it was, this would likewise be immaterial. Experience under the cease and desist order, as revealed by the stipulated facts, showed that mere elimination of specific statements from the forms was not enough to stop the deception. The Commission was entitled to change its mind, if that is what it has done, as to the kind of a cease and desist order which was necessary to protect the public interest. The record of the entire Commission proceedings, including the original hearing, is before us, and factually supports the order here under review.

[Estoppel]

Petitioners contend that the Commission is estopped to modify its original order by its asserted failure to act within a reasonable time after accepting petitioners' compliance report. In this connection it is called to our attention that the compliance report is dated July 26, 1956, and was accepted by the office of the chief counsel on August 1, 1956, whereas it was not until February 6, 1958, that the show cause proceeding was instituted.

While the show cause proceeding was not instituted until the latter date, the Commission's compliance division began to question petitioners' compliance as early as October 2, 1956. In any event, however, section 5(b) of the act authorizes the Commission to reopen cease and desist proceedings and to alter, modify, or set aside such an order "at any time."[9] Hence estoppel could not be based upon passage of time, assuming that it could be, in any event, a defense available against the Commission.

The general counsel's letter of August 1, 1956, expressing satisfaction with the forms then being used by petitioners may have caused petitioners to acquiesce in the cease and desist order instead of seeking a review thereof. But they no longer acquiesce in that order as modified and are now exercising the right to review that order. Hence they are not aggrieved by the fact that they may have been originally lulled into inaction by the general counsel's letter of August 1, 1956.

Petitioners assert that the Commission's examiner erred in overruling objections to the admission of evidence. The reference here is to the twelve witnesses called by the Commission, who testified that they could not determine from an examination of the cards what purpose was intended to be served by the forms.

Whether or not this evidence was admissible, it was not prejudicial. It added nothing that could not have been determined by the Commission from an examination of the forms. The items of evidence tending to support the finding of continued deception were the forms themselves and the stipulated facts concerning the substantial response which they brought.

The order of the Federal Trade Commission entered on November 14, 1958, in its Docket No. 6236 is affirmed, and it is directed that a decree be entered enforcing in whole the said order.

[7] Indeed, it is apparent that petitioners have drawn the same conclusion, else they would not feel aggrieved by the requirement that the true purpose be revealed.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. JULIUS H. MINER, District Judge.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Resale Price Fixing Under Federal Laws—Refusal to Deal—Legality.—A manufacturer of watch bands was found to have violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act by refusing to sell to a dealer solely because it would not follow resale prices established by the manufacturer. While a manufacturer has a right to stop dealing with a dealer because he thinks the dealer is acting unfairly in trying to undermine his trade, this right is neither absolute nor exempt from regulation. Distinguishing United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U. S. 300, from the instant case, the court held that here the refusal to deal was used to accomplish an illegal purpose, since it was part of a plan of operation to limit the sale of the manufacturer's products to wholesalers who would agree not to sell below the established prices. Such an agreement is illegal under Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

See Resale Price Fixing, Vol. 1, ¶ 3015.70.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Damage Action—Necessary Averments—Damage to Plaintiff.—In a civil damage action against a manufacturer of watch bands for refusing to deal with a wholesaler because it would not follow the manufacturer's resale prices, the element of damage to the plaintiff was shown where the fact of actual damage was established and the amount could be reasonably ascertained. "It is not the law that the defendant who caused the damage can be permitted to escape liability because it is difficult for the plaintiff to express in terms of dollars the damages it has suffered." In the instant case, the wholesaler's proof of damages was not speculative. The case was remanded to the trial court for the purpose of fixing the amount of the damages.

Reversing a decision of the U. S. District Court, Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, 1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,328.

Before DUFFY, SCHNACKENBERG and PARKINSON,[1] Circuit Judges.

[Treble Damage Action]

SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff, A. C. Becken Co., an Illinois corporation, appeals from an adverse judgment entered in the district court in plaintiff's action for treble damages brought under § 1 of the Sherman Act,[2] following a trial by the court without a jury. Defendant, The Gemex Corporation, a New Jersey corporation, is a manufacturer of watch bands, distributed by it nationally through wholesalers, including plaintiff (until August 2, 1956) and the latter's two principal competitors, The Ball Company and Stein and Ellbogen Company.

[Refusal to Deal]

1. According to plaintiff's theory, defendant attempted to force plaintiff to enter into a price-fixing agreement for the establishment and maintenance between wholesalers of minimum resale prices on Gemex products and also on products competitive to the Gemex line. Plaintiff contends that defendant had already exacted such an agreement from plaintiff's competitors and threatened to drop plaintiff as a distributor unless it joined this price-fixing agreement. Plaintiff asserts that, when it refused to do so, defendant carried out its threat to "drop" plaintiff as a Gemex distributor, which resulted in losses to plaintiff for which it is entitled to treble damages.

§ 1 of the Sherman Act provides:

> "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal [3] * * *."

The trial was on complaint [4] and answer. The court heard the evidence of the parties, made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered judgment, dismissing the action with prejudice. Finding 7 is as follows:

Defendant's refusal to sell was not the result of any combination, conspiracy, or attempt to combine and conspire by defendant and anyone.

Here is defendant's contention:

> "The defendant, being a manufacturer, may announce to its distributors in advance the circumstances under which it will or will not sell to a given distributor. Such an announcement does not in any way amount to coercion and certainly, if done on a unilateral basis, does not constitute an attempt to conspire, whether in regard to fixing prices, maintaining quality, protecting trade names or trademarks, or any of the many aspects of commercial trade. A merchant or a manufacturer, absent any attempt to monopolize or restrain trade, may exercise discretion as to whom it will sell its products and may refuse to sell for reasons sufficient to itself."

The evidence clearly establishes the following facts:

Tower, defendant's representative, on August 1, 1956, visited plaintiff's office and told its vice-president Bohlander that plaintiff would be expected to sell lines competitive to defendant's lines at manufacturer-suggested prices. On the following day, Swartman, defendant's sales manager, and Tower talked to president Clark and others, of plaintiff, in the latter's office. Tower stated that "it is the philosophy of our company" that to be a Gemex distributor, plaintiff would have to sell competing lines of watch bracelets at prices suggested by manufacturers. Tower also said that he had talked to Stein & Ellbogen Company and The Ball Company, competitors of plaintiff, and, when asked "how he knew that they would uphold, or how they would stop doing this, and he said they had shook hands over it. And he said, 'That is good enough for me'." After further discussion Bohlander suggested that > "* * * if they would not allow us to sell the line through the salesman, that they at least allow us to show the line in our catalog."

He also stated that—

> "* * * at that point Mr. Tower stood up and he said, 'Well,' he said, 'we are at an impasse. This is it.'
> "And Mr. Swartman said, 'Well,' * * * 'it would seem to me that there is a moral obligation of some kind here, and that we ought to take back the sample lines,' * * *."

Defendant's answer admits that it advised plaintiff on August 2, 1956 that it would no longer sell its products to plaintiff.

[Illegal Purpose]

The law recognizes that a manufacturer, in the battle for business, has a right to sell to whom he pleases. It follows that he has a right to stop dealing with a dealer because he thinks the dealer is acting unfairly in trying to undermine his trade. United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U. S. 300, 307. He is, however, limited to a

[3] 15 U. S. C. A. § 1.

[4] Plaintiff's complaint charged that defendant attempted to engage in a wrongful and unlawful combination and conspiracy,

(a) To prevent and restrict the sale and distribution of Gemex's products, by reason of its refusal, for the unlawful reason stated by Gemex as aforesaid, to sell its products to Becken;

(b) To prevent and restrict the sale and distribution of products manufactured and sold by Gemex's competitors;

(c) To, and did [sic], discriminate against a wholesale distributor, to-wit, Becken, who would not combine and conspire with Gemex to price competitors' lines as directed and dictated by Gemex;

(d) To force and compel Becken to enter into a contract or agreement providing for the establishment and maintenance between wholesalers of minimum resale prices on products competitive to the Gemex line; and legitimate use of this weapon. The right to stop dealing is neither absolute nor exempt from regulation. Lorain Journal Co. v. United States [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,957], 342 U. S. 143, 155; Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,494], 345 U. S. 594. In the latter case the court said, at 625:

(e) To force and compel Becken to enter into a contract or agreement providing for the establishment and maintenance of minimum resale prices between persons, firms or corporations in competition with each other; and that such acts have unreasonably restrained, do unreasonably restrain, and will continue unreasonably to restrain trade and commerce in violation of the anti-trust laws of the United States of America above cited.

> "* * * If accompanied by unlawful conduct or agreement, or conceived in monopolistic purpose or market control, even individual sellers' refusals to deal have transgressed the Act. * * *"

A wrench can be used to turn bolts and nuts. It can also be used to assault a person in a robbery. Like a wrench, a manufacturer's right to stop selling to a wholesaler can be used legitimately; but it may not be used to accomplish an unlawful purpose. In the case at bar, the clearly established facts show a plan of operation adopted by defendant, the essential purpose of which was to limit the sale of its products to wholesalers who would agree not to sell below prices stipulated by defendant. Such an agreement is in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. The established facts also show that the refusal to continue plaintiff as a wholesaler of defendant's products was solely because plaintiff would not sell those products according to defendant's existing illegal plan of doing business in violation of § 1. Plaintiff was not rejected as a customer by defendant because of any other reason. It follows that the facts alleged and established by the evidence state a cause of action under § 1 of that Act. Findings of fact by the district court, inconsistent with these views, are clearly erroneous, under rule 52(b).[5]

In Federal Trade Comm. v. Beech-Nut Packing Co., 257 U. S. 441, there was involved a system of merchandising which the court said, at 454,

> "* * * goes far beyond the simple refusal to sell goods to persons who will not sell at stated prices, which in the Colgate case was held to be within the legal right of the producer.
> "The system here disclosed necessarily constitutes a scheme which restrains the natural flow of commerce and the freedom of competition in the channels of interstate trade which it has been the purpose of all the anti-trust acts to maintain. In its practical operation it necessarily constrains the trader, if he would have the products of the Beech-Nut Company, to maintain the prices 'suggested' by it. * * *"

From what we have said, it is obvious that the district court erred in entering its conclusion of law that no violation of the Sherman Act has been shown by plaintiff.

The district court should have found the issues in favor of plaintiff and this cause will be remanded so that such a finding may be entered, together with judgment accordingly.

[Damage]

2. Defendant relies upon the district court's finding 13, which reads:

Plaintiff was not damaged as a result of defendant's refusal to sell watch bands to plaintiff subsequent to August 2, 1956.

Defendant asserts that the damages were so speculative in nature that it was impossible for the court to conclude that plaintiff had been damaged by any action taken by defendant.

However, we find that virtually uncontradicted evidence shows the following facts:

In the fall of 1954, defendant induced plaintiff to take over the Gemex inventory of a wholesaler who was going out of business and predicted that plaintiff's Gemex annual sales would be as much as $250,000. Plaintiff took on the line and commenced active promotion and sale, putting the line in its catalog which was distributed to thousands of retailers in the United States. Complete sample lines of Gemex brands were distributed by 16 salesmen to the retail trade throughout the middle west. The Marshall Field account was assigned specifically to one salesman and, as a result, that account on August 2, 1956 was about one-third of the total volume of plaintiff's Gemex sales. When defendant withdrew its line, plaintiff's Field account dropped from $25,435.60 in the fiscal year ending January 31, 1956, to $1940.87, in the fiscal year next succeeding August 2, 1956. As a result of the cutoff, plaintiff lost its Christmas last-half business, and its profit on Gemex sales, instead of being an expected $6655 for the fiscal year ending January 31, 1957 (up from $4627.76 the year before), was only $1263.94, or a loss in the fiscal year during which the cutoff occurred of $4391.06.

[5] 28 U. S. C. A. rule 52(b).

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

In the light of 43 years' experience with promoting similar lines of merchandise, plaintiff, after promoting the Gemex watch bands during the first full fiscal year ending January 31, 1956, could reasonably expect a 50% increase in profits for the next year ending January 31, 1957, a 33% increase the following year, a 25% increase the next year and a 15% increase in each of the two succeeding years. Also sustained were losses ranging from out-of-pocket cash expended to losses in closing out the merchandise defendant had first agreed, and then later refused, to take back. These losses totaled $56,007.95. In addition, $780 was a salary outlay for promotion of defendant's line at Field's, the benefit of which was lost when the cutoff by defendant halted further sales of its merchandise there. Plaintiff concedes that about two-fifths of this item might be fairly deducted because of the sales made during the two years of this promotion activity before the date of the cutoff.

Total losses to plaintiff, thus shown, amount to $56,475.95.

We do not consider that the proof of damages offered by plaintiff was speculative in nature and that it is impossible to contend that plaintiff has been damaged by the action taken by defendant, as the latter contends. Rather, we think, that there was no speculation as to the fact of actual damage and that plaintiff's business was seriously curtailed by the cutoff by defendant. It is not the law that the defendant who caused the damage can be permitted to escape liability because it is difficult for plaintiff to express in terms of dollars the damages it has suffered. William H. Rankin Co. v. Associated Bill Posters, 42 F. 2d 152,[6] where, at 155, the court said:

> "* * * This evidence, while purely an estimate and introduced as such, was proof of a kind as definite and certain as the subject-matter admitted. It had to do with what was never actually earned because of the defendants' wrongdoing. The witness testified from his knowledge of the business history, made his calculations upon what appears to be a reasonable basis, and the defendants had ample opportunity by cross-examination or the offer of their own evidence on the subject to discredit him and show any fallacy in his reasoning or testimony. * * *"

The district court was led into error in finding as a fact and concluding as a matter of law that plaintiff was not damaged as a result of defendant's conduct. Damage was proved. Finding 13 is clearly erroneous.

While the evidence now in the record might be sufficient to justify a direction to the district court to compute therefrom plaintiff's actual damages sustained and make an assessment accordingly, we feel that the ends of justice would be better served if this cause be remanded for the purpose of considering the evidence already in the record on the subject of plaintiff's damages, as well as any proper evidence to be offered by defendant, and rebuttal evidence of plaintiff, on subject of plaintiff's damages, and fixing the proper amount of said damages. Such proceedings we now direct.

[Holding]

3. The judgment of the district court is therefore reversed and this cause is remanded to that court with instructions to (1) find the issues in favor of plaintiff and against defendant, (2) assess plaintiff's damages in the manner and in accordance with the views herein expressed, and (3) enter judgment that plaintiff recover threefold the said damages assessed, and costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee, which the district court shall fix. 15 U. S. C. A. § 15.

Judgment Reversed and Cause Remanded with Directions.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Sufficiency of Proof.—A preliminary injunction to enjoin a druggist from violating the plaintiff's fair trade contracts with retailers was denied for insufficiency of proof. There was an admitted error in identifying the clerk in one of the three transactions involved, none of the shoppers in the three transactions could produce receipts, and there was a sworn denial of the violations by the druggist. The determination of those contested matters depended on "demeanor" evidence which was insufficient to support the motion for a preliminary injunction.

For the defendant: Nathan Finkelstein, New York, N. Y.

Memorandum

[Fair Trade—Preliminary Injunction]

Edward Weinfeld, District Judge [In full text]: This is another case where plaintiff seeks a preliminary injunction to enjoin a druggist from violating the plaintiff's fair trade contracts with retailers in the State of New York by selling its trade-marked products at prices below those established by plaintiff. Two shoppers, who jointly participated in one of the three alleged sales upon which plaintiff moves for injunctive relief, describe the person from whom the purchase was made as a female. The defendant denied it ever had in its employ a female clerk, whereupon the two shoppers conceded that they were wrong but claimed the description was an inadvertent error. This might well be and is understandable but the defendant denies selling plaintiff's product below the stipulated price. Its President swears that each purchaser is given a sales receipt which reflects the date and amount of purchase and that none of the shoppers on the three occasions have produced these receipts. If such receipts are given to a customer this certainly would be fairly potent evidence of the purchase and the amount thereof. The shoppers deny they received any such receipts or that they were tendered to them.

[Sufficiency of Proof]

The admitted error in identification plus the contested issue revolving about the receipts and the sworn denial of violation preclude a finding on this record that plaintiff has presented sufficient proof to entitle it to the drastic preliminary relief it seeks. The determination of the contested matters must, in large measure, depend upon demeanor evidence. Under the circumstances, the motion is denied.

[Reply—New Matter]

The plaintiff has submitted reply affidavits which include new matter not presented in its original motion papers based on events after the argument of the motion. The Court has not considered these affidavits insofar as they present new matter. Plaintiff was given leave to reply to the answering affidavit and not to make a further application based upon alleged events occurring after the hearing of the motion. To permit this practice would draw out the process of reply and surreply affidavits interminably. What the practice is in the defendant's drugstore in October 1959 is not proof of what it was in July 1959, when it is alleged the events took place upon which the motion for injunctive relief was based.

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Sufficiency of Proof—Delay in Enforcement as a Defense.—An injunction pendente lite to enjoin violations of a drug company's fair trade contracts was granted where a defendant, while professing to be a wholesaler selling to retailers sold single quantities at retail and below fair trade prices to persons who came in off the street. The plea that the defendant did not know these individuals were not retailers was insufficient; he could have readily ascertained whether or not they were retailers but deliberately chose not to do so. In addition, the delay from the time of discovery of the alleged violation to the seeking of injunctive relief did not defeat the motion since that delay was caused by extensive investigations to assure adequate proof. Also, the balance of hardship was in the plaintiff's favor. Constant violations by the defendant were shown, and the injunction simply required conformity to the law.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3354.34, 3440.34.

Memorandum

[Fair Trade—Injunction Pendente Lite]

Edward Weinfeld, District Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff moves for an injunction pendente lite to enjoin the defendant from violating plaintiff's fair trade contracts with retailers in the State of New York by selling its trade-marked products at prices below those established by plaintiff.

[Type of Sale]

While defendant asserts it is a wholesaler, who sold to retailers, the proof submitted establishes that it sold single quantities at retail and below plaintiff's fair trade prices to persons who came in off the street. The plea that defendant did not know these individuals were not druggists must fail since defendant could readily have ascertained by appropriate inquiry whether the purchasers were retailers. It chose not to do so. It deliberately avoided information which at once would have destroyed its present claim.

[Delay in Enforcement]

The defendant has raised the issue of delay from the time of discovery of the alleged violation to the filing of the motion for injunctive relief. The Court requested an explanation from plaintiff's attorneys and is satisfied that the delay was unavoidable. The extensive investigation to assure adequate proof to support the charge and the even and rigid enforcement of the plaintiff's fair trade program throughout the general area where this defendant and other alleged violators operated were necessarily time-consuming. Unless there were such enforcement against other alleged violators, defendant would be in a position to urge nonenforcement as a basis upon which to defeat plaintiff's application. In this case, unlike the other decided this day, where the plaintiff herein also sought injunctive relief which was denied because of inadequacy of proof, sufficient has been submitted to warrant the granting of the application.

[Balance of Hardship]

In addition, the balance of hardship tips in plaintiff's favor. Plaintiff is entitled to enforce its fair trade program; defendant is required to observe the law; plaintiff's fair trade program has been enforced extensively and with vigor. The granting of the injunction would simply require the defendant to conform to the law. Sufficient has been shown to indicate constant violations by the defendant. Cf. Hamilton Watch Co. v. Benrus Watch Co. [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,517], 206 F. 2d 738, 740 (2d Cir. 1953).

[Ruling]

Accordingly, the motion is granted. Settle order on notice.

In the United States District Court, Eastern District of Missouri, Eastern Division. Civil No. 10527(3). Filed November 20, 1959. Amended December 4, 1959, and December 14, 1959.

Case No. 1266 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—"Vertical" Acquisition of Stock and Assets—Merger of Nation's Largest "Family Shoe Store Chain" with Fourth Largest Shoe Manufacturer —Effect on Competition.—A proposed merger of the country's largest "family shoe store chain" with the nation's fourth largest manufacturer of shoes would substantially lessen competition and tend to create a monopoly in the manufacturing and retailing of shoes in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act. The "acquired" company, in addition to its principal business of operating family style retail stores (seventh in the industry with 1.2 per cent of the national retail sales), also operated four manufacturing plants which produced 0.5 per cent of the nation's shoes (twelfth in the industry in manufacturing). The "acquiring" company, in addition to manufacturing 5 per cent of the nation's shoes (fourth in the industry in manufacturing), operated 3.8 per cent of the nation's total retail shoe stores. The court noted, however, that . was not so much concerned with percentages, as such, as with the meaning of those percentages in the light of the facts and the "economic realities" involved. It made no difference that the "acquiring" and "acquired" companies produced only 5 and 0.5 per cent of the country's shoes, respectively, when one was the fourth largest manufacturer in the nation and the other, with only 1.2 per cent of all retail shoe sales, was the largest family shoe chain retailer. The test is: what do the facts show as to the trends in the industry and the true economic impact of the particular merger.

Here, the merger would increase concentration in the shoe industry, both in manufacturing and retailing. The fourth manufacturer would become the third and the combination would be the largest operator of retail shoe stores in the nation (5.7 per cent). Other manufacturers would be adversely affected since the "acquired" chain would become a smaller market for their products. Other retailers would be adversely affected by reason of the advantages which would inure to the chain from its affinity with the manufacturer. Further, in the shoe retailing field, the chain would be eliminated as a substantial competitive factor to the "acquiring" manufacturer.

See Acquisitions of Stocks or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4207.635, 4207.800.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Vertical Acquisition of Stock and Assets—Merger of Nation's Largest "Family Shoe Store Chain" with Fourth Largest Shoe Manufacturer—Relevant Market (Line of Commerce).—A Federal District Court, in ruling that a proposed merger of the nation's fourth largest manufacturer of shoes and the nation's largest "family shoe store chain" would violate Section 7 of the Clayton Act, held that, for the purpose of determining the impact of the merger, the "line of commerce" was (1) men's shoes, (2) women's shoes, and (3) children's shoes, each considered separately. "Line of commerce," which refers to a product market, has been defined as any product, or group of products, that has "sufficient peculiar characteristics and uses to make it distinguishable from all other products." As to the burden of proof, there was no question but that the burden was upon the Government to establish the "line of commerce." Here, there was "interchangeability" in (1) the manufacturing process, (2) price, style, and quality, and (3) use. However, it was a noticeable fact that shoes are distinct as to the sexes (except children's) in that the male and female population wear distinctly different types of shoes. Further, shoe manufacturers making men's, women's, and children's shoes separate their production, as to each of those categories, in separate plants. Thus, while there was a close question as to whether "shoes—as such" could be treated as a "line of commerce" (as first contended by the Government), and while there was argument for a breakdown into quality, style, price and intended use (as contended by the defendants), there could be no question, either legal, logical, or evidentiary, but that men's, women's, and children's shoes, regardless of quality, style, price, and intended use, have sufficient peculiar characteristics and uses to make them "distinguishable" and a "line of commerce." That classification is recognized by the entire industry and the public. To classify shoes "as a whole" could have been unfair and unjust; to classify them further would have been "impractical, unwarranted and unrealistic."

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4207.375.

Acquisitions of Stock or Assets—Vertical Acquisition of Stock and Assets—Merger of Nation's Largest "Family Shoe Store Chain" with Fourth Largest Shoe Manufacturer—Relevant Market (Section of the Country).—A Federal District Court, in ruling that a proposed merger of the nation's fourth largest manufacturer of shoes and the nation's largest "family shoe store chain" would violate Section 7 of the Clayton Act, held that, for the purpose of determining the impact of the merger, the effective area of competition, and, thus, the relevant "section of the country," was the "whole of the United States" as far as manufacturing was concerned, since both parties manufactured shoes throughout the country. However, as to the retail market (both parties retailed shoes throughout the country), the court concluded that a "section of the country" was "a city of 10,000 or more population and its immediate and contiguous surrounding area" in which both of the companies had a store. The Government contended that the proper geographic market was "the nation as a whole," or, in the alternative, a city, or, a city and the immediate surrounding area. The defendants contended that the proper designation for retailing was a "standard metropolitan area," which they defined as an economic unit "which is commonly the result of consolidating political units, its borders being defined by the flow of local commerce as measured by objective economic indicators." The court found that the "acquired" company operated primarily a family-type store in cities of 10,000 or more population and usually in the corporate limits or its environs; that the "acquiring" company had stores, and leased "departments," in cities of 10,000 or more inhabitants; that there were at least 141 such cities in which both companies had a retail store; and that dealers in "downtown" metropolitan areas competed with dealers in the "outlying" areas.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

See Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4207.425.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Suit for Injunctive Relief—Unlawful Stock and Asset Acquisitions Under Clayton Act, Section 7—Injunctive Relief—Divestiture of Stock—Ruling Reserved.—A Federal District Court, in ruling that a proposed merger of the nation's fourth largest shoe manufacturer and the nation's largest family-shoe store chain would violate Section 7 of the Clayton Act, reserved for further consideration the question of the disposal of the stock. If the judgment should become final in its present form, the "acquiring" company would be confronted with the necessity of disposing of the "acquired" company's stock. Noting that the disposition could have far-reaching effects and consequences, the court concluded that, should the judgment become final, evidence would be heard concerning the effects and the manner of handling that disposition.

[Unlawful Merger Charged]

RANDOLPH H. WEBER, District Judge [In full text]: This is a suit by the government to restrain the proposed merger of the defendants Brown Shoe Company, Inc., and G. R. Kinney Co., Inc., hereinafter to be referred to as Brown and Kinney respectively. The Complaint charges a violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act[1] and seeks injunctive relief under Section 15.[2] Brown is a New York corporation and has its principal office and transacts business in this district and therefore this Court has jurisdiction of this proceeding.[3]

[1] 15 U. S. C. A. § 18, 64 Stat. 1125. "No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital and no corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission shall acquire the whole or any part of the assets of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or tend to create a monopoly." (Other parts of the section are not herein involved.)

[2] 15 U. S. C. A. § 25, 38 Stat. 736. "The several district courts of the United States are invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations * * *, and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. * * * Whenever it shall appear to the court before which any such proceeding may be pending that the ends of justice require that other parties should be brought before the court, the court may cause them to be summoned whether they reside in the district in which the court is held or not, * * *."

[3] 15 U. S. C. A. § 22, 38 Stat. 736. "Any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; * * *."

[Prior Proceedings]

The plaintiff filed its Complaint on November 28, 1955, and obtained an ex-parte temporary restraining order before the late Honorable Rubey M. Hulen. Upon hearing the evidence presented on plaintiff's Motion for Preliminary Injunction the Court was not convinced at that stage of the proceedings that plaintiff was entitled to a preliminary injunction pending a hearing of the cause on its merits. However, while the merger was permitted to continue, the businesses were ordered to be operated separately.

The merger was effected on May 1, 1956, and throughout the trial hereof there has been no contention made or indicated that defendants have not complied with the preliminary order. Business has been done between defendants but, as far as the record is concerned at this time, the businesses have been operated separately and the assets have been kept separately identifiable in a new corporation licensed as G. R. Kinney Corporation. G. R. Kinney Corporation entered its appearance as a party to this suit[4] and hereafter the reference to defendant Kinney shall be construed as a reference to both G. R. Kinney Co., Inc., and G. R. Kinney Corporation.

Judge Hulen died on July 7, 1956, and this matter remained upon the docket without action until August, 1957, when various pretrial conferences were begun and subsequently all discovery and preparation for trial was completed and the cause came on for trial before this Court on August 4, 1958. Full testimony was not completed until January 24, 1959, the matter was passed for filing of briefs and the cause was taken under submission on August 1, 1959.

I.

A. History of Brown

[Manufacturer and Retailer of Shoes]

The evidence reveals that Brown and its predecessors have been engaged in the manufacture of shoes since 1877. In its present form, Brown was incorporated in the State of New York in 1913, and since that time has been engaged in the manufacture of men's, women's and children's shoes. In 1929 Brown began to experiment in operating a few retail outlets, but by 1945 had disposed of them and until 1951 engaged principally in manufacturing and distributing its shoes to the consuming public through independent retailers, chain stores and mail order houses.

[Franchise Arrangements]

For a number of years Brown has had franchise arrangements with certain retailers. These franchise arrangements consist of committing the retailers not to carry competing lines of shoes of other manufacturers and in return they receive certain aids and assists from Brown by way of advertising, insurance, rubber footwear purchases, advice and help on inventories and inventory sales. Brown does not limit its sales to franchise dealers but has expanded its franchise operations since 1950.

Brown engages in extensive national advertising to develop consumer acceptance for its brand name shoes, viz., Buster Brown

[4] Judge Hulen's Memorandum Opinion on plaintiff's Motion for Preliminary Injunction, [CCH] 1956 TRADE CASES par. 68,244 (E. D. Mo. 1956), was filed and entered in this Court on January 13, 1956. It provided that if the merger was completed, then:

"(1) that title to all assets acquired from Kinney by Brown by the merger be vested in a subsidiary corporation of Brown;

"(2) that the subsidiary corporation shall have independent management under the control of a board of directors, none of which members shall be on the boards of directors of Brown or any of Brown's other subsidiaries;

"(3) that all assets acquired from Kinney, together with the net earnings of Kinney subsequent to the merger, shall be retained by Kinney, and shall be at all times identifiable as assets of the subsidiary corporation, and none such assets shall be intermingled with Brown's assets;

"(4) that all the stock in the subsidiary corporation shall be held by Brown, other than qualifying shares for the board of directors, and shall not be hypothecated or encumbered in any manner;

"(5) that any leases now held by Kinney if renewed shall be renewed in the name of the subsidiary corporation, and any new leases negotiated for the subsidiary (Kinney) outlets shall be in the name of the subsidiary corporation, and all such leases shall be and remain the property of the subsidiary corporation;

"(6) that no subsidiary (Kinney) retail outlet shall be closed for reasons of competition with any Brown controlled retail outlet;

"(7) that no factory of the subsidiary (Kinney) corporation shall be closed or any of its production taken over by Brown because of competitive reasons with Brown; and

"(8) that on formation of the subsidiary (Kinney) corporation it shall enter its appearance in this cause and make itself subject to the jurisdiction of the Court in this cause."

[Judge Hulen's Order, entered March 13, 1956, follows above Opinion except it details the mechanics of performance.]

and Robin Hood for children's shoes; Naturalizer, Air Step and Life Stride for women's shoes; and Pedwin and Roblee for men's shoes. Brown also manufactures shoes for independent retailers under their brand names.

(Wohl)

In 1951 Brown acquired Wohl Shoe Company, hereinafter referred to as Wohl. Wohl was then a well-established corporation which operated 250 shoe departments in various department stores located throughout the United States. Most of its outlets were located in medium-sized cities and specialized in women's shoes. It operated a wholesale division which bought from various manufacturers, including Brown, and sold its own brand name shoes to some independent retailers, to its own retail outlets (leased shoe departments in various department stores) and to Wohl-plan accounts (independent retailers throughout the country who are not permitted to handle competing lines of shoes under trade names other than Brown or Wohl and who receive certain merchandising aids and assists and have credit arrangements under which they file weekly statements showing total sales and expenses and remit the weekly sales receipts, after deducting salaries and expenses, to be applied against their outstanding account). Wohl was, at the time of acquisition, the nation's largest operator of leased shoe departments. Since acquisition, Wohl operates as a separate division of Brown but there has been an interchange of corporate officers.

In 1950 (before acquisition) Wohl bought $2,884,328.00, or 12.8% of its purchases, from Brown. In 1952 (after acquisition) purchases increased to $6,018,939.00, or 21.4%; in 1955, to $10,758,518.00, or 32.6%, and in 1957, to $12,099,201.00, or 33.6%. In 1950, Wohl ranked ninth among shoe firms in net sales and Brown fourth. By 1955, including Wohl, Brown had moved into third place in net sales.

(Regal)

In 1954 Brown acquired Regal Shoe Corporation, hereinafter referred to as Regal, a Massachusetts corporation, which operated one manufacturing plant producing men's shoes and 110 retail stores. Regal manufactured shoes for sale at retail in its own retail stores and also purchased shoes from other manufacturers for sale therein. Regal operated a few shoe departments and also sold some of its manufactured products, under private brand names, to chain stores and other distributors of shoes. Regal had acquired the Curtis Shoe Company in 1954. The Regal Shoe Manufacturing Company was incorporated in 1954 as a wholly-owned subsidiary of Regal Shoe Company and certain assets of Regal Shoe Company were transferred to the new corporation. After the merger between Regal and Brown there was an interchange of corporate officers.

Before its acquisition, Regal sold no shoes to Wohl. In 1955, after the acquisition, Regal sold $2,000.00 worth of shoes to Wohl and in 1956 this increased to $265,000.00. It sold $89,000.00 to Brown in 1953, $544,000.00 in 1954, $599,000.00 in 1955 and $744,057.00 in 1956. Before Kinney's acquisition by Brown, Regal never sold shoes to Kinney. By 1956 it had sold and delivered $359,000.00 worth of shoes to Kinney.

At the time the Regal sales to Brown and its affiliates were increasing, Regal's sales to other concerns, unconnected with Brown, decreased. For example, in 1953 Regal sold 51,815 pairs to those other concerns at $278,000.00, and by 1955 this decreased to 14,864 pairs at $92,000.00.

(Wetherby-Kayser)

In 1952 Brown and the Florsheim Shoe Company had each purchased a total of approximately one-third of the capital stock of Wetherby-Kayser, which operated retail stores in the Los Angeles area. In 1953 International Shoe Company acquired Florsheim and Brown acquired Florsheim's stock in Wetherby-Kayser. Subsequently, in 1953, Brown acquired the remaining outstanding stock of Wetherby-Kayser. Since that time Brown officials serve as officers of its board.

Brown had been a small supplier of Wetherby-Kayser before acquisition. In 1952, when Brown and Florsheim began to acquire its capital stock, Brown sold Wetherby-Kayser $23,144.00 worth of shoes, or 10.4% of its total purchases. In 1953, during Brown's acquisition of all of Wetherby-Kayser's stock, this had increased to $137,958.00 or 49.2% of its total purchases. Since 1954, Wetherby-Kayser's purchasing has been assumed by Wohl, and 50% of its requirements come from Brown.

(Other Retail Acquisitions)

Brown acquired the Richardson Shoe Store, Corpus Christi, Texas, in 1952, which operated one retail store. In 1954, Brown acquired the Wohl Shoe Company of Dallas, Texas, (not connected with Wohl) which operated leased shoe departments in Dallas. In 1954 Barnes and Company of Midland, Texas, which operated two retail shoe stores was also acquired by Brown; Barnes purchased shoes from manufacturers located outside of Texas, including Brown.

In 1955 Brown acquired the T. D. Reilly Shoe Company, hereinafter referred to as Reilly, which operated two leased retail shoe departments in Columbus, Ohio. Reilly had been purchasing its shoes for retail from various suppliers and manufacturers outside the State of Ohio, including Brown.

(Manufacturing Acquisitions)

From 1913 Brown's manufacturing facilities grew and expanded through the building and acquisition of additional plant facilities. It acquired Barton Bros. of Kansas City, Missouri, in that year. In 1946 Brown purchased the trust certificates representing the stock of the Ermtree Shoe Company and its affiliate Footkind Shoe Company. In 1948 it acquired the assets of the Milius Shoe Co., consisting of a factory at Piggott, Arkansas, and a leased plant at Festus, Missouri. In 1950 it acquired the assets of Spalsbury-Steis Shoe Company, which operated a manufacturing plant at Fredericktown, Missouri. In 1952 it acquired the capital stock of the Bourbeuse Shoe Company, which operated a factory at Union, Missouri. In 1953 it acquired the stock of Monogram Footwear, Inc., which operated a factory at Trenton, Illinois, the stock of the O'Donnell Shoe Corporation, which operated a factory at Humboldt, Tennessee, and the stock of Kaut, Lauman, Winter, Inc., which operated a factory at Dixon, Missouri.

These acquired companies produced and sold their shoes outside of the states in which they were located and are presently operated by the Shoe Manufacturing Division of Brown. In these acquisitions Brown obtained two trade names, "Risque" and "Propr-Bilt," and has continued to use those names. Brown increased the number of its manufacturing plants from 20 in 1945 to second place in the industry, with 42 plants operated, by 1956.

In 1926 Brown acquired the stock of Moench Tanning Company, Inc., which operated two tanneries. Brown now operates factories that supply some of its wood heels, soles and shoe cartons. It has steadily increased its production of leather, cut soles, heels and cartons and has expanded and acquired manufacturing facilities therefor. Its manufacturing division operates a centralized purchasing and distribution facility for buying and supplying the manufacturing needs of its various shoe plants, and its large quantity purchasing results in definite price advantages.

(Sales and Assets)

Between 1950 and 1955 Brown's total dollar sales increased from $89,313,000.00 to $159,481,000.00 and its assets from $36,490,000.00 to $72,396,000.00 Its total net sales and assets have consistently increased since 1955.

There is a dispute between plaintiff and defendants on the manner in which the above assets were arrived at and determined. However, regardless of the dollar figures, the evidence here is undisputed as to the fact that in 1955 Brown was the fourth largest shoe manufacturer in the United States. It produced in that year, 25,648,000 pairs of shoes, or 3.97% of the nation's total production. In 1957, when combined with Kinney, Brown's production increases to 29,105,105 pairs of shoes, or 5% of the nation's total shoe production and would place it third in the industry.[5]

Asset-wise, pair production-wise and net sales-wise, Brown, with the acquisition of Kinney, would move from the fourth position in the industry to the third position.

B. History of Kinney

Kinney was established in 1894 and operates four manufacturing plants producing men's, women's and children's shoes. These plants sell their products principally to Kinney's own retail outlets but do sell some unbranded shoes to chain stores, mail order houses and other distributors.

[Principal Business—Retailing]

Kinney's principal business, however, is the operation of family-style retail shoe stores. It operates in more than 270 cities

[5] The 3 top shoe manufacturers, viz., International, Endicott-Johnson and Brown (including Kinney), produced about 17% of the nation's total shoe production in 1957.

The top 24 manufacturers produced about 35% of the nation's total and thus the top 3 produced about ½ of the top 24's production for 1957.

When the top 4 (which adds General Shoe Corp.) is considered, they produced about 23% of the total shoe production and had about 65% of the top 24's production.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

throughout the United States and at the time of trial had approximately 411 such retail stores. Its retail stores obtain about 20% of their shoes from their own manufacturing plants and 80% from other manufacturing sources, now including Brown and Regal.

In 1954 Kinney purchased no shoes from Brown or any of its affiliates. By 1957, 7.9% of all of its purchases, in the amount of $1,546,856.00, were from Brown and Regal, making Brown the largest single supplier of Kinney's shoes. By 1957 Kinney's wholesale sales to Brown and Wohl retail outlets tripled and by the first half of 1958 had more than quadrupled. During this same period Kinney's sales to independent retailers diminished.

(Sales and Assets)

[Rank in Industry]

Kinney's net sales increased from $35,228,000.00 in 1950 to $51,661,000.00 in 1955. During this same period its assets grew from $13,000,000.00 to $18,000,000.00. While there is some dispute between plaintiff and defendants as to how the asset figures were arrived at, there is no dispute but that Kinney ranked eighth asset-wise among all shoe firms in the nation in 1955, and was twelfth in number of pairs produced and seventh in net sales.

Kinney produced 0.5% of all shoes manufactured in 1955 and had 1.2% of all national retail sales. By the time of trial Kinney had added 51 new retail outlets and is the largest family shoe store chain in the nation.

[Finding of Facts
as to History of Brown-Kinney]

All of the foregoing the Court finds to be the facts in this cause concerning the history, type of business, size, method of operation and position in the industry of Brown and Kinney.

II.

History of the Clayton Act

[Purpose of Act]

The country's first experience in anti-trust and monopoly legislation was in 1890 when Congress passed the Sherman Act.[6] Thereafter huge consolidations and mergers flourished. In 1911 the Supreme Court enunciated the "rule of reason" in Standard Oil v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 31 S. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619, and many felt that this decision further weakened the Sherman Act and that it was ineffective in halting the growth of trusts and monopolies. The concern for the preservation of the free enterprise system resulted in the enactment of the Clayton Act in 1914.[7] Its purpose was to fill the gaps and to halt anti-competitive acts before they reached the magnitude required by the Sherman Act. See United States v. du Pont [1957 Trade Cases ¶68,723], 353 U. S. 586, 589, 77 S. Ct. 872, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1057.

[Limitations on Section 7]

After the passage of the Clayton Act, Section 7 thereof was held to have several limitations. One was that it was not believed to apply to vertical mergers, i. e., mergers within the industry proceeding forward to or backward from the ultimate consumer. United States v. Bethlehem Steel [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 69,189], 168 F. Supp. 576, 582; Cf. United States v. E. I. du Pont, supra. Another was that the section did not cover acquisitions of assets, but only applied to acquisitions of stock. Thatcher Mfg. Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 272 U. S. 554, 47 S. Ct. 175, 71 L. Ed. 405. Other limitations were that the Act itself required that the effect of the acquisition had to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, and the restraint of commerce was confined to any section or community. 38 Stat. 731, 15 U. S. C. (1946 Ed.) § 18.

[1950 Amendment]

In 1950, Congress amended the Clayton Act in order "that the economic system be protected against those forces of monopoly which would destroy it." Congressional Report No. 1191, August 4, 1949, on H. R. 2734 at pages 12-13. That Report shows that the Congress intimated that everybody, business, labor, consuming public and all citizens, both corporate and individual, have a stake in preventing the destruction of our economic system. Section 7, as amended, provides a prohibition of the acquisition of stock or assets "where in any line of commerce, in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or tend to create a monopoly."[1]

[Effect of Amendment]

In other words, where the Act had previously dealt only with stock acquisitions and required substantial lessening of competition between the acquiring and acquired corporations and had narrowed the restraint to any section or community, it now prohibits, (a) any acquisition of stock or assets (b) in any line of commerce (c) in any section of the country (d) where the effect may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly. United States v. Bethlehem Steel, supra, at l. c. 582: United States v. E. I. du Pont, supra, at l. c. 591; American Crystal Sugar Co. v. Cuban-American Sugar Co., (S. D. N .Y. 1957) [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,735] 152 F. Supp. 387, 395, affirmed (2 CCA, 1958) [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,155] 259 F. 2d 524.

III.

[Issues]

Therefore, the problem in this and any other Section 7 case is to go to the facts of the case and resolve those facts in the light of the Congressional intention in the Act and the courts' interpretation of both the Congressional intention and the Act.

We have here an acquisition by Brown of the stock of Kinney. This is such an acquisition as contemplated by the statute and once there is such acquisition there then remains three issues present for determination. They are: (1) line of commerce, (2) section of the country, and (3) the impact of the merger.

Let us take up these elements in that order:

(1)

Line of Commerce

[Product]

(Government's Contention)

The government here contends that "shoes" as a class, or, in the alternative, "men's," "women's" and "children's" shoes considered separately, should be the "line of commerce".

Plaintiff argues first that shoes are a class product distinguishable from all others; that defendants manufacture, distribute and sell shoes of all types, in numerous sizes and for every member of the family; that the same machinery is used to produce shoes of different types and grades and that production is often converted between types and grades; that component parts of shoes and wages are industry-wide and therefore prices tend to be industry-wide.

For its alternative argument, plaintiff contends that shoes for "men," "women" and "children" are all sold in some stores and that there are also stores selling these separately or in combinations less than all three; that the trade literature speaks in terms of "men's," "women's" and "children's" shoes; that there is sufficient proof to show that each has sufficiently distinct characteristics and uses to make each a separate "line of commerce".

(Defendants' Contention)

Defendants contend that differences in grades, qualities, prices and uses of shoes should be considered in determining the relevant "line of commerce".

In other words, defendants state that where certain lines of shoes might stop at a $3.50 price and another line start at a $4.50 price, each could be a separate line; that price determines quality and thus quality enters the picture of consideration; or, that a shoe might be classified in the trade as a "casual", "dress", "play" or "work", and as such each could be a separate line; that the peculiar characteristics of the product, rather than the constitution or characteristics of the customer, determine whether or not we are dealing with products that have "interchangeability"; that upon these considerations the total shoe product could be separated into "lines of commerce" as to grade, quality, price and use and the government has failed to meet the burden required.

(Review of the Cases)

[Burden of Proof]

Before going to the facts in evidence, let us turn to the case law on this subject for any guideposts that might be found to help in resolving the facts.

There can be no question but that the burden is upon the government to establish the "line of commerce". United States v. E. I. du Pont, supra, at l. c. 583; In the Matter of Pillsbury, Inc., 50 F. T. C. 555, 569, 8-10 C. C. H. Trade Reg. Rep. § 11582.

[1 See footnote 1 on page 76,097.]

[Definition]

"Line of commerce" refers to a product market and has been defined as any product, or group of products, that has "sufficient peculiar characteristics and uses to make it distinguishable from all other products". United States v. E. I. du Pont, supra, at l. c. 593; United States v. Bethlehem Steel, supra, at l. c. 589, 592.

["Interchangeability"]

The government and the defendants have cited, explained and tried to rationalize the whole gamut of cases dealing with the problem of the "line of commerce" as it arises in the antitrust field. Some of these cases deal with the theory of "reasonable interchangeability" introduced as a consideration of the relevant market in an earlier du Pont case, commonly called the Cellophane case. United States v. E. I. du Pont [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956). See also American Crystal Sugar Co. v. Cuban-American Sugar Co., supra. The "price", "grade" and "quality" factors were noted as they were dealt with in Hamilton Watch Co. v. Benrus Watch Co., (D. C. Conn.) [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,485] 114 F. Supp. 307, affirmed (2 CCA, 1953) [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,517] 206 F. 2d 738. The Bethlehem Steel case, supra, was cited as authority for the establishment of separate lines of commerce within a broad line of commerce.

The earlier du Pont (Cellophane) case has been distinguished and limited as applying to the monopolization clause of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. See United States v. Bethlehem Steel, supra, at l. c. 593, n. 36. Yet, the American Sugar Co. case, supra, a Section 7 case, leads to conclusion that "interchangeability" cannot be ignored as a factor where, under the circumstances, the products are more or less the same.

[Competition]

The Hamilton Watch Co. case, supra, considered jewelled watches as a "line of commerce" regardless of differences in the number of jewels or the prices charged. The Court held that the two companies competed actively with each other and all other companies in the sale of nationally advertised branded jewelled watches.

In the Bethlehem Steel case, supra, at l. c. 595, the Court adopted the steel industry as a whole, and within the whole, divided further into separate lines of commerce with respect to various individual steel items. It declared both the whole and the divisions as separate lines of commerce.

[Price and Quality]

The case of International Shoe Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 280 U. S. 291, 50 S. Ct. 89, 74 L. Ed. 431, where the Supreme Court overruled the Commission's order prohibiting the acquisition and indicated that prices and quality between the two companies were not the same, can be distinguished from the instant case for three reasons: (1) the precarious financial condition of the acquired (McElwain) company was a determining factor, for at l. c. 301, the Court said:

> "* * * the evidence establishes the case of a corporation in failing circumstances, the recovery of which to a normal condition, was, to say the least, in gravest doubt, selling its capital to the only available purchaser in order to avoid what its officers concluded was a more disastrous fate.";

(2) the companies were found to be competing in entirely different sized communities and; (3) the case was decided in 1930 and at that time Section 7 of the Clayton Act was limited to a lessening of competition between the acquired and the acquiring company.

In the Hamilton Watch case, supra, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals at l. c. 741, said:

> "Although we now indulge in no ultimate conclusion, we believe the amendment of § 7 in 1950 certainly casts doubt on decisions—including International Shoe Co. (citation omitted) and United States v. Columbia Steel Co. (citation omitted)."

An analysis of the maze of cases on the subject leads one to the conclusion that a "line of commerce" cannot be determined by any process of logic and should be determined by the processes of observation. See International Shoe case, supra, at l. c. 299.

Therefore, we must go to the facts in the case and see what the testimony here reveals and make a determination of the "line of commerce" from the practices in the industry, the characteristics and uses of the products, their interchangeability, price, quality and style. In other words, determine how the industry itself and how the users, the public, treat the shoe product. In this regard, it becomes necessary that each case stand upon its own particular facts.

[FINDINGS OF FACTS AS TO "LINE OF COMMERCE"]

[Interchangeability as to Manufacturing Process]

The evidence in the case at hand shows a certain degree of interchangeability in the shoe industry. First, there is the interchangeability in the manufacturing process; for instance, welt shoes may be made for men, women and children and if so, some of the same machinery is used; or machinery for cement shoes, or stitch down shoes, may be as readily applied to the shoe for the large child as for the small child or the young boy or young miss; the factory producing men's shoes may also produce sizes for growing boys or teenagers; the same is true in the women's lines as to growing girls and the young miss; shoe manufacturers allow their sizes to overlap at the ends of their lines to meet the needs and the pocketbooks of their intended customers.

There is this noticeable fact, however, that shoe manufacutrers making "men's" "women's" and "children's" shoes separate their production as to each of the above categories in separate plants.

[Interchangeability in Price, Style, and Quality]

Second, there is the question of interchangeability in price, style and quality; for instance, shoes manufactured with cheap quality material are often made to look exactly like the higher priced shoes; the average store window shopper, uninitiated in matters of shoe quality, can easily mistake one shoe for the other; one buyer, without the money to pay for the higher quality, may still want to imitate that quality by buying the cheaper shoe that resembles it; the retailer points out the features about his particular line of shoes by either telling his customer that his is better quality or style, or, that in his price line the better quality and style is imitated.

Therefore, while quality eventually determines both the wholesale and the retail prices, the manufacturers definitely attempt to copy the styles of the higher priced shoes in the lower priced lines and the retailers definitely attempt to sell to the public as a whole, whatever price, style or quality line they may be carrying.

[Interchangeability of Use]

Third, there is the interchangeability of the use to which shoes are put by the customer; for instance, one person may wear the casual to work, another to school, another to the country club and yet another wear it on an outing; one person may wear the work shoe to church, while another may wear it to the woods; one may wear his or her "new shoes" to dress up in, and as they get older and shabbier, wear them to work or to do the sun-up to sun-down chores about the house.

Likewise, the size of the foot does not always determine the age of the possessor of the foot. Some boys can, and must, wear men's shoes; some girls may of necessity wear women's sizes; some women, with pride, may slip into the size of a miss. The old cliche of "filling someone else's shoes" is still a mental ability or incentive and not a physical attribute or characteristic. Nor does the type of shoe always determine the use to which it is to be put, for mores, habits, and economics may determine where, when and how often we wear them.

[Distinction as to Sexes]

There is this noticeable fact, however, shoes are distinct as to the sexes (except children's) and regardless of overlapping at the beginning and end of the size runs, the male and female population wear distinctly different types of shoes. Children wear the same shoes up to necessary changes required because of size and then the same male and female distinctions take over.

Fourth, the shoe people themselves admit that their trade classifications into "casuals", "misses", "growing boys", "women's dress", "men's dress", "work", "play", "crib", "first steps", and the maze of other characterizations attempted by the manufacturers and the retailers to differentiate their lines or to catch the buying eye, do not determine the use to which the shoe is put or by whom it will be put. They do not agree among themselves as to definitions of these various categories. Many of the categories are used interchangeably and the public uses the shoe product interchangeably.

[Recognized Classifications]

There is this noticeable fact, however, that there is one group of classifications which is understood and recognized by the entire industry and the public—the classification into "men's", "women's" and "children's" shoes separately and independently. Brown and Kinney each manufacture and sell men's, women's and children's shoes. While there is a close question as to whether "shoes—as such" could be treated as a "line of commerce" and, while there is argument for a breakdown into quality, style, price and intended use, there can be no question or argument either legal, logical or evidentiary, but that it can be said that all "men's shoes", regardless of quality, style, price and intended use, have sufficient peculiar characteristics and uses to make them distinguishable and a "line of commerce". The same can be said separately as to all "women's shoes" and all "children's shoes". On this the government has sustained its burden.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

CONCLUSION

LINE OF COMMERCE

[Men's, Women's, and Children's Shoes]

The Court finds the foregoing to be the facts and from those facts it is found and determined that the "line of commerce" in this case should be, and is hereby declared to be, "men's", "women's" and "children's" shoes, each considered separately. To classify shoes as a whole could be unfair and unjust; to classify them further would be impractical, unwarranted and unrealistic.

(2)

Section of the Country

[Geographic Market]

As previously stated, in addition to "line of commerce" it is necessary to determine "section of the country". Here again, while the word "market" does not appear in the Act, when we talk about "section of the country" we are actually talking about the geographic market.

(Government's Contention)

[Nation—City or "City and Surrounding Area"]

The government contends that the nation as a whole constitutes a "section of the country" for both retailing and manufacturing. In the event the Court should not adopt that contention as to retailing, the government takes the alternative position that it should be a city, or a city and the immediate surrounding area.

(Defendants' Contention)

["Standard Metropolitan Area"]

The defendants admit the country as a whole constitutes a "section of the country" for manufacturing, but contend that what they call a "standard metropolitan area" is the proper designation for retailing. They would define such an area as an economic unit which is commonly the result of consolidating political units, its borders being defined by the flow of local commerce as measured by objective economic indicators.

Manufacturing

["Nation as a Whole"]

Brown and Kinney both manufacture and retail "men's", "women's" and "children's" shoes throughout the nation. The parties have agreed that as far as manufacturing is concerned, the whole of the United States is a "section of the country" and the evidence supports this.

CONCLUSION

SECTION OF THE COUNTRY

(Manufacturing)

Therefore, from the evidence and because there is no dispute, the United States is found to be the effective area of competition for manufacturing. From the finding heretofore entered on "line of commerce" the Court further finds that this applies as to "men's", "women's" and "children's" shoes, considered separately.

Retailing

[Location of Stores]

This leaves for consideration and further determination the "section of the country" with reference to the retail market. Kinney has its own family shoe stores scattered throughout the United States. Brown has its Wohl-plan stores, its Wohl leased departments, its Regal, Wetherby-Kayser and Brown franchise stores, as well as a few company-operated stores and the independent retailers to which it sells and all are scattered throughout the entire country.

(Review of the Cases)

[Burden of Proof]

The burden is upon the government to establish the "section of the country". This has been heretofore covered in discussing the "line of commerce" and the same citations apply.

In the Senate Committee Report No. 1775, 81st Congress, 2d Session, 1950, when the amendment to Section 7 was being considered, it was stated:

> "What constitutes a section will vary with the nature of the product. Owing to the differences in the size and character of markets, it would be meaningless, from an economic point of view, to attempt to apply for all products a uniform definition of section, whether such a definition were based upon miles, population, income, or any other unit of measurement. A section which would be economically significant for a heavy, durable product, such as large machine tools, might well be meaningless for a light product, such as milk." Id. pp. 5-6.

In Standard Oil Co. v. United States [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,432], 337 U. S. 293, 299 n. 5, 69 S. Ct. 1051, 93 L. Ed. 1371, the Supreme Court said:

> "Since it is the preservation of competition which is at stake, the significant portion of coverage is that within the area of effective competition."

See also Senate Committee Report No. 1755, supra, and United States v. Bethlehem Steel Corporation, supra, at l. c. 595-596.

The city and surrounding area was adopted as a "section of the country" in the case of United States v. Maryland and Virginia Milk Pro. Ass'n. [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,197], 167 F. Supp. 799. The case involved milk dealers in the Washington metropolitan area which consisted of the District of Columbia and nearby Maryland and Virginia. The Bethlehem Steel case, supra, at l. c. 608, 618-19, adopted the United States as a whole, certain states separately, combinations of states and a quadrant of states, as separate effective areas of competition.

In the American Crystal Sugar case, supra, at l. c. 398, the Court pointed out that the applicable sections of the country comprising a ten state area and a three state area were "not mere legal abstractions but correspond to the commercial realities of the sugar industry." In International Shoe, supra, the Supreme Court distinguished between cities of over 10,000 population and cities of 6,000 or less.

In Transamerica Corp. v. Board of Governors, (3 CCA, 1953) [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,536], 206 F. 2d 163, 170, cert. den. 346 U. S. 901, the Court stated:

> "It necessarily follows that under Section 7, contrary to the rule under Section 3, the lessening of competition and the tendency to monopoly must appear from the circumstances of the particular case and be found as facts before the sanctions of the statute may be invoked."

[Economic Reality]

Thus, a review of the cases leads this Court to the conclusion that each case must stand upon its own facts as to the determination of the area or areas of effective competition. This area must be determined by economic reality and not necessarily by political boundaries or with mathematical precision. Neither can it be determined solely from testimony of economists.

The economist may give his review of trends and his prognosis of the future, yet, it also remains for the people in the business to tell us the actual effects, the practical results and where and whose competition they meet.

Let us review then, the evidence offered by the parties, both from their economists and from the people in the business.

[FINDING OF FACTS AS TO SECTION OF THE COUNTRY]

[Areas of Competition]

The evidence in this cause shows that shoe retailers primarily and generally sell shoes in the following categories: (1) men's, (2) women's, (3) women's and children's and (4) men's, women's and children's, or, the family type store.

Kinney is primarily a family type store and operates attractive places of business with prominent window displays and in good locations in cities of 10,000 or more population and usually in the corporate limits or its environs. Its merchandise is in the low or medium price range, is of excellent quality for the price and imitates the higher priced styles. Its store operations are aggressive and highly competitive.

Brown operates its retail outlets, primarily selling women's shoes through Wohl, men's shoes through Regal, and men's, women's and children's shoes through Wetherby-Kayser, Reilly and others and through the stores that operate under the Brown franchise arrangement. Their stores and leased departments are in cities of 10,000 or more inhabitants, are well located, attractive, sell low, medium and medium-high priced shoes. The brand names are well advertised and the stores are aggressively operated and competitive.

The area in which this Court sits was thoroughly gone into in the evidence. St. Louis is a city with defined geographical limits; surrounding it is St. Louis County, which is composed of numerous municipal corporations and a large unincorporated area. Across the river in the State of Illinois are other well defined corporate area and their surrounding territories. People from each and all of these areas work, shop and trade in their area and interchangeably.

Within the corporate limits of the City of St. Louis and within the corporate and unincorporated areas around St. Louis, are found many huge concentrated shopping areas. For instance, a large downtown department store will go out into an outlying area, put up a similar store and surround it with building facilities for merchants selling everything from drugs to clothing, to food, to knick-knacks and sundries. These areas cater to personal services such as barber shops and hair dressers, insurance offices, doctors and dentists and many have retail shoe stores. The downtown department store and the outlying department store have the same type of departmental operations, including shoes.

[Competition Between "Downtown" and "Outlying" Areas]

The evidence in this case as to the St. Louis area supports the conclusion, and it is a reasonable one, that shoe retailers—downtown, in corporate areas surrounding the downtown, in unincorporated areas surrounding the corporate areas, plus the shoe retailers in between and at the fringes—all are in competition with each other. For example, the worker downtown may buy his shoes during the noon hour while his wife buys her shoes and the children's shoes in the outlying shopping center; or, they may all wait and go to the shoe store together either in the outlying area or downtown. The discriminating buyer might not find the shoe he or she wants in the outlying area and will make a trip downtown to get it. The advertising, carried in the various media of the area, refers to a store and all of its branches in the entire area.

It is further apparent from this evidence that in this area price and quality are not necessarily synonymous factors. As heretofore pointed out in discussing "line of commerce", the buying public may have many reasons why they buy a particular shoe, at a particular price, either in consideration of quality or regardless of quality.

What is true in the evidence concerning the area in which this Court is located is likewise true to greater or lesser extent throughout the entire United States. The United States has seen a tremendous growth in and around large cities. This growth is more evident among cities containing populations of 10,000 and above. People have been moving to metropolitan areas. Industry has been expanding in metropolitan areas and people have moved in and around the places of their work. The mercantile business has expanded to the same areas where the population has increased. Everybody in the same business, in every area where there are lots of people, is in competition with the other fellow who is in the same business. This is true of the shoe retailers and shoe people have so testified.

The testimony in this case shows that Brown franchise dealers in downtown metropolitan areas are competing with Brown franchise dealers in the outlying areas. They are competing with other retailers in the same business. The same is true of Kinney; the same is true of Wohl; the same is true of Regal; the same is true as between Brown, Kinney, Wohl and Regal.

The evidence here shows that retailers of "men's", "women's", and "children's" shoes, whether sold separately or in combinations thereof, are actively, forcefully, competitively and actually vying with those handling a like line for the trade of the people in their cities and the immediate and contiguous surrounding area.

[Competition Between "Acquiring" and "Acquired" Companies]

The evidence here shows that more than 12 million pairs of Brown's shoes and 7 million pairs of Kinney's were sold in the same cities. There are at least 141 cities of over 10,000 population, in which there is located a Kinney retail store and there is also a Brown operated, Brown franchise or a Brown plan account outlet. These stores are all in competition with each other in those cities at the retail level in the sale of the "men's", "women's" and "children's" shoes handled and with every other shoe retailer therein located and so handling. These Brown stores have a varying share of the retail market therein, as do Kinney's stores; those percentages are substantial and if combined would become more substantial.

What then is the "section of the country" as it relates to shoes retailing and as it can be determined by this evidence? Is it the city limits? Is it the city and surrounding areas? Is it the standard metropolitan area?

CONCLUSION
SECTION OF THE COUNTRY
(Retailing)
[City and Surrounding Area]

The Court finds the foregoing to be the facts as supported by the evidence of this case and, it is the Court's conclusion therefrom that the areas of effective competition for retailing purposes cannot be fixed with mathematical precision or by political boundary. However, when determined by economic reality, for retailing, a "section of the country" is a city of 10,000 or more population and its immediate and contiguous surrounding area, regardless of name designation, and in which a Kinney store and a Brown (operated, franchise, or plan) store are located.[8]

In reaching this conclusion, the Court also finds the government has sustained its burden and adopts all findings of fact heretofore set forth in discussing the "History of Brown and Kinney", the "Line of Commerce" and such findings of fact as may hereafter be set forth.

Impact of the Merger
[Effect on Competition]

The third phase of a Section 7 case is the impact of the merger because the Act prohibits an acquisition in a line of commerce, in any section of the country, where the effect may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.[1]

(Review of the Cases)

In United States v. Bethlehem Steel, supra, at l. c. 603, it was stated:

> "The ultimate question under section 7 is whether an acquisition may substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly within the relevant market. The government is not required to establish with certitude that competition in fact will be substantially lessened. Its burden is met if it establishes a reasonable probability that the proposed merger will substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly. * * *
> "There may be a substantial lessening of competition or tendency to monopoly when a merger substantially increases concentration, eliminates a substantial factor in competition, eliminates a substantial source of supplies, or results in the establishment of relationships between buyers and sellers which deprive their rival of a fair opportunity to compete."

And at l. c. 606, the Court further stated:

> "The increased concentration which would result from the merger cannot be considered in a vacuum; it cannot be divorced from the history of mergers and acquisitions, which in large measure accounts for the existing high degree of concentration in the industry."

In United States v. du Pont [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,723], 353 U. S. 586, supra, at l. c. 592, the Supreme Court said:

ing of competition is clearly relevant in determining the existence of a tendency to monopolize. * * *' "

[Prior to 1950 Amendment]

Before the 1950 amendment the Act was held not to apply to vertical mergers and the courts were only confronted with horizontal mergers. In these, the trend was for big companies to acquire other big companies and the impact was either readily apparent or obviously imperceptible. When the amendment was under consideration, we find this reading in the Senate Report, supra, p. 5:

"As a large concern grows through a series of such small acquisitions, its accretions of power are individually so minute as to make it difficult to use the Sherman Act test against them * * *."

And in the same Report, p. 3:

"The figures presented * * * show that in the field of manufacturing above, the 25 largest corporations in 1948 owned 27 percent of the total assets of all manufacturing corporations, or a little more than average of 1 percent of the assets for each of the 25 corporations.

"The enactment of the bill will limit further growth of monopoly and thereby aid in preserving small business as an important competitive factor in the American economy."

["Minute Acquisitions"]

Certainly it is evident that Congress intended to encompass minute acquisitions which tend toward monopoly and to do so in their incipiency. Courts have recognized the necessity to act toward a violation as it begins, rather than wait until it has become fait accompli. See du Pont and Bethlehem Steel cases, supra.

[Test of Legality]

In a determination of these factors it becomes necessary to review, not only the practices of the companies involved, but also the trends in the industry. In the American Crystal Sugar case, supra, the Second Circuit held that the lower court correctly understood and applied the proper test of legality when it said:

"He stressed the necessity for consideration not merely of competition between the two companies, but also the competitive situation of the industry." Id. at 572.

When we review the cases and the Act as presently written, in the light of Congressional intent, it is concluded by this Court that the impact of the merger must be determined from factual situations of the companies involved and from trends in the industry. Likewise, we are not so much concerned with percentages, as such, but with what these percentages mean in examination under the light of the facts of the case and the economic realities involved.

[Percentages]

What difference can it make that Brown has only 5% of the shoe production and Kinney 0.5%, when Brown is the fourth largest firm in the United States and Kinney with only 1.2% of all retail shoe sales is the largest family shoe chain retailer? Their combination moves Brown to third place in the industry. Does it then make sense to say that this is imperceptible because the percentages are small? Or rather, doesn't it make sense to say, that regardless of percentages or size, the test is, what do the facts show as to the trends in the industry and the true economic impact of this particular merger, which takes place among an industry having a few large firms that control a sizeable segment of the total with the balance divided among hundreds of others having only minute segments.

It is upon this analysis that the Court shall review the impact of the merger.

[Findings of Facts as to Impact of Merger]

Trend in the Industry

[Manufacturers Obtaining Retail Outlets]

There is evidence in the record of a definite trend in the shoe industry of manufacturers of "men's", "women's" and "children's" shoes obtaining retail outlets that sell said shoes separately or in combinations thereof as heretofore defined. For example, International Shoe Company had no retail outlets in 1945, but by 1956 had acquired 130; General Shoe Company had 80 retail outlets in 1945 and 526 by 1956; Shoe Corporation of America, in the same period, went from 301 to 842; Melville Shoe Company from 536 to 947; and Endicott-Johnson from 488 to 540. And, as significant, or even more significant in this case, Brown, with no retail outlets in 1945 had acquired

845 such outlets by 1956.[9]

The evidence here shows that between 1950 and 1956, there were 9 independent shoe firms, operating 1,114 retail shoe stores, that became subsidiaries of large firms and ceased their independent operations. By 1956, the 6 largest firms owned and operated 3,997, or 18%, of the nation's 22,000 shoe stores and the 13 largest firms operated 4,736, or 21%, of them.[10]

[Limitation of Independent Manufacturers' Market]

The evidence here also shows a definite trend in the industry to the effect that once manufacturers acquire retail outlets they definitely increase the sale of their own manufactured product to these retail outlets. The parent company becomes a larger and larger supplier of its acquired retail outlets and the outlets' purchases from independent manufacturers definitely and consistently become less and less. Chain stores and company-dominated stores are drying up the available outlets for independent manufacturers. Thus, the effect of this vertical integration in the shoe industry has been to increase the number of outlets dominated by large manufacturers and to seriously limit the market to which independent manufacturers are able to sell.

The evidence here shows that there is also a definite trend in the industry toward the decrease of the number of plants manufacturing shoes. Of the companies representing 95% of the entire industry, the number of plants operated decreased from 1207 in 1950 to 1048 in 1956. Of the 1048 shoe manufacturing plants in 1956, about 20%, or 212, are owned and operated by 10 companies. Between 1950 and 1956, 7 companies independently operating 25 shoe manufacturing plants have become acquired by the 10 companies now operating 20% of all shoe manufacturing plants.

[Effect on Independent Retailers]

The testimony in this case further shows that independent retailers of shoes are having a harder and harder time in competing with company-owned and company-controlled retail outlets. National advertising by large concerns has increased their brand name acceptability and retail stores handling the brand named shoes have a definite advertising advantage. Company-owned and company-controlled retail stores have definite advantages in buying and credit; they have further advantages in advertising, insurance, inventory control and assists and price control. These advantages result in lower prices or in higher quality for the same price and the independent retailer can no longer compete in the low and medium-priced fields and has been driven to concentrate his business in the higher-priced, higher-quality type of shoes—and, the higher the price, the smaller the market. He has been placed in this position, not by choice, but by necessity.

Brown-Kinney a Part of Trend

[Nation's "Dominant" Shoe Firm]

The evidence here shows that Brown, its affiliates and Kinney are a definite part of this trend in the industry. In fact, Brown has been a moving factor in this trend. As stated earlier in this Opinion, the evidence shows that in 1955 Brown sold no shoes to Kinney, but by 1957 had become its largest single supplier of shoes. That Wohl's purchases from Brown increased from almost $3,000,000.00 to over $12,000,000.00 from 1950 to 1957. That Brown's sales to Wetherby-Kaiser increased from $28,000.00 to $138,000.00 during the time Brown was acquiring control and today Brown sells it 50% of all its requirements. That percentage-wise, Wohl's purchases from Brown

[9] And on May 1, 1958, the following retail outlets were in operation:

Brown Franchise Stores	647
Regal Outlets	92
Wohl Plan Accounts	208
Wohl Leased Departments (In 243 stores)	457
Total	1,404
Kinney	416
Combined Total	1,820

[10] There were over 70,000 stores selling shoes but the census department classifies a shoe store as one that has over 50% of its gross receipts entirely from the sale of shoes. The 22,000 figure is determined as retail shoe stores having such percentage of sales.

The six firms' percentages of nation's total retail shoe store operation for 1956:

Melville Shoe Co.	4.3%
Shoe Corp. of America	3.8
*Brown (not including franchise stores)	3.8
Endicott-Johnson	2.4
General Shoe	2.3
Edison (not a manufacturer)	1.3
Total	17.9%

International Shoe, the nation's largest shoe manufacturer (but one of the 13 largest firms above considered) had only 0.5% of the nation's total.

* If Brown and Kinney were combined, Brown's percentage would be 5.7% and would raise the above total to 19.8%.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

increased from 12.8% in 1950 to 33.6% in 1957, and Kinney's purchases from Brown increased from zero to 7.9% by 1957.

The evidence in this case further shows that one manufacturer who supplied Wohl with $1,230,527.00 worth of shoes in 1955, sold them less than $100,000.00 worth of shoes in 1958. Another manufacturer's sales to Wohl decreased from over $340,000.00 in 1950 to $68,970.00 in 1957. Other suppliers lost sales to Brown-controlled outlets in varying amounts and degrees.

The evidence here further shows that Brown, with the acquisition of Kinney, would have more retail outlets than any other manufacturer of shoes. That it would move from third to second in the industry in net sales.[11] That when considered from both the manufacturing and retail outlet standpoint, it would become the dominant shoe firm in the country.

Other Factual Findings

[Manufacturer-controlled Retail Outlets]

This Court finds from the evidence that while the acquisition of Kinney's manufacturing facilities might only slightly affect commerce on a nation-wide scale (5% to 5.5%), the greatest impact of the merger on manufacturing would be felt in the advantages of the company-controlled retail outlets. This impact is connected with manufacturing in that large manufacturers (including Brown) are acquiring retail outlets which purchase from them and smaller independent manufacturers are losing that market as the purchases increase. This substantially lessens competition between manufacturers and Brown has been, is, and is likely to continue to be, an ever growing part of this result.

[Tendency Toward Monopoly]

This Court further finds that the acquisition by Brown of Kinney's large and vast retail outlets (which results in the increase of the ultimate retail market sales of the combined products of their two manufacturing enterprises) would definitely increase the final consumption of their combined product with advantages being obtained that tend toward monopoly both in ultimate sales increase and through price or profit advantage. If, by advantages in buying, selling, insurance, assists in business planning and practices, advertising and credit arrangements, the percentage of the retail sales by the combined company-owned and company-controlled stores increases, so likewise their power to control price increases; so likewise does their power to sell more and more of their own shoes tend to create a monopoly.

[Merger Would Result in Prohibited Effects]

This Court further finds that the merger of Brown and Kinney would have a definite and substantial impact and effect upon shoe retailing of "men's," "women's" and "children's" shoes in every city of over 10,000 population and its immediate and contiguous surrounding area, and wherein a Brown and Kinney store is operated. This impact would be felt by other retail merchants in the same lines. This impact would result from buying and pricing advantages which would inure to Kinney by being a part of Brown and because of its already well solid position in the retail field. This impact would be felt in these areas by other manufacturers, especially the small independent manufacturer, in decreased outlets for his product. This impact would but add to the trend in the industry and to the past practices by Brown. The effect would be to substantially lessen competition and it definitely tends to create a monopoly in these areas.

[Domination of Mass Market]

The Court further finds from the evidence that due to the nature of the shoe industry, no one manufacturer, no one retailer, no one manufacturer-retailer combined, has a large percentage of the market, wholesale or retail. Yet, a small group of firms control a sizeable segment of the market.[12] These firms definitely set the price and style trends. These firms are better able to meet the style trends and finance the change over. These firms are better able to acquire company-owned stores and thus acquire ready-made markets for their production. These firms are better able to meet the changing conditions of the retail markets

[11] Of the top 12 firms in the nation in 1956 (considering Brown and Kinney combined) 6 had less than 91.1 million dollar sales each, per year. The 6 largest ranged from 126.1 to 266.8 million each, per year. The smallest of these 12 had 16.4 million whereas Brown and Kinney combined would have had 219.1 million.

[12] See ft. nt. 5, 10, and text paragraphs supported thereby.

and to dominate the mass market in the low and medium priced fields.

["Acquiring" Company as Supplier of "Acquired" Company]

This Court further finds that Kinney sold 6.4 million pairs of shoes in 1955, which it purchased from outside sources. This exceeds the production of any one manufacturer below the top six. As Brown continues to supply more and more shoes to Kinney and as Kinney converts more and more of its manufactured product to Brown affiliates, the effect on competition is already evident and the possibility is apparent.

This Court further finds that with Brown as a supplier and the advantages resulting therefrom, Kinney becomes a more dominant factor in each retail market in which it operates a store. It is eliminated as a competitive factor as against Brown and as independent retailers are forced to other lines or from the market, the tendency toward monopoly is already in effect and the further possibility is apparent.

[Elimination of Independents]

This Court further finds that as the Brown-Kinney experience is weighed in the same scale with what is happening in the industry in the large manufacturer-retail outlet acquisitions, the trend is toward the eventual elimination of small manufacturers and independent retailers.

(Conclusion)

[Effect on Buying Public]

Whether the customer—the buying public—would or would not benefit may be highly speculative. It is self-evident, however, that Congress has recognized that the final result of increased power can and will result to the detriment of the public.

We can only eat an apple a bite at a time. The end result of consumption is the same whether it be done by quarters, halves, three-quarters, or the whole, and is finally determined by our own appetites. A nibbler can soon consume the whole with a bite here and a bite there. So, whether we nibble delicately, or gobble ravenously, the end result is, or can be, the same.

[Increasing Percentage of Market]

If manufacturers, such as Brown, sell at wholesale in the area of effective competition, their product (through all types of outlets) must of necessity reach the retail market of that area. Their company-owned and controlled retail stores have a percentage of that market and a combination of their businesses increases that percentage. Such increase, regardless of percentage amount, gives them power. Such power not only tends to create a monopoly, but substantially lessens competition by eliminating the effectiveness of the independent retailer and the smaller manufacturer.

[Motives]

Regardless of our economic or other philosophy; regardless of our ideas or thoughts about how good or how bad "bigness" or "control" may be; regardless of how necessary it may be for the smaller to grow bigger and the bigger to better compete with the biggest;[13] regardless of all of these—the Congress has, down through the years, definitely tightened the screws upon acquisitions in the effort to prevent mergers and acquisitions where, as now ultimately defined, competition is substantially lessened, tendency toward monopoly is created, either or both.

[Increased "Concentration" in Industry]

It is this Court's conclusion that the merger of Brown and Kinney would increase concentration in the shoe industry, both in manufacturing and retailing. The fourth manufacturer would become the third; the top four companies would control 23% of the production market and Kinney and Brown would have one-fifth of that; the two would become the largest operator of retail shoe stores in the nation; and Kinney becomes a smaller market for other manufacturers.

[13] One of defendants contentions was its necessity to compete with other larger companies. Their motives are not a determining factor, however, for in U. S. v. du Pont [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,723], 353 U. S. 586, 607, the court stated:

"Similarly, the fact that all concerned in high executive posts in both companies acted honorably and fairly, each in the honest conviction that his actions were in the best interests of his own company and without design to overreach anyone, including du Pont's competitors, does not defeat the Government's right to relief. It is not requisite to proof of a violation of § 7 to show that restraint or monopoly was intended." See also Bethlehem Steel, supra, at 1. c. 617.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Elimination of "Substantial Competitive Factor"]

It is this Court's conclusion that the merger would eliminate Kinney as a substantial competitive factor to Brown in the shoe retailing field. The most aggressive retail chain in the nation, now a potent competitor of Brown, would become but another adoptive child of an already big family.

[Manufacturer-Retailer Relationship]

It is this Court's conclusion that the merger would establish a manufacturer-retailer relationship which deprives all but the top firms in the industry of a fair opportunity to compete. Kinney's already powerful position in the retail field is made more powerful by the proposed affinity with Brown. Other manufacturers have already suffered; other retailers have felt the effect; the reasonable probability is the further substantial lessening of competition and the increased tendency toward monopoly.

Holding

[Reasonable Probability of Violation]

From all the facts heretofore found, from all the evidence herein and all reasonable inferences therefrom, this Court finds, concludes and holds that there is a violation of Section 7 (15 U. S. C. § 18) since, in fact and in reasonable probability, it is established:

(1) That while the acquisition of the manufacturing facilities of Kinney by Brown, would but slightly lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly when considered alone, the combination of the manufacturing-retailing facilities of Brown and Kinney would substantially lessen competition and tend to create a monopoly in the manufacturing of "men's," "women's" and "children's" shoes, considered separately, throughout the United States as a whole.

(2) That the acquisition of Kinney by Brown would substantially lessen competition and tend to create a monopoly in manufacturing-retailing and in retailing alone, in "men's," "women's" and "children's" shoes, considered separately, in every city of 10,000 or more population and its immediate and contiguous surrounding area, regardless of name designation, and in which a Kinney store and a Brown (operated, franchise or plan) store are located.

(3) That the government has sustained the burden of proof required therefor and the Court shall enter judgment requiring defendant Brown to relinquish and dispose of the acquired stock of defendant Kinney and thereafter enjoining Brown and Kinney, their agents, servants, officers and employees from acquiring any interest in the stock or assets of the other defendant.

Further Holding

[Disposition of Stock—Further Hearing]

There is one further aspect of this case which the Court should reserve for further consideration. The temporary order of Judge Hulen[4] allowed the acquisition to continue under certain restrictions and requirements. If this judgment should become final in its present form, the defendant Brown would be confronted with the necessity of the disposition of the stock of Kinney. This could have far-reaching effects and consequences.

In United States v. du Pont, supra, the Supreme Court, in overruling the trial court's decision, ordered that the district court conduct a > ". . . further hearing of the equitable relief necessary and appropriate in the public interest to eliminate the effects of the acquisition offensive to the statute. The district courts, in the framing of equitable decrees, are clothed 'with large discretion to model their judgments to fit the exigencies of the particular case'. (citation omitted)" Id. 607-608.

It is this Court's conclusion that should this judgment become final, this Court should hear any evidence which the defendants might wish to offer touching the effects of the disposition of the stock and suitable manner in handling same. The government should be given an opportunity to express opposition or suggestion therein.

Therefore, the judgment to be entered will provide for such further hearing, rulings and final order.

[¶ 69,533] General Gas Corporation v. National Utilities of Gainesville, Inc.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. No. 18002. Dated November 16, 1959.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia. BOYD SLOAN, District Judge.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Practices Constituting Discrimination Under Clayton Act, Section 2(a)—Local Price Cutting—Public Interest—Effect on Competition.—In an action charging an interstate seller of liquefied petroleum gas with lowering its price in a local area, while maintaining its prices elsewhere, in order to drive a local competitor out of business in violation of Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act, a preliminary injunction ordering the interstate seller to maintain what the trial court considered the prior general price was vacated. The reviewing court held that the proof did not establish facts essential to the granting of the order in its present form in that (1) the prior general price was less than that found by the trial court, since other competitors were charging lower prices and the plaintiff, while charging the same price, was granting free services, (2) the proof of irreparable damage to the plaintiff was "weak" at best, (3) it was in the best interest of the public to have the benefit of every legal price cut, and (4) since the plaintiff was contending for what it claimed was the prior recognized status, whatever injunctive relief was given should be equally binding on it. However, a temporary injunction would be proper if the parties were required to compete on an even basis, and the competitive basis was made realistic as to the remaining competitors.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3505.840, 3506.250, 3506.440, 3506.500, 3506.620, 3508.545, 3515.500.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Injunctive Relief for Violations of Antitrust Laws—Price Discrimination—Pretrial Procedures—Preliminary Injunction.—A preliminary injunction ordering an interstate seller of liquefied petroleum gas to abandon a price cut in a single area and restore a "general" price was vacated. The reviewing court found that the proof did not establish facts essential to the granting of the order in its existing form. While the court could not fashion a new order because the plaintiff might not want the order in the new form, and because the trial court should have the freedom to add any other terms it might wish to add, the court did remand the case with two suggested modifications: (1) reduce the level of prices in the area to more nearly approximate what the reviewing court felt was the prior general level, and (2) bind both parties by the equitable relief, since the prior order might have placed plaintiff in a preferred position. It was also held that, on appeal from such a preliminary injunction, the sole issue before the court was whether the trial court had abused its discretion; the merits of the controversy were left open for further consideration and future determination.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9024.70, 9026.15, 9027.15.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Injunctive Relief from Violations of Antitrust Laws—Price Discrimination—Necessary Averments—Irreparable Injury—Destruction of Business.—A trial court's finding that a local seller of liquefied petroleum gas would be irreparably injured (put out of business) by an interstate seller's price cutting in a local area while maintaining its regular price in other areas, which supported a temporary injunction prohibiting the interstate seller from this practice, was found to be weak at best. The reviewing court, noting that the period of delay pending trial was only some nine months, and that other competitors testified that they could compete at a figure closely approximating the interstate seller's price, vacated the injunction and remanded the case.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9022.05, 9022.50.

Vacating an order of the U. S. District Court, Northern District of Georgia, 1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,447.

Before HUTCHESON, TUTTLE and WISDOM, Circuit Judges.

[Price Discrimination—Appeal from Preliminary Injunction]

TUTTLE, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This is an appeal from the grant by the trial court of a preliminary injunction which, in effect, required the appellant to abandon a deep price cut in the sale of its products and to restore a general price which the court found to have been previously prevailing.

Although we do not on this appeal undertake to resolve the legal questions that must ultimately be disposed of if the plaintiff below is to be entitled to recover under Section 2 of the Sherman Act as amended, or under the provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act,[1] it is necessary to consider the appellee's theory of recovery in order to test the appellant's contention that no prima facie case was made out to warrant the issuing of a temporary injunction.

[Local Price Cutting]

The gist of National's action is that it, as a local company, is engaged in the business of selling liquefied petroleum gas in competition with General in all or parts of thirteen counties in Georgia; that prior to June, 1959, there was an established prevailing price for the sale of such gas of 20¢ less 2¢ a gallon discount for cash or prompt payment to domestic customers and 18¢ less two cents to commercial customers; that during the month of June, General cut the prices to 15.5¢ less two cents to all customers; that such cut was not made in other trade areas in Georgia, but that it was made in National's trade area for the purpose and with the intent to injure, destroy or prevent competition by National; that the introduction of such price, alleged to be so low as to make it impossible for either competitor to make a profit, has the effect to, and tends to, substantially lessen competition and create a monopoly.

The hearing on motion for preliminary injunction was on affidavit only. No oral testimony was heard by the trial court. The court made findings of fact to the effect that since 1954 there was a prevailing price of 20¢ less two cents for 10 days payment, and 18¢ less two cents for domestic and commercial customers, respectively, in the trade area; that the plaintiff provided certain free service to customers that was worth one cent a gallon on the price of gas; General did not provide such free service; that there were some twelve other competitors of the two parties; that National's sales had increased during the years immediately preceding the filing of this action and that such sales were at the average price of 18.17¢ per gallon; that National had approximately 1500 customers and 20 percent of the business, and General had an estimated 1800 customers and approximately 25 percent of the business. It was proved that General's sales had declined during the months immediately preceding the filing of the new prices by it. The court found that prior to the month of June, 1959,

> "there has been, both on the part of the plaintiff and defendant, price cutting in vying for the business of individual customers, but there had not been until the action of the defendant here complained of, an overall price reduction to all customers within the competitive area; that General continued to sell the gas in adjacent areas at 18¢ net and that if National reduced its price to 13.5¢ a gallon net to meet the net price of appellant it could not operate at a profit but would be losing money."

Although recognizing the undoubted correctness of the principle that price cutting for the purpose of getting a competitor's business is not per se illegal, Schine Theatres v. United States [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,245], 334 U. S. 110, 120, the court seems to have decided that such act here "tends to eliminate plaintiff as a competitor" and it was therefore illegal. The court entered an order enjoining the appellant from continuing in effect the price cuts of June, 1959, and from "maintaining a general sales price in said counties . . . of less than 18¢ [net] per gallon" for domestic consumption or less than 16¢ net for commercial consumption. It provided that it should have no > "effect on customer sales that have been negotiated in the past, as a business practice, on a bid basis or a customer basis, nor shall it prevent such competition in the future."

The court required the appellee to make a bond for $5,000 for the protection of the appellant. The injunction was to be in effect until the further order of the court. The case is expected to be ready for trial on the merits in April, 1960. Both parties agree that the intervening months are the months of largest sales in this seasonal business.

[Grounds for Appeal]

Appellant first filed a petition with this court seeking an order staying the injunction, but, without passing on that petition, we set the appeal down for an early hearing on the merits. Appellant urges that there was a complete failure of proof of such purpose, intent, or tendency to monopolize as is contemplated in the applicable statutes. Moreover, it contends there is a complete absence of proof of threat of irreparable loss to the plaintiff if the injunction had been denied.

We recognize the salutary principle that where the facts are sharply in dispute on preliminary hearing, the trial court should go extremely slow in entering an order that, by its very nature, may seriously interfere with the course of competition. This is particularly so when all the proof, pro and con, is by affidavit and the trial court is unable to sift out, either by hearing the witnesses testify or by the parties' cross-examination, what is true and what is false. General Electric Co. v. American Wholesale Co., 7 Cir. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,501], 235 F. 2d 606. Moreover, the record here contains several weaknesses of proof as to points which were essential to the establishment by plaintiff of its prima facie case.

I. The Previous Non-Contested Prevailing Prices

The court found that the previous price prevailing in the retail trade area was 20¢ less two cents, and 18¢ less two cents. The affirmative proof offered by plaintiff included an affidavit by one competitor which stated that the entire trade area in which it, the Ritchie Gas Company, Inc., operated five counties, the prevailing price was 17¢ net. Another affidavit introduced by plaintiff showed that gas was sold at a regular 17¢ price in Forsyth County during 1957, 1958, by another competitor, L. & L. Gas Company, and that a reduction to 15¢ had been put into effect during the summer months of the year preceding the June reductions of defendant here complained of. One affidavit shows that another competitor, Southland Butane, Inc., sold at the regular price of 17¢ net during 1957-1958 in four of the counties in the trade area. Another affidavit offered by the plaintiff averred that the regular price of Woodstock Gas & Coal Company in Forsyth County was 17¢ less one cent if paid in 30 days, or 16¢ net. It is not stated that appellant was in any way responsible for this price. E. S. Gilmer, president of Tugalo Gas Company, which competed in three counties with both National and General, said "the prevailing price for L. P. gas in our trade area has been 17¢ net to any consumer. The price has prevailed for the last three years." There was evidence introduced by appellant, which is not denied by appellee, that the price set by it in June, 1959, was not lower than prices offered by at least one of its competitors when the one cent differential for free service was considered. Looking only at the plaintiff's proof as to the existence of a prevailing non-controversial price prior to the June reduction, and the court's finding of the existence of a one cent price differential between plaintiff and defendant, it is clear that the finding that

> "Since 1954 the price of liquefied petroleum gas in the area served by National has been 20¢ per gallon with a two cent per gallon discount if paid within 10 days from delivery, leaving a net price of 18¢ per gallon for domestic consumers" is without factual basis to support it. So long as there were competitors in the field offering a net price of 17¢ [2] which the Ritchie and other affidavits offered by the plaintiff averred, it cannot be said that, within the context here intended, the price was 20¢

[2] Analysis of the plaintiff's affidavits shows that in nine out of the thirteen counties a regular price of 17¢ net was being maintained by at least one dealer a substantial part of the time after 1954.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

less two cents. Moreover, in making such finding the court did not give effect to its other finding that, as applied to the dispute between the two parties of this litigation the price offered by National included services worth one cent per gallon.

On the record before us it clearly was not permissible for the court to require that the defendant reinstate a price of 20¢ less two cents for cash or prompt payment.

II. Irreparable Damage

The appellee's proof of irreparable damage was in the nature of proof of its current profits at the current yield of 18.44 cents on the average for 1958 sales. It proved a net profit of $19,741.10 before taxes, and showed that a cut of each cent in the amount received for the same number of gallons would result in annual profit reduction of $13,248. There was proof by affidavits of the officers of the plaintiff that National Utilities of Gainesville is unable to compete with General Gas Corporation at a retail market of 13½¢ per gallon and 13¢ per gallon;

> "our break even point is about 16¢ per gallon net, General Gas Corporation's price discrimination by cutting liquified petroleum gas to 15¢ per gallon, 14¢ per gallon, 13½¢ per gallon and 13¢ per gallon [the cut complained of was to 15½¢ less 2 cents for 10 days payment] will completely eliminate us as a competitor . . ."

Proof by a certified public accountant stated:

> "A reduction in the price of L. P. gas to 123½¢ per gallon would result in our immediate irreparable loss to National Utilities of Gainesville, Inc., and would force the corporation out of business." (Emphasis added.)

However, and most significantly, it must be noted that National Utilities offered proof by its other competitors, who asserted that they could compete on the basis of a price of 15¢. Gene Latham, president of L. & L. Gas Company, operating in five counties, including one in this trade area, furnished an affidavit for the plaintiff below in which he said, "L. & L. Gas Company cannot operate its business at a price less than approximately 15¢ per gallon . . ." D. J. Whitmire, treasurer of Southland Butane, Inc., a competitor in 4 counties, said: "Southland Butane, Inc. cannot operate its business at a price less than approximately 15¢ per gallon . . ." J. Hoyt Crow, vice-president and general manager of Woodstock Gas & Coal Company, which competes with both the parties to this litigation in Forsyth County, said: "My company cannot compete with General Gas Corporation at such cut prices [allegedly 13¢]. We cannot make money and stay in business at less than 15¢ per gallon."

To look briefly at the other side, we find proof offered by General[3] that it can and did, during the months of June and July make a profit from the sales at 17¢ less two cents and 15½¢ less two cents; that "not more than forty percent of the customers will avail themselves of the two cents discount for payment within ten days"; that specifically, during the month of July, 1959, when appellant had in effect a price of fifteen and one-half cents, less two cents, its sales price averaged 14.79¢ per gallon. This estimate of the percent of purchasers who would take advantage of the two cents cash discount is not controverted. It would seem, therefore, that the net average price per gallon with which National would have to compete is approximately 14¾¢. Three of plaintiff's witnesses testified they could compete at approximately 15¢ and one that it was "unable to meet General Gas Corporation's price cutting below 14¢ per gallon net."

In view of the fact that the period of delay pending trial was some nine months, and, if plaintiff sought to meet the quoted price, it might receive 14¾¢ net on the average, and in light of the testimony of the other competitors who could compete at a figure closely approximating this price, it appears that the proof of irreparable damage to the plaintiff was weak at best.

III. The Public Interest

In this price war, as is true in most such competitive conflicts, there is, of course, one party, the public, that benefits, at least temporarily. The public loses in the long run if the result of such a conflict eliminates the weaker competitor, leaving only one or two who monopolize the field. Any gain from temporarily lowered prices can then quickly be wiped out by a price increase that can be instituted by the sole winner. In the temporary injunction entered here, however, we think the right of the public to have the benefit of every legal price cut was inadvertently overlooked by the trial court. It appears without dispute that in nine counties out of the thirteen (these nine include some of the most populous) this product was selling at 17¢ net, and according to the contention of the appellant as to the service practice of its competitors (which the court found to be true as to plaintiff), possibly at the equivalent of 16¢. We think that the maintenance of a price of 20¢ less two cents for cash by court order is, on the record before us, unfair to the public whose interests it is the primary function of the antitrust acts to protect.

[3] This proof was tendered in this court on General's motion for stay of the injunction. It therefore was not before the trial court.

IV. Competitive Position of Appellee

The trial court expressly found that the plaintiff, as well as other competitors of appellant, made price cuts from time to time on an individual basis. The Court said:

> "It appears from the record here that in the struggle for business there has been, both on the part of plaintiff and defendant, price cutting in vying for the business of individual consumers, but there had not been until the action of the defendant here complained of, an overall price reduction to all consumers within the competitive area."

In its injunction requiring the defendant to reestablish its general price structure of 20¢ less two cents, the court made the further provision:

> "The injunction granted herein has no effect on customer sales that have been negotiated in the past, as a business practice, on a bid basis or a customer basis, nor shall it prevent such competition in the future."

Appellant contends that this order leaves the plaintiff below and the twelve other competitors free to sell at any price they see fit but prevents it from competing even on a customer to customer basis except to the extent that it can meet a price quoted to an individual customer by plaintiff or the other competitors.

On oral argument in this court appellee's counsel stated that appellee was doing nothing that was forbidden to the defendant. We think that since appellee is here contending for what it claims was a recognized status prior to June 1959, and in light of counsel's apparent acquiescence, whatever injunctive relief is granted to it should be equally binding on it.

The gist of the trial court's decision, as stated in its conclusion, is:

> "It appears from the evidence here that competitors of the defendant corporation were cutting their prices from time to time on a customer basis and, while defendant contends that its broad price cuts in the Athens and Gainesville areas were good faith reductions to meet the equally low price of a competitor, it seems clear that there is this situation: The competitors of General were struggling for business and cutting prices on a customer basis and defendant, General, becoming tired of the struggle customer by customer, declared war with a drastic price reduction over the area in which plaintiff competes."

If it is ultimately proved that in making this price reduction over the whole area the appellant did no more than meet the lowest price of competitors in major parts of the trade area, we think there is considerable doubt whether this would afford a proper basis for granting either injunction or damages. We do not, however, decide this on this appeal, for as we said in Mansfield Hardwood Lumber Co. v. Johnson, 5 Cir., 242 F. 2d 45, we regard as correct and controlling here what was said in Mytinger & Casselberry, Inc. v. Newman, 7 Cir., 215 F. 2d 382:

> "On appeal from a decree from a preliminary injunction the sole issue before the court was whether district court abused its discretion, and the merits and the controversy would be left open for further consideration and future determination."

Applying this principle to this appeal, in light of the contested legal issues and the showing that, if resolved in favor of the plaintiff, it might be seriously damaged by the loss of customers if it did not compete on a basis that would cause financial loss which would be difficult if not impossible to measure, we cannot say that the granting of a temporary injunction was beyond the court's power. So long as the plaintiff and defendant would be required to compete on an even basis the temporary injunction would not seriously injure the appellant if the competitive basis fixed in the injunction is made realistic as to the remaining competitors in the trade area.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

We conclude that if the trial court should see fit to modify the temporary injunction so as to prohibit both the defendant and the plaintiff from selling or offering to sell to any domestic customer, except under existing unexpired contracts, for less than 18¢ with a two cent discount for cash within 10 days, and to commercial customers, defined as the court defined them in its findings of fact, for less than 16¢ less two cents, sufficient protection would be afforded to both parties without depriving the public of the benefits of a somewhat lower price than that prescribed in the order appealed from.

In suggesting such an order we do not, any more than did the trial court, resolve any of the issues, either legal or factual. These will then properly be determined on a full trial of the case.

We hold that in respect of the price of 20¢ less two cents for prompt payment, and 18¢ less two cents, the record did not support the court's findings. Moreover, we think that as to prices of 18¢ less two cents, and 16¢ less two cents, which we here suggest, the record would not support a holding that such general price, even if later found to be improper, would work any irreparable damage to the plaintiff.

This court cannot fashion such injunctive order, for it is not certain that the plaintiff would desire one in such a modified form. Moreover, the trial court should consider the other terms of any order it may see fit to enter. It is therefore necessary that the present order be set aside in order that the trial court may have a free hand within the limits of what we have said in this opinion and the prayers of the moving party to enter such order as it may consider right.

The injunction appealed from is vacated and the case Remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. Costs of this appeal will be divided equally between the parties. Because of the seasonal nature of the business of both parties and the emergency of the appeal, it is Ordered that the mandate shall be issued forthwith.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, Southern Division. No. 28475-Cr. Filed October 8, 1959.

Case No. 1451 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Corporations Dissolved Before or After Return of Indictment.—A California corporation indicted for a Sherman Act violation after dissolution, and another corporation indicted after taking steps towards dissolution were not entitled to a dismissal of the action. They were corporations existing under or authorized by the laws of a state within the meaning of Section 8 of the Sherman Act. The California statute provides that the existence of a dissolved corporation continues for the purpose of prosecuting or defending "actions." The word "actions" applies to both civil and criminal actions. Even assuming that it was the legislative intent that "actions" referred only to civil actions, that narrow interpretation could apply only to state actions, since a state could not immunize its corporations against federal criminal prosecution. Thus, regardless of how the state may construe it, that statutory provision sufficiently continued the existence of the corporations for the purposes of the Sherman Act.

Opinion

[Motions to Dismiss Indictment]

JAMES M. CARTER, District Judge [In full text]: Motions to dismiss an indictment, filed on behalf of two defendants raise generally the question as to the effect of the dissolution of a corporation upon a subsequent criminal prosecution.

In September 1958 a federal grand jury sitting in this district commenced an investigation which culminated in an indictment on June 5, 1959, charging thirteen corporations, engaged in the retail sale of groceries, and a trade association with conspiring to restrain trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. 1). Two of the defendants, both incorporated under the laws of the State of California, have filed motions to dismiss the indictment for reasons set out below.

[Dissolution of Defendants]

The motion of Will-Free Inc., is supported by an affidavit of its former president, Mr. Foster Willett. In February 1959, and while he was the sole owner and president of Will-Free Inc., the board of directors voted to dissolve. In March, Will-Free Inc., transferred its grocery assets to Food King, Inc., which Mr. Willett also owned. In payment for these assets, Food King gave to Will-Free a promissory note for $5700.00. Thereafter, Will-Free Inc., made a final distribution of its assets, consisting principally of the note, to Mr. Willett, its sole stockholder, and in May 1959 completed its formal dissolution under the laws of the State of California. The records show that a subpoena duces tecum was served on Will-Free Inc., in September 1958, and that Mr. Willett was a witness before the grand jury. Presumably he was aware before the dissolution of Will-Free Inc., of the investigation which resulted in the indictment.

The motion of Linferg Super Market, Inc., and its supporting affidavit recite that its assets were purchased in March 1959 by Mayfair Markets (also a defendant in this case), and that thereafter Linferg Super Market, Inc., filed a formal certificate of election to dissolve with the Secretary of State, as a step toward dissolving under the laws of the State of California. Linferg Super Market, Inc., was not dissolved on June 5, 1959, the date of the return of the indictment, and consequently was a corporation existing under the laws of the State of California on that date.

[Effect of Dissolution]

The precise question presented by these motions is whether a criminal prosecution for violation of the antitrust laws can be maintained against Will-Free Inc., which had dissolved before it was indicted, and against Linferg Super Market Inc., which had taken steps toward dissolving, but had not completed its dissolution at the time it was indicted. It seems clear that such prosecutions can be maintained.

["Existence" Under State Law]

Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides penalties for any "person" violating its provisions, and Section 8 of the same act[1] defines a "person" as including "corporations . . . existing under or authorized by . . . the laws of any State . . .". This inquiry then turns on the question whether the movants are corporations "existing" under the laws of the State of California so far as Sections 1 and 8 of the Sherman Act are concerned.

The motion of Will-Free Inc., will be discussed first. If it has sufficient "existence" under the California law, despite its dissolution, to meet the requirements of Section 8 of the Sherman Act, Linferg Super Market, Inc., which is not dissolved, must surely possess such "existence".

[Defense of "Actions"]

The pertinent sections of the California law are found in Sections 5400 and 5401[2] of the Corporations Code of the State of

[1] Sherman Act, Section 8 [26 Stat. 210; 15 U. S. C. § 7.] The word "person," or "persons," wherever used in this act, shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States, the laws of any of the Territories, and laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country.

[2] § 5400. Continued existence of dissolved corporations: Purposes for continued existence. A corporation which is dissolved by the expiration of its term of existence, by forfeiture of existence by order of court, or otherwise, nevertheless continues to exist for the purpose of winding up its affairs, prosecuting and defending actions by or against it, and enabling it to collect and discharge obligations, dispose of and convey its property, and collect and divide its assets, but not for the purpose of continuing

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

California of 1947. Section 5400 provides in part that after its dissolution, a corporation "nevertheless continues to exist for the purpose of . . . prosecuting and defending actions by or against it . . .". [Emphasis supplied.]

Counsel for the defendants urge that this court should follow United States v. Safeway Stores, Inc. [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,208], 140 F. 2d 834 (C. A. 10, 1944). In that case the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit had to consider whether Section 399 of the Civil Code of California 1941, which is substantially the same as Sections 5400 and 5401 of the Corporations Code of 1947, continued the existence of three subsidiaries of Safeway Markets, Inc., which were dissolved under California law before being indicted for violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. The court reached the conclusion that Section 399, by specifying that the existence of a dissolved corporation continued for the purpose of defending "actions", referred only to civil and not to criminal actions. On this reasoning the court dismissed the indictment.[3]

This decision by the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit is not binding on this court, which believes that the word "action" should not be construed to apply only to civil cases. No California case or statute is cited by the Court of Appeals to support its reasoning. To the contrary, the statutes of the State of California clearly established that the word "action" is used to include criminal as well as civil prosecutions.[4]

Compare United States v. Auerbach et al., 68 F. Supp. 776, 780 (S. D. C. D. Calif. 1946), where the court states:

> "At common law, an equity case was referred to as a 'suit' in equity, and a law case was referred to as an 'action' at law."

[State Construction]

Assuming arguendo, that it was the intent of the legislators of the State of California in enacting Section 5400 to continue the existence of a corporation, after its dissolution, only for the purpose of prosecuting and defending civil actions, as is urged by defense counsel, this limitation would apply only with reference to preventing criminal prosecution under State law and would not preclude prosecutions under the Sherman Act. This identical question was discussed by the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in Alamo Fence Company of Houston v. United States, 240 F. 2d 179 (C. A. 5, 1957), where the argument was made, that a Texas statute continued the existence of a dissolved corporation only for the purpose of civil action. The court in that case wrote at 183:

> ". . . We have no doubt that a state can no more continue the existence of one of its corporations and at the same time immunize it against federal criminal prosecution, than it could have created the corporation in the first instance with such immunity." [Citing for comparison Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 197, 333 and Barnes Coal Corp. v. Retail Coal Merchants Ass'n, 4th Circuit, 128 F. 2d 645, 648.]

The recent case of Melrose Distillers, Inc., et al. v. United States, (1959) [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,335], 79 S. Ct. 763, appears to be controlling on this point. There the Supreme Court had to consider whether the laws of the States of Delaware and of Maryland continued the existence of corporations dissolved under these laws to such an extent as to permit the maintenance of an indictbusiness except so far as necessary for the winding up thereof.

§ 5401. Abatement of actions. No action or proceeding to which a corporation is a party abates by the dissolution of the corporation or by reason of proceedings for dissolution and winding up thereof.

[3] The major part of the reasoning of the court in the Safeway case seemed to have been based upon the analogy between the dissolution of a corporation and the death of a natural person which causes an abatement of actions against the natural person. (United States v. Safeway Stores, Inc., supra, at 836). In a case arising in this circuit, the Supreme Court pointed out: "The parallel has not been the subject of universal admiration . . . and is by no means exact . . .". (Defense Supplies Corporation v. Lawrence Warehouse Co., (1949) 336 U. S. 631 at 634, 69 S. Ct. 762.

[4] California Code of Civil Procedure:

§ 22. ["Action" defined.] An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the declaration, enforcement, or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense.

§ 23. Special proceeding defined. Every other remedy is a special proceeding.

§ 24. Division of actions. Actions are of two kinds:

1. Civil; and
2. Criminal.

Penal Code of California, 1949:

§ 683. Criminal action defined. The proceeding by which a party charged with a public offense is accused and brought to trial and punishment, is known as a criminal action.

ment charging a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. With certain differences of language unimportant here, the statutes of each State provided "proceedings" could be continued against a corporation after its dissolution. The defendants there urged that in each instance "proceeding" was limited to civil actions, and the corporations could not be prosecuted under the Sherman Act. The Supreme Court stated at p. 765:

> "We have found no Maryland decisions interpreting these sections [the Maryland statutes]; but we are satisfied that the term 'proceeding', no matter how the state court may construe it, implies enough vitality to make the corporation an 'existing' enterprise for the purposes of Section 8, of the Sherman Act . . . We conclude that irrespective of how the Delaware statute may be construed by the Delaware courts, it sufficiently continued the existence of this corporation for the purpose of Section 8 of the Sherman Act." [Emphasis supplied]

As to corporate existence, generally "state law controls in determining what state law has created," E. & J. Gallo Winery v. C. I. R. (9 Cir. 1955) 227 F. 2d 699, 704-5, but if the laws of a State continue a corporation in existence for the purpose of defending "proceedings," regardless of how narrowly State courts may interpret this word, we are satisfied that the "existence" which is continued is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of Sections 1 and 8 of the Sherman Act.

[Motions Denied]

The motions of Will-Free Inc., and Linferg Super Market Inc., are denied.

Federal Trade Commission and Robinson-Patman Acts

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Access to Documentary Evidence—Subpoena Duces Tecum—Scope and Validity—Relationship to Robinson-Patman Act.—In connection with an investigation into certain practices of a food producing company to determine whether such practices were violative of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act and Sections 2(a) and 2(d) of the Clayton Act, the court enforced a subpoena duces tecum for the production of certain documentary evidence on the grounds that (1) the subpoena would not be burdensome, since the Commission agreed to observe certain protective restraints, (2) the Commission had the power to precede their complaints by an investigation to determine whether there was "reason to believe" acts had been committed in violation of the law, and (3) the investigation was not a guise for an attempt to enforce Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act. The Commission may declare conduct to be an "unfair" practice or "method of competition" although that conduct might constitute sales at "unreasonably low prices" within the meaning of that section.

Opinion

[Enforcement of Subpoena]

Leon R. Yankwich, District Judge [In full text]: The Federal Trade Commission,[1] petitioner herein, to be referred to as "The Commission," has been investigating certain practices in interstate commerce of the respondent, Hunt Foods and Industries, Inc., to be referred to as "Hunt," a California corporation with offices at Fullerton, Orange County, California, within this district, and engaged in interstate commerce. The object of the investigation is to determine whether Hunt or its predecessors,

> "in connection with the offering for sale, sale and distribution of processed tomato products, by selling such products at unreasonably low prices with the purpose or intent of eliminating competition, have violated Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, or by selling such products to different customers at discriminatory prices and by affording customers payments or compensations for facilities or services rendered in connection with the sale of such products not afforded competing purchasers on proportionally equal terms, have violated Section 2(a) and 2(d) of the Clayton Act."

[Subpoena Duces Tecum]

In the course of its investigation and pursuant to the congressional authority of the Commission[2] it issued its subpoena duces tecum, directed to Hunt and signed by Sigurd Anderson, one of the Commissioners, on April 28, 1959, informing Hunt of the matter and scope of the investigation and directing Hunt to appear on June 16, 1959, at 10 o'clock A. M., at 1747 West Commonwealth Avenue, Fullerton, California, before George W. Elliott or Ralph C. Wilmot, Jr., Attorney-Examiners of the Federal Trade Commission, and produce certain documentary evidence in connection with the investigation described in the subpoena.

The subpoena specifically set forth the scope of the investigation as given above. The documents to be produced were described in certain specifications numbered one to four attached to the subpoena, which are reproduced in the margin.[3]

"4. Copies of all advertising contracts, expense vouchers and other records disclosing all expenditures for advertising, direct or indirect, by the company, its predecessors and subsid-

The subpoena was served by registered mail and was received by Hunt on May 5, 1959. On June 16, 1959, George W. Elliott, Attorney-Examiner of the Commission, convened a hearing for the purpose of receiving the testimony and documentary evidence called for by the subpoena. A reporter's transcript of the brief proceedings shows that, after the Examiner opened the proceedings, Mr. Joseph R. Harmon, the secretary of Hunt, was introduced, as was also Herbert S. Herlands, attorney for Hunt.

[Failure to Comply]

Mr. Harmon, in answer to a question by the Examiner, stated that he was authorized by Hunt to respond to the requests contained in the subpoena. The following colloquy then occurred:

"MR. ELLIOTT: Mr. Harmon, what books, papers or documents or other material are you producing at this time and place in response to such request?

"MR. HARMON: On behalf of Hunt Foods, and Industry, Inc., you are hereby advised that that company upon advice of counsel, declines to comply with the subpoena issued by the Federal Trade Commission under date of April 28, 1959, and addressed to Hunt Foods, an Industry, Inc.

"MR. ELLIOTT: Mr. Harmon, Have you anything further to say or produce in response to the subpoena?

"MR. HARMON: Nothing further." (Italics added.)

The Examiner then adjourned the proceedings. Later the Commission instituted this action to enforce the subpoena[4] by the filing, in this Court, of a petition, the substance of which has been summarized above.

[Objections to Subpoena]

Although at the time of the hearing Hunt did not raise any specific objections, in their answer they challenge the power of the Commission to issue the subpoena, attack the constitutionality of Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act,[5] which they claim the Commission is seeking to enforce, and allege invalidity of the subpoena and of the action of the Commission on other grounds to be referred to hereafter.

A lengthy affidavit also sets forth why compliance with the subpoena would impose an unnecessary burden upon Hunt.

I

The Scope of the Subpoena

We dispose of the question of burdensomeness of the subpoena by adverting to the fact that, at the hearing of the matter, the Commission indicated that the scope of the subpoena is not so broad as Hunt thought. It was then suggested by the Court that the Commission file a statement with the Court indicating the limited scope of the inquiry they proposed to conduct so as to allay, as it were, Hunt's fears. Such a statement was filed and counsel for the Commission state in the final memorandum filed in the case that the Commission

"is willing to accept (it) as a binding limitation on it."

In substance, they agree to return to the place where the records are kept during ordinary business hours, limit the number of Commission representatives to three and agree that the Commission representatives will perform the physical work of removing the documents from the files and making copies thereof or notes about them. They will "sample" the documents specified rather than examine all. Hunt will be permitted to observe the Commission representatives at every stage, requiring their only assistance in locating the files containing the specific documents. Photostatic reproductions will be made at the Commission's expense. The stipulation also limits to 760 man hours the time which the Commission representatives will remain at the respondent's place of business.

In brief, the Commission, by this method, gives assurance to the Court that it will observe the protective restraints which, at times, are imposed by courts in the conduct of depositions,[6] interrogatories,[7] and inspection of documents.[8] This being so we need not consider the abstract question raised by Hunt whether the Commission's statement is, or is not, a modification of the subpoena. For, concededly, it is an assurance given to the Court by counsel for the Commission, who instituted the action on its behalf, that the restraint and limitation expressed in the statement will be observed in the investigation.

As the Court retains jurisdiction of this matter and will be available to determine any dispute as to any order of compliance to be issued, Hunt will be protected against any oppressive or illegal use of the subpoena power, should any be attempted.

II

The Validity of the Subpoena

In truth, it is quite evident that Hunt believes that the entire investigatory proceeding of the Commission lacks validity and would have us so limit this power of inquiry as to do violence to the letter and spirit of the Federal Trade Commission Act under which this action is instituted and the decisions which have interpreted it. At this late date there can be no serious question as to the power of the Federal Trade Commission (and other regulatory commissions) to precede their complaints by an investigation to determine whether the facts exist warranting the issuance of a complaint. Indeed, the public is protected when a complaint is preceded by an investigation aimed to determine whether there is "reason to believe" that acts have been committed in violation of law, and, if so, whether they are of a character which is within the jurisdiction of a particular commission. And the courts have uniformly sustained the reasonable exercise of such investigatory powers.[9]

The reason is well stated in one of the cases involving the Federal Trade Commission:

> "The only power that is involved here is the power to get information from those who best can give it and who are most interested in not doing so."[10]

Such an investigation does not involve any question or unreasonable search and seizure, as is argued in the present case. When a similar contention was made in a National Labor Relations case, the answer given by the Supreme Court through Mr. Justice Rutledge was emphatic:

> "What petitioners seek is not to prevent an unlawful search and seizure. It is rather a total immunity to the Act's provisions, applicable to all others similarly situated, requiring them to submit their pertinent records for the Administrator's inspection under every judicial safeguard, after and only after an order of court made pursuant to and in exact compliance with authority granted by Congress."[11] (Italics added.)

In the case before us the statute grants to the Commission the power to prevent unfair methods of competition and to prohibit them by order to desist.[12] In pursuit of these objectives, full investigatory powers are given as to persons engaged in commerce.[13]

Constitutionality of the Robinson-Patman Act

There is no merit to the contention that under the guise of investigating alleged violation of the antitrust laws an attempt is being made by the Commission to enforce

[13] 15 U. S. C. A., § 46(a) and (b).

Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act.[14] I am aware of the limitations which the Supreme Court last year placed upon this Act.[15] But its decision merely limited the scope of the Act by denying the right to institute, under it, a private treble damage action. It did not intend to limit the scope of the Act as to its public enforcement or that of Section 3 as a regulatory penal statute. Indeed, the Court, while not passing on the constitutionality of the provision of the Act relating to violations of the "unreasonably low price" provision of Section 3, expressed no doubts about the validity of the regulatory and penal phases of that provision.[16] That case and a subsequent decision of the Supreme Court condemned price discrimination against one person as violative by the antitrust law.[17] Other decisions have consistently condemned price fixing as unreasonable per se.[18]

So it is reasonable to assume that the type of price discrimination which the Commission was investigating in the case before us involved what might, upon proof, develop to be an unfair method of competition, which it is the explicit function of the Commission to investigate, prevent and prohibit.[19]

The fact that these practices may also be covered by the "unreasonably low price" provision of Section 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act presents no difficulty. For the cases just cited reenforce me in the conviction expressed years ago that that provision is not unconstitutional for vagueness.[20] And the Commission may declare conduct to be an "unfair" practice or "method of competition" and prohibit it although such conduct may also constitute a violation of the Sherman or Clayton Antitrust Act.[21]

This being so, the subpoena here involved must be held to have been issued in compliance with the investigatory powers of the Commission in order to determine whether a complaint should issue.[22] And the subpoena

Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U. S. C. A. § 45) "empowers and directs" the Commission to prevent the use of any "unfair method of competition or unfair or deceptive act or practice" in commerce. Selling at unreasonably low prices with the intent of eliminating competition is certainly an unfair method of competition. See, Moore v. Mead's Fine Bread Co., supra. The Commission should seek to eliminate such practice at its inception. For, as said in Federal Trade Commission v. Raladam Company, 1942 [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,203], 316 U. S. 149, 152:

"One of the objects of the Act creating the Federal Trade Commission was to prevent potential injury by stopping unfair methods of competition in their incipiency." (Italics added)

Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as modified by the Robinson-Patman Act, (15 U. S. C. A., § 13(a)) declares that it is unlawful, under certain conditions, for a person engaged in commerce to "discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality."

Section 2(d) of the Clayton Act, as modified by the Robinson-Patman Act, (15 U. S. C. A., § 13(d)) requires those who grant to some of their customers allowances in connection with the sale of commodities in commerce to make such allowances "available on proportionally equal terms to all other customers."

was properly made returnable before an Examiner.[23]

Summary and Conclusion

What precedes and the added comments in the footnotes are sufficient answer to the contentions made by Hunt against the legality of the Commission's action. A more detailed discussion would merely be an elaboration of what is herein expressed, or no more than a repetition of the reasoning of the cases cited in the footnotes answering contentions similar to those made here, based, in many instances, on cases also cited here by Hunt.

Most of the cases pointing the other way are early cases in which the courts, faced with a newly created commission empowered to exercise great controls in order to keep our economy free and competitive, sought to restrict it. Whatever validity these cases had is attenuated by later decisions. Trial courts must accept this situation, i. e., we must be guided not by some expression of higher courts in an old case, but by the latest expressions in the field, whether there be ideally logical consistency or not between the two lines of thought. So we state the following conclusions on the objections made by Hunt:

The Commission has authority to issue the subpoena here involved under its extensive powers to investigate, prevent and prohibit unfair "practices" or "methods of competition" in commerce. The prohibition of discriminatory practices through sales at "unreasonably low prices" to favored customers is within these powers. The concept that unfair competition may arise from such discriminatory practices is a certain and valid standard.

The subpoena was properly made returnable before a hearing officer and was, under the statute and rules of practice of the Commission, properly served by mail upon one of Hunt's officers.[24]

And finally, in view of the nature of the investigation, the scope of the subpoena is not too broad or burdensome.[25]

On the whole subject, I agree with the conclusion reached by Judge Leibell that:

> "It was clearly the purpose of the Congress that the Commission should have adequate subpoena power to perform its duties." [26]

[Enforcement]

It follows that the petitioner is entitled to an Order enforcing the subpoena as prayed for in the Complaint. Formal findings and order fixing a new time for appearance to be prepared by counsel for the Government under Local Rule 7.

The scope of the inquiry here is limited, both as to the subject matter and as to the persons dealt with. So are the documents relating to them sought by the subpoena. (See, Federal Trade Commission v. Hallmark, Inc., supra Note 22, p. 439.) They do not cover the broad range found not "relevant" in Federal Trade Commission v. American Tobacco Co., 1924, 264 U. Nor are they so "unrelated" to the proposed inquiry as I found the documents sought in Martin v. Chandis Securities Co., D. C. Cal., 1940, 33 F. Supp. 478.

[26] Federal Trade Commission v. Tuttle, supra Note 11, p. 614. The legislative history confirms the view that the bills before the Congress creating the Commission intended to extend the subpoena power to any "investigation which may be undertaken" (House Report 533) in order that the Commission should have "extensive power of inquiry." In the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. CR. 173-58. Dated November 30, 1959.

Case No. 1387 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Price Fixing—Conspiracy to Fix Prices in Sale of Polio Vaccine to Public Authorities—Uniform Prices as Proof of Conspiracy—"Most Favored Customer" Clause in Government Purchase Contracts as Price "Floor."—Five producers of polio vaccine, in a criminal antitrust action charging them with conspiring to fix prices and eliminate competition in the sale of polio vaccine to domestic public authorities, were acquitted on the ground that the Government's proof furnished no basis for an inference of an agreement or combination among the producers. The Government's case, in large measure, consisted of the testimony of the producers' officers and employees. Those witnesses testified, however, that their pricing practices were based on independent business considerations and denied any collusion or agreement with any other producers. Further, the producers' claims of innocence were apparently buttressed by the presence of a "most favored customer" clause in Government purchase contracts. It was pointed out in the testimony that, by the operation of that clause, a "floor" was placed on domestic prices, since a price reduction would have resulted in an "across-the-board" cut to not only the Federal Government but, through the operation of the Polio Assistance Act and the "little most favored customer" clauses contained in some state contracts, to the states as well. Furthermore, with the exception of one of the producers, in the fall of 1956, all of them were, at all times, able to sell all the vaccine they could produce. Under such circumstances, they could not be expected to lower their prices. The contention that their refusal to reduce their prices was the result of an agreement was only "suspicion and conjecture."

The Government also contended that the producers, while maintaining uniform prices in the United States, charged lower and "disparate" prices in the foreign market. The court found, however, that any differences in the two markets arose by virtue of the "most favored customer" clause in the Government's contracts. That clause did not apply to sales made to foreign public authorities; therefore, price reductions in the foreign market did not require similar reductions to domestic public authorities. After the expiration of that clause, and its disappearance as a practical marketing influence, disparate bidding, previously seen only in the foreign market, appeared in the domestic market.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Conspiracy to Fix Prices of Polio Vaccine—Trial—Evidence—Proof Beyond a Reasonable Doubt—"Reasonable Hypothesis of Innocence" as Ground for Acquittal.—A Federal District Court, in a criminal antitrust action charging five producers of polio vaccine with conspiring to fix prices, granted the defendants' motions for a verdict of acquittal on the ground that the Government had failed to meet the test imposed upon it in "circumstantial evidence" cases, namely, the elimination of every "reasonable hypothesis of innocence." In such cases, unless there is substantial evidence of facts which exclude every other hypothesis but that of guilt, it is the duty of the trial court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the accused. Here, the Government's endeavor to prove the guilt of the defendants out of the mouths of their own officers and employees resulted in testimony which, if believed, tended to establish the innocence of the defendants. There was testimony to the effect that the defendants' pricing practices were based upon independent business considerations, that a "floor" had been placed upon domestic prices by the presence of "most favored customer" clauses in the Government's own purchase contracts, and that the demand for polio vaccine had kept up with the supply, thereby justifying the producers' refusal to lower their prices. Thus, the Government's contention that the producers' actions were not independent, but were contrived by prior agreements among them, was only "suspicion and conjecture." There was "no bridge over the gap from fact to inference."

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Price Fixing Conspiracy Charged—Polio Vaccine]

The Court [FORMAN, District Judge, in full text]: I take it that we are all here, and I will proceed to rule upon the pending motions.

They have been made under Federal Criminal Procedure Rule 29 to strike the evidence presented by the Government in relation to bids and quotations in foreign markets, and on behalf of all defendants for judgment of acquittal of them on Counts 1 and 2 of the indictment on the ground that the evidence presented by the Government is insufficient to sustain a conviction of the offenses charged, and under Count 2 for the additional reason that the Government has failed to prove that the District of New Jersey is a proper venue for trial of the offenses charged in the indictment.

It is unnecessary to dilate upon the well known history surrounding the now-famous discovery by Dr. Jonas Salk of poliomyelitis vaccine. It is sufficient for the purpose here to say that the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis supported his discovery in March of 1953 of a vaccine to immunize against and prevent the disease, and set about the task of conducting tremendous numbers of trials to ascertain the safety and efficacy of the vaccine. Under its auspices, manufacturers of biologicals were called together to undertake production of the so-called Salk polio vaccine.

Of the eleven companies invited, the defendants herein, Eli Lilly and Company, Allied Laboratories, Inc., through its Pitman-Moore Division, which will be referred to herein as Pitman-Moore, American Home Products Corporation, with its Wyeth Division, herein referred to as Wyeth, Merck & Company, Inc., with its Sharp & Dohme Division, herein referred to as Merck Sharp & Dohme or Sharp & Dohme, and Parke, Davis & Company, evinced their interest and agreed to engage in the manufacture. A sixth firm, Cutter Laboratories, also committed itself. Later on, during the course of its manufacture of the vaccine, difficulties developed which caused Cutter to terminate its production.

The early stages were exceedingly experimental and, in fact, were designed to furnish the vaccine for the enormous number of field trials to ascertain the effectiveness of the vaccine. Even before these tests were terminated, the Foundation determined to have on hand a stockpile of vaccine in case the vaccine was adjudged safe for use.

The five defendants together with the Cutter Company engaged in contracts with the Foundation for the purpose of producing such a quantity of vaccine and the contracts which each of them entered into with the Foundation are dated in July and August of 1954 and are Exhibits G-22 to 26 inclusive.

Meanwhile, Dr. Francis, designated to make the ultimate test of the vaccine, reported favorably April 12, 1955. In April and May of 1955, the Health, Education and Welfare Department of the Government, hereinafter referred to as HEW, called upon each manufacturer to attend in Washington and each manufacturer agreed to go along with a pattern, a voluntary allocation of the manufactured vaccine through the Foundation for commercial purposes and to governmental health agencies.

[Polio Assistance Act]

On August 12, 1955, the Polio Assistance Act was passed and by its terms the Surgeon General was empowered to allocate to the states and territories vaccine to be paid for out of appropriations by the Federal Government, and provision was also made for the states to purchase polio vaccine directly and to be reimbursed by the Federal Government. The original act called for an appropriation of $30 million. It expired February 26, 1956, but it was extended to June 30, 1957 and a further appropriation of $30 million was provided. The only sources of supply of the vaccine were the five companies herein named as defendants, and the Cutter Company, until its career as a supplier came to an end.

Each company sold its vaccine through its individual sales and distribution system, the details of which in each instance will be more fully treated at a later juncture.

Up to the enactment of the Polio Assistance law, each company sold its vaccine pursuant to the voluntary allocation plan, supplying the National Foundation until its commitment with it was fulfilled.

After the passage of the national Polio Assistance Act, each company now licensed to manufacture and sell the vaccine submitted bids to agencies of the national government and to the health agencies of the states and subdivisions.

Pursuant to the law the HEW allocated vaccine or funds for its purchase to the states on a system designed to achieve equitable distribution.

[Alleged Agreements to Fix Prices]

The Government's charge in this case is that in bidding to public agencies for the first six months in 1955 through December 31, 1957, the defendants and others engaged in unlawful conspiracy, entered into on or after January 1, 1954, in restraint of interstate trade and commerce among the several states in the sale of polio vaccine in violation of the Sherman Antitrust law, 15 U. S. C. 1, as in Count 1 of the indictment. The combination and conspiracy was alleged to have consisted of continuing agreements, understandings, plan and concert of action among the defendants and others, the substantial terms of which have been that they would (A) submit uniform prices and quotations for sales of polio vaccine to public agencies (B) to adopt uniform and non-competitive terms and conditions for such sales and (C) to adopt uniform and non-competitive methods for pricing of polio vaccine on sales to public authorities.

In Count 2 of the indictment, Section 3 of the Sherman Antitrust law was alleged to have been violated in that the commerce involved ran to the territories and the District of Columbia.

[Inference of Illegal Agreement—Circumstances]

The Government submitted that the circumstances from which the illegal agreement may be inferred are eleven in number, and I will take them up in the order in which they have been generally argued by counsel in discussing the motions before me.

(A) Uniformity of Price and Methods of Pricing for Sale to Public Authority.

Tabulations which were offered by the Government were intended to show price uniformity in sales made by the five defendants of polio vaccine to public authority throughout the period of the indictment, G-112 to G-116 inclusive referred to as the Blue Books. The tabulations reflect five periods of pricing.

It should be understood that there developed packaging of this vaccine in vials of 3 cc's, in vials of 1 cc, three such vials to the package, and in vials containing 9 cc's.

The periods into which the pricing in the Blue Books fell are as follows:

From April 12, 1955, through February 5, 1956, during which the price for polio vaccine was 7.12-7.13 per 9 cc vial.

From February 6, 1956 through May 14, 1956, $6.33-6.34.

From May 15, 1956 through April 17, 1957, 5.70.

From April 18, 1957 through September 30, 1957, 5.13.

From October 1st, 1957 through December 31st, 1957, 5.13 remained the price, with certain exceptions, apparently on an ad hoc basis.

The last cut to public authority generally was one by Pitman-Moore in December 1957 to $4.78. Transcript 3018.

The Government urged that its evidence proved that the price uniformity was not inevitable and did not result from the defendants' independent decisions to follow each others' prices, but could only have resulted from agreement among the defendants to adhere to uniform means and methods of pricing in selling polio vaccine to public authority.

The use of the 9 cc vial size was brought out by the substantial demand of the customers who were almost universally for it. Transcript 909. Mr. White, Transcript 624. Mr. Hovey, Transcript 2714. Mr. Greeve of HEW, Transcript 2893. Mr. Jewett's difficulty with the 3 cc vial: Wyeth tried to market its three 1 cc package and quit it, and Pitman-Moore tried a higher price for the 3 cc package and found it unsuccessful. Transcript 1422-5.

No defendant was shown to anticipate the large part the Government would play in the purchase of vaccine, although all had notions that boards of health of cities, counties and states would be looked to for some activity. Early thought on this ranged from 5 to 10 per cent on the part of Lilly to an outside of 20 per cent. Wyeth expected a small public market according to G-68 of April 19, 1955. To be sure, when initial prices were instituted, no one could divine that Congress would in the following August implement its assistance with an appropriation of $30 million.

Merck Sharp & Dohme claims to be affected time-wise differently than the other defendants named in the indictment, and this subject will be treated here, perhaps out of regular order. The indictment and bill of particulars allege that the defendants entered the conspiracy not later than July 1st, 1955. All the defendants had set their prices by April 20, 1955 and had quoted to public authority uniformly by July 1st, 1955 except Merck Sharp & Dohme, the prices of which were not set until January 17, 1956.

On May 23rd and 24th, 1955, all the defendants except Merck Sharp & Dohme set their prices for HEW contracts under voluntary allocation. Lilly, Transcript 1863; Pitman-Moore, Transcript 1259; Wyeth, Transcript 2913; and Parke, Davis, Transcript 2555.

Mr. Kuryloski, representing Merck Sharp & Dohme, could not submit a price at that time. In December of 1955 and January of 1956, Mr. Greeve of HEW held meetings with Merck Sharp & Dohme's representatives and advised them on the marketing procedures of other defendants. Minutes of meetings are Merck Sharp & Dohme Exhibits 27 and 28.

The Government's theory for holding Merck Sharp & Dohme as a defendant is predicated upon two documents said by the Government to implicate Merck Sharp & Dohme, which will be mentioned later.

(B) Advance Knowledge of Initial Price.

Lilly was by far the most successful of the manufacturers and its organization, stimulated by public curiosity concerning the new preventive of the dread poliomyelitis, even before the rendition of the Francis Report on April 12, 1955, was understandably anxious to give information to its customers. They wanted to know two things: When would they be able to get the vaccine and what would be its price. These subjects were the almost constant concern of Mr. Beesley, president of Lilly, and Mr. Teel, executive vice-president, during the latter part of 1954 and into 1955.

In December of '54 Mr. Teel was talking about prices of $3.60 for 3 cc's, $1 per cc, $9 for 9 cc's, with a long list price of $15 less 40 per cent, Transcript 1871-1876. These prices were talked about, and as early as October of 1954 Lilly had told its distributor in Spain that the price would be not more than $3.60 per 3 cc, less 15 and 7 per cent, Lilly Exhibit 8. This information was hedged with the warning that the price might change without previous notice, but was being furnished ostensibly to lay the foundation for the registration of an import license into Spain.

On February 15, 1955, Mr. Teel wrote to Mr. Beesley that he had had an opportunity to discuss the proposed pricing of polio vaccine with Mr. J. K. Lilly, who had approved the following prices as mentioned in G-32.

G-32 is dated February 15, 1955 and is as follows:

> "Mr. E. N. Beesley, cc—Mr. J. K. Lilly.
>
> "Yesterday I had an opportunity to discuss the proposed pricing of polio vaccine with Mr. J. K. Lilly, who has approved the following prices: Single package, one immunization, Net trade $3.60. Multiple package, three immunizations, Net trade $9.00.
> "It is noted that because of the public interest in this vaccine and the pressures that will be exerted on boards of health to furnish vaccine in certain cases, we may anticipate that a substantial percentage of sales will be made through this medium and that it will therefore be necessary to establish a special price to boards of health which is in line with custom in the trade.
> "I understand that the Foundation has just submitted a proposal in regard to delivery of the vaccine under contract and that there are several other questions that must be settled before we can reach a final conclusion as to how the product will be announced to the trade. It is for this reason that I believe it is a bit premature to make the announcement of the prices referred to above. However, once the production questions are answered, I think that it might be advisable for us to start taking advance orders during the first ten days of March."
> Signed "Forrest Teel."

On March 3, 1955 Lilly sent its letter No. 1 "Polio Vaccine Marketing Plan" to its domestic salesmen, Government Exhibit

65 in evidence. This exhibit is addressed to Lilly salesmen, domestic. It is entitled "Polio Vaccine Marketing Plan, letter No. 1." It appears since it is a basic document in the case that it will be well to read it in full.

"General Considerations. A. It is impossible at this time to estimate the release for shipments of polio vaccine.

"B. Government license must be granted before the commercial vaccine may be shipped by any manufacturer.

"C. The Francis Report indicating the degree of vaccine effectiveness in the 1954 trial is expected in April.

"D. Eli Lilly and Company will sponsor jointly with the Foundation a closed-circuit television program, which will feature men prominent in the field of immunology, and others who have co-operated in the development of the vaccine. You will receive additional information on this subject at an early date.

"E. The vaccine, when licensed by N.I.H., '—the National Institute of Health—' will carry a short dating—perhaps six months.

"F. For some relatively short period it will be necessary to allocate the vaccine in order to insure the widest possible use.

"G. It is understood that no firm sales or deliveries may be made until after the vaccine is licensed by the National Institutes of Health.

"Premarketing Sale of Vaccine.

"You will be informed very soon when to start taking provisional orders for the vaccine from physicians and druggists. Since it will not be possible to ship the vaccine prior to government licensure, it will be necessary for us to forego the customary practice of 'filling the pipeline' before announcement.

"Until we have a clearer picture as to the amount of vaccine that will be available, it would be hazardous to speculate as to quantities that will be available.

"It follows that at that time no guarantee should be made to anyone. To do so would invite embarrassment and disappointment.

"Sale and Shipment of Vaccine.

"When you are officially authorized to take provisional orders, the following procedure will be followed. Druggists' and physicians' orders may be obtained for quantities up to your total allocation. Please keep in mind that the vaccine will be administered in three equal doses of 1 cc each, with an interval of one week between the first and second injections, and the final injection four weeks later.

"The physician's order should be turned through the selected druggist in the customary manner, with copies going to your district manager. The wholesaler's copy should carry the notation—in a prominent place—'Being supplied from Indianapolis.'

"The usual third-party-order procedure will not be followed since we will ship on the home office copies of retailers' L-80's. The home office copies are to be mailed the last working day of the week in an envelope marked 'POLIO' on both sides. To facilitate entry and handling, retailer and physician orders should be separated.

"Prices to Physicians and Retailers.

"Retailer, one immunization, 3 cc vial, Net trade $3.60, List $6.00. Three immunizations, 9 cc vial, $9, net trade, List $15.

"Physician, quote the customary ⅙ on one immunization $4.20, three immunizations $10.50.

"City, County, State Boards of Health and other Tax-Supported Institutions.

"These accounts will be shipped from Indianapolis only, transportation prepaid. Vaccine should not be shipped to druggists for delivery.

"Sales to these outlets should be wired to Indianapolis, stating requirements and furnishing billing information. Acceptance of order will be wired; however, on occasion it may be necessary to make divided shipments.

"When a wholesaler sells an institution direct, he will receive the regular discount and will be charged with one-half of the transportation charges.

"The following prices will be in effect with these institutions: Single immunization (one 3 cc vial) $2.85. Three immunizations (one 9 cc vial) $7.13. These prices reflect a discount of 50% and 5% from list.

"All sales to these institutions will be final and merchandise will be nonreturnable.

"Occasionally it may be customary and necessary to supply these outlets through a retailer. In such instances, a 10% handling charge will be allowed on receipt of a copy of the billing at board of health rates, bearing your signature indicating delivery and approval.

"On transactions of this kind (a retailer involved) it is contemplated that the wholesaler's profit will be essentially that provided on a Supplement A basis. Complete details for handling will be supplied later.

"May we again call to your attention: This letter is not your signal to proceed with the taking of provisional orders; you will be informed of that date very shortly. Your usual fine co-operation in putting this program into effect is anticipated.

"Yours very truly, ELI LILLY AND COMPANY."

[Price Establishments]

It might be well at this point to state the price establishments in amounts and dates covering the entire period, so that they may be held in mind during the considerations of this comment.

The initial pricing, as we have seen, was made in G-65, as read, by Lilly on March 3, 1955. It was followed by an announcement of Parke, Davis on March 14, 1955, in which the public authority prices were mentioned as $7.12 and $2.85.

Wyeth's announcement came forth on March 15, 1955, with prices of $3 for the three 1cc vial, later $7.12 for the 9cc vial and $2.85 for the 3cc.

Pitman-Moore followed on April 20, 1955 with $7.13 and $2.85.

Merck Sharp & Dohme's announcement of $7.12 did not come out until January 17, 1956.

[Reductions]

The first reduction in price from 7.13 to 6.33 in the area in which we are concerned in this case was made by Lilly on February 3, 1956, to be effective February 6, 1956. This was followed by an announcement by Wyeth on February 8, 1956 with a price of $6.33, and on February 10, 1956 by Merck Sharp & Dohme with a price of $6.33, and on February 10, 1956 also by Pitman-Moore with a price of $6.34 and $2.59, 3 cc's, and by Parke, Davis on February 24 of a price of $6.33 for the 9 cc's.

The second reduction was made by Parke, Davis on May 14, 1956 to a price of $5.70, followed the next day by Eli Lilly to the same price, on the 16th of May by Pitman-Moore to $5.70, and on the 17th of May by Wyeth to $5.70, and on May 22 by Merck Sharp & Dohme to $5.70.

The third reduction occurred on April 18, 1957 and was made by Merck Sharp & Dohme to $5.13. The same amount was announced on April 22, 1957 by Lilly, on April 29, 1957 by Parke, Davis, on May 2, 1957 by Pitman-Moore and on May 6, 1957 by Wyeth.

Subsequent reductions were made in the late fall of 1957. The first one was a reduction by Wyeth to $4.92 in a bid to the State of Maryland, the second on December 4, 1957 by Merck Sharp & Dohme in a bid to New York City, but that was preceded, I believe, by a bid on October 28, 1957 of $5.02 to Baltimore. The New York City bid was $4.78.

On the 9th of December, 1958, Parke, Davis bid $4.52 to New York State on an invitation for 105,000 vials, and Pitman-Moore bid $4.78 to the State of Maryland on December 16, 1957 which it makes into a general reduction of $4.88 less 2 per cent, or $4.78 net on the 30th of December, 1957.

Prior to March 3, 1955, Lilly had no discount for state, city and county health agencies. It did, however, give Federal agencies a discount of 40, 15 and 7 per cent. In fixing its discount for the polio vaccine, Mr. Beesley and Mr. Teel directed their Mr. Abendroth to check other drug houses to ascertain the custom in the trade for discounts to state, county and city health agencies. Mr. Abendroth reported that the latter were receiving discounts of 50 and 5. These were accepted by Lilly for city, county and state health agencies and thereafter, to avoid discrimination between state and Federal agencies, the Lilly discount to the Federal Government of 40, 15 and 7 was changed to 50 and 5. It is to be noted that 50 and 5 provided a slightly higher price than the 40, 15 and 7, although on other Federal biologicals the discount remained 40, 15 and 7. This is from the transcript, 1934-48 and 1954.

Mr. Valentine, President of Pitman-Moore, fixed a $7.50 list price for the three 1cc vials, or a net of $4.50 before he left for Europe on February 6, 1955. Pitman-Moore's prices came out in their house magazine, called "Planned Detailing, Sales," Pitman-Moore Exhibit 15. He testified that he came to no decision as to discount until his return from Europe, which was in the latter part of February, after copy for "Planned Detailing" had gone to the printer. It was not until after Lilly had formally announced its prices on March 3, '55 that he decided to meet them and hence, although "Planned Detailing" went out as printed on March 9, 1955, it carried a supplement entitled "Definite Prices Now Established on Poliomyelitis Vaccine," whereas "Planned Detailing" gave the following information as to price—this quotation is from "Planned Detailing":

"PRICE?

"At this time we cannot quote a firm price, but you may state that the package of three 1cc vials will cost not more than $7.50 List, $4.50 Net. (Note following paragraph.)

"DISCOUNTS?

"A new discount policy is necessary for this product. Price to physicians will be List less 25%; net price to retailers will be List less 40% (no additional discounts); price to wholesalers will be List less 40% and 16⅔%."

The supplement reads as follows:

"Since the accompanying special issue of Planned Detailing went to press, definite prices on Poliomyelitis Vaccine (Bio. 175) have been established. They are:

"List price $6.00
Price to physicians ..... $4.50 (list less 25%)
Price to retailers ..... $3.60 (list less 40%)
Price to wholesalers ..... $3.00 (list less 40% & 16⅔%)

"Note, on page two of Planned Detailing, the paragraph on new discount policy. Although no trade discount will be allowed retailers on Poliomyelitis Vaccine, it does qualify for annual RDA rebate."

Pitman-Moore's price to doctors was not corrected until March 16 when it was made $4.20, like Lilly's, G-65. The $4.20 was arrived at by discounting the RDA rate by 30 per cent by Pitman-Moore. Lilly took its long list less 40 per cent and then added one-sixth. The first time it quoted a public authority price was on April 20th to the New Jersey State Board of Health.

A look at Pitman-Moore's initial pricing shows that under its old system where the regular discounts applied, its list was $7.50. The doctors received a discount of 40 per cent, leaving $4.50. Druggists, when purchasing from wholesalers, had a 40 per cent discount, or $4.50, and when buying direct, had discounts of 40 per cent and 15 per cent, or $3.82. Wholesalers had discounts of 40 per cent and 16⅔ per cent.

In the "Planned Detailing" magazine, which went in the mail on March 9, the new discount policy was described as list $7.50, doctors' discount 25 per cent, or $5.62, druggists, 40 per cent, or $4.50, and wholesalers, 40 and 16⅔ per cent, or $3.75.

In the flyer that accompanied "Planned Detailing", which was made up after the Lilly prices were announced, the list was fixed at $6 with a 25 per cent for doctors, giving them a price of $4.50; a discount of 40 per cent to druggists, giving them a list of $3.60—or giving them a net price of $3.60, and wholesalers their discounts of 40 and 16⅔ per cent, making that net $3.

On March 16, to give place to the adjustment to meet the Lilly doctor price of $4.20, Pitman-Moore applied a 30 per cent discount to its $6 list, making the doctors' net $4.20, as indicated heretofore.

[Public Agency Price]

The public agency price was set April 20, 1955, when response to a telegram from the Department of Health of New Jersey, imparted the information that the price would be $2.85 for 3cc and $7.13 for 9cc.

The reasons for Pitman-Moore's adoption of these price quotations, and the revolutionary character of them with regard to their previous business history, will be stated in some detail later.

The Government presses that Wyeth had advance knowledge of Lilly's price because its president, Mr. Howard, wrote a letter to a Canadian associate on February 11, 1955, G-27, in which he said, among other things:

> "We have no information as to what competitors are going to do on pricing so I can only guess. My guesstimate is that it will be in the neighborhood of $3 to $4 (our take) for a complete immunization of three doses."

It asks us to compare this letter with a letter of Mr. Charron of Lilly's Foreign Department, writing to his associate on February 9, 1955, G-147, in which he expresses himself in part as follows:

> "But in spite of these handicaps, Mr. Bard and I have worked out some estimates for various areas in Latin America which we feel are reasonably conservative. Please note that the estimates vary according to the price. Since the date of your memorandum there have been rumors that the price would not be from $3.00 to $7.00 per immunization, but might range from around $2.00 per immunization. If we could get some commitment regarding the ultimate price at which this product will be offered, even with the other uncertainties, I think some firm orders might be secured in advance of actual marketing date."

The Government also points to a letter from Lilly's Abendroth to the Department of Public Health in Shawnee, Oklahoma, dated February 18, 1955, G-201, in which Mr. Abendroth, Manager of the Pricing and Development Department of Lilly, says:

"At this time it is impossible for us to give you a definite price on this vaccine that would apply to a health department. To date we have not been able to run any exact costs on this vaccine and this is the reason we are unable to give you a definite reply. As near as we can estimate, the cost of a single immunization will be somewhere between $3.00 and $4.00, and the cost of a single immunization in a bulk vial, consisting of three immunizations, will be slightly less than the figure mentioned above. There is a possibility that the vaccine may be slightly less than the price mentioned above as this depends entirely on the exact costs in the manufacture of the vaccine."

Mr. AuBuchon of Wyeth testified that he did not know of Lilly's prices until he heard of it through one of his salesmen who had secured a copy of Lilly's publication of its initial prices, G-65. He had it forwarded to him posthaste, but did not receive it until March 6. He testified that when he did receive it he said, "Well, this is what I have been waiting for; this is what I need." Transcript 2876. He said that he meant that he had been anxious to have his company make a publication of prices, and with Lilly's public announcement he felt that he would now be permitted to do so. The Government, on the other hand, suggests that his explanation gives rise to the inference that he had advance knowledge of the price. If Merck Sharp & Dohme had any advance knowledge of prices, they made no use of them for they quoted none until January of 1956, following meetings of their Mr. Kuryloski and Mr. Greeve of the HEW. Merck Sharp & Dohme had no vaccine upon which to quote during 1955.

Parke, Davis set its public authority price on February 25, 1955 following a meeting of company officials at which "someone" reported the Lilly price of $3.60 per 3cc, Transcript 2370. Parke, Davis insisted that Lilly's activity was very hectic and brought out that it was necessary on February 11, 1955, for Lilly to issue a letter of admonition to its salesmen. Parke, Davis 6.

"In the absence of formal instructions from Indianapolis," quoting from PD-6, "we can readily appreciate the action which some of you gentlemen, as well as our salesmen, may have taken with respect to soliciting orders for polio vaccine. It has come to our attention that some of our salesmen have been encouraged to solicit orders—even going so far as to indicate to physicians the probable price and method of packaging. It seems to us that, since neither the price nor the method of packaging polio vaccine has been established, plus the fact that no official release of such information has been authorized, it would be unwise and even dangerous for any of us to go out on a limb to the extent just mentioned. Such action could easily lead to considerable embarrassment to the company, and in the end do more harm than good.

"Certainly we do not want to discourage anyone from giving physicians and retailers all the information released to date regarding the company's participation in the polio project, perhaps even going so far as to include the present belief that Eli Lilly and Company will have adequate supplies of the vaccine if and when it is officially approved.

"We therefore would like to request that your salesmen be advised to confine their remarks regarding polio vaccine to the information authorized to date, and under no circumstances should they make any commitments with respect to probable price or packaging, or make any statements implying that polio vaccine has been, or will be, approved for sale.

"Your immediate cooperation in this instance will be appreciated." Signed LeBien.

The next category is: Adoption of and Adherence to 50% and 5% Discount.

In 1946 Lilly abolished all county, city and town discounts. These accounts paid the net price the retailer got, namely 40 per cent off list.

Concern for setting a special price for public authority is reflected in G-32, the Teel to Beesley memo, February 15, 1955, in which Mr. Teel stated:

"It is noted that because of the public interest in this vaccine and the pressures that will be exerted on boards of health to furnish vaccine in certain cases, we may anticipate that a substantial percentage of sales will be made through this medium and that it will therefore be necessary to establish a special price to boards of health which is in line with custom in the trade."

Similar concern was expressed from time to time in the Product Addition and Deletion Committee report of Lilly, G-148. Finally, as stated earlier, it was left to Mr. Abendroth to investigate the discounts employed by other drug houses, and as a result the allowance of the 50 and 5 discount to state, city and county agencies and the substitution of the same for the 40, 15 and 7 theretofore allowed Federal agencies, was established.

It is interesting to note that this applied only to polio vaccine and that the Federal discount of 40, 15 and 7 continued to apply to biologicals other than polio vaccine.

Mr. Valentine of Pitman-Moore concedes he practically copied Lilly's discount system and adapted it to Pitman-Moore hoping to change the traditional system of Pitman-Moore which, as has been mentioned heretofore, dealt with the dispensing physician in contrast to the prescription physician, Pitman-Moore wanted very badly to use the exploitation of polio vaccine as a vehicle with which to revise its merchandising approach. Transcript 1408.

Wyeth did not use discounts but quoted net prices less 2 per cent. In any event, it met competition by coming out with the price of other manufacturers of polio vaccine. It followed the Lilly announcement except that it published $7.12 instead of $7.13 to public authority on the 9cc vial.

Merck Sharp & Dohme had established discounts of 50 and 5 to city, county and state in 1952. In 1949 discounts of 40, 16⅔ and 5 per cent were used in sales to the Federal Government. It continued to apply the latter in sales to the Federal Government. It is to be noted that the result of the application of 40, 16⅔ and 5 is identical with 50 and 5.

Parke, Davis followed a practice of long standing to quote discounts of 50 and 5 per cent on biologicals. Parke, Davis sometimes gave further reductions (discounts) on quantity shipments and, in fact, during April 1, 1955 to December 31, 1957, some were given on other biologicals. An additional cut or discount was given in December 1957, as has been stated, to New York State when Parke, Davis reduced its price from $5.13 to $4.52 on the order 105,000 vials.

The next category, D, Defendant's Proclivity for Discussing Prices.

The Government submits that the evidence shows that attendance by the defendants' representatives at meetings of the Foundation furnished opportunities for them to speak of various phases of the production of the vaccine, including prices.

There is also produced a memo dated July 30, 1954, written by F. M. Hadley, an official of Lilly, to Messrs. Beesley, Teel and Wheeler, in which he says:

> "Harry Loynd told me this morning that they have completed their contract with the Polio Foundation, and following is the price schedule:
> "Single immunization $1.21
>
> "Three immunizations $3.15
> "Our prices were, respectively, $1.26 and $3.50, and if the discount should apply our prices would be $1.07 and $2.98, respectively."

The stockpiling contracts were signed by Lilly on July 21st, 1954, and by Parke, Davis, of which Mr. Loynd was president, on July 30th, 1954, so that this information seems to be after the event and, of course, deals with the price to the Foundation.

Then there is the testimony of Mr. Beesley that at a Foundation meeting on May 13th, 1954, Mr. O'Connor of the Foundation suggested that the producers discuss price, and so forth, together, and Mr. Beesley, a member of the Indiana Bar, declined, stating that he felt it would not be proper to engage in such conversation. The conversations were not had and the contracts were negotiated separately with each company.

["Price Talk" Forbidden]

Lilly introduced a memo of 1952, L-12, forbidding price talk by its employees with its competitors.

The Government offered the following points of contract between Pitmore and other defendants. Mr. Valentine had on occasion spoken with Mr. Beesley socially. Transcript 1031.

Mr. Valentine phoned Mr. Loynd of Parke, Davis after Parke, Davis's announced price cut of May 14, 1956 to ascertain whether it was true. Transcript 1390. Mr. Valentine admitted that he would call Sharp & Dohme and other defendants concerning pricing practices if he had a question regarding them. Transcript 1022-1023.

At a National Wholesale Drug Association meeting, Mr. Valentine stated that he had inquired concerning the number of "depots" Parke, Davis had. Incidentally, he received a rather noncommittal reply, which turned out to be less than informative. The conversation took place with a Mr. Carl Johnson, I believe.

In G-39, Mr. Ball on July 24, 1956, wrote to Mr. Ruch of Pitmore that he talked to Mr. Stuart Smith, vice-president in charge of marketing for Wyeth, to confirm > "that their price for poliomyelitis vaccine to the physician is actually $7.20. I learned that they do not have a long list price, but list only net prices, and the above prices apply to all classes of trade, including the retail pharmacist, surgical supply dealer and the physician. I'm not certain about wholesalers, but feel that they must offer a wholesale discount.

>
> "In any event, it's confirmed that the above price is being offered to physicians, and that they are actively soliciting new direct accounts. Their reasoning is that when a limited number of druggists were passing their price on to the physician without any mark-up it was creating so much confusion they decided on one price for all classes of trade. This includes not only Poliomyelitis Vaccine but also their injectables, penicillin, etc.
> "They point out that they have no surgical supply dealer's discount, and with that class of trade we have a 15% advantage, and that they have no rebate plan with the druggist, which, of course, we do.
> "Under the circumstances, it appears that on direct sales to the physician Wyeth will definitely have us at a disadvantage, and unless we elect to follow a pricing pattern similar to theirs, I can't see any logical answer except to continue as we are at the present time. We can discuss this when you return."

In G-141, Mr. John Galloway, in charge of publicity for Pitman-Moore, reported on August 27, 1954 on a conference with Mr. Basil O'Connor of the Foundation. Among other things, he says:

> "You will be interested, in connection with promotional plans, that most of the people present felt that public health groups will jump on the bandwagon if the Francis report is favorable. O'Connor thought that we could expect to see free vaccination of all first graders within a few years and even in 1955 a very large part of all available vaccine might be used by public health agencies. One of the Wyeth representatives started to explain why the industry should promote sales of the vaccine to these buyers, to forestall state agency production, but he was interrupted by the other Wyeth representative. I got the impression that the interruption was designed to prevent the first speaker from divulging Wyeth's plans inadvertently. If they are going to encourage free vaccination by state and county agencies, we're going to have strong competition in the area where we are most vulnerable."

But Mr. Valentine denied any early realization of the public agency part in any program and in fact disagreed with Mr. Galloway's interpretation of Mr. O'Connor's statement.

Merck Sharp & Dohme's Mr. L. E. Arnow wrote a memo to file on May 14, 1954, G-54 in evidence, on the meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria of May 13 called by Mr. O'Connor of the Foundation. In it he said:

> "It was evident to the S&D people present from conversation with other industrialists that the companies now producing believe that 50¢ per cc. probably is the smallest figure that would persuade them to undertake large scale production at this time. It seems probable that each of the six companies will submit this figure to Mr. O'Connor. In rather casual conversations with Mr. Loynd, of Parke Davis, and Mr. Beesley, of Lilly, we gained the impression that current costs vary between 40¢ and 60¢ per cc. for finished, packaged material. It was our impression also that these costs include general and administrative expenses.
> "In private conversations with the other producers, it is evident that most of them will suggest that the foundation pay them the agreed on sum per cc. each month in order to finance the production of the vaccine. If the vaccine is marketed in the usual way, this money obviously then would be refunded to the foundation. This point was not discussed in the open meeting."

But Mr. Valentine testified that he discussed the proposal for monthly billing in the open meeting. Transcript 1543.

Mr. Ruch wrote Mr. Warren, both of Pitman-Moore, on September 24, 1956, G-38:

> "We appreciate the comments in your letter of September 6 concerning competitive polio vaccine activity by both Wyeth and Lilly.
> "Sometime ago Wyeth developed a single price discount policy and this holds true on their entire injectable line—not just polio vaccine. They are quite concerned about the single price policy, for obvious reasons. I had an opportunity to discuss this with their vice president for sales at a recent FWDA meeting. They are not at all pleased with it and are contemplating some changes. No dates were mentioned, however.

"It would make little difference what Lilly offered as a discount because they only sell to their franchised wholesalers who in turn are not permitted to handle any other brand as long as Lilly is able to supply.

"Each manufacturer, Roy, has their own discount policy and have made an effort to fit polio vaccine into the policy without too much disturbance. In almost every instance it has placed an advantage on one particular class of trade, but of course another manufacturer has the advantage with another class. As an example: Wyeth has an advantage on direct sales to physicians; we offer retail druggists up to 7½ per cent rebate and have a special 15 per cent discount for SSAs.

"I hope these remarks are of assistance to you. As always we appreciate hearing field reports and any other comments you care to make concerning the competitive situation will be most welcome."

G-129 and G-130 are an exchange of letters dated June 23 and 25, 1956, respectively, in which Mr. Valentine is told by one of his salesmen that he has observed an invoice from Wyeth billing polio vaccine at $6 per vial to McCormack Brothers, operators of two drug stores and a warehouse. He is curious to know whether Wyeth classes the account as a wholesaler. Mr. Valentine replied that he had been told "by the people involved that they rate this firm as a chain, and since they maintain a warehouse, they are entitled to the wholesale price." Mr. Valentine testified that he called Wyeth and got the information which was the subject matter of this letter from "someone" there.

It will be recalled that it was Dr. Arnow of MS&D who wrote the memo, G-54, reporting on the meeting with the Foundation. G-83 is a memo from Mr. J. J. Weissmuller of Merck Sharp & Dohme International to J. E. Monz of the same, dated April 12, 1955, in which he says:

"Mr. S. T. Bryan gave me the following prices which S&D Division is expected to establish.

"1 x 3cc vial	RD 3.60 vial
3 x 1cc amp.	3.60 pkg.
3 x 1cc amp.	2.85 pkg. (for State Board of Health)
1 x 9cc vial	RD 9.00 vial
1 x 9cc vial	7.13 vial (for State Board of Health)

"The information above is merely conveyed for informative purposes. The product name will be given to us later."

Merck Sharp & Dohme did not in fact announce its price to public authority, as stated before, until January 17, 1956. The exhibit refers to S. T. Bryan who is a liaison man between Merck Sharp & Dohme and its International, and he is quoted as having given prices which "the S&D Division is expected to establish."

In G-55, dated July 8, 1954, Mr. Kenneth D. McGregor wrote a memo to Mr. Loynd and others concerning the Polio Foundation contract. In it he says among other things:

"It was understood that Mr. Fritsch would talk with Mr. Beesley prior to Lilly meeting the Foundation and that I will talk with Mr. Wheeler afterward."

Mr. McGregor and Mr. Wheeler were respectively general counsel to Parke, Davis and Lilly. At Transcript 1930, Mr. Beesley testified that he never met Mr. Fritsch who is now deceased.

As to the category E. Abnormal Company Pricing Procedures:

G-148 is a report on the work of Lilly's Products Additions & Deletions Committee. It appeared that the subject of pricing was referred to the Marketing Committee, which took no action upon it. Mr. Beesley testified, Transcript 2194, that pricing was not the function of this committee. At Transcript 1807, Mr. Beesley related the details concerning the elements which were considered in determining price. At Transcript 1982, he testified that costs and these many factors were not added together for the purpose of setting the prices, but they were all considered, as well as what price the public would accept as ultimately governing the decision.

Pitman-Moore had a new product committee but it did not make any recommendation for the price on polio vaccine, which was set by Mr. Valentine, in consultation with Mr. Ball, his assistant, and Mr. Ruch, his sales manager.

Wyeth had a so-called form M89 procedure which governed prices and price changes. These were normally initiated by the request of the sales manager and involved the execution of forms to go through the regular channels of the company, which normally took two to three weeks. Mr. AuBuchon testified that the pricing of polio vaccine was accomplished informally by conference with the appropriate executives who acted forthwith. This procedure was countenanced in emergencies and he felt that the polio vaccine pricing situation warranted action similar to the emergency treatment.

Merck Sharp & Dohme is involved in Exhibit G-152, a memorandum from Henry Ditzel to C. W. Foy, which directs arrangement for a catalogue sheet on poliomyelitis vaccine. It is dated January 17, 1956, following the meetings of December 21, 1955 and January 12, 1956 between Mr. Kuryloski of Merck Sharp & Dohme and Mr. Greeve, HEW's liaison man with producers. Mr. Greeve advised Merck Sharp & Dohme how to enter the market in terms of other producers' activities, concerning policies, prices, and so forth.

Summaries of these meetings are found in the Merck Sharp & Dohme exhibits, December 21, 1955 and January 12, 1956, MSD-27 and 28, respectively.

On January 25th, 1956, Mr. Kuryloski said in a letter to Mr. Greeve, Merck Sharp & Dohme Exhibit 30: "We now know how United States Public Health Service wants us to operate."

Merck Sharp & Dohme had refused to quote HEW in May, August and October, 1955.

Parke, Davis pricing and catalogue department was not responsible for either price determination or change. It has no "normal" pricing procedure. Transcript 2358. Mr. David had a limited hand in pricing and almost none in completely new products. Transcript 2286-87. It had no pricing committee. Transcript 2359.

Mr. Loynd set Parke, Davis's price in talks with Mr. Meyer and Mr. Walker. Transcript 2466.

The next category, F. Pricing Without Reference to Supply and Demand.

Lilly's change in its distribution system permitted it to lower its list by 11 per cent on February 6, 1956, it had eliminated any allowance to retailers, and though its price was reduced, the net it received was a trifle greater than before. This was done at a time when every other producer was having difficulty in getting its vaccine to pass tests for release.

The second cut, on May 15, 1956, by Parke, Davis was heard of by Mr. Beesley on the ticker in his office. Transcript 2072.

Mr. Beesley had costs checked and said that at this time his supply was catching up with demand, Transcript 2134. The third cut was made by Merck Sharp & Dohme on April 18, 1957. The Grand Jury was already in session, and Lilly consulted counsel for advice. Pursuant thereto it simply followed its business judgment in meeting the cut. Lilly had seen no reason to cut further during the last months of 1956, although it had accumulated an inventory that amounted to 22 million cc's by January 1, 1957. This was quickly diminished in the early months of 1957. Instead of cutting prices during the fall of 1956, Lilly chose to reduce production, claiming this was better business judgment since it had no vaccine that was close to expiration date. In March of 1957, 15 million cc's were sold. Transcript 2144-46.

[Identical Prices—Lower Bids Solicited]

Mr. Upchurch, purchasing agent for North Carolina, testified that Mr. Jewett of Pitman-Moore told him that he had vaccine which he was anxious to sell in the latter part of 1956. Fifteen bidders had quoted identical prices and in February of 1957, Mr. Upchurch invited them all to bid lower. None responded. At this time inventories were falling and a cut in price would have affected one bidding adversely under the most favored customer clause in the HEW contract.

Mr. Bartlett of Pitman-Moore's Foreign Sales Department testified that he believed Pitman-Moore had approximately three million doses on hand in November of 1956. Transcript 3403.

["Cost Plus" Plan Rejected]

On November 21, 1956, G-1-R-53-0053, Mr. Ball of Pitman-Moore declined a request of the Armed Services Medical Procurement Agency to determine costs and agree to a cost plus basis.

Mr. Bartlett in a letter to a prospective distributor in South Africa dated October 24, 1956 declared that there was "plenty of vaccine now available"—"many more times than sufficient to meet the domestic demand"—"available supply being drained off." He spoke of "delay next year." Mr. Bartlett testified that he thought Pitman-Moore had a lot of vaccine on hand but it developed he was very wrong. He wrote the letter to South Africa in the nature of inspiring the prospective purchaser with security that vaccine could be furnished if ordered promptly.

[Meeting Price Cuts]

When Pitman-Moore met the first cut, it did so with a bid of 6.34 and maintained this price above the 6.33 cut for about two months. During this time complaints developed to such an extent that it went down to the identical 6.33. Transcript 1484, 1589.

Of the second cut, Mr. Valentine wrote in a letter of May 16, 1956 to Mr. Bartlett in Europe that he did not know why Parke, Davis cut. He supposed it wanted prestige. Transcript 1600.

When Merck Sharp & Dohme announced its April 18, 1957 cut, Pitman-Moore did not follow until May 2, 1957. It was timid about a reduction for it feared liability under the most favored customer clause on all it had sold before.

Pitman-Moore made a fourth cut in December of 1957 to the State of Maryland, bidding 4.78 net. It implemented this in a general cut to public authority on December 30, 1957. Pitmor-53, Transcript 3018.

[Following Competitors' Prices]

Wyeth never had a short-dated supply. Its vaccine only had a four-months' life. It started out with a three 1 cc vial which cost more than the 3 cc vial. It tried to get $3.00 instead of $2.85 for it, but the reaction convinced it that it could not get the higher price. Transcript 2877. G-42 and G-70. Wyeth followed Lilly prices. After a discussion it decided to meet the first cut of Lilly of February 6, 1956 on February 8. It learned of the Parke, Davis second cut from an article in the Wall Street Journal of May 15, G-132, and after discussion of its executives it met the reduction on May 16. Transcript 2890.

When Sharpe & Dohme's third cut was announced on April 18, 1957 it decided to meet it on May 6, 1957 although it had had no vaccine from May of 1956 to February 1957 and then only small releases to May of 1957.

November 1, 1957 Wyeth bid a delivered price of $4.92 to the State of Maryland on 4500 vials on a direct bid.

Merck Sharp & Dohme did not have a large inventory in late '56 and '57. It was selling well below its sales level, and Mr. Hovey of HEW testified that a cut was not to be expected if a producer was selling all he could make. Merck Sharp & Dohme's quotations were on an if available basis. G-1-R-57-0218, 0223, 0216.

When Merck Sharp & Dohme made the third cut on April 29, 1957 it was out of the red for the first time, and, as did Parke, Davis, it made the reduction to gain attention. On December 4, 1957 it quoted New York City a price of $4.78 net. Also Merck Sharp & Dohme bid $5.02 to the City of Baltimore on October 28, 1957.

Parke, Davis followed Lilly's cut on February 16, 1956. It was having production troubles but wanted to keep its name before the market. Parke, Davis had no vaccine passing tests from July 16, 1955 to February 24, 1956. It was two and a half million dollars in the red when it decided to make the second cut on May 15, 1956, anticipating its return to the market. This was announced in a news release, G-132, attended with considerable bravado considering its position. It did not give consideration to Lilly's cutting below but determined that the cut would put it prominently back in the eyes of the trade. When the third cut came by Merck Sharp & Dohme on April 18, 1957, Parke, Davis had no choice but to cut once Lilly followed. It received calls from Mr. Schultz of HEW in Washington and Miss Pinto, a Military Purchaser in Brooklyn, inquiring for its decision as to whether it would meet the cut.

In 1957, in December, Parke, Davis made a fourth cut by way of a sealed bid in New York City, as we have heretofore indicated.

The next category, G, Price Reductions all made through Public Announcement.

All of the defendants which chose to make formal price reductions did not initiate them through sealed bids but sought to achieve maximum notice and publicity by public announcements. Lilly in its reduction of February 3, 1956 sought to achieve credit for initiating the first reduction.

Parke, Davis designed its public reduction of May 15, 1956 to acquire the maximum free publicity and notice of its being back in the market. It had been a leader in the Foundation program and was embarrassed by its later production troubles,

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Transcript 2417. In December of 1957 it bid to the State of New York by way of a sealed quotation, but its reason for this was that the market pressures had changed.

Merck Sharp & Dohme's intention was not to acquire more business by its public reduction, but, like Parke, Davis, to regain its standing in the market.

Wyeth never initiated a public announced price reduction. It simply followed others, as did Pitman-Moore. They also claimed their sealed bid quotations late in 1957 were the result of changed market conditions and the expiration of the effect of the most favored customer clause in the HEW contracts. Nevertheless, the resort by those defendants who initiated reductions by public announcement thereof rather than through channels of sealed bidding is claimed by the Government to be evidence from which the inference may be drawn that there was agreement among them upon this course.

H. Failure to Give Usual Terms to Public Authority.

Lilly. The Government claims that the conduct of defendants with regard to allowing quantity discounts, transportation charges and returns of merchandise was an agreed design upon the part of the defendants to support the uniformity of prices of the vaccine. Lilly maintained the policy throughout of refusing quantity discounts and did not tender them even to the General Services Administration, the Government Procurement branch.

Lilly followed a practice of shipping its merchandise F. O. B. destination, a course most favored by its buyers, as testified to by Messrs. Hovey of HEW and Mr. Nicholson of Milwaukee. Furthermore, HEW by the end of 1956 required all defendants to pay for air express, as most appeared to have been doing anyway. G-1-R-57-0167, 0148, 0158, 0176, 0185. As to returns, the Product Addition & Deletions Committee of Lilly recommended no returns on polio vaccine, G-148. Indeed, its policy was not to permit returns on biologicals generally.

Mr. Valentine of Pitman-Moore remembered vaguely that a quantity discount was once given to the General Services Administration during what he thought was the so-called 50 and 7 discount period. That is quite early in the polio marketing program. Transcript 1482, but all quantity discounts were ultimately eliminated even from the General Services Administration catalogue.

As to transportation, Pitman-Moore first paid ordinary charges F. O. B. destination. Where air express was directed, the customer was required to pay the difference, but in October of 1956 the defendants undertook to pay air charges as well.

In the matter of returns of polio vaccine, "Planned Detailing" Pitmor-15, specified that it would accept none from any class of trade, but General Services Administration could return under the Pitman-Moore catalogue, Transcript 810.

There was no evidence that any public agency ever sought to return polio vaccine. Transcript 810.

Wyeth allowed no quantity discounts, although in its GSA contract it agreed that special prices would be quoted on quantity lots on request. It received no such request. Transcript 807.

Wyeth paid transportation by air F. O. B. destination. Initial shipments by Wyeth to HEW were labeled "No Returns." This label was later removed but there were no returns of polio vaccine.

In Merck Sharp & Dohme 27 and 28, Mr. Greeve of HEW was said to have apprised Merck Sharp & Dohme of Wyeth's method [of] handling returns. Merck Sharp & Dohme asserted that since its inventory was below sales level, it had valid reason to decline quantity discounts. Indeed, Mr. Hovey of HEW supports that assertion. Merck Sharp & Dohme shipped by ordinary transportation F. O. B. destination, but eventually came to paying for transportation by air. Shipping its merchandise F. O. B. destination had been a long-standing policy of Merck Sharp & Dohme since 1937, reemphasized in 1948 and 1955. Transcript 2723 and Merck Sharp & Dohme Exhibits 34 and 35.

Parke, Davis had no set rule on these discounts. In the New York City bid in December of 1957 a low price was quoted on a large order for 105,000 vials, Transcript 2341, 2495.

From April 1, 1955 to December 31, 1957 some discounts where given on other biologicals, Transcript 2341, but no quantity discounts were permitted while Parke, Davis was in the red on polio vaccine. Transcript 2343.

Parke, Davis shipped F. O. B. destination as described for Merck Sharp & Dohme. It insisted that a quote of 5.586, Parke, Davis' then established and net price to public authority, made to the State of New York F. O. B. its plant, was not an error and did not lower the price of merchandise but reflected the fact that multiple destinations in New York State were involved.

Contracts of Parke, Davis with GSA of September of 1956, Exhibit G-1-R-58-0126 provided that polio vaccine would be returnable. Later Parke, Davis stamped invoices "No Returns" to discourage them. Transcript 2471. But generally polio vaccine, like any other biological of Parke, Davis, was returnable. Transcript 2470.

Mr. Hovey of the HEW testified that its contract did not provide for returns and never asked for such provision, and Mr. Kimble testified that out-dated vaccine was never a problem, Transcript 666.

Since it is now the time of our usual recess and since there is considerable further to go, I suggest for your benefit and mine that we take the usual five minutes.

(Short recess.)

The Court: We now come to the category I, Distribution Practices Which Assured Uniformity.

The Government sought to show that each defendant took steps to assure that the price quoted to public authority for its brand of polio vaccine would not deviate from an established price no matter how the vaccine was sold to public authority.

Historically Eli Lilly has always sold to wholesalers. These are referred to as Lilly franchise wholesalers. Nevertheless, initially retailers received 10 per cent on sales made to public authority below the state level. In passing, it should be noted that Lilly reserved the right to quote direct to the Federal Government as did each of the other defendants. Indeed, Mr. Hovey and Mr. Nicholson testified that it was their preference, as purchasing agents to receive bids directly from the manufacturers as opposed to wholesalers or retailers. Transcript 723, 349.

The handling allowance permitted retailers by Lilly was eliminated on February 6, 1956 by what has been referred to throughout the case as an agency agreement. G-133. This agreement permitted the wholesaler to quote Lilly's newly-established public authority price of $6.33 less 2 per cent or 6.20 net. The choice of submission was left to the wholesaler. According to Mr. Beesley, this caused chaos among the wholesalers, Transcript 2064, and in view of the importance of the wholesalers to Lilly, it became a very disturbing situation. To rectify this condition, Lilly purchased a second agency agreement on July 13, 1956, G-134, which provided that the wholesaler would quote Lilly's then-established public authority price of 5.70 less 2 per cent or 5.586. It should be noted that both agreements provided that no handling allowance for retailers was contemplated.

Parenthetically, it should be noted that according to a letter dated April 4, 1955, and written by Mr. F. C. Abendroth, manager of the pricing development department of Lilly, a sale to a city, county or state institution was to be made through a retailer when "absolutely necessary" and that a 10 per cent handling allowance would be paid only upon condition that the retailer sell the vaccine at a price not less than the established board of health or public authority price, > "and if he sacrifices part of his handling charge in order to obtain the business, we will not allow the retailer a handling charge . . . In other words, the vaccine must be sold at 7.13 per package to the board of health." G-62.

Mr. Abendroth's letter was a reply to an inquiry from a Lilly representative in Denver, Colorado, dated March 30, 1955, G-63, in which the writer made the following observation:

> "Some thirteen or fourteen years ago when we sold our biological products through a retailer to a health institution we allowed this retailer to deduct 16⅔, as I recall, and in addition gave him a 10 per cent handling charge. However, if this retailer upon bid, or in any other fashion, passed on to the health department any portion of his 10 per cent handling charge, or bid the item at less than net trade less 16⅔ per cent, we did not allow him any handling charge in this type of violation."

Mr. Abendroth's letter, G-62, of April 4, 1955, antedated the most favored customer clause by approximately six months. Further, it appears that Lilly had never used such an agency agreement before those which appear herein and Lilly, since the introduction of the agreement, has used the agreement on only one other occasion.

According to the testimony, the retailers' handling allowance was eliminated on polio vaccine in 1956 because they, the retailers, were no longer needed.

Lilly's agency agreements were an admitted attempt to do all that could be legally done to maintain a uniform price among its wholesalers which Lilly considered so vital to its wellbeing.

Mr. Beesley testified, Transcript 2237, that Lilly never pressured a dealer or refused either a handling allowance or delivery, although Lilly did ask that wholesalers sell at the regular price. Further, he testified that Lilly did not like its products to be footballed and that in order to implement that policy, the agency agreement was drawn.

Prior to the advent of polio vaccine Pitman-Moore's activity had been devoted to the veterinary field of medicine and to the dispensing physician in the area of human medicine. I mean the emphasis had been on the veterinary field of medicine. There came a time, however, before the Salk vaccine program got under way, when the management of Pitman-Moore concluded that it was time for them to change that emphasis in their sales from the dispensing physician to the prescribing physician and they were looking for a product that would afford them the opportunity to make this transition. It was the testimony of Mr. Kenneth Valentine, president of Pitman-Moore, that polio vaccine appeared to be that product. Mr. Valentine further testified that Pitman-Moore realized that its entire system of discounts and distribution would have to be revamped if the transition was to be successful. Indeed, preliminary steps had already been taken. For example, market testing was already being conducted at the time that the Salk vaccine program got under way.

Thus it was that the end of the allocation system on July 31, 1956 saw Pitman-Moore directly faced with a problem in distribution. Specifically, the allocation system had in effect provided for Pitman-Moore an automatic system of distribution which did not necessitate Pitman-Moore having its own wholesalers or other outlets.

Mr. John R. Jewett, coordinator of polio vaccine sales for Pitman-Moore, realized that the end of allocation was the start of Pitman-Moore's necessary acquisition of in-state bidders or representatives. Mr. Jewett had correctly observed that in-state bidders frequently enjoyed an advantage over their out-of-state counterparts, especially in the matter of tie bids. Mr. Jewett discussed this problem with Mr. H. O. Ball, his immediate superior, then went on a vacation and when he returned found that his thoughts on in-state bidders were being implemented by Mr. Ball in the form of an agency agreement which was eventually published as G-13, September 14, 1956, a letter to all MD's and combination salesmen.

This agreement was implemented in G-105, September 21, 1956, a letter to a Raleigh, North Carolina pharmacy. That is, it is an actual agency authorization from Pitman-Moore permitting the pharmacy to bid Pitman-Moore's vaccine at Pitman-Moore's then-established price for a 10 per cent handling allowance.

Prior to September 14, 1956 Pitman-Moore had already selected some firms to bid its product. Transcript 2942. Mr. Jewett emphasized that this was not an agency relationship, Transcript 2943. Thus, on August 2, 1956, the Thrifty Drug Company had been authorized to submit a bid on 50,000 vials of polio vaccine to the State of Illinois. However, Pitman-Moore or Thrifty did not receive the award, and no allowance was in fact paid. On this bid, Thrifty had split its 10 per cent allowance with the state. To preclude the successful submission of a bid below its established price to public authority, Pitman-Moore endeavored to arrange with the state that it would bid directly and if successful, would pay an allowance to a local firm.

It should be noted that the Pitman-Moore agency agreement provided for the handling allowance to be paid on sales to city, county and state authorities, Transcript 2942, and that no allowance would be paid if a price lower than that established was bid. Transcript 3095 and 2952.

Mr. Jewett testified that agency agreements applied to any product. Thus, if a potential bidder desired authorization to quote on a Pitman-Moore product, he would so inform Pitman-Moore, and if the parties agreed, the agency document would be drawn. As with polio vaccine, no allowance was permitted if a price below that then established was bid.

In January 1957 Mr. Louis Wolin of New York obtained authorization to submit a bid on Pitman-Moore polio vaccine to the City of Milwaukee. Mr. Wolin split his potential 10 per cent allowance with Milwaukee and, pursuant to the agreement, Pitman-Moore refused to deliver. Transcript 357-8.

Wyeth's distribution was made through five distributors, Transcript 2905 and 6, although wholesalers were used when necessary and handling charges were allowed in such instances. Transcript 2908-11.

From August 1955 to April 10, 1957 Wyeth gave allowances on city, county, state sales to public authorities of polio vaccine to its five distributors. On the latter date, it discontinued this practice as to polio vaccine only, G-161, elimination of handling allowances dated April 10, 1957, Transcript 2908.

["Most Favored Customer" Clause]

It appears that the Thrifty Drug Company already mentioned in connection with Pitman-Moore, submitted a bid to the State of Illinois of 6.76 on January 13, 1956. G-112, page 3. Thrifty also bid below Wyeth's established price on polio vaccine on February 2, May 16, May 28 and June 14, 1956. Thrifty's practice of bidding below the producer's established price was made impractical by the November 2, 1956 amendment to the most favored customer clause, G-1-R-57-0175, which reads as follows:

> "It is further understood and agreed that in the event vaccine is sold to or for the use of public health agencies at a price lower than the contract price during the contract period, such reduction shall apply to the contract."

This was an enlargement of the application of the original most favored customer clause of October 6, 1955, G-1-R-57-0105 which reads as follows:

> "It is further understood and agreed that in the event a price reduction on vaccine is made to health agencies, during the contract period, such reduction shall apply to this contract. In no case shall prices exceed those charged to any other health agency."

Merck Sharp & Dohme sold directly to the Federal agencies. Before October 1956 Merck Sharp & Dohme allowed wholesalers a 10 per cent handling charge on state bids when necessary. Transcript 2598-99. After October 1956 it no longer did so on polio vaccine only because wholesalers were no longer needed. Transcript 2601.

Prior to October 1956, retailers could also quote city, county and state public authorities in their own behalf and receive a 10 per cent allowance. Transcript 2581.

It was Merck Sharp & Dohme's practice to advise its wholesalers of its bids in order to inform the wholesaler of his cost. Transcript 2584. According to Merck Sharp & Dohme, the wholesaler was free to quote any price. An example of this was submitted through the testimony of Mr. Harkness, who submitted a bid to the State of Kansas below that then established by Merck Sharp & Dohme. The testimony was to the effect that Merck Sharp & Dohme was "elated" at Mr. Harkness's low bid. Unfortunately, it appears Mr. Harkness's bond was not sufficient to cover his bid and accordingly he was not successful. It is noteworthy that although Mr. Harkness had apparently been doing business with the State of Kansas for a long time, he had never had any difficutly because of his bond before the incident just related.

It should also be noted that Mr. Harkness had bid Lilly's vaccine at 5.536 rather than the Lilly established price of 5.586 net. Following his submission of that bid, Mr. Harkness received a call from his wholesaler, McPike, who informed him first that the Fair Trade agreement precluded the submission of a bid below the price then established which did not influence Mr. Harkness, and, second, that by virtue of the Lilly agency agreement with McPike, no handling allowance was contemplated for the retailer, that is, Mr. Harkness. As a result of this conversation, Mr. Harkness withdrew his bid on Lilly vaccine because, said Mr. Harkness, he did not want to be the cause of McPike losing his Lilly franchise.

Mr. Kuryloski testified, Transcript 2581, that Merck Sharp & Dohme's regular distribution system was adopted for polio vaccine, and that pursuant thereto the retailers could quote city, county, state in their own behalf until October 1956 as noted heretofore. Wholesalers could do likewise, Transcript 2582.

Parke, Davis sold directly to the state as well as to the Federal Government. Prior to October 1, 1956 both wholesalers and retailers were technically able to bid to public authorities below the state level. Transcript 2490. In fact, however, none had ever done so. On October 1, 1956, even this possibility was eliminated by virtue of the withdrawal of the 10 per cent handling allowance, a matter which had been first considered in 1950, and which was not brought about solely by polio vaccine, with the result that Parke, Davis never paid a handling charge to anyone but a very small number of distributors which it maintained for the sake of having a local address. This was the practice as to all Parke, Davis products, Transcript 2484.

The Parke, Davis normal system of distribution was through 22 branches supplemented by 1195 biological depots. A biological depot is a retailer who stocks a complete line of all Parke, Davis biologicals for which he receives 40 and 15 for service distribution. In 1956 Parke, Davis realized 60 per cent of its sales through these depots. Transcript 2491.

Parke, Davis argued that it did not engage in policing activity as to any of its bidders. The record, however, indicates that two bids of 5.027, as opposed to 5.0274 net, the then-established Parke, Davis price, made to the State of New Hampshire on May 7, 1957 and the State of Connecticut on May 28, 1957, were withdrawn by its Boston branch.

Mr. Stephen David, pricing and cataloguing manager of Parke, Davis, testified at Transcript 2333 that he received a telephone call from Mr. Hearty, the manager of the Parke, Davis Boston branch, who indicated that a price of 5.027 had been quoted whereupon Mr. David told Mr. Hearty that 5.0274 was the correct quote. Mr. David did not recall whether the call was about Connecticut or New Hampshire but thought that his instructions were used to cover both bids. Transcript 2335.

J. Uniform Resistance to Attempts by Purchasing Agents to Break Price.

The Government produced evidence through the testimony of Federal purchasing agents that attempts were made to devise bid invitations in such a way as to force the defendants to vary either their price or the terms and conditions of sale of polio vaccine, none of which were accepted by the defendants. This, represented the Government, showed agreement upon the part of the defendants to maintain uniform prices.

Lilly refused to grant further discounts in line with its longstanding policy and also declined to give separate billing for shipping costs in continuation of its policy never to do so.

At the request of HEW, Mr. Rose of General Services Administration solicited offers from Lilly and all other defendants for vaccine to be delivered without specification as to containers and otherwise on a broad basis, sometime during late '56 or early '57. The amount contained in the offer was estimated to be 400,000 cc's. All defendants returned bids quoting 5.586, G-1-R-57-0216. This was at a time when inventories were supposed to be unusually high, and Mr. Rose expected that his solicitations would produce a reduction in the bidding. Lilly's inventory was high but within six weeks the inventory began to melt away; besides, the defendants found no attraction in the solicitation because they said the Government's requirement was only estimated at 400,000 cc's and could have been less.

[Inducement to Reduce Bids]

In the fall of 1956, Mr. Slocum, purchasing agent for New York, sought to secure a deviation in bidding by providing for bids F. O. B. plant instead of F. O. B. destination and also in soliciting for bids in two ways. The bidder had a choice between Part 1 of the invitation wherein four items were solicited individually and Part 2 where in the same four items were solicited, but if the bidder reduced the price on any one of them, he would receive the award for all four, which amounted to more than $140,000 in the aggregate.

Lilly, as did others, declined to reduce on this inducement. It is true that its inventory was rising and stood at 22,000,000 cc's in January of 1957, but these were sold by March of '57. It was during this period, the fall of 1956, that Lilly made the determination to reduce production rather than to take a cut in price.

On January 7, 1957 Mr. Upchurch, the North Carolina purchasing agent, solicited bids for some 8,000 vials to be delivered from February 1957 to June 1957. On the receipt of identical quotations, he solicited bidders, again without success. It is to be noted that by February 1, 1957 sales were very heavy.

Commander Mazzone, late of the Armed Services Medical Procurement Agency (ASMPA), testified that on October 19, 1956, November 1, 1956 and January 28, 1957, he awarded bids to Parke, Davis by virtue of the fact that all bids submitted were the same, with the result that under the applicable regulations Parke, Davis, which was located in a distressed labor area, received the awards. Two other producers, Eli Lilly and Pitman-Moore inquired independently as to the basis upon which Parke, Davis was awarded the October 19th and November 1st bids.

Commander Mazzone testified that he explained the application of the regulations to the representatives of Lilly and Pitman-Moore when each called and told them that they might overcome Parke, Davis's advantage by having the regulations changed or by lowering their prices. The awards mentioned were for orders totaling $55,000, $134,000 and $201,000 respectively.

The Government stresses the fact that no defendant lowered its price to ASMPA, despite the advice of Commander Mazzone, but the defendants point to the most favored customer clause, by the terms of which any price reduction to ASMPA would have been applied to all sales of polio vaccine to Federal authorities and by virtue of the Polio Assistance Act and the little most favored customer clause employed by some of the states to virtually every domestic public authority.

Apparently for one reason or another these defendants thought it best to forego lowering their prices in order to win the ASMPA bids in favor of seeking to sell their vaccine elsewhere. Indeed Pitman-Moore shortly thereafter sold very substantial quantities of vaccine to ASMPA.

I am aware of the fact that throughout this very period Lilly's inventory was growing at such a rate that as Mr. Beesley testified production was severely cut back. However, I am also aware of the fact that although this inventory was approximately 22 million cc's on January 1, 1957, it was completely expended by March.

Pitman-Moore admittedly declined to become involved in any reduction of its bids which would reflect diminution in any price quoted to HEW because of the most favored customer clause. It also was solicited by the same purchasing agents as mentioned in connection with Lilly and remained obdurate to any invitation to make reductions or changes in connection with the invitation devised by Mr. Slocum, purchasing agent for New York, in which he requested that the shipments be made F. O. B. plant. Pitman-Moore did, however, offer to itemize the shipping cost to the various fourteen destinations in New York so as to give Mr. Slocum a basis for his recovery from counties to which the shipments were made.

Mr. Upchurch testified that Mr. Jewett of Pitman-Moore said he had vaccine and was anxious to sell but also said that Mr. Jewett stated that the supply had caught up with the demand for Pitman-Moore as of late December 1956 and early January 1957.

Wyeth was not among those invited to rebid by Mr. Upchurch, purchasing agent for North Carolina. It had no vaccine during the time that Messrs. Slocum, Rose, Hovey and Commander Mazzone concerned themselves with inviting lesser bids during the latter part of 1956. Wyeth did refuse to give a cost breakdown or to enter into price redetermination agreements with the Military Procurement Agency because it was against its policy so to do.

Merck Sharp & Dohme replied to the invitation to quote on an estimated 400,000 cc's that it was short of inventory, and could not quote for delivery in accordance with the invitation, but was willing to quote depending on availability of stock on the basis of its established price of 5.586 net.

Parke, Davis did respond to Mr. Slocum's invitation to bid F. O. B Detroit as requested but the bid was at the established price of 5.586. The reason for this submitted by Parke, Davis was that shipping was called for to 14 separate destinations in New York State. Therefore, Parke, Davis submitted that the full price would only reflect extra cost of preparation of paper work covering the multiple shipments. It viewed price-cutting to any one purchasing agent as but the commencement of a series of price cuts which it viewed as a disastrous policy to pursue.

In the fall of 1956, during which the solicitations for 400,000 cc's estimated were made and the Slocum invitations were proffered, neither Wyeth or Merch Sharp & Dohme had any of the vaccine available. Compare G-1-R-57-0223, November 1, 1956 of Merck Sharp & Dohme.

Assuming the correctness of the Government's assertion that there was a large inventory of polio vaccine during the fall of 1956, it must be noted that by March 1, 1957 the entire polio vaccine supply had been practically exhausted and a shortage resulted. Thus, for whatever reason, all the defendants except Wyeth, which was not producing at the time, were out of polio vaccine in March of 1957.

K. Some Quotations to Foreign Public Authority Varied in Price Terms and Conditions of Sale.

The Government showed that while defendants uniformly quoted the same price to domestic public authority there were occasions when the defendants quoted disparate prices to foreign public authority under comparable market conditions. Shipping terms were granted to such foreign authorities that differed from those permitted domestic authorities. The Government further submitted that polio vaccine was sold to foreign public authority at prices less than domestic prices on the ground that it was "short-dated" although short-dated vaccine was never offered at a reduced price to domestic public authority even during periods when the vaccine was in long supply.

The Government claims that the difference between the foreign situation and the domestic situation was such as to lead to the inference that the defendants' uniformity of price to domestic authorities could have only been maintained pursuant to agreement among them and not through independent action. The instances to which the Government points occurred in five Latin-American countries: Venezuela and Costa Rica in July and August of 1956, Uruguay and Brazil in July and August of 1957 and Chile in October of 1957.

Lilly received an order for the Venezuelan Government from its district manager there, dated July 18, 1956, at the rate of 5.43 F. O. B. Indianapolis. This was pursuant to an early letter written by Lilly in February of 1955 that its price in export countries would be on a net trade basis less 20 and 5 per cent. This pricing was changed in mid-July of 1956 and the Venezuelan representative was informed by letter of the change which was to the price charged public agencies in the United States and would be 5.70 less 2 per cent F. O. B. Indianapolis. This letter crossed that of the Venezuelan representative in the mail. Nevertheless, he was directed to withdraw his bid of 5.43 and substitute the authorized bid of 5.70 less 2 per cent F. O. B. Indianapolis.

Meanwhile, Merck Sharp & Dohme authorized a quote of 5.43 F. O. B. New York and Wyeth on July 2 accepted a Venezuelan purchase offer of 5.43.

In Costa Rica, in August of 1956, Lilly entered a bid of 5.70 less 2 per cent F. O. B. Indianapolis. All bids, of which this was one, were set aside and new quotations solicited. At the last moment, the Costa Rican Government demanded that the bid should be C. I. F. rather than F. O. B. plant. The representative established the C. I. F. quotation by deducting the 2 per cent cash which brought it down to 5.586 net and added 4 and 4/10ths cents as insurance and freight charges, coming up with a C. I. F. price of 5.63 net.

In Uruguay in August of 1957 Lilly entered a bid of 5.13 less 2 per cent cash discount or 1 per cent representing the Uruguayan tax, the merchandise to be shipped C. I. F.

In Chile, a similar bid of 5.13 less 2 per cent C. I. F. was authorized by Lilly on October 25, 1957.

There is no quotation to Brazil by Lilly.

It would therefore appear that Lilly maintained its domestic prices except that in the summer of 1957, Lilly found that competition was quoting the equivalent of its F. O. B. Indianapolis price but delivering for that price. It thereupon quoted C. I. F. prices to meet the competition.

In Costa Rica, in August of 1956, Pitmore's first authorized quote was $5.75 C. I. F. Its second quote was $5.61 C. I. F. The domestic price at that time was 5.70 less 2 per cent F. O. B. destination. Pitman-Moore claimed that $5.61 C. I. F. Costa Rica was an equivalent of the domestic quote.

Pitman-Moore did not quote in Venezuela, but in August of 1957 it bid to Uruguay at 5.13 less 2 per cent C. I. F., subject to the 1 per cent Uruguayan tax.

In Brazil in August 1957 it authorized a quotation of 5.027 C. I. F. when the domestic price was 5.13 less 2 per cent F. O. B. destination.

In Chile in October of 1957 it entered the same bid.

Wyeth's only authorized quotation in Costa Rica was $5.70 F. A. S. Philadelphia in August of 1956. In Venezuela, Wyeth accepted a government purchase order of $5.43 on July 2nd, 1956, but could not deliver the merchandise.

Wyeth bid only in Costa Rica and Venezuela in foreign sales situations set up by the Government.

In Costa Rica in August of 1956, Merck Sharp & Dohme's first bid was $5.75 C. I. F. or $5.70 F. O. B. New York. Its second bid was $5.45 C. I. F. The latter quotation was a reaction to the Pitman-Moore bid of $5.46.

In Venezuela in August of 1956 Merck Sharp & Dohme bid $5.43 F. O. B. New York, a reaction to a Wyeth bid which in turn was a reaction to the erroneous bid of Lilly.

In Uruguay, Merck Sharp & Dohme's bid in August of 1957 was $5.0274 C. I. F.

Merck Sharp & Dohme did not bid in Chile but on July the 11th, it bid in Brazil $5.027 C. I. F.

Parke, Davis bid in August 1956 in Costa Rica $5.73 less 2 per cent C. I. F. on both occasions. The 3-cent differential over $5.70 represented the difference between the domestic F. O. B. destination and the foreign C. I. F. Parke, Davis did not bid in Venezuela. On July 26, 1957, Parke, Davis bid in Uruguay $5.13 less 2 per cent C. I. F., or $5.02 net.

Parke, Davis said that its representative, J. J. Williams, entered this bid without authority, but it later appeared that the vaccine was actually sold by Parke, Davis for $4.69.

In Chile, Parke, Davis bid on October 14th, 1957, $5.13 less 2 per cent C. I. F. It later reduced this to $4.62 less 2 per cent C. I. F. because it had come into competition with Connaught, the Canadian firm which was offering a 10 cc vial for $5.13.

In Brazil on August 20th, 1957, Parke, Davis quoted a price of $5.025 C. I. F. This superseded a quote of $5.027 C. I. F. of June 26, 1957, and was made to meet competition reported by Parke, Davis's Brazilian representative.

It further appears that in April, June and November of 1955, Parke, Davis bid $6.84 less 2 per cent (6.7032 as opposed to the continental United States price of 6.9874 net) to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. This price was the export trade price less 20 and 5 per cent. This worked out to be 40, 20 and 5 off $15. Transcript 3803.

Parke, Davis has represented it did not sell any polio vaccine to any domestic public authority in 1955. Mr. Bratzel, at Transcript 3808, testified that he could not say whether the Puerto Rican bids were ever shipped or not.

It further appears that on two occasions Parke, Davis sold to Argentina vaccine which was considered short-dated. The first of these transactions occurred on August 25, 1956, and involved vaccine with an expiration date of September 23, 1956, or less than one month. The price was $4.50 or approximately 20 per cent less than the United States public authority price of $5.70 less 2 per cent.

The second of these transactions occurred on September 21, 1956 and involved vaccine having expiration dates of December 23 and 26, 1956. This vaccine was sold for about $5.10 or $5.13, and reflected a compromise between—at $5.70, the established domestic price, and the Argentine offer of $4.50, the price per vial of the first shipment.

These transactions necessitated that Parke, Davis represent to the Government that it had endeavored to sell this vaccine domestically but without success. Such a representation was, in fact, made and is found in Parke, Davis 24, 25. Transcript 3823, 26.

In this connection, Mr. Stephen David, pricing and catalogue manager of Parke, Davis, testified that from April 1, 1955 to December 31, 1957, he never received an invitation to bid on short-dated vaccine except the foregoing Argentina invitation.

It should be noted, however, that on August 21, 1956, the Armed Services Military Procurement Agency solicited an emergency bid of 10,000 vials but that Parke, Davis replied stating that it had no vaccine available. Transcript 3793, G-1-R-59-0031. It was argued that although the Argentine short-dated vaccine was not shipped until August 25, 1956, the vaccine itself had been committed prior to August 21, 1956.

On September 4, 1956, ASMPA again solicited a bid from Parke, Davis for 13,334 vials of polio vaccine. Transcript 3793. G-1-R-59-0036. Parke, Davis replied, offering vaccine having an expiration date of December 19, 1956 (3½ months) at $5.586, the Parke, Davis then-established price to domestic authority.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

The record is devoid of any indication that ASMPA would have been interested in short-dated vaccine as such.

I note that the purchasing agent of the State of New York, Mr. Slocum, solicited bids for vaccine having an expiration date of not less than two months, in October 1956. There is, however, no indication that Parke, Davis had available any vaccine that would have met with Mr. Slocum's requirements.

G-186 and 187 are letters of June 12 and September 10, 1957, transmitting pro forma invoices from Parke, Davis to the Rykinskoop Bureau of The Hague, Netherlands. Transcript 3797. They show that Parke, Davis shipped 41,818 vials and 7,500 vials on each occasion. Of these quantities the Rykinskoop Bureau was billed for 40,485 and 7,267 vials respectively. Parke, Davis did not charge for the remainder of the vials.

These transactions were apparently occasioned by the fact that the Rykinskoop Bureau of the Netherlands Government could only pay a price which amounted to the domestic Parke, Davis price for 40,485 and 7,267 vials respectively, although the need was for 41,818 and 7,500 vials. In order to obtain the order, Parke, Davis billed the Bureau for the quotient which resulted when the funds available to the Bureau were divided by the then-established domestic public authority price of $5.13 less 2 per cent, $5.0274. The difference between the number of vials ordered and the number of vials paid for at that price was shipped free in both instances.

Parke, Davis conceded that these transactions represented price cuts. They were certainly a departure on its part from its strict adherence to uniformity on the domestic scene.

These transactions which, incidentally, were not proposed by the Government in its proffer of proof of foreign sales, must take their place in a consideration of all of the other circumstances brought out in the Government's case.

[Motion for Acquittal—"Circumstantial Evidence Case"]

In this Circuit, the rule governing the determination of a motion for acquittal made under Rule 29 in a circumstantial evidence case—and this is such a case—is clear. It has been set out in United States v. Gasomiser Corp., 7 FRD 712 (D. Del. 1947) at page 718, where Judge Rodney wrote:

> "This then being a criminal case based upon circumstantial evidence, in order for the motions of the defendants to be denied guilt must be the only reasonable hypothesis from such evidence. If there is any other reasonable hypothesis, although admittedly guilt may also be a reasonable hypothesis, then the defendants are entitled to judgments of acquittal. In this circuit, it is clear that 'In order to justify a conviction of crime on circumstantial evidence it is necessary that the directly proven circumstances be such as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis but that of guilt.' United States v. Laffman, 3 Cir., 1945, 152 F. 2d 393, 394; United States v. Tatcher, 3 Cir., 1942, 131 F. 2d 1002, 1003; United States v. Russo, 3 Cir., 1941, 123 F. 2d 420, 423, or, as it has been otherwise stated by many courts in this circuit, 'Unless there is substantial evidence of facts which exclude every other hypothesis but that of guilt, it is the duty of the trial court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the accused.' Paul v. United States, 3 Cir., 1935, 79 F. 2d 561, 563; Nicola v. United States, 3 Cir., 1934, 72 F. 2d 780, 786; Grant v. United States, 3 Cir., 1931, 49 F. 2d, 118, 119. . . ."

["Reasonable Hypothesis of Innocence"]

Simply stated, this requires that the Government not only prove the defendants' guilt based on a reasonable hypothesis beyond a reasonable doubt, but also that the Government simultaneously eliminate every other reasonable hypothesis of innocence. It hardly need be stated that in making this determination, the evidence introduced in the Government's case must be looked at in the light most favorable to it. But this does not mean that every possible inference in favor of the Government is drawn from the evidence—but only that inferences reasonably deducible therefrom are to be drawn.

In Gasomiser, Judge Rodney said further, at page 721:

> "It should be made clear, however, that while all the government's evidence is accepted as true, the court may very well look to the defense evidence for the purpose of ascertaining a reasonable hypothesis other than guilt. In many cases, a motion for judgment of acquittal made at the close of the government's case will be denied because there is no apparent reasonable hypothesis from the circumstances other than that of guilt. Indeed, in most cases any hypothesis other than guilt can only be shown in defense. The government usually is interested solely in presenting its own case, and inferences other than guilt can only be shown by facts at variance with the hypothesis of the government itself. If the rule that 'unless there is substantial evidence of facts which exclude every other hypothesis but that of guilt, it is the duty of the trial court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the accused' has merit, then the rule must be invoked at a time when it may have value. After the defense evidence has been presented, therefore, such a motion may be granted for the reason that the defense evidence has presented a reasonable hypothesis other than guilt which may be inferred from all of the government's evidence. Whenever such a hypothesis exists, the case should not be allowed to go to the jury, because any inference drawn by the jury would be no more than the jury's determination as to which of two reasonable hypotheses be the correct one, and defendants in criminal cases based upon circumstantial evidence alone are entitled to have their presumption of innocence sustained as a matter of law when the inference of innocence is a reasonable one under the evidence."

[Testimony of Defendants' Officers and Employees]

Now, the instant motion comes at the conclusion of the Government's case, and ordinarily the defendants would not, at this stage in the trial have had the opportunity to present what they consider reasonable hypothesis of innocence. But that has not been true in this case.

The defendants are corporations, personified through their corporate officers and employees. They enjoy no privilege against self-incrimination and, while the individuals would if they themselves were defendants, such is not the case. Thus the Government's case has consisted in large measure of the testimony of high-ranking corporate officers and employees of the defendants, viz. the president of Eli Lilly and the executive vice-president of Eli Lilly International; the president of Pitman-Moore, the vice-president in charge of exports for Pitman-Moore and the coordinator of polio vaccine sales for Pitman-Moore; the sales manager of Wyeth and the vice-president, director of sales for Wyeth International the director of sales and marketing of MS&D, the president of MS&D International and the MS&D International sales territory coordinator; the vice-president of Parke, Davis in charge of domestic sales, the assistant to the director of the western overseas division of Parke, Davis and the manager of the pricing and catalogue department of Parke, Davis.

This approach, an endeavor to prove the guilt of the defendants out of the mouths of their own officers and employees, resulted in testimony tending to establish the innocence of the defendants, if believed, because each of the foregoing witnesses either testified that his determinations, practices and policies as to polio vaccine were based upon independent business considerations only, and were in no wise the result of an understanding or agreement, tacit or otherwise, with any other defendant, or at least gave no testimony tending to establish the contrary. Indeed, each corporate officer asked, emphatically denied collusion, agreement or understanding of any kind with any defendant. Put another way, then, the testimony of each of the defendants' officers and employees, if believed, tends to establish a reasonable hypothesis of innocence.

These hypotheses have been noted heretofore in piecemeal fashion in reviewing the eleven-plus factors relied upon by the Government to establish guilt.

In broad, but not necessarily all-inclusive summary, they are as follows:

As to Lilly:

(a) Lilly's president, Mr. Eugene N. Beesley, testified that his determination of price was based on many factors, including manufacturing costs, business risks, and a consideration of the price which the traffic would bear, and not on any agreement with any other producer of vaccine.

(b) Mr. Beesley further testified that in the opinion of the Lilly Company, the Lilly franchised wholesalers were a vital factor to the economic welfare of Lilly and that because of that fact, the agency agreements were necessary in order to bring order out of the chaos and confusion that had resulted among the Lilly wholesalers when they were bidding disparately.

(c) The change in the distribution setup of Eli Lilly which precluded the allowance of a handling charge to retailers as of February 6, 1956 was occasioned by the fact that the sale of polio vaccine did not necessitate the use of the retail outlet.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

(d) The change in Lilly's discount structure to the Federal Government on biologicals from 40, 15 and 7 to 50 and 5 resulted from a determination that the public authority on the state and lower levels should not be required to pay a higher price than the Federal Government, and since the Abendroth survey of the custom in the trade indicated that a discount of 50 and 5 to city, county and state public authority was in order, according to trade custom, the Federal Government's discount was conformed thereto in order to remove any discrimination. This change in discount structure resulted in the Federal Government paying a slightly higher price for the vaccine than it would have paid under the old discount system of 40, 15 and 7. This change was implemented only as to the vaccine.

(e) Lilly's use of the agency agreement and refusal to give quantity discounts beyond those already established for a particular class of customer appears to be in line with Lilly's firm adherence to the doctrine of fair trade, according to the testimony.

Pitman-Moore:

(a) As noted heretofore, Pitman-Moore was faced with a rather significant transition as to change of emphasis from the area of dispensing physician and veterinarian to the prescribing physician with a heavier emphasis in human medicine than had previously been the case.

(b) Pitman-Moore was, according to the testimony, seeking to obtain or establish in-state bidders in order to maintain and develop its sales not only on polio vaccine but on other products as well. Its previous system of distribution had not provided sufficient for this type of outlet. In order to achieve these bidders, the agency agreement was utilized.

(c) In its discount structure, Pitman-Moore followed consciously, but independently, according to the testimony, the Eli Lilly Company in an area where it had not previously had an occasion to develop any practice of its own.

Wyeth:

(a) Wyeth gave no discounts according to the testimony but set a price for each class of trade or customers, which price it did not reduce except when forced to do so by a competitor, at least during the period of the most favored customer clause. In late 1957, however, Wyeth did make a price reduction in a sealed bid to the State of Maryland.

(b) Wyeth, too, had production troubles which kept it out of the market for all practical purposes during late '56 and early '57.

(c) Wyeth, according to the testimony, exercised no policing or other supervision over those who bid its products as evidenced by the fact that in the first half of 1956, the Thrifty Drug Company bid Wyeth's vaccine on five occasions at a price below that then established by Wyeth.

Merck Sharp & Dohme:

(a) The testimony developed that Merck Sharp & Dohme did not establish a price on polio vaccine for sale to public authority in the United States until January 17, 1956, because of certain technical difficulties.

(b) Because of its late entry into the vaccine market, it was faced with a significant deficit. When, however, this deficit had been eliminated or overcome in April 1957, it established a reduction in polio vaccine price.

(c) Merck Sharp & Dohme's January 1956 entry into the polio market was preceded by meetings between Mr. Greeve of the HEW and Mr. Kuryloski, an associate of Merck Sharp & Dohme on December 21, 1955 and January 12, 1956. At those meetings, Mr. Greeve informed Mr. Kuryloski in some detail of the customs and policies then prevailing among the other producers of polio vaccine.

(d) It was further testified that Merck Sharp & Dohme exercised no control or pressure over its wholesalers or those who bid its products. In support of this, Merck Sharp & Dohme pointed to the Harkness bid in Kansas, referred to earlier.

Parke, Davis:

(a) Parke, Davis was another sufferer from production troubles and was at one time two and a half million dollars in the red. Nevertheless, it met the Lilly cut of February 6, 1956 in order to keep its name before the market.

(b) Furthermore, it established a cut itself in May 1956 in order to put its name and product, in this case polio vaccine, before the public with vigor.

[Uniform Domestic Prices—Disparate Foreign Prices]

There were two other factors which must be examined as to all the defendants simultaneously. These are: (1) almost unvaried price uniformity in the United States and (2) pricing to foreign countries. The latter is subdivided by the Government into (a) those instances where the defendants quoted prices below those then being quoted to domestic public authority and (b) those instances where the defendants quoted disparate prices.

["Most Favored Customer" Clause as Price "Floor"]

With regard to uniformity, Merck Sharp & Dohme has succinctly pointed out that the most favored customer clause was, in effect, a floor below which a defendant would be reluctant to go domestically on any given bid since to do so would have resulted in an across-the-board cut to not only the Federal Government but, through the operation of the Polio Assistance Act and the little most favored customer clauses contained in some state contracts, to the states as well.

[Supply and Demand]

Furthermore, with the exception of Eli Lilly and Company in the fall of 1956, all of the defendants were at all times able to sell all the vaccine they could produce. As to Lilly's inventory of approximately 22 million cc's on January 1, 1957, the record indicates that by March 1957 this entire supply had been sold. As Mr. Hovey of the HEW testified,

> ". . . if any company could sell all they produced at the price of the current contract we naturally would not expect them to bid any lower on a new contract." Transcript 700-701.

It is interesting to note that when Pitman-Moore reduced its price on February 10, 1956 to 6.34 to public authorities in contrast to a reduction to 6.33 by the other four producers, the purchasing agent of Michigan complained that Pitman-Moore was charging a different price than the other producers, in this case a one cent higher price. This and other complaints resulted in Pitman-Moore's dropping its price to 6.33 on April 20, 1956.

Mr. Walker of Parke, Davis testified that in April 1957, following the price reduction of Merck Sharp & Dohme, he received calls from Mr. Schultz of the HEW and Miss Pinto, a military purchaser from Brooklyn, inquiring as to Parke, Davis's intention in meeting the reduction of MS&D. According to Mr. Walker, Mr. Schultz and Miss Pinto indicated that they were holding up orders for Parke, Davis until the new price was set.

Indeed, Wyeth's initial price was set higher than Lilly's in the case of the three cc shipments; that is, Lilly was charging 2.85 for a 3 cc vial whereas Wyeth was initially charging $3.00 for three lcc vials. Mr. AuBuchon testified that he believed his packaging to be superior, and that each vial contained one injection, thereby obviating the need to reinsert the needle in the rubber stopper covering the vial. However, the complaint from Wyeth's customers was such that it was forced to meet the Lilly price, which it did on April 8, 1955.

Again, Mr. Greeve, the liaison man between HEW and the vaccine producers, outlined the expectations of HEW to MS&D when the latter was preparing to enter the market in December of '55-January of '56 in terms of the conduct of the other producers, including price and discount structure.

[Expiration of "Most Favored Customer" Clause]

I have earlier stated the Government's division of the defendants' activities with respect to the sale of polio vaccine to foreign authorities. That is, disparate prices and prices below those then prevailing domestically to public authorities. However, there appears to be what is perhaps a more significant division, based upon the most favored customer clause. Thus, the foreign sales may be grouped into those made during the period that the most favored customer clause was in effect, that is, October 1955 through June 1957, and those made thereafter.

The former grouping includes bids made to Venezuela in July and August 1956 by Lilly, Wyeth and Merck, Sharp & Dohme, and to Costa Rica in August 1956 by all five defendants. While an argument might be made that the most favored customer clause applied to sales made to foreign public authorities, it seems clear that such was not the understanding of the defendants with the possible exception of Pitman-Moore, nor was that the understanding of the Government. Thus, during this period when the most favorable customer clause was operative in the United States, there was no similar force in the foreign market in terms of a benefit inuring to domestic public authority by virtue of a lower price having been offered to foreign public authorities.

Although the most favored customer clause expired contractually on June 30, 1957, it remained in effect as a practical matter until all the Government funds allocated to the polio program had been expended. Thus, the use of sealed bids and resultant breakdown in price uniformity did not occur domestically until October 1957. However, it is interesting to note that apparently within three months the established price to public authority in the United States had been reduced from $5.13 less 2 per cent, or $5.0274 net to $4.88 less 2 per cent, or $4.78 net—Pitmore-53—and not, incidentally, $4.7824 net, which would have been the result of the normal application of a 2 per cent discount to a price not ending in a zero or five, at least as applied to sales made to public authorities by these defendants during the operation of the most favored customer clause. That uniform application with its resultant price carried to four decimal places, was perhaps to be anticipated or expected in view of the operation of that clause, and in the case of Eli Lilly and Company, necessarily to its relationship with its wholesalers.

In any event, the fact that the most favored customer clause did not disappear as a practical marketing influence on the same date that it expired contractually appears to account for the time lag between the expiration of the most favored customer clause, June 30, 1957, and the appearance in the domestic market of disparate bidding in sealed bids previously seen only in the foreign market.

[Differences in Domestic and Foreign Prices—Cause]

The defendants have pointed up other differences between the market abroad and at home. Without exception, I find them of little or no impact. Any significant difference, therefore, must arise by virtue of the most favored customer clause.

That clause was the invention, not of the defendants, but of the Government. In its original form (October 1955) it did not apply to sales of vaccine made by a wholesaler or retailer as opposed to sales made by a manufacturer to a public authority. Thus, while Thrifty Drug Company, for example, might split its 10 per cent handling allowance and, in fact, bid and sell Wyeth vaccine to the City of Milwaukee at a price less than that established and maintained by Wyeth on its direct sales to public authority under the original most favored customer clause, without causing a general reduction in the price of Wyeth vaccine to public authority, it could not do so under the amended or revised most favored customer clause of November 2, 1956. Both the original and the amended or revised most favored customer clauses have been heretofore set out verbatim.

["Inevitable Result" of Clause]

The obvious, indeed the inevitable result of the amended most favored customer clause was to effect an ever greater degree of price uniformity than had previously existed. There is no suggestion that this clause had its origin anywhere but in the Federal Government. Indeed, this clause is but one instance of the Government's unprecedented interest in the manufacture, allocation, distribution and sale of a biological, in this case Salk vaccine.

[Acts Consistent with Innocence]

Thus, the defendants in this case were brought together by a common objective, innocent enough, that is, the project of furnishing the National Foundation of Infantile Paralysis with vaccine for its field testing and looking toward the day when the vaccine would be approved for general public use stockpiling. Admittedly, even in these endeavors it is clear that the defendants were not moved by eleemosynary motives. Their contract provided for recovery of their costs and indemnification for damages. And for the period of the Government contracts, October 1955 to June 30, 1957, the most favored customer clause appears to buttress securely their claim to acting in a manner consistent with innocence in refusing to reduce their prices.

[Conspiracy Only a "Suspicion"]

The economic theory upon which the Government charges that absent an agreement among them, they would have reduced their prices at least to the extent urged by Messrs. Rose, Slocum and Upchruch, does not face the reality of the operation of the most favored customer clause as developed by the defendants in the Government's case. Consequently, there remains only the fact that the buyers persisted in soliciting lower and different prices while each seller with equal persistence refused to lower its price or change its terms. That a particular defendant so reacted to the invitation of the purchasing agents by reason of a previous connivance and agreement with a fellow producer or producers and not independently never rises higher than the level of a suspicion and certainly does not meet the test imposed upon the Government in a criminal case, resting only upon circumstantial evidence in such a way as to eliminate any reasonable hypothesis of innocence.

When screened by the protection of the presumption of innocence and the necessity of overcoming every reasonable hypothesis consistent with innocence as these defendants are, and mindful of viewing the evidence in the Government's case in the light most favorable to it, there remains only the allegation that the defendants consciously charged uniform prices to public authorities in the United States for their polio vaccine and refused to reduce them, although repeatedly asked to do so. That their actions were not independent and were contrived by prior agreements among them cannot be but a matter of suspicion and conjecture. The plus factors which the Government has undertaken to prove in this case do not furnish the basis from which valid inferences of agreement and combination among the defendants may be drawn.

["Gap" Between Fact and Inference]

And this is true, although the Government's plus factors herein may be said to stretch somewhat beyond those of the cement case, 268 U. S. 588 (1925) and Pevely Dairy Company v. United States [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,526], 178 Fed. 2d 363, Eighth Circuit, 1949. Nevertheless, they do not reach those appearing in either the Morton Salt case [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,412], 235 Fed. 2d 573, Tenth Circuit, 1956, or the C. O. Two Fire Equipment case [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,290], 197 Fed. 2d, 489, Ninth Circuit, 1952. There is no bridge over the gap from fact to inference as in the last two cases by way of any of the defendants' conduct.

[Ruling on Motions]

Since the evidence relating to domestic bids and the proofs concerning foreign market quotations have been adverted to, the motions to strike such evidence will be denied.

[Acquittal Granted]

As to the main motions of each defendant for a verdict of acquittal on Count 1 of the indictment, they are granted.

Count 2 must fall with the disposition of Count 1, apart from the challenge to venue, and the motions to acquit under Count 2 will also be granted.

The Clerk will so notify the jury.

That is the end.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Applicability of Sherman Act to Common Carriers—Jurisdiction of District Court and Interstate Commerce Commission—Referral of Issues to Commission Prior to Court's Decision.—A Federal appellate court refused to recall and clarify its earlier mandate (1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,958) authorizing a trial court to request the assistance of the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining whether the Commission was empowered by law to confer antitrust immunity upon certain "joint agreements" by railroads which allegedly violated the antitrust laws, and, if so, whether the Commission had validly conferred such immunity on those agreements. In denying the motion to recall and clarify, the appellate court noted that the trial court had requested the assistance of the Commission in those matters. It had been contended that the trial court had erroneously revised the appellate court's earlier mandate because of a supervening decision of another panel of the appellate court in another case involving different parties.

[Antitrust Immunity]

PER CURIAM [In full text]: Upon consideration of appellees' motion to recall and clarify the mandate of this court, and it appearing that a copy of the opinion and a certified copy of the judgment of this court was transmitted to the District Court on March 14, 1958, 102 U. Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Labor Unions Under Sherman Antitrust Act—Antitrust Legality of Collective Bargaining Agreement—Alleged Conspiracy Between Union and Non-Labor Group (Garment Manufacturers' Association).—Two members of an association of manufacturers and jobbers of ladies' sportswear garments, in an action charging that a collective bargaining agreement between the association and a garment workers' union was a part of an antitrust conspiracy to restrain trade, fix prices, and create a monopoly, were denied a preliminary injunction to stay arbitration proceedings commenced by the union under the agreement. The manufacturers sought to bring their claim within the doctrine of Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3, 1944-1945 TRADE CASES

¶ 57,386 (holding that labor unions, while normally exempt from the operation of the antitrust laws, are liable if they conspire with non-labor groups to achieve illegal, non-labor objectives), but there were no evidentiary facts to support the charge of a conspiracy between the union and the non-labor association. If, as asserted by the union, the allegedly illegal provisions in the collective bargaining agreement were demanded and obtained by the union's independent action in furtherance of the welfare of the employees they represented, then the Allen Bradley case was "inapposite." Thus, the manufacturers would have had a cause of action only if they could have established that the challenged provisions of the agreement were the result of, or were used to further, a conspiracy between the union and the non-labor association to achieve an illegal restraint of trade, price fixing, or other conduct condemned by the antitrust statute.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2101.063; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2520.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Price Fixing—Alleged Price Fixing Provision in Collective Bargaining Agreement Between Labor Union and Manufacturers' Association—Labor Unions Under Antitrust Laws.—Two manufacturing members of an association of manufacturers and jobbers of ladies' sportswear garments failed to establish the antitrust illegality of a clause in a collective bargaining agreement between the association and a garment workers' union whereby the members of the association each agreed to pay their contractors "an amount at least sufficient to pay their workers the wages and earnings provided for in the agreement, and in addition a reasonable amount to cover overhead." The manufacturers, evidently relying on the "overhead payment" provision, contended that the agreement had been subverted for price fixing purposes since the "overhead" provision, in effect, required the contractors to sell their garments at the same level of prices. However, "overhead" costs would "vary from contractor to contractor" and it was not clear as to how that provision would result in price fixing on a conspiratorial basis. Also, the union contended that the "overhead" provision was demanded in order to insure that no part of the labor costs paid to a contractor would be diverted by him for "overhead" or other non-labor costs. The court, in denying the manufacturers a preliminary injunction to stay arbitration proceedings instituted by the union under the collective bargaining agreement, held that there was no evidence of a conspiracy between the union and the non-labor association.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2011.181, 2101.063; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.600.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Exclusive Dealing—Collective Bargaining Agreement Restricting Garment Manufacturers to Services of "Union Shop" Contractors—Reasonableness of Restraint—Labor Unions Under Antitrust Laws.—Two manufacturing members of an association of manufacturers and jobbers of ladies' sportswear garments failed to establish the alleged antitrust illegality of a clause in a collective bargaining agreement whereby the association's members agreed to maintain "union shops" or designate "union shop" contractors. The manufacturers, charging that the provision constituted an illegal restraint of trade, urged that their designations of contractors were "ineffectual" unless approved by a union board. However, they stated no instance where the union board had refused to give such approval, and made no claim that there had been an arbitrary refusal to give such approval in order to further an illegal purpose. Since 80 per cent of the production was carried on in shops not owned by members of the association, and since the manufacturers and contractors in the industry were engaged in an "integrated production effort," the provision in question was clearly designed to secure "union shop" conditions in the industry. The court also held that there was no evidence of a conspiracy between the union and the non-labor association.

[Labor Unions Under Antitrust Laws]

EDWARD WEINFELD, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: Plaintiffs move for a preliminary injunction to stay an arbitration hearing before the Impartial Chairman designated in a collective bargaining agreement between the defendant National Skirt and Sportswear Association, representing employers, hereafter called "the Association", and the three union defendants, hereafter collectively referred to as "the Union." The membership of the Association is composed of jobbers and manufacturers of ladies' sportswear garments. The plaintiffs, manufacturers, have been members of the Association since 1951 and as such are bound by the terms, and entitled to the benefits, of the agreement between it and the Union.

[Antitrust Legality of Collective Bargaining Agreement]

The agreement, which has been in effect since June 1958, expires in May 1961 and is basically a renewal of prior agreements, the first of which was entered into in 1933. It provides against strikes and lockouts, and also contains a specified procedure for the resolution of disputes and grievances. In the event disputes are not resolved at the final stage of the grievance procedure they are referred to, and determined by the Impartial Chairman, who is granted power to conduct hearings and whose decision shall be final.

Plaintiffs operate what is known as an "inside shop" where they manufacture only a part of the garments they sell and distribute. The balance of their output is produced by sub-manufacturers and contractors to whom plaintiffs deliver goods, either uncut or cut, for processing into garments.

On October 2, 1959, the Impartial Chairman notified the plaintiffs that the union defendant Local 23 had filed a complaint charging them with violations of the agreement and that a hearing thereon would be held on October 26, 1959. The alleged violations were:

(1) failure to make payments to designated Health and Welfare, Retirement, and Severance Funds, hereinafter referred to as "welfare funds";

(2) manufacturing of the garments with non-union, non-designated and non-registered contractors;

(3) failure to settle piece rates of garments produced by non-union, non-designated and non-registered contractors.

The complaint also charged that the plaintiffs maintained more than one set of books to conceal violations and to evade provisions of the agreement and failed to submit all their books and records for examination by a union representative.

Three days before the scheduled hearing on these charges, the plaintiffs commenced this action, naming their own "Association" and the Union as defendants. They charge that certain provisions of the collective bargaining agreement violate the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 and the Sherman Act, and consequently are unenforceable. Upon the filing of the complaint, the plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction to stay the hearing before the Impartial Chairman, claiming that their alleged violations are based upon the provisions of the agreement which the suit seeks to invalidate, and that if the proposed hearing were held the plaintiffs would be deprived of "our rights and our suit rendered valueless."

[Preliminary Injunction Sought]

Plaintiffs, to obtain the drastic relief of staying the arbitration procedure which has been applied in this industry under the present and prior agreements for more than twenty-five years, must show: (1) a likelihood that their attack upon the alleged illegal provisions will be sustained upon a hearing on the merits,[1] and (2) even if so, that irreparable injury will result unless an immediate restraint is granted.[2]

Thus we first consider the substance of the charges of illegality. These break down into an attack, first, on the welfare fund provisions, and, second, on other clauses of the contract which allegedly restrict competition and result in price-fixing.

Alleged Price-Fixing, Restraint of Trade and Monopolization of Trade

[Antitrust Conspiracy Charged]

The plaintiffs' second cause of action challenges other provisions of the agreement, the enforcement of which, they allege, constitutes an unlawful combination and conspiracy by the defendants to control the manufacture and sale of garments made by the plaintiffs and others in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. In end result, the basic charge is price-fixing and unreasonable restraint of trade.

[Background of Garment Industry]

The significance of the provisions under attack and the illegal results attributed to their enforcement can better be appreciated against the background of conditions in this industry which have been recognized as sui generis.[11] The barest outline will suffice for the purposes of this motion.

Manufacturers such as the plaintiffs produce only a portion of garments in their own shops, so-called "inside shops"; the balance are manufactured away from their premises by outside sub-manufacturers or contractors whose employees work on the manufacturers' material, either cut or uncut. Presently more than 80% of the workers in this industry work in the shops of contractors. This is usually referred to as the "outside system of production." It has its genesis in a fiercely competitive struggle by manufacturers of garments at the turn of the century which caught the workers in the industry, at that time mostly recently arrived immigrants, in between, depressed their wages and resulted in intolerable working conditions.

The defendant international union was then organized and waged an aggressive campaign to unionize the industry and to better conditions. In an effort to avoid unionization, and to evade all direct responsibility to production employees, manufacturers who operated inside shops, the then prevalent method of manufacturing and marketing of garments, abandoned their shops. Instead they contracted out all or a part of the work to outside contractors whose employees worked on materials supplied by the manufacturers. And so the outside system of production came into being. These contractors generally were marginal operators without financial resources and again the worker was exploited.

The abandonment by a manufacturer of direct production on his own premises also brought into being the "jobber". The jobber had no direct dealing with employees, was not responsible to them for wages, and was unconcerned with hours and adequate standards. He also engaged contractors for the production of his garments and by this method shifted all responsibility for employee conditions to the contractor. The jobber as a class competed with the inside manufacturer. The contractors were in fierce competition with one another for the patronage of jobbers and inside manufacturers. The essential basis of this intense competition was reduced labor costs. The brunt of this economic rivalry was borne by the workers and reflected itself in depressed wages and substandard labor conditions.[12] The Union, as well as enlightened leaders in the industry, sought to correct the demoralizing effects upon employees brought about by the jobber-contractor system. The problem of the industry, also one of public concern, was the subject of investigations by public agencies and commissions which recommended either legislation or remedial programs.[13]

In the light of the historical conditions which led to the contractor system and its attendant evils, the employees of the entire industry were the subject of Union concern and all bargaining agreements through the years have reflected not only a purpose to correct conditions, but to prevent their recurrence.[14] It is against this background

[11] 95 Cong. Rec. 8709 (1949).

[12] Report of Advisory Commission in the Cloak and Suit Industry appointed by Governor Alfred E. Smith of New York State in 1924. A very exhaustive and illuminating analysis of practices and conditions in the industry is set forth by the late Mr. Justice Shientag, who was a member of the Commission, in Abeles v. Friedman, 171 Misc. 1042, 14 N. Y. S. 2d 252 (1939).

[13] Reports of the United States Industrial Commission, Volume XV; Report of Advisory Commission, note 12 supra. See also In re Larry Jay, Inc., 3 A. D. 2d 386, 160 N. Y. [14] Indeed the current agreement provides: "Since the ultimate source of employment and wages paid to employees of contractors . . . is the employer . . . the parties . . . acknowledge that a member of the Association who supplies work to contractors . . . is directly concerned with the payment of the wages of the workers employed by his contractors . . . ." Paragraph Seventh (e) at p. 10.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

that the various clauses under attack must be considered.

[Challenged Agreement]

The current agreement provides that for the purpose of eliminating substandard labor conditions, to protect the employment opportunities of the workers covered by the agreement, and to secure enforcement of the provisions of the agreement, every Association member agrees to

(1) maintain a union shop if he manufactures on his own premises, and if not,

(2) he will designate contractors or sub-manufacturers who conduct union shops and have entered into contractual relationships with the Joint Board and/or the Union,

(3) pay to contractors or sub-contractors an amount at least sufficient to pay their workers the wages and earnings provided for in the agreement, and in addition a reasonable amount to cover overhead.

["Union Shop" Agreement as Restraint of Trade]

The complaint alleges that these provisions are designed as part of a combination or conspiracy by the defendants to restrain trade, to fix prices and to create a monopoly in the garment industry. The basis of the complaint is not clearly spelled out in the affidavits submitted by plaintiffs in support of their motion and to the extent there is reference thereto, it is of a general conclusory nature. Evidently, the claim of illegal restraint of trade rests upon items 1 and 2 noted above. However, these are clearly designed to secure union shop conditions in the industry since 80% of production is carried on in shops not owned by Association members. The manufacturer and the contractor, though functioning, theoretically, as separate entities, are engaged in an integrated production effort.[15] The unique nature of this phase of the garment industry was recognized by the principal sponsor of the Taft-Hartley Act who indicated that the secondary boycott features of the Act were not intended to apply to the manufacturer-contractor relationship in this industry.[16]

[Union "Approval" of Contractors]

The plaintiffs urge that although they and other Association members are free to designate their contractors, this is ineffectual unless the Union Joint Board approves. No instance, however, is stated as to any claimed refusal to give approval to designations nor is any claim made that there has been an arbitrary refusal in order to further an illegal purpose.

[Alleged Price Fixing Provision]

Item 3 above is calculated to assure that the wage levels established by the agreement are maintained. However, plaintiffs contend that those provisions have been subverted for price-fixing purposes. Their contention rests upon the requirement that the manufacturer pay contractors, not only amounts sufficient to pay the workers the wages stipulated in the agreement, but in addition,

> "a reasonable amount . . . to cover his (the contractor's) overhead which each member of the Association shall settle separately with his contractors . . ."

There is no averment either in the complaint or the affidavits as to any specific price-fixing activity between the Association and the Union. Evidently relying on the overhead payment provision, the plaintiffs contend that this in effect requires the contractor to sell his garments at the same level of prices as all other contractors. However, overhead payments obviously would vary from contractor to contractor

[15] This aspect of the industry is expressly acknowledged in the current agreement. It provides that the parties acknowledge "that each member of the Association and his contractors . . . who manufacture garments . . . for him . . . are closely allied and have a close unity of interest with each other in the manufacture of such garments, and that, in any labor dispute, to the extent of any work performed on such garments, a member of the Association and his contractors . . . are not 'neutral' . . . but are jointly engaged in an integrated production effort." Paragraph Sixth (b) at p. 7.

[16] 95 Cong. Rec. 8709 (1949). The recently enacted Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, Pub. L. No. 86-257, 86th Cong., § 704 confirms this view. It contains a specific amendment to section 8(b)(4) but makes the secondary boycott provisions inapplicable to "persons in the relation of a jobber, manufacturer, contractor, or subcontractor working on the goods or premises of the jobber or manufacturer or performing parts of an integrated process of production in the apparel and clothing industry . . . ."

and just how this provision would result in price-fixing on a conspiratorial basis is not made clear. On the other hand, the Union contends that the overhead provision was demanded to insure that no part of the labor costs paid to a contractor would be diverted by him for overhead or other non-labor costs.

[Conspiring With Non-labor Groups]

The plaintiffs seek to bring their claim within the holdings of Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3,[17] and United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States,[18] but their papers are barren of any evidentiary fact to support the charge of conspiracy between the Union and the Association. Evidently recognizing this, and to bolster their unsubstantiated charges, plaintiffs have submitted a copy of an indictment returned against another union, a member of the International herein, based upon a collective bargaining agreement and practices thereunder which they say closely parallel those in this case. On a motion for an injunction, facts, and not charges, are required if a party is to prevail. The Court has not considered the indictment relevant on this motion. An indictment is not a substitute for evidence. Neither the Association defendant nor the defendant unions are the subject of any indictment. In any event, an indictment is an accusation and has no probative value. A union, no less than a corporation, is entitled to the same presumption of innocence that protects individuals.[19]

[Independent Action—Labor Objective]

The Union urges that the various provisions of the agreement under attack were designed in light of the past practices and abuses which victimized the workers, whether engaged by inside manufacturers, jobbers, or outside contractors, to assure their permanent elimination and to assure further that the manufacturer and jobber would not divorce themselves from responsibility for the wages, working conditions and welfare of the worker who produces the product which they sell and market. These provisions, says the Union, are the result of hard bargaining, reflect its independent effort to protect its members by insuring a fair wage, maintenance of adequate standards of work and prevention of recurrence of past demoralizing practices. If these protective clauses were demanded and obtained by the Union, as they assert, as a matter of independent action in furthering the welfare of the employees they represent, then the Allen Bradley case, which was predicated on joint and conspiratorial action between the employer and the union, is inapposite. Only if plaintiffs can establish that the attacked clauses were the result of, or used to further, a conspiracy with the Association or others to achieve an illegal restraint of trade, price-fixing, or other conduct condemned by the antitrust statute, would plaintiffs have a cause of action. They submit no facts to support such a charge but rest their attack solely on the clauses in question. Contrariwise, the Union affirmatively, by affidavit ot one of its officials, swears that the provisions were demanded for the purpose of protecting the interest of its members and to maintain and preserve desirable standards which were achieved only after a long struggle to overcome the known evils which had plagued the industry and its workers through the years.

[Temporary Injunction Denied]

Thus, with respect to each asserted cause of action there appears to be substantial doubt as to plaintiffs' legal position, assuming there were no factual dispute, which there is. Upon the record presented, the plaintiffs have not established that their right to ultimate relief is so clear as to entitle them in advance of trial, where factual and legal issues may be fully explored, to the drastic relief of an injunction.[20]

Neither have plaintiffs shown that irreparable injury will result if the hearing on the charges against them is permitted to proceed before the Impartial Chairman . . . .

Marietta Page v. Telford Work, et al.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, Central Division. Civil Nos. 14390-WM and 14391-WM, respectively. Opinion dated October 21, 1959, filed October 23, 1959. Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law dated November 19, 1959, filed November 23, 1959.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Necessary Averments—Interstate Commerce—Effect on Interstate Commerce as Contrasted with Effect on "Business Engaged In" Interstate Commerce—"Legal Advertising" in Local Area.—Community newspapers in the Los Angeles area, in treble damage actions charging them with injuring other publishers by alleged Sherman Act violations in the solicitation of bids for "legal advertising," were granted summary judgment on the ground that the acts complained of had no anti-competitive effects on any interstate commerce. The parties, all of whom were connected with local publishing, were engaged in interstate commerce by virtue of their regular purchase of newsprint from sources outside the state, their carriage of some national advertising and news items, and the fact that they had a few out-of-state subscribers. However, that interstate trade in which the parties were engaged suffered no anti-competitive effects from the acts complained of. The test of jurisdiction is not that a business engaged in interstate commerce be affected, but that the business' interstate commerce be affected.

The market involved, legal advertising in the Los Angeles area, was an "intrastate activity." Control over that market would have afforded no leverage to gain control of the interstate markets in newsprint, national news, or national advertising, no matter how successfully the local legal advertising market was monopolized, since the major users of those interstate services and commodities, such as the great metropolitan dailies, were not dependent upon legal advertising revenues. Furthermore, there was no appreciable interstate market for Los Angeles legal advertising. While one of the plaintiffs had 13 out-of-state subscribers and carried an average of 5 legal advertisements for out-of-state clients per issue, those were not "substantial" or "appreciable" amounts of interstate commerce by any standards.

Opinion

[Interstate Commerce]

SOLOMON, District Judge [In full text]: Each case is now before the court on plaintiffs' motions for partial summary judgment, and on defendants' motions for summary judgment; each motion is directed to the issue of jurisdiction under the Sherman and Clayton Acts. Both cases raise the identical jurisdictional issues, and are treated together. The court has taken testimony in addition to the affidavits of counsel, and the parties are in agreement that all evidence relative to the jurisdictional issue is now before the court.

[Parties]

Plaintiff C. A. Page Publishing Company owns and publishes the Commercial News, a general business newspaper serving the Los Angeles area.

Defendants are a number of community newspapers serving small neighborhoods in and around Los Angeles and the Los Angeles Newspaper Service Bureau together with several of its officers. The Bureau is owned substantially by the defendant newspapers and represents them in the solicitation of legal advertising.

["Legal Advertising" Market—Antitrust Charges]

Plaintiff seeks treble damages under the Sherman and Clayton Acts.[1] It claims that collusive and illegal bidding by defendants caused the Commercial News to lose printing contracts for the 1951 and 1954 Los Angeles delinquent tax lists. More particularly, plaintiff contends that defendant newspapers

[1] 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2, 4, 13, 15, 18 and 26.

(1) fixed rates for legal advertising published in their newspapers,

(2) appointed Telford Work to submit collusive and illegal bids,

(3) pooled forces and facilities to print and publish legal advertising so as to be in a position to outbid on public legal advertising all publishers who were not members of the Bureau,

(4) pooled receipts,

(5) sought to restrain the general public from placing legal advertising with non-member newspapers,

(6) sought by threats, intimidation, and duress to destroy non-member newspapers,

(7) divided the market territorially among its members,

(8) placed prohibitive restrictions on new membership,

(9) bought out various non-member newspapers,

(10) succeeded in effectively eliminating competition by non-member newspapers in the publishing of legal advertising.

Plaintiff contends that these activities enabled one of the defendant newspapers to obtain the contract to publish the Los Angeles delinquent tax list on bids of $52,000 in 1951, and $76,000 in 1954, as against plaintiff's bids of $109,000 in 1951 and $120,000 in 1954. Plaintiff estimates that its costs in printing the lists, had it been the successful bidder, would not have exceeded $24,000 for either list. Thus, it seeks over a half million dollars in damages, representing three times its estimated net profit of $85,000 in 1951, and $96,000 in 1954.

[Companion Case]

In the companion case, consolidated for trial, plaintiff Marietta Page brings a stockholder derivative action on behalf of Consolidated Printing and Publishing Company, the former publisher of the Los Angeles Daily Journal, a newspaper primarily engaged in the publication of legal advertising for the Los Angeles area.

She alleges that defendant newspapers sought to destroy the Journal, a non-member of the Bureau, and by their activities impaired the revenues of the Journal so severely that the owners of Consolidated were forced to sell out for one million dollars less than the former value of the Journal. Thus, plaintiff seeks, for Consolidated, $3,000,000, treble its alleged loss.

[Jurisdiction—Interstate Commerce]

Plaintiffs argue that a newspaper is by its nature engaged in interstate commerce, and therefore acts which interfere with the normal operation of a newspaper business necessarily affect interstate commerce sufficiently to satisfy the jurisdictional requirements of the Sherman and Clayton Acts.

We may assume that the plaintiff and defendant newspapers are engaged in interstate commerce by virtue of (1) their regular purchases of newsprint from sources outside of California, (2) their carriage of some national news and feature items, (3) their carriage of some national advertising, and (4) a few out-of-state subscribers.

[Test]

However, the test of jurisdiction is not that the acts complained of affect a business engaged in interstate commerce, but that the offensive acts affect the interstate commerce of such business or any business. Furthermore, it is not all economic consequences to interstate commerce which confer jurisdiction but only those anti-competitive consequences which the statutes are designed to prevent.[2]

[2] "The word 'affect' is used in two different situations under the antitrust laws. A case under the antitrust laws, so far as the interstate commerce element is concerned may rest on one or both of two theories:

(1) That the acts complained of, occurred within the flow of interstate commerce. This is generally referred to as the 'in commerce' theory.

(2) That the acts complained of, occurred wholly on the state or local level, in intrastate commerce, but substantially affected interstate commerce.

"Under both of these theories, the transactions complained of must affect or have an effect on interstate commerce or the requirements of the statute are not satisfied. Under the 'in commerce' theory, the ultimate effect on interstate commerce is the impact on that commerce under a qualitative and not a quantitative test. If there is price fixing or division of the market involved, there are violations per se, as a matter of law. Where there is involved no price fixing or division of the market, the effect of the transactions complained of may be a question of law or a mixed question of law and fact.

"Turning to the second alternative, where acts wholly within intrastate commerce substantially affect interstate commerce, these acts

[Cases Considered]

This principle was very well expressed in Mandeville Farms v. Sugar Co., 1947, [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,251], 334 U. S. 219, 234, where the court stated:

> "[G]iven a restraint of the type forbidden by the Act . . . and a showing of actual or threatened effect upon interstate commerce, the vital question becomes whether the effect is sufficiently substantial and adverse to Congress' paramount policy declared in the Act's terms to constitute a forbidden consequence."

In Sears, Roebuck & Company v. Blade, S. D. Cal. 1953 [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,475], 110 F. Supp. 96, Sears brought a treble damages action against its former Los Angeles advertising manager and several local engravers, arising out of an alleged kickback arrangement between the manager and his co-defendants in the sale to Sears of engravings and mats.

Ample facts appeared to qualify Sears as a business engaged in interstate commerce, and the court so found. Nevertheless, the court dismissed the action on the express ground that the acts complained of were not alleged to have restrained or have tended to restrain these interstate activities in which Sears was engaged. Accord. Feddersen Motors v. Ward, 10 Cir. 1950 [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,579], 180 F. 2d 519, Boro Hall Corp. v. General Motors, 2 Cir. 1946 [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,228], 130 F. 2d 196, on rehearing. See also Brenner v. Texas Co., D. C. N. D. Cal. 1956 [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,314], 140 F. Supp. 240, 243.

In every case cited by plaintiff involving news media, a defendant had restrained, or attempted to restrain, competition in the interstate market for national news and advertising. Lorain Journal v. United States [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,957], 342 U. S. 143 (1951); Farmers Guide Co. v. Prairie Co., 293 U. S. 268 (1934); Greenspun v. McCarran, D. C. Nev. 1952 [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,439], 105 F. Supp. 662, and United States v. The Times-Picayune Publishing Co., D. C. E. D. La. 1952 [1952 Trade Cases ¶ 67,285], 105 F. Supp. 670.

In each of these cases, newspapers, enjoying dominant positions in local or regional newspaper markets, utilized various methods outlawed by the Sherman Act, to draw advertising from competing news media, in order to drive competitors out of business and to monopolize local markets for interstate news and advertising.

In Evening News Publishing Co. v. Allied Newspaper Carriers of N. J., 3 Cir. 1959 [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,291], 263 F. 2d 715, an association of newspaper carriers utilized its dominant position of the home delivery market to force the Evening News to abandon the use of newsboys in order to restrain and monopolize home deliveries of the News. The court held that the dissemination of national news and advertising was "an essential element of [the newspaper's] being", and that home delivery is "an integral part of the interstate operation".

[No Interference with Interstate Commerce]

In the present case, the loss of the delinquent tax list contracts was not alleged to have threatened the normal operation of the Commercial News—a newspaper of general circulation neither primarily devoted to, nor economically dependent upon legal advertising. Thus, although the Commercial News carried substantial amounts of national news and display advertising, there was no interference with the flow of such news and advertising to Commercial News readers. On the other hand, the Los Angeles Daily Journal, which is primarily devoted to legal advertising, carried insignificant quantities of national news and display advertising, so that even if we assume that the original Journal was eliminated as a competitor and the current Journal is a new and distinct entity, the elimination of the Journal also did not interfere with the flow of national news and display advertising.

may occur before goods enter the flow of commerce, or after they leave the flow of commerce. Here we have a question of fact as to whether the wholly intrastate acts substantially affect the flow of commerce.

"After determination of the issue as to whether the wholly intrastate acts substantially affect the flow of commerce, we then reach the same problem that is reached under the 'in commerce' theory, namely the ultimate effect or impact of the acts complained of on interstate commerce and again the test is a qualitative one and not a quantitative test, and again is a question of law, or a mixed question of law and fact." Las Vegas Merchant Plumbers Ass'n. v. United States, 9 Cir. 1954 [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,673], 210 F. 2d 732, 739, n. 3.

Furthermore, even if the original Journal had carried substantial news and advertising and even if the Commercial News had been destroyed by defendants' activities, no showing could have been made that the defendants had any control or potential control over the interstate markets for newsprint, national display advertising, or the dissemination of national news. This is no case of creeping monopolization. Klors v. Broadway-Hale Stores, 1959 [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,316] 359 U. S. 207. Plaintiffs assert that the defendant newspapers were able to destroy the Journal by the exercise of control over the local legal advertising market. But this control could afford them no leverage to gain control of the interstate markets in newsprint, national news, or national display advertising, no matter how successful their monopoly of the legal advertising market, since the major users of these interstate services and commodities, such as the great metropolitan dailies, are not dependent upon the revenues brought by legal advertising.

[Interstate Market for "Legal Advertising"—Amount]

If there existed an appreciable interstate market for Los Angeles legal advertising or a Los Angeles market for legal advertisements placed by out-of-state clients, a case might be made out for the anti-competitive effects of defendants' activities on these markets. No such markets exist. The Journal is the only newspaper involved which is primarily devoted to legal advertising. It is the only newspaper involved whose out-of-state readers are particularly interested in legal advertising. The Journal has only 13 out-of-state subscribers, three of whom are complimentary. Similarly, legal advertisements for out-of-state clients appeared in the Journal regularly, though on a very small scale (averaging 5 items per issue), and a great majority of these items were placed by local counsel. These are not "substantial" or "appreciable" amounts of interstate commerce by any standards, and we hold that these items also come within the maxim de minimis. See, e.g. Klors v. Broadway-Hale Stores, supra, at 211; Mandeville Farms v. Sugar Co., supra, at 234; United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 1946 [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,576], 332 U. S. 218, 225. Cf. Mabee v. White Plains Publishing Co., 1945, 327 U. S. 178, 181; Labor Board v. Fainblatt, 1938, 306 U. S. 601, 607.

[Cases Dismissed]

Plaintiffs' motions for partial summary judgments are denied, and defendants' motions for summary judgments are granted. Both cases are dismissed. No costs.

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law on Motions for Summary Judgment

[C. A. Page Publishing Co., Inc. v. Telford Work]

This cause came on to be heard, before the Honorable Gus J. Solomon, Judge, on motion of the Defendants for Summary Judgment and on cross-motion of the Plaintiff for Summary Judgment, pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Plaintiff and Defendants being represented by their respective attorneys of record, Defendants having filed their several motion papers, and Plaintiff having filed its several opposition papers, and its several motion papers on cross-motion for summary judgment, and the Court having heard testimony in addition to the affidavits and exhibits filed and referred to by the respective parties, and it appearing to the Court that the parties are in agreement that all evidence relative to the issue of jurisdiction is before the Court, and the matter having been submitted for decision; wherefore, the Court, being fully advised in the premises, and the Court having rendered its decision, finds the facts and states the conclusions of law as follows:

Findings of Fact

1. Plaintiff, C. A. Page Publishing Co., Inc., a California corporation, owns and publishes the Commercial News, a general business newspaper serving the Los Angeles area.

2. Defendants are the owners and publishers of a number of community newspapers serving small neighborhoods in and around Los Angeles and the Los Angeles Newspaper Service Bureau, a California corporation, Mutual Newspaper Publishing Co., a California corporation, and the several officers of said corporations. The Los Angeles Newspaper Service Bureau, hereinafter referred to as "Bureau" and its subsidiary corporation, Mutual Newspaper Publishing Co., are owned substantially by the defendant newspaper publishers. Mutual Newspaper Publishing Co. publishes The Los Angeles Daily Journal, a newspaper primarily engaged in the publication of legal advertising for the Los Angeles area. Bureau represents the newspaper defendants in the solicitation of legal advertising.

3. Plaintiff seeks treble damages under the Sherman and Clayton Acts, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2, 4, 13, 15, 18 and 26.

4. Plaintiff claims that collusive and illegal bidding by defendants caused the Commercial News to lose printing contracts for the year 1951 and 1954 for the publication of the Los Angeles County delinquent tax lists. More particularly, plaintiff contends that defendant newspapers

(a) fixed rates for legal advertising published in their newspapers,

(b) appointed Telford Work to submit collusive and illegal bids,

(c) pooled forces and facilities to print and publish legal advertising so as to be in a position to outbid on public legal advertising all publishers who were not members of the Bureau,

(d) pooled receipts,

(e) sought to restrain the general public from placing legal advertising with non-member newspapers,

(f) sought by threats, intimidation, and duress to destroy non-member newspapers,

(g) divided the market territorially among its members,

(h) placed prohibitive restrictions on new membership,

(i) bought out various non-member newspapers,

(j) succeeded in effectively eliminating competition by non-member newspapers in the publishing of legal advertising.

5. Plaintiff contends that these activities enabled one of the defendant newspapers to obtain the contract to publish the Los Angeles County delinquent tax list on bids of $52,000 in 1951, and $76,000 in 1954, as against plaintiff's bids of $109,000 in 1951 and $120,000 in 1954.

6. Plaintiff estimates that its costs in printing the said delinquent tax lists, had it been the successful bidder, would not have exceeded $24,000 for either list.

7. Plaintiff seeks over a half million dollars in damages, representing three times its estimated net profit of $85,000 in 1951, and $96,000 in 1954.

8. Plaintiff and defendant newspapers engage in interstate commerce by virtue of (1) their regular purchases of newsprint from sources outside of California, (2) their carriage of some national news feature items, (3) their carriage of some national advertising, and (4) a few out-of-state subscribers.

9. The loss of the delinquent tax list contracts was claimed to have threatened the normal operation of the Commercial News, a newspaper of general circulation neither primarily devoted to, nor economically dependent upon legal advertising.

10. Although the Commercial News carried substantial amounts of national news and display advertising, there was no interference with the flow of such news and advertising to Commercial News readers.

11. There is no showing, and no showing could here be made, that defendants had any control or potential control over the interstate markets for newsprint, national display advertising, or the dissemination of national news.

12. This is no case of creeping monopolization of any interstate market.

13. Plaintiff claims that defendant newspapers were able to destroy the Los Angeles Daily Journal by the exercise of control over the local legal advertising market. Such control of the local legal advertising market could afford defendants no leverage to gain control of the interstate markets in newsprint, national news, or national display advertising, no matter how successful a monopoly could be gained of the legal advertising market, since the major users of those interstate services and commodities, such as the great metropolitan dailies in the Los Angeles area, are not dependent upon revenue brought by legal advertising.

14. No appreciable interstate market exists either for Los Angeles legal advertising or for legal advertisments in Los Angeles placed by out-of-state clients. No such interstate markets exist.

Conclusions of Law

1. There is no genuine issue as to any of the foregoing facts which are determinative of the cause.

2. The market involved in the instant case is an intrastate activity which is not in trade or commerce between the states.

3. The interstate trade or commerce in which plaintiff and defendants engage did not suffer any anti-competitive effects from the acts of defendants of which plaintiff complains.

4. The activities of defendants with relation to legal advertising did not have any anti-competitive effect on any interstate market.

5. There is no jurisdiction of the Federal Court in this case under the antitrust laws.

6. Defendants are entitled to a summary judgment dismissing this action, and Judgment should be entered accordingly.

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law on Motions for Summary Judgment

(Marietta Page v. Telford Work, et al.)

[Summary Judgment]

This cause came on to be heard, before the Honorable Gus J. Solomon, Judge, on motion of the Defendants for Summary Judgment and on cross-motion of the Plaintiff for Summary Judgment, pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Plaintiff and Defendants being represented by their respective attorneys of record, Defendants having filed their several motion papers, and plaintiff having filed her several opposition papers, and her several motion papers on cross-motion for summary judgment, and the Court having heard testimony in addition to the affidavits and exhibits filed and referred to by the respective parties, and it appearing to the Court that the parties are in agreement that all evidence relative to the issue of jurisdiction is before the Court, and the matter having been submitted for decision; wherefore, the Court, being fully advised in the premises, and the Court having rendered its decision, finds the facts and states the conclusions of law as follows:

Findings of Fact

[Parties]

1. Plaintiff, Marietta Page, brings a stockholder's derivative action on behalf of Consolidated Printing and Publishing Company, hereinafter referred to as "Consolidated," the former publisher of the Los Angeles Daily Journal, a newspaper primarily engaged in the publication of legal advertising for the Los Angeles area.

2. Defendants are the owners and publishers of a number of community newspapers serving small neighborhoods in and around Los Angeles and the Los Angeles Newspaper Service Bureau, a California corporation, Mutual Newspaper Publishing Co., a California corporation, and the several officers of said corporations. The Los Angeles Newspaper Service Bureau, Inc., hereinafter referred to as "Bureau," and its subsidiary corporation, Mutual Newspaper Publishing Co., hereinafter referred to as "Mutual" are owned substantially by the defendant newspaper publishers. Mutual publishes The Los Angeles Daily Journal, the newspaper previously published by Consolidated, and which was purchased by Mutual from all of the stockholders of Consolidated. Bureau represents the news paper defendants in the solicitation of legal advertising.

[Charges]

3. Plaintiff seeks treble damages for Consolidated under the Sherman and Clayton Acts, 15 U. S. C. §§ 1, 2, 4, 13, 15, 18 and 26.

4. Plaintiff claims that defendant newspapers sought to destroy the Los Angeles Daily Journal, a non-member of the Bureau, and by their activities impaired the revenue of the Journal so severely that the owners of Consolidated were forced to sell out for one million dollars less than the former value of the Journal.

5. Plaintiff contends that defendant newspapers

(a) fixed rates for legal advertising published in their newspapers.

(b) appointed Telford Work to submit collusive and illegal bids.

(c) pooled forces and facilities to print and publish legal advertising so as to be in a position to outbid on public legal advertising all publishers who were not members of the Bureau.

(d) pooled receipts.

(e) sought to restrain the general public from placing legal advertising with non-member newspapers.

(f) sought by threats, intimidation, and duress to destroy non-member newspapers.

(g) divided the market territorially among its members.

(h) placed prohibitive restrictions on new memberships.

(i) succeeded in effectively eliminating competition by non-member newspapers in publishing of legal advertising.

6. Plaintiff seeks, for Consolidated, $3,000,000.00 treble its alleged loss.

[Interstate Commerce]

7. Defendant newspapers engage in interstate commerce by virtue of (1) their regular purchases of newsprint from sources outside of California, (2) their carriage of some national news feature items, (3) their carriage of some national advertising, and (4) a few out-of-state subscribers.

8. Consolidated engaged in interstate commerce by virtue of (1) regular purchases of newsprint from sources outside of California (2) a few out-of-state subscribers. The Los Angeles Daily Journal, primarily devoted to legal advertising, carried insignificant quantities of national news and display advertising.

9. Even if Consolidated, former owner of the Los Angeles Daily Journal, had been eliminated as a competitor by reason of the activities of defendants in relation to legal advertising, such elimination of Consolidated as a competitor, would not have interfered with the flow of national news and display advertising in interstate commerce.

10. No showing was, or could have been made, that the defendants had any control or potential control over the interstate markets for newsprint, national display advertising, or the dissemination of national news.

11. This is no case of creeping monopolization of any interstate market.

12. Plaintiff claims that defendant newspapers were able to destroy the Los Angeles Daily Journal by the exercise of control over the local legal advertising market. Such control of the local legal advertising market could afford defendants no leverage to gain control of the interstate markets in newsprint, national news, or national display advertising, no matter how successful a monopoly could be gained of the legal advertising market, since the major users of those interstate services and commodities, such as the great metropolitan dailies in the Los Angeles area, are not dependent upon revenue brought by legal advertising.

13. No appreciable interstate market exists either for Los Angeles legal advertising or for legal advertisements in Los Angeles placed by out-of-state clients. No such interstate markets exist.

14. The Los Angeles Daily Journal is the only newspaper involved which is primarily devoted to legal advertising. It is the only newspaper involved whose out-of-state readers are particularly interested in legal advertising. It has only 13 out-of-state subscribers, three of whom are complimentary. Legal advertisements for out-of-state clients appeared in the Journal regularly, though on a very small scale (average 5 items per issue), and a great majority of these items were placed by local counsel. These are not "substantial" or "appreciable" amounts of interstate commerce by any standards, and come within the maxim of de minimus.

Conclusions of Law

[Effect on Interstate Commerce]

1. There is no genuine issue as to any of the foregoing facts which are determinative of the cause.

2. The market involved in the instant case is an intrastate activity which is not in trade or commerce between the states.

3. The interstate trade or commerce in which plaintiff and defendants engage did not suffer any anti-competitive effects from the acts of defendants of which plaintiff complains.

4. The activities of defendants with relation to legal advertising did not have any anti-competitive effect on any interstate market.

5. There is no jurisdiction of the Federal Court in this case under the antitrust laws.

[Summary Judgment Granted]

6. Defendants are entitled to a summary judgment dismissing this action, and Judgment should be entered accordingly.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. Civil Action No. 58 C 1667. Dated November 17, 1959.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Consent Decree—Practices Enjoined—Restricting Use of Competitors' Products—Cemetry Markers.—An owner of two cemeteries was prohibited by a consent decree, which was entered in a private antitrust action, from preventing, restricting, or discouraging "outside" dealers from selling markers for installation in its cemeteries. More specifically, the owner was prohibited from (1) making unreasonable requirements as to the alloy content of markers to be installed in its cemeteries, (2) requiring a separate certificate as to the alloy content of each marker to be installed in its cemeteries, (3) requiring lot owners to pay excessive and unreasonable installation, "foundation," and "care" charges for markers to be installed in its cemeteries, (4) enacting any unreasonable rules and regulations which would make it impossible for lot owners to purchase markers from "outside" dealers for installation in its cemeteries, and (5) informing lot owners that markers for installation in its cemeteries could not be purchased from any other person.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.825.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Consent Decree—Specific Relief—Modification of Contracts and "Rules and Regulations" Relating to Sale and Installation of Cemetery Markers—Specific Prices Set by Judgment.—An owner of two cemeteries, in a consent decree entered into between itself and an "outside" dealer in cemetery markers, was ordered to (1) modify its contracts for the sale of cemetery markers in such a manner as to show a break-down of the total price charged to lot owners, (2) modify its "rules and regulations" so as to require each manufacturer desiring to have its markers installed in the owner's cemeteries to furnish only one initial certificate as to the alloy content of the manufacturer's markers, (3) make specific charges, as set out in the judgment, for installation, "foundations," and "care" of markers, (4) furnish a yearly certificate, to the plaintiff's attorney, as to the use of certain "funds" created for the care of the markers in its cemeteries, and (5) file with the clerk of the court, and serve on the plaintiffs' attorney, a copy of its rules and regulations as revised in accordance with the judgment.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9024.40.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure — Consent Decrees — Use of Government Consent Decree in Subsequent Private Action—Private Consent Decree in Which Parties Concede Applicability of Provisions in Government Consent Decree.—A private antitrust action in which dealers in cemetery markers charged a manufacturer and an owner of two cemeteries with imposing various restraints on the sale and installation of such markers was terminated by the entry of a consent decree between the dealers and the owner of the cemeteries. The manufacturer was dismissed, with the consent of the dealers, after agreeing that (1) the dealers were within the class of persons contemplated by a Government consent decree in a provision which directed the manufacturer to sell to all retailers upon non-discriminatory terms and conditions, and (2) the owner of the cemeteries was within the class of persons contemplated by the Government consent decree in provisions which, among other things, prohibited the manufacturer from dealing with "any cemetery" which unreasonably restricted the installation of markers in its cemetery. The owner of the cemeteries, a defendant here but not in the earlier Government action, conceded that it was included in the latter provision of the Government decree, and in certain other provisions thereof.

Final Judgment

Part I

[Consent Decree]

EDWIN A. ROBSON, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: Plaintiffs having filed their complaint herein on September 9, 1958; the defendants, Jas. H. Matthews & Co., a Pennsylvania corporation, and Jas. H. Matthews & Co., Inc., an Illinois corporation, having appeared by their attorneys; and the plaintiffs and the defendants, Jas. H. Matthews & Co., Inc. and Jas. H. Matthews & Co., by their attorneys, having consented to the entry of Part I of this Final Judgment without admission by any party in respect of any issue of fact or law;

And it appearing to the Court, before any testimony has been taken herein, and without any trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and upon consent of the plaintiffs and the defendants, Jas. H. Matthews & Co., a Pennsylvania corporation, and Jas. H. Matthews & Co., Inc., an Illinois corporation, that:

[Government Consent Decree]

1. Following the filing of this action on September 9, 1958, there was entered on November 5, 1958 a Final Judgment in Civil Action No. 16818, entitled United States of America v. Jas. H. Matthews & Co., a Pennsylvania corporation [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,187], in the United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania. The Final Judgment in Civil Action No. 16818 is as follows: * * *

[Persons Referred to in Government Consent Decree]

2. Jas. H. Matthews & Co., a Pennsylvania corporation, agrees that it will not deny that plaintiffs were within the class of persons contemplated by the reference in Section IV(A) of said Final Judgment in Civil Action No. 16818 [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,187], to "any person regularly engaged in the business of selling markers or monuments at retail".

3. Jas. H. Matthews & Co., a Pennsylvania corporation, agrees that it will not deny that Chapel Hill Gardens, Inc. was within the class of persons contemplated by the reference to "any cemetery" in Section V (D), (G) and VI (A) of the said Final Judgment in Civil Action No. 16818 [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,187].

It Is Therefore Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed That:

[Manufacturers Dismissed]

4. Defendants, Jas. H. Matthews & Co., a Pennsylvania corporation, and Jas. H. Matthews & Co., Inc., an Illinois corporation, be and they are hereby dismissed from this action with prejudice and without costs.

Part II

[Cemetery Operator]

And it further appearing to the Court that the defendant, Chapel Hill Gardens, Inc. by itself and through its wholly owned subsidiary (hereinafter referred to as "Chapel Hill"), is the owner and operator of two (2) cemeteries in the metropolitan area of Chicago known as Chapel Hill Gardens South and Chapel Hill Gardens West; that the complaint herein is brought under the Sherman Antitrust Act;

And it further appearing to the Court before any testimony has been taken herein, and without any trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and the attorneys for plaintiffs and defendant Chapel Hill having consented to the entry of Part II of this Final Judgment with respect to Chapel Hill and plaintiffs,

It Is Therefore Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed That:

[Single Plaintiff Dismissed]

5. Upon motion of plaintiffs herein, Rita Cesaro doing business as F. Cesaro Monument Co., one of the plaintiffs, be and she is hereby dismissed as a party plaintiff.

It Is Further Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed That:

6. The reference to "any cemetery" of "Cemetery" in Sections V (D), (G) and VI (A) of the said Final Judgment, in Civil Action No. 16818 [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,187], hereinbefore set forth, does include defendant Chapel Hill.

[Restraining Installation of Outside Dealers' Cemetery Markers]

7. The defendant Chapel Hill is enjoined and restrained from directly or indirectly preventing, restricting and discouraging plaintiff dealers from selling markers for installation in the cemeteries operated by Chapel Hill, except as provided from time to time in its rules and regulations, not inconsistent with this decree.

[Unreasonable Requirements—Alloy Content]

8. The defendant Chapel Hill is enjoined and restrained from directly or indirectly preventing, restricting and discouraging sales of markers by plaintiff dealers for installation in said defendants' cemeteries by making unreasonable requirements for certain specific alloy contents in the markers, except as hereinafter provided by the revised rules and regulations of Chapel Hill.

[Certificates of Alloy Content]

9. The defendant Chapel Hill is enjoined and restrained from requiring a separate certificate of alloy content for each marker to be installed in Chapel Hill cemeteries, except as provided in its revised rules and regulations hereinafter set forth.

[Unreasonable Charges]

10. The defendant Chapel Hill is enjoined and restrained from directly or indirectly preventing, restricting and discouraging sales of markers by plaintiff dealers for installation in Chapel Hill cemeteries by assessing and requiring lot owners to pay excessive and unreasonable installation, foundation and care charges for markers, except that said charges shall from time to time be fixed and determined as hereinafter set forth.

[Unreasonable Rules and Regulations]

11. The defendant Chapel Hill is enjoined and restrained from enacting any unreasonable rules or regulations which would make it impossible for a lot owner to purchase a marker from plaintiff dealers for installation in Chapel Hill cemeteries.

[Availability of Markers]

12. The defendant Chapel Hill is enjoined and restrained from directly or indirectly informing its lot owners that markers cannot be purchased for installation in Chapel Hill cemeteries from any person other than Chapel Hill.

[Specific Relief—Modification of Contracts]

13. The defendant Chapel Hill is hereby ordered and directed, within thirty (30) days from date hereof, to modify its sales and contracts for markers to list separately and specifically the allocation of the total price, as follows: (a) the selling price of the marker, (b) the installation and foundation charges, (c) the amount of the "early care fund" deposit which will be set aside upon its books as a reserve, (d) the amount of the "late care fund" deposit and (e) the total price thereof to the lot owner.

[Single Certificate of Alloy Content]

14. The defendant Chapel Hill is hereby ordered and directed, within thirty (30) days from date hereof, to modify its rules and regulations to provide and require each bronze manufacturer desiring to have its marker installed in Chapel Hill cemeteries to furnish only one initial certificate containing a representation and warranty setting forth the minimum alloy content of said marker, style, finish and color thereof which conforms to the rules and regulations of Chapel Hill and that all subsequent markers of said manufacturer will comply and conform with said minimum alloy content, style, color and finish thereof, as specified in said certificate; subsequent separate certificates shall not be required of the same bronze manufacturer, except in specific individual instances in which Chapel Hill shall have a reasonable doubt as to compliance with the foregoing.

[Specific Charges to Be Made]

15. The defendant Chapel Hill is hereby ordered and directed, within thirty (30) days from date hereof, to make the following charges for installation, foundations and care of markers, as follows:

(a) 7¢ (seven cents) per square inch of said marker for installation, service and foundations for markers.

(b) 5½¢ (five and one-half cents) per square inch of said marker for "early care" of markers, said sum to be separately set forth in its books, and the principal and income of said "early care fund" reserve to be used solely for the care, upkeep and maintenance of markers for the first five (5) years after installation.

(c) 5½¢ (five and one-half cents) per square inch of said marker shall be deposited in a trust fund with the Chicago Title and Trust Company of Chicago as Trustee, under existing trust agreements, the income thereof to be used exclusively for the care and maintenance of markers in said defendants' cemeteries after five (5) years from installation.

(d) Said charges and provisions shall be equally applicable to all markers, whether with vases or without.

[Price Changes—Notice Required]

16. The aforesaid charges for installation, service, foundations and care are fixed as of this date but are subject to increase or decrease, depending upon general economic conditions, labor, material and any other costs or factors, and that if any of these conditions justify a change in said charges, defendant Chapel Hill may do so by notifying plaintiff dealers and their attorney, in writing, at least thirty (30) days prior to their effective date and the determination of such increase or decrease shall be made by defendant Chapel Hill from time to time based upon the conditions above mentioned.

[Use of Certain Funds—Certificate Required]

17. Within a reasonable time after written request by plaintiffs' attorney, defendant Chapel Hill shall once a year, for a period of five (5) years hereafter, after the close of its fiscal year, furnish a certificate by its then certified public accountants to the attorney for plaintiffs certifying as to the use of its "early care fund reserve" and its trust fund for care of markers in its cemeteries.

[Rules and Regulations—Filing Required]

18. The defendant Chapel Hill shall, within sixty (60) days from date hereof, file with the Clerk of the United States District herein in the above cause, and serve a copy on attorney for plaintiffs herein, a copy of its rules and regulations relating to markers and memorials and contracts revised as aforesaid.

[Applicability of Judgment]

19. This judgment shall be applicable to and binding upon the officers, directors, agents, employees, successors and assigns of defendant Chapel Hill.

[No Adjudication or Admission of Allegations]

20. The consent of defendant Chapel Hill to the entry of this decree shall not be an admission, nor shall anything contained in this decree be an adjudication, of any matter or issue of fact or law alleged in said complaint or that defendant Chapel Hill has heretofore at any time or in any manner committed any act or done anything which it is hereinabove restrained or enjoined from doing in the future.

[Costs]

21. This decree is entered without costs or damages to or against any party hereto.

[Jurisdiction Reserved]

22. This Court reserves jurisdiction hereof for purposes of enforcing the terms and conditions of Part II of this Final Judgment.

Peoples Gas Light and Coke Company, Natural Gas Pipeline Company of America, Texas-Illinois Natural Gas Pipeline Co., Crown Stove Works, Northern Illinois Gas Company, Florence Stove Company, Sellers Engineering Company, Gas Appliance Service, Inc., Autogas Corporation, Norge Sales Corporation and American Gas Association, Inc.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. No. 12638. Dated December 3, 1959.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. SULLIVAN, District Judge.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Test of Unreasonable Restraint—Per Se Violation—Boycott—Refusal to Approve Gas Burner.—A manufacturer's complaint charging that gas utility companies, gas burner manufacturers, and a trade association engaged in a conspiracy, pursuant to which the association refused to approve its burners and the utilities consequently refused to supply gas for its burners, did not establish a per se violation of the Sherman Act. Distinguishing the case of Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,316, the court held that the alleged facts did not establish a concerted refusal by the defendants to enter into any business relationship with the manufacturer. In fact, the only business dealing involved between the parties was the association's test of the manufacturer's burners, and there was no refusal to test but only a refusal to approve. No boycott, conspiracy to boycott, or other form of per se violation was established by the facts alleged. It was not shown that the association's action had the effect of unreasonably restraining competition. While the complaint alleged that the tests made by the associations were not based on valid, unvarying, objective standards, there was no allegation that the denial of approval was the result of arbitrary or capricious action or that approval was unreasonably denied. Also, there was no allegation concerning the reason given for the denial of approval or that said reason was not true in fact. Allegations as to the safety, efficiency, and durability of the manufacturer's burners did not supply this omission.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.533.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Necessary Averments to State Cause of Action—Public Injury.—A manufacturer's complaint charging that gas utility companies, gas burner manufacturers, and a trade association engaged in a conspiracy, pursuant to which the association refused to approve its burners and the utilities consequently refused to supply gas for its burners, was dismissed on the ground that the complaint failed to allege any injury to the public. The alleged facts did not establish a per se violation of the antitrust laws which would have eliminated the need for showing public injury, and there was no allegation of such general injury to the competitive process that the public at large would suffer economic harm. The allegations failed to show that there had been any appreciable lessening in the sale of conversion gas burners or that the public had been deprived of a product of over-all superiority. There was no allegation that the denial of approval was arbitrary or capricious or that the association gave some reason which was not true.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9009.475, 9009.600.

Before HASTINGS, Chief Judge, DUFFY and CASTLE, Circuit Judges.

[Treble Damage Action]

CASTLE, Circuit Judge [In full text]: Radiant Burners, Inc., plaintiff-appellant, (herein called plaintiff) a manufacturer of conversion gas burners and gas furnaces brought suit in the District Court seeking recovery of treble damages from and injunctive relief against defendants-appellees. Plaintiff's second amended complaint charged defendants with conspiracy and combination, in violation of 15 U. S. C. A. § 1, for the purpose of controlling the manufacture, sale, use and installation of gas burners and gas heating devices and restraining the trade and commerce of manufacturers of such devices in a manner thereinafter described. The defendants-appellees are American Gas Association, Inc., (herein called AGA); Peoples Gas, Light & Coke Co. and Northern Illinois Gas Company (herein called Utilities); Natural Gas Pipeline Company of America and Texas-Illinois Natural Gas Company (herein called Pipelines); Autogas Corporation, Crown Stove Works, Florence Stove Company, Gas Appliance Service, Inc., Norge Sales Corporation and Sellers Engineering Company (designated in the complaint as Manufacturers). It is alleged that AGA is a membership corporation and its membership embraces (1) public utility corporations, including Peoples and Northern; (2) hundreds of manufacturers of machinery, equipment and devices used in the collection, transmission and distribution of gas; (3) pipeline companies transmitting gas to utilities and large industrial users; and (4) individuals and other legal entities.

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Alleged Antitrust Violations]

The activities of defendants-appellees alleged to be in violation of 15 U. S. C. A. § 1 are their forming or joining AGA for the purpose of controlling the manufacture, sale, use and installation of gas burners, gas heating devices and gas equipment:

"* * * in the manner described as follows:

A. The defendant, AGA, has laboratories in Cleveland, Ohio, and Los Angeles, California, each of which purports to test the utility, durability and safety of gas burners and other gas equipment. These tests made by AGA are not based on valid, unvarying, objective standards, and AGA can make and arbitrarily and capriciously does make determinations in respect of whether a given gas burner or equipment has passed its test. AGA then affixes its seal of approval only on those gas burners and appliances which it has determined have passed its test.

B. The defendant gas burner and equipment Manufacturers, some of which are in competition with the plaintiff, along with the defendant Utilities, Peoples and Northern, are, or have been represented on the committee of AGA which decides whether or not given gas burners and equipment warrant AGA approval.

C. The Utility defendants, Peoples and Northern, and other Utilities, are legal monopolies in the various communities in which they serve gas, and as such have power to influence, and do influence, prospective purchasers of gas burners and other gas equipment in respect of the gas burners and equipment which are to be installed and used in communities each serves gas. * * *"

["Approval" Withheld]

Plaintiff avers that it is not possible to successfully market gas equipment, including its Radiant Burner, unless AGA approved because AGA and Utilities (a) refuse to provide gas for use in equipment not AGA approved, (b) refuse or withdraw authorization and certification of dealers who handle gas burners or equipment not AGA approved, (c) prepare and circulate false and misleading reports that equipment not AGA approved is unsafe, unreliable or lacking in durability, (d) Utilities discourage prospective purchasers from buying or installing equipment not AGA approved and refuse to permit its display in public areas of their offices and (e) induce municipalities and government agencies to pass ordinances which require that no gas burner or equipment shall be used within their limits unless such gas burner or equipment bears the seal of approval by AGA.

Plaintiff asserts it tendered its Radiant Burner to AGA for approval on two occasions and that AGA has not approved it. Plaintiff alleges that gas burners approved by AGA are not as safe and as efficient and no more durable than plaintiff's Radiant Burner. It alleges that dangers present in AGA approved burners, their expensiveness and the expensiveness of their operation result to some extent in the public's failure to convert to gas heating and the public is thus deprived of the cheapest form of fuel available.

Plaintiff alleges it was forced to forego establishing dealerships in several localities because its Radiant Burner did not have the required AGA approval and that it was forced to withdraw from two areas because of local requirements, made by ordinances or public officials, that gas burners have AGA approval.

[Injury to Plaintiff]

It is alleged that the illegal conspiracy and combination has prevented plaintiff from recovering substantial sums expended in the development, manufacture and attempted sale of its Radiant Burner and caused plaintiff to lose substantial profits from sales it would have otherwise obtained.

Motions to dismiss filed by defendants-appellees were allowed by the District Court and the complaint dismissed for failure to state a cause of action. Plaintiff appealed.

[Issues]

The main contested issues are (1) whether the allegations of the complaint establish a per se violation of 15 U. S. C. A. § 1 (a boycott or a conspiracy to boycott) eliminating a showing of injury to the public, or (2) if not, whether the allegations of the complaint establish the requisite injury to the public.

[Per se Violations]

Plaintiff contends that the allegations of the complaint establish a per se violation of the antitrust law and that it is unnecessary to show injury to the public. In support of this contention heavy reliance is placed upon Klor's Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc. [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,316], 359 U. S. 207 and Fashion Originators' Guild of America, Inc., v. Federal Trade Commission [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,101], 312 U. S. 457. In those cases the essential basis for a boycott was present. In Klor's the complaint charged that certain manufacturers and distributors of appliances conspired among themselves and with a competitor of Klor's either not to sell to the latter or to sell to it only at discriminatory prices and on highly unfavorable terms. In Fashion the charge was that members of the Federation who are affiliated with the Guild agreed to sell their products only to those garment manufacturers who in turn agreed to sell only to cooperating retailers. In the instant case no buyer-seller relationship between plaintiff and any of defendants-appellees is involved. The allegations do not establish a concerted refusal by defendants-appellees to enter into any business relationship with plaintiff. In fact the only business dealing involved between plaintiff and any of the defendants-appellees was AGA's test of plaintiff's Radiant Burner, and there was no refusal to test, but only a refusal to approve. No boycott, conspiracy to boycott or other form of per se violation is established by the facts alleged.

[Unreasonable Restraints]

It is pertinent to note that although the complaint alleges that tests made by AGA "are not based on valid, unvarying, objective standards, and AGA can make and arbitrarily and capriciously does make determinations" in granting its approval, there is no allegation that AGA's denial of approval of plaintiff's Radiant Burner was the result of arbitrary or capricious action or that approval was unreasonably denied. No allegation whatsoever is made concerning the reason given (or that no reason was given) for AGA's denial of approval or that said reason was not true in fact. Plaintiff's allegations as to the safety, efficiency and durability of its Radiant Burners do not in our view supply this omission. We deem the complaint insufficient for lack of this material element, no per se violation having been shown. Without such allegations there is a failure to show that the action of AGA has the effect of unreasonably restraining competition. In Northern Pacific Railway Company v. United States [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,961], 356 U. S. 1, 4, the Court, in this connection, had occasion to observe:

> "The Sherman Act was designed to be a comprehensive charter of economic liberty aimed at preserving free and unfettered competition as the rule of trade. It rests on the premise that the unrestrained interaction of competitive forces will yield the best allocation of our economic resources, the lowest prices, the highest quality and the greatest material progress, while at the same time providing an environment conducive to the preservation of our democratic political and social institutions. But even were that premise open to question, the policy unequivocally laid down by the Act is competition. And to this end it prohibits "Every contract, combination . . . or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States." Although this prohibition is literally all encompassing, the courts have construed it as precluding only those contracts or combinations which "unreasonably" restrain competition. Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. United States, 221 U. S. 1; Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U. S. 231."

[Public Injury]

It is our opinion that the complaint also fails to allege such injury to the public as is essential to plaintiff's right to maintain its action. In the absence of a per se violation the Sherman Act protects the individual injured competitor and affords him relief, but only under circumstances where there is such general injury to the competitive process that the public at large suffers economic harm. Cf. Rogers v. Douglas Tobacco Board of Trade, Inc. 5 Cir. [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,350], 266 F. 2d 636. The primary purpose of the statute is to protect the public from monopoly. In Feddersen

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Motors v. Ward, 10 Cir. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,579], 180 F. 2d 519, 522 it was said:

"But injury to plaintiff alone is not enough upon which to predicate such an action. There must be harm to the general public in the form of undue restriction of interstate commerce. An appreciable part of such commerce must be the subject of the monopoly, restraint, or conspiracy. And a general allegation of the forming of such a combination or conspiracy with resulting injury to the public and to the plaintiff is not enough. While detail is not necessary, it is essential that the complaint allege facts from which it can be determined as a matter of law that by reason of intent, tendency, or the inherent nature of the contemplated acts, the conspiracy was reasonably calculated to prejudice the public interest by unduly restricting the free flow of interstate commerce."

The allegations of plaintiff's complaint fail to establish that there has been any appreciable lessening in the sale of conversion gas burners or gas furnaces or that the public has been deprived of a product of over-all superiority. Although plaintiff claims its burner better in safety and efficiency from certain standpoints and as durable as those approved by AGA such allegations do not establish that the factors mentioned are the only ones determinative of over-all quality or safety. In this connection it is again significant that plaintiff makes no allegation that AGA's denial of approval of its Radiant Burner was arbitrary or capricious or that AGA gave some reason which was not true.

[Elements Not Shown]

The allegations of the complaint considered as a whole and viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff fail to show the existence of the elements prerequisite to its right to maintain an action under 15 U. S. C. A. § 1.

It is not necessary to consider additional contentions made by individual defendants as to the complaint's shortcomings in so far as it attempted to state a claim against them.

[Dismissal Affirmed]

The District Court's judgment order of dismissal is affirmed.

Affirmed.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. No. 7951. Argued November 3, 1959. Decided November 19, 1959.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Western District of North Carolina, at Charlotte. WILSON WARLICK, District Judge.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Services or Facilities Furnished by Seller—Advertising for Benefit of Newly Appointed Distributor—Services of Offices and Staff and Letterhead Paper and Factory Technician—Proportional Equality—Advertising Allowances.—A hearing aid manufacturer discriminated against a distributor (plaintiff) by furnishing a newly appointed distributor, before the termination of the distributorship contract with the plaintiff-distributor, services and facilities connected with the handling, sale, and offering of products purchased from the manufacturer, upon terms not proportionally equal to those accorded the plaintiff-distributor. The manufacturer sent letters to users and prospective users of its hearing aid which announced the appointment of the new distributor, announced a free hearing aid service clinic in connection with the opening of the new distributorship, and recommended that the reader visit the new distributor. The manufacturer also furnished free of charge to the new distributor the services of one of its factory technicians to inspect, clean, adjust, and make minor repairs to hearing aids brought to the new distributor during the operation of the clinic. While it would have been impossible for the manufacturer to have done for the plaintiff-distributor exactly what it did for the new distributor, since it could not have referred to the plaintiff as a new distributor, "proportional equality" required that users and prospective users, circularized by the manufacturer, should at least have been told that the plaintiff was still a distributor (even if about to be terminated as such), and the addressee should not have been advised to visit only the new distributor.

Evidence did not, however, support the charges that the manufacturer (1) paid to or for the benefit of the new distributor, advertising allowances which were not made available to the plaintiff or (2) offered for sale or sold through the new distributor, receiver cords and batteries at less than list prices and gave to the new distributor such discounts or allowances as were necessary to enable such sales to be made. There was no evidence that the manufacturer would not have paid for advertising by the plaintiff. Also, there was no evidence that the sale of cords and batteries at less than list prices was an "offering for sale and selling through the" new distributor or that the manufacturer gave the new distributor "discounts or allowances . . . necessary to enable such sales to be made."

For the appellant: John G. Golding (William B. Webb on brief).

For the appellee: O. W. Clayton (Clayton & London on brief).

Before Soper and Haynsworth, Circuit Judges, and R. Dorsey Watkins, District Judge.

[Price Discrimination Action]

R. Dorsey Watkins, District Judge [In full text]: Appellant, M. O. Dantzler (Dantzler) sued appellee, Dictograph Products, Inc. (Dictograph), the first count, alleging unlawful discriminations in violation of the Clayton Act, United States Code, Title 15, Section 13(d) and (e), and the second count alleging unlawful breach of contract, breach of confidential relations thereunder, and wrongful and malicious abuse by Dictograph of customer lists of Dantzler. At the conclusion of evidence on behalf of Dantzler, the District Judge withdrew the case from the jury, and entered judgment dismissing the case with prejudice. The appeal is only from the dismissal of the claim under the Clayton Act, the cause of action for breach of contract having been abandoned.[1]

The facts, construed most favorably for Dantzler, show that in March 1954 Dantzler and Dictograph entered into a contract, revised on September 1, 1954, under which Dantzler became the Charlotte, North Carolina, distributor for Acousticon hearing aids in 17 counties in North Carolina and four counties in South Carolina. Dantzler handled only Dictograph products, although the contract did not require him to deal exclusively in them. From March 1954 until April 1, 1957, Dantzler was the only formally appointed Dictograph representative in this territory assigned to him.

[Distributor Contract]

The September 1, 1954 contract provided that:

"8. This agreement may be terminated at any time with or without cause by either party hereto, by posting written notice thereof in the United States Registered Mail . . ."

The contract also provided that upon termination of the contract by either party, Dictograph might make and retain copies of Dantzler's lists or collections of names and addresses of users of Acousticons.

The agreement further provided that the distributor was an "independent business man and is not constituted and shall not be considered an employee or agent of" Dictograph.

[New Contract]

On March 12, 1957, Dictograph sent a form letter to all Distributors, including Dantzler, stating that in order to conform with the requirements of the Federal Trade Commission, a revised Acousticon Distributor Franchise Agreement had been prepared. Two copies executed by Dictograph were enclosed, and the addressee was asked to sign and return one of them. This was a departure from previous practice, under which the Distributor signed first. The new agreement was identical with, or substantially similar to, the September 1, 1954 Agreement between Dantzler and Dictograph, but Dantzler did nothing about accepting or rejecting the new agreement until April 23, 1957.

In the early part of March, 1957, Dictograph approached Harold K. Green and Jerry K. Green, former Acousticon distributors but at the time selling other hearing aids in Charlotte, North Carolina, and negotiated with them, as a result of which a distributor agreement was signed by the Greens on March 27, 1957, and by Dicto-

[1] At the argument on appeal, counsel for Dictograph stated, without challenge or contradiction, that Dantzler had originally sued Dictograph in the State courts for breach of contract; had voluntarily dismissed that suit, and then filed this suit in the United States District Court for the Western District of North Carolina.

graph on April 1, 1957. This was in form similar to the Dantzler Agreement of September 1954, and covered the identical territory.

[Seller's Services and Facilities]

Dictograph prepared 2900 copies of a letter dated March 25, 1957, (the so-called "Dear Friend" letter) signed by its Chairman of the Board, 1344 copies of which were mailed at Dictograph's expense to users whose names and addresses were obtained from lists maintained by the defendant in its home office (which list included names and addresses of users who had been customers of the plaintiff) and to prospective users of Acousticon in the Charlotte area, announcing the "reappointment" [2] of the Greens as a distributor of Dictograph products. It also announced a hearing aid service clinic to be held on April 1, 2, and 3 in connection with the opening of the Green distributorship. The remainder of the letters were delivered to the Greens for their use. At least some of the letters contained notice of a special offer of batteries and receiver cords at less than the usual price during the clinic.

Dictograph also paid for four newspaper advertisements of the opening of the Green distributorship; and furnished free of charge to the Greens the services of one of its factory technicians to inspect, clean, adjust and make minor repairs to hearing aids brought to the Greens' place of business on April 1 to 3, 1957.

Dantzler did not know of any of the negotiations or arrangements with the Greens until one of his customers brought him, on March 27, 1957, a copy of the "Dear Friend" letter.

[Cancellation Notice]

On April 18, 1957, Dictograph sent Dantzler a formal notice of cancellation of his September 1, 1954 contract, under paragraph 8 thereof, and notice that the offer of a new contract under the March 12, 1957, letter had been withdrawn. On April 23, 1957, Dantzler replied, stating in part:

> "So far as I am concerned our contract of September 1, 1954, was terminated long before you sent this letter by your breaking the contract through appointment of another distributor and your actions connected with that appointment."

[Statute]

Dantzler claims that Dictograph's conduct is violative of United States Code, Title 15, Section 13(d) and (e) reading as follows:

> "15 U. S. C. A. 13(d) It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to pay or contract for the payment of anything of value to or for the benefit of a customer of such person in the course of such commerce as compensation or in consideration for any services or facilities furnished by or through such customer in connection with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of any products or commodities manufactured, sold, or offered for sale by such person, unless such payment or consideration is available on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing in the distribution of such products or commodities.
> "15 U. S. C. A. 13(e) It shall be unlawful for any person to discriminate in favor of one purchaser against another purchaser or purchasers of a commodity bought for resale, with or without processing, by contract to furnish or furnishing, or by contributing to the furnishing of, any services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale or offering for sale of such commodity so purchased upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms."

[Alleged Discriminatory Acts]

It is asserted by plaintiff that five discriminatory acts were committed, namely:

> "(a) Furnishing to the said Greens the services of the chairman of its Board of Directors to promote the business of the said Greens, which service and facility was not offered or accorded the plaintiff.
> "(b) Furnishing to the said Greens the services of its offices and staff and its letterhead paper to distribute letters promoting the business of the said Greens which services and facilities were not offered or accorded to the plaintiff.
> "(c) Furnishing to the said Greens the services of a factory technician to clean and adjust hearing aids and to advise customers concerning repairs, all without charge to such customers or to the said Greens, which services were not offered or accorded to the plaintiff.
> "(d) Paying to or for the benefit of the said Greens, advertising allowances for the promotion of their sales of the products of the defendant, which allowances were not made available on proportionately equal terms to the plaintiff.

[2] Factually this was correct. To a prospective user, it might well connote a renewal, rather than a new appointment.

"(e) Offering for sale and selling through the said Greens, receiver cords at one-half of the defendant's established list price and batteries at twenty per cent off of the established list price and giving to the said Greens such discounts or allowances as were necessary to enable such sales to be made."

[Critical Period]

It is necessarily admitted by Dantzler that under paragraph 8 of the September 1, 1954, contract Dictograph could at any time, as it did by the letter of April 18, 1957, validly terminate Dantzler's distributorship; and that, therefore, the critical period for the purpose of this suit is March 26, 1957—April 18, 1957.[3] Within that period Dictograph had two Charlotte distributors—Dantzler and the Greens.[4]

The evidence does not support the fourth and fifth alleged discriminatory acts. In April, 1957, Dantzler submitted to Dictograph tear sheets and advertising bills for newspaper advertisements for the month of March, 1957, and was reimbursed on a 50-50 basis. There is no evidence that Dictograph would not have paid for advertising by Dantzler, up to April 18, 1957, an amount equal to what it expended for the Greens; however unlikely this might be.

Also, there is no evidence that the sale of batteries and receiver cords at less than list prices was an "offering for sale and selling through the said Greens". Nor is there any evidence that Dictograph gave the Greens "discounts or allowances . . . necessary to enable such sales to be made." The testimony of Harold K. Green was that he purchased merchandise from Dictograph in March 1957, prior to the opening of the Green distributorship.[5] Dantzler testified that "Very few hearing aids, I say very, very few hearing aids are sold at list prices at any time."

Literally, of course, it would have been impossible for Dictograph to have done for Dantzler exactly what it did for the Greens, since it could not have referred to Dantzler as a new distributor. However, the "Dear Friend" letter,[6] sent to all known users and prospective users of Acousticon, reads as if the Greens were the only distributor in Charlotte; refers to the free hearing aid clinic to be conducted by the Greens on [3] There is no evidence or claim that the "Dear Friend" letter of March 25, 1957 was mailed before its date. As the mailing was from Jamaica, New York, and as one of Dantzler's customers brought in a copy on March 27, 1957, the earliest effective date would seem to be March 26, 1957.

[4] Although as noted, the Greens did not sign their contract until March 27, 1957, and Dictograph did not accept until April 1, 1957, the case in this aspect must be viewed in the light most conceivably favorable to Dantzler.

[5] An interrogatory propounded to Dictograph asked whether receiver cords for hearing aids were sold by Dictograph to the Greens in 1957 prior to April 1, 1957. The answer, offered in evidence by Dantzler's attorney, was:

"Yes, so as to be available for sale by Jerry K. Green and Harold K. Green at the Hearing Aid Clinic April 1, 2 and 3, 1957."

[6] The letter, on the letterhead of Acousticon International, reads as follows:

"March 25, 1957

"Dear Friend:

"Acousticon takes great pleasure in announcing the reappointment of Harold K. Green and Jerry K. Green as Acousticon distributors in Charlotte, North Carolina. They are located at:—

"Carolina Hearing Aid Company
Suite 503—Independence Building
Corner Trade and Tyron Streets
Charlotte, N. C.
Telephone: EDISON 4-7340

"Harold and Jerry Green have been associated in the hearing aid business for many years and due to the excellence of their scientific fittings they have built up a following of many satisfied hearing aid users in both North and South Carolina.

"Acousticon is famous for its complete line of hearing aids that incorporate all the latest scientific developments, including a great variety of powerful instruments that can be concealed on the head with no cords or any other parts to be worn on the body.

"To celebrate the opening, we have arranged for a factory trained technician to conduct a free hearing aid service clinic to be held for three days, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, April 1st, 2nd and 3rd. Regardless of the make or model of the hearing aid you are now wearing, take advantage of this opportunity now for free cleaning and adjustment of your hearing aid.

"The attached page gives you all the details of this free Hearing Aid Clinic and I urge you to read it thoroughly. Visit the Carolina Hearing Aid Company on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday—April 1st, 2nd and 3rd—You will be glad you did."

April 1, 2, and 3, at which any make or model hearing aid would be cleaned and adjusted free; and recommended that the reader visit the Greens "on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday—April 1st, 2nd and 3rd—You will be glad you did."

Moreover, the "attached page" again emphasized the "Free Hearing and Service Clinic"; and stated:

"Receiver Cords at Half Price ($1.00 per cord)

"Receiver cords for any make of hearing aid at half price these three days only. (Office sales only).

"Batteries 20% off List Price.

"Batteries for all makes of hearing aids at 20% off list price for these three days. (Office sales only)."

Proportional equality would have required that users and prospective users of Acousticon, circularized by Dictograph, should at least have been told that Dantzler was still a distributor (even if about to be terminated as such), and the addressee should not have been advised to visit only the Greens.

[Holding]

We according hold that Dictograph discriminated against Dantzler by furnishing the Greens services and facilities connected with the handling, sale and offering for sale of commodities purchased from Dictograph, upon terms not "proportionately equal" to those accorded Dantzler. See Sun Cosmetic Shoppe, Inc. v. Elizabeth Arden Sales Corp., 2 Cir., 1949 [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,521], 178 F. 2d 150; *Elizabeth Arden Sales Corp. v. [Reversed and Remanded]

The existence of a count for breach of contract led to substantial confusion in the introduction below of evidence of alleged damage. As the judgment of the District Court must be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial on the Clayton Act count, Dantzler will be afforded an opportunity to offer evidence as to pecuniary losses within the period March 26—April 18, 1957, resulting from Dictograph's discriminatory practices.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Who May Bring Suit—Persons "Injured"—"Direct" as Contrasted with "Remote" Injury—Public Performance, Publishing, and Recording Rights in Musical Compositions—"Target" of Alleged Conspiracy.—Thirty-three composers and authors of musical compositions, in a treble damage action charging radio and television networks and their music "acquiring and licensing" organization with conspiring to monopolize the exploitation of musical compositions, were not entitled to sue for alleged injuries to their "nondramatic public performance rights," because they had so divested themselves of such rights, by agreement with a non-profit association of which they were members, that any injury sustained by them was not "direct" but was "secondary and remote." They had "unequivocally" transferred to that association a non-exclusive right to license public performances of their compositions for profit. Also, it was the association, not the individual authors and composers, which (1) marketed and licensed the compositions, (2) negotiated the prices and terms of the licenses, (3) prosecuted claims of infringement, (4) received all royalties and license fees, and (5) determined the distributive share of the pooled royalties and fees to be received by each author and composer. Thus, it was the association, not its individual members, that was engaged in the business of licensing the plaintiffs' compositions for public performance. No substantial reason was advanced as to why the association, the "direct target" of that branch of the alleged conspiracy, had not brought the action.

However, as to the charges that the networks induced music publishers, by payments and otherwise, to refrain from publishing and recording the songs, the claim of direct injury to the individual authors and composers was sufficiently supported to entitle them to maintain the action. They could receive royalties only if the publishers "worked" their songs. Thus, although the authors and composers had transferred their "publishing and recording" rights to the publishers, the networks' alleged payment of "bounties" to the publishers would remove them from the "target area" and place the authors and composers "in the line of fire." Thus, the situation was distinguishable from that involving the divestment of the "public performance for profit" rights to the association; there, it was not claimed that the association caused a diminution of the income of the authors and composers by participating in, or lending itself to, any conduct in violation of its duty to market the compositions.

Further, the court found that the authors and composers had an interest in songs not covered by "publisher contracts" that was "susceptible to damage by the charged conspiracy."

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9005.55, 9009.275.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Sufficiency of Damage Allegations—"Collateral" Injury and "Inconsequential" Damages—Conspiracy to Suppress Publishing and Recording of Songs.—Radio and television networks and their music "acquiring and licensing" organization, in a treble damage action charging them with conspiring to suppress the publishing and recording of songs, were not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of their contention that any injury to the authors and composers was "only collateral" and that any damage was "inconsequential." Whether the damage was great or slight was a question of fact to be decided by the trier of the facts.

[Treble Damage Action—Capacity to Sue]

EDWARD WEINFELD, District Judge [In full text]: This is a motion by the defendants for summary judgment in a private antitrust suit brought under sections 4, 12 and 16 of the Clayton Act.[1] The motion is based solely on plaintiffs' alleged lack of standing to sue and hence the merits of the action are not involved.

[Motions—Prior Proceedings]

Alternatively, the defendants seek partial summary judgment, should the Court conclude that plaintiffs are entitled to maintain this action as to some, but not all, of their claims for damages. Finally, the defendants move, should the Court conclude that issues of fact exist as to material matters touching upon plaintiffs' capacity to sue, that a separate trial be granted with respect to such facts.

The plaintiffs urge that the record demonstrates they do have standing to sue, and in any event, disputed questions of fact on this issue require the denial of the motion. As to the request for a separate trial, they contend it would be just as expeditious to proceed on all issues, leaving to the trial court the determination of the defendants' contentions.

The motion, supported by voluminous affidavits and exhibits, is based upon facts which have been culled from pre-trial depositions of the plaintiffs and witnesses aggregating more than 20,000 pages of testimony, some 11,000 exhibits consisting of approximately 55,000 pages, and almost 3,000 pages of answers to written interrogatories served pursuant to Rule 33 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

These pre-trial proceedings, which have extended over a five-year period, forecast an extremely long trial presenting complex issues. This circumstance, however, can play no part in the consideration of this motion. If the plaintiffs have been directly damaged by reason of the wrongful conduct charged against the defendants, they may not be denied their day in court, even though a trial upon the merits and incidental proceedings may take, as the defendants suggest, several years. Equally, it follows, if plaintiffs are without right to maintain this action, then the defendants are entitled to be protected against the heavy burden of expense and effort entailed in a protracted and intricate trial. Moreover, the proper administration of justice requires, in the interests of other litigants who await and are entitled to a trial, that the Court's energies and time be not deflected by an unnecessary and time-consuming trial. This comment is made since the extensive, if not prolific, affidavits and briefs submitted in support of, and in opposition to, the motion, have strayed in a number of instances far and wide from the basic question. The allegations of the complaint charging an illegal conspiracy by the defendants in violation of the antitrust laws, must, for the purposes of this motion, be deemed true.[2] Consequently, those portions of the affidavits which argue the merits of the charges are not pertinent.

[Issue—Injury to Plaintiffs]

The issue here falls within a very narrow compass—whether the alleged antitrust conduct of the defendants has injured the plaintiffs in their business or property within the meaning of the antitrust statutes so as to give them standing to maintain this action for treble damages. The voluminous record furnishes a basis upon which a decision can be reached on the question posed. It is difficult to believe that further proliferation of it will yield additional material facts. It is stated that on the limited issue alone thousands of pages of testimony were taken.

The principal documents consisting of the Articles of Association of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, (hereafter called ASCAP), plaintiffs' agreements with ASCAP and with music publishers, are not in dispute.[3] What is principally in dispute is the interpretation which the parties place upon them and the nature of the relationship between the plaintiffs on the one hand and ASCAP and the publishers on the other. Since the motion rests upon documentary evidence, the authenticity of which is not challenged, plaintiffs' admissions and their answers to interrogatories, there are no facts in dispute which are essential to a determination of the tendered legal question[4]—whether the plaintiffs have standing to maintain this action.

[Parties]

The plaintiffs, thirty-three in number, professional composers and authors, are engaged in the writing of musical compositions.[5] They bring this action, in their individual capacities and, also, as a spurious class action pursuant to Rule 23(a)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on behalf of approximately 3,000 professional authors and composers of music who allegedly have suffered and will continue to "suffer loss and damage in their business and property" by reason of defendants' conduct in violation of the antitrust laws, set forth in the complaint. Plaintiffs are members of ASCAP.

The defendants include Broadcast Music, Inc., (hereafter referred to as BMI), which is wholly owned by radio and television broadcasting companies. BMI is engaged primarily in the acquisition and licensing of performance rights in musical compositions. The other defendants include the leading radio and television networks, each of which owns and operates radio and television stations. These defendants, together with other broadcasters, organized BMI. Each broadcasting company defendant is a stockholder of BMI. Also named as defendants are subsidiary publishing and recording companies, and various individuals who were or are officers, directors, or executives of one or more of the corporate defendants.

[Conspiracy to Monopolize]

The gist of the plaintiffs' charges is that the defendants conspired to dominate and control the market for the use and exploitation of musical compositions, particularly the rights to public performance for profit, to establish and maintain a monopoly thereof and to restrain trade and commerce therein. The ultimate goal, say the plaintiffs, was to control the music industry and thereby to fix and reduce the price to be paid by the defendant networks and their co-conspirators in the broadcasting industry for the use of music on their programs.

[Music "Pool"]

Plaintiffs charge that to achieve their conspiratorial objective, the defendants organized BMI in 1939, as the vehicle to maintain a music pool for their joint use and benefit, and have dominated it ever since. In general they allege that to effectuate the conspiracy, the defendants have given preference to the performance of BMI controlled music, have discriminated against the musical compositions written by the plaintiffs and other writers similarly situated, have boycotted, restricted and limited their musical compositions both in broadcasting and recording and have induced other broadcasters and record companies to do the same.

[Specific Acts Charged]

Specific acts and conduct of the defendants in furtherance of the conspiracy are enumerated in the complaint. Plaintiffs charge that such conspiratorial acts and conduct have resulted in limited introduction and availability to the public of non-BMI songs and a monopoly in the music industry to the detriment of the plaintiff songwriters, other songwriters and the public. The plaintiffs

[3] In their briefs and upon the argument of the motion, the plaintiffs contended that pre-trial depositions of two witnesses, an ASCAP executive and its General Counsel, had not been completed since they had not cross-examined them. Consequently, they urged that the depositions be disregarded on this motion. The Court was of the view that there was substance to plaintiffs' contention, and to avoid a denial of the motion with leave to renew because of an incomplete record, directed that the examination of the witnesses be completed. Thereafter, the plaintiffs withdrew their objections and consented "that the Court consider and decide the motion upon the record as heretofore presented to it by the parties, including the testimony given by said witnesses as well as the documents produced by said witnesses, which record for this purpose may be deemed sufficient."

[4] Cf. Associated Press v. United States [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,384], 326 U. S. 1, 5-6 (1945).

[5] Plaintiffs' counsel refers to them as "writers of music"—a "generic term to describe both those who supply the music, commonly called composers, and those who, supplying the lyrics, are called authors." The individual musical works they produce include popular songs, production songs, and serious music including symphonies and music for ballet and opera.

allege that the defendants have limited, restricted and prevented (1) the publication of musical compositions written by plaintiffs and others similarly situated; (2) the marketing and sale of published versions thereof; (3) the use and utilization thereof by radio and television broadcasting stations and networks; (4) the use and utilization thereof in the manufacture and sale of phonograph records; (5) the public performance for profit thereof in places of public gathering and entertainment, and (6) the stimulation which use and popularization in each of said segments of the market provides for exploitation in other segments thereof.

[Alleged Injury]

In consequence, the plaintiffs claim that they and other writers similarly situated have been injured by an annual loss of income from their musical compositions, depreciation of the price of performance fees and loss of prestige and recognition as authors and composers. Plaintiffs seek treble damages in the sum of $150,000,000 and injunctive relief.

["Direct" Injuries Required]

Section 4 of the Clayton Act[6] provides in pertinent part, as follows:

> "* * * [A]ny person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States * * * and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

While the foregoing statute contains no language of limitation, the courts have restricted the right to sue thereunder to those persons who are directly injured in their business or property. Those who are indirectly or incidentally injured by the forbidden conduct have been denied standing to assert a claim.

Our Court of Appeals has summarized the rule as follows:

> "Those harmed only incidentally by anti-trust violations have no standing to sue for treble damages; only those at whom the violation is directly aimed, or who have been directly harmed may recover.
> Undoubtedly, [other] persons suffer some financial loss when anti-trust violations are directed against the corporations in which they have an interest. But not every financial loss due to an anti-trust violation, however remote, gives a right of action."[7]

Similarly, the rule has been stated in Martens v. Barrett,[8] as follows:

> "* * * [I]t is universal that where the business or property allegedly interfered with by forbidden practices is that being done and carried on by a corporation, it is that corporation alone, and not its stockholders (few or many), officers, directors, creditors or licensors, who has a right of recovery, even though in an economic sense real harm may well be sustained as the impact of such wrongful acts bring about reduced earnings, lower salaries, bonuses, injury to general business reputation, or diminution in the value of ownership."

[Persons Who Cannot Sue]

A fairly general pattern has emerged from this concept. The following plaintiffs have been held to be without standing to sue for treble damages under the antitrust laws: (1) a patent owner who licenses his patents to a manufacturer on a royalty basis, for loss of royalties on sales which would have been made but for the antitrust conduct of defendants;[9] (2) shareholders, officers, and creditors of corporations for diminution in value of ownership, loss of earnings, or impairment of corporate ability to pay, due to the impact of antitrust conduct on the corporation;[10] (3) nonoperating motion picture landlords for depreciation in market value of the property or loss of rents attributable to antitrust violations relating to the showing of pictures at the theatres operated by their lessees,[11] (4) an insurance broker for loss of income due to a conspiracy to deprive the company which he represented of a particular contract;[12] (5) a supplier of raw materials for loss of sales resulting from conduct restricting the business of its major customer.[13] While the instant case bears resemblance to some of the foregoing, it does not fit precisely the pattern of any.

["Divestment" of "Business or Property" Rights]

The defendants' position broadly stated is that the pre-trial record demonstrates that the plaintiffs have so divested themselves to others—ASCAP and music publishers—of rights in their compositions, that they retained no "business or property" susceptible of direct injury within the meaning of the statute; that the conspiracy to restrict compositions written by the plaintiffs, if it injures anyone, directly injures ASCAP and the publishers, and injury, if any, to plaintiffs is indirect, remote and incidental, for which recovery is not permitted under the act.

["Transferred" and "Retained" Rights]

Consideration of this contention requires an analysis of plaintiffs' rights in their musical compositions, the nature of the rights transferred to others and what rights, if any, were retained by plaintiffs.

[Copyrights]

A writer of a musical composition under common law possesses the exclusive right to make the first publication and to prevent publication by others. However, upon its first publication the composition passes into the public domain. The author's right in his composition may be preserved by publication with notice of copyright in compliance with the terms and provisions of the Copyright Act.[14] Upon such publication the common law rights are terminated and statutory rights come into being and control.[15] As stated in some of the authorities, "when the copyright comes in, the common law goes out."[16] The statutory rights may be summarized as follows:

(1) Printing and publishing rights:

The right to print and sell piano and orchestration copies, folios, composite works and other printed versions of the composition;

(2) Mechanical reproduction rights:

(a) The right to manufacture and sell phonograph recordings, electrical transcriptions, tapes and other devices reproducing the composition, including (b) the right to make recordings of the composition in synchronization with motion pictures;

(3) Public performance for profit rights:

The right to perform, nondramatically, the composition in public for profit by means of live or recorded presentations.[17]

The rights so granted upon compliance with the statute are separate and independent. They may be retained by the owner or disposed of by him to others either singly or in their entirety, as his interests dictate.[18]

[Rights Disposed of]

The burden of the defendants' challenge to the plaintiffs' standing to sue centers about the separate dispositions by plaintiffs of (1) printing, publishing and mechanical reproduction rights, sometimes referred to hereafter as the publishing and recording rights, and (2) the nondramatic public performance rights for profit, hereafter referred to as the public performance rights. The claims which center about these rights may be considered separately.[19]

To support their position, the defendants note that the complaint alleges, and the pretrial record establishes, that plaintiffs' and other writers' compositions are marketed through (1) the printing and sale of sheet music, (2) the licensing of recordings on phonograph records and other mechanical reproductions, and (3) the licensing of public performance rights. Accordingly, the defendants argue that since the plaintiffs have granted, for commercial exploitation, their public performance rights to ASCAP and their recording and publishing rights to the publishers, from whom they receive payments therefor, any injury to plaintiffs is indirect and secondary; that the conspiracy, if it injures anyone directly, injures ASCAP and the music publishers; that the right to sue for damages for such direct injuries is with them and not with the plaintiffs.

[Contracts]

In all, 7,000 songs have been composed by plaintiffs herein.[20] As to all, the public performance rights are the subject of agreements with ASCAP by virtue of plaintiffs' membership therein.

As to 5,800 of the total number, the publishing and recording rights are the subject of agreements entered into by plaintiffs with publishers.

As to the remaining 1,200, no publishing or recording contracts are in effect. The plaintiffs are the common law or statutory copyright owners.

The Nondramatic Public Performance Rights and ASCAP

[Authors and Composers' Non-profit Association]

The complaint emphasizes that a principal objective of the conspiracy was control of the public performance rights in musical compositions. Hence, we turn first to this aspect of the defendants' attack upon plaintiffs' standing to sue. This involves a consideration of ASCAP and the agreement under which it licenses the nondramatic public performance for profit of plaintiffs' compositions.

[Licensing Rights Vested in Association]

ASCAP is a nonprofit unincorporated association which was formed in 1914 to protect its members against piracies of their works and generally to promote their interests. It grants licenses and collects royalties for the nondramatic public performance for profit of the works of its members.[21] Its duration is 99 years. Its membership includes two groups, authors and composers of music, referred to as "writer members", and music publishers. The writer members, including plaintiffs, number in excess of 3,000. ASCAP's general management is vested in a Board of Directors which since prior to 1941 has consisted of an equal number of writer and publisher members. Under the Articles of Association, all members, writers and publishers alike, execute agreements vesting in ASCAP the right to license, upon a nonexclusive basis, the nondramatic public performance of works written or published by the members. Pursuant thereto, these plaintiffs, writer members, entered into uniform agreements with ASCAP. The agreements provide in part that:

> "The Owner [the publisher or writer member] sells, assigns, transfers and sets over unto [ASCAP] for the term hereof, [18] Interstate Hotel Co. v. Remick Music Corp., 157 F. 2d 744, 745 (8th Cir. 1946), cert. denied, 329 U. S. 809 (1947); M. Witmark & Sons v. Jensen, 80 F. Supp. 843, 846-47 (D. Minn. 1948), appeal dismissed, 177 F. 2d 515 (8th Cir. 1949).

[19] Cf. Ring v. Spina, 148 F. 2d 647, 653 (2d Cir. 1945).

[20] This was the total number which at the time of plaintiffs' last examination had been published, placed with a publisher, or registered with ASCAP for performance credits. It does not include works written thereafter.

[21] ASCAP also licenses other compositions in its repertory, obtained by contract with foreign societies.

> the entire exclusive[22] right of public performance * * * in each musical work," of which he is the copyright owner either alone or jointly with others, or in which he has any right, title or interest, or which during the term of the agreement may be written, composed, acquired, owned, published or copyrighted by the owner, alone, jointly, or in collaboration with others. The agreement further provides that with respect to every such musical work, the right of public performance

> "shall be deemed assigned to [ASCAP] by this instrument and shall vest in and be the absolute property of [ASCAP] for the term hereof * * *."

These agreements cover substantially all the 7,000 compositions written by the respective plaintiffs. They expire December 31, 1965.

[Licenses Granted by Association]

ASCAP, through its licensing department, grants performance licenses to users of music. They are of two kinds: (1) a blanket license, and (2) a program license. The blanket license is the type generally issued. It grants to the music user for its term the right to perform all the music in ASCAP's catalogue upon payment of a flat fee which does not vary according to the number of ASCAP compositions used by the licensee or the number of programs in which they are played. Under the program license the broadcaster pays ASCAP a fee only for each program in which ASCAP's music is used. The terms of the licenses and the rates to be charged are decided by ASCAP's Board of Directors. Individual members do not pass upon, approve, ratify or reject license terms agreed to by the Board.

[Royalties and Fees Collected by Association]

All royalties and license fees collected by ASCAP are pooled in a common fund. Control over and disposition of all funds received is vested in the Board of Directors. The funds are first disbursed to meet operating expenses and payments due to affiliated foreign societies. Upon payment of the foregoing plus reserves which may be set up, the net amount remaining is distributed among the members upon order of the Board of Directors. The amount to be distributed is divided into two equal parts: one for allocation among publisher members and the other for allocation among writer members.[23] The royalties payable to individual writer members are determined by a Writers' Classification Committee composed of writer members of the Board of Directors. The Committee is empowered to determine a writer's status with respect to his share of royalties. In fixing the status of a member, certain criteria are imposed by the Articles of Association upon the Committee.[24] These include the number, nature, character and prestige of works composed, written or published by the member, the length of time his works have been a part of the ASCAP catalogue, their popularity and vogue. Primary consideration is to be given to the performance of the compositions as indicated by objective surveys. The system of distribution used by the Writers' Classification Committee has been changed from time to time.

[Plaintiffs Have Granted No Licenses]

With respect to the 7,000 songs, public performance licenses have been granted only by ASCAP. Plaintiff members since 1941 have not granted a single license although they assert an equal right to grant nonexclusive licenses, a point hereafter considered.

[Contentions]

The defendants emphasize that the terms of plaintiffs' membership in ASCAP plus ASCAP's activities in marketing for public performance the works of the plaintiffs and other writers compel a finding that it is not the plaintiffs but ASCAP which is in the business of licensing the compositions. Accordingly, they urge that the force of the defendants' alleged illegal conduct is visited directly, and in the first instance, upon ASCAP which receives all the licensing fees and only indirectly upon plaintiffs in the form of reduced royalties.

Plaintiffs, however, contend that their business is not only that of creating and writing songs and compositions, but also includes exploiting and promoting their songs; that ASCAP is simply the vehicle through which they effect public distribution of their products. They urge that ASCAP is only an agent, "the middle-man between the songwriter and the user"—that they "utilize the services of ASCAP as a licensing and collection agency." Plaintiffs also refer to it as a "co-operative society" and as "a conduit through which the fees flow from the users to the members themselves." Consequently, they contend, the direct loss falls upon them and not ASCAP.

[Association, Not Individual Members, Is "Direct Target"]

No purpose is served in attempting to define the precise jural nature of ASCAP whether "co-operative society", "agent", "conduit",[25] or "middle-man", as plaintiffs variously contend or, as the defendants contend, "a corporate-like entity" or an association whose entire membership has a "joint and common interest" in this action similar to the members of a partnership. Theoretical concepts must give way to reality.

The stubborn facts are that the plaintiffs under the Articles of Association by which they are bound[26] have executed agreements which unequivocally transfer to ASCAP a nonexclusive right to license public performances for profit of their compositions; that it is ASCAP, and ASCAP alone, which has marketed and licensed the 7,000 songs written by plaintiffs; that it was not the plaintiffs but ASCAP which negotiated the prices and terms of the licenses; that it was not the plaintiffs but ASCAP which prosecuted claims of infringement of plaintiffs' compositions. It is ASCAP and not its licensees from which the plaintiffs and their fellow members receive royalties. It is ASCAP which determines how much each composer shall receive. The amount distributable to a plaintiff of his share of the fund is beyond his control. Thus, even were it accepted that ASCAP is a "co-operative society" which renders services exclusively in the interests of its members, this would "not remove its activities from the sphere of business."[27] Its business nature is not affected by its nonprofit character.[28]

The thrust of the alleged conspiracy insofar as the public performance rights are concerned is directed against ASCAP as the licensor of the totality of all its members' compositions and not as against particular members or particular compositions. The licensing activities of ASCAP are extensive and represent a vast business enterprise. It has licensed 3,475 radio stations; 21 national and regional radio networks; 453 television stations and 3 television networks. In 1955,[29] 85 per cent of all radio performances and 90 per cent of all television performances of copyrighted music were licensed by ASCAP. In a single year it has issued more than 26,000 general licenses to hotels, night clubs, restaurants and similar public places, motion picture theatres, drive-ins, wired music operators and others. In 1956, its receipts from licenses were close to $25,000,000 and after required disbursements it distributed almost $19,000,000 to its members. No matter what name may be applied to ASCAP, no matter what its jural character, as a consequence of the grant of rights by its members to it, the competition in the field of nondramatic public performances for profit is between ASCAP and BMI and not between plaintiffs or other composers and BMI. Indeed, plaintiffs themselves virtually concede this. In answer to an interrogatory, they stated:

> "* * * The rights of public performance for profit of the musical compositions written by [plaintiffs and other writers

[25] Our Court of Appeals has recognized that ASCAP is not a mere agency or conduit for its members. Reversing a District Court ruling which dismissed an action brought by two publisher members (corporations) and ASCAP for infringement of copyright, the Court stated "any recovery of damages * * * would go to the society, and the corporate plaintiffs were necessary parties merely because they hold their respective causes of action in trust for the society." Buck v. Elm Lodge, Inc., 83 F. 2d 201, 202 (2d Cir. 1936). There are many cases where the vindication of the right of public performance of members' songs was brought in the name of ASCAP, e. g., Buck v. Jewell-LaSalle Realty Co., 283 U. S. 191 (1931); Jewell-LaSalle Realty Co. v. Buck, 283 U. S. 202 (1931).

similarly situated], except in rare instances, are cleared through ASCAP or defendant BMI."

No matter how phrased, it cannot obscure the fact that ASCAP, and not the individual composers, is the direct target of the alleged conspiracy. Any other conclusion flies in the face of reality.

The situation here presented comes within the doctrine enunciated by Judge Learned Hand in Bookout v. Schine Chain Theatres Inc. [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,987], 253 F. 2d 292, 295 (2d Cir. 1958), that "all claims under the Anti-Trust Acts rest upon wrongs done by the suppression of competition and must be initiated by a party whose commerce has been directly injured."

The conclusion is compelled that in practice and in fact it is ASCAP which was and is engaged in the business of licensing plaintiffs' compositions for public performance; that for that purpose plaintiffs have so divested themselves of their public performance rights to ASCAP that any injury resulting from the conspiracy was primarily and directly upon ASCAP; that injury, if any, sustained by the plaintiffs is secondary and remote.

[Retained Rights Not Susceptible of Direct Injury]

The plaintiffs seeks to avert this conclusion, relying upon certain retained rights with respect to their compositions, which independently of those granted to ASCAP, they claim are susceptible of direct injury by reason of defendants' conduct.

First, the fact that plaintiffs retained a separate right to grant nonexclusive licenses (assuming arguendo that the right remained with the plaintiffs)[30] does not alter the remote nature of any claimed injury. While the 1941 decree voided the exclusive licensing right in ASCAP, the fact is, as already noted, that no plaintiff granted nondramatic public performance licenses.[31] The reason is apparent. The blanket licenses issued by ASCAP permit the performance of all compositions in ASCAP's repertoire and hence there is no need for a user to obtain a license from any individual ASCAP member to perform that member's particular composition. The nonexclusive right allegedly retained by the plaintiffs is more apparent than real. The only loss plaintiffs could have suffered was loss of income from ASCAP.

As to the right to restrict nondramatic performances by ASCAP's radio and television licensees, this has rarely been exercised. Its purpose is to enable an author to protect his composition against indiscriminate performances. This hardly gives support to a claim of direct injury.

As to plaintiffs' contention that they retained rights concerning the use of said compositions in dramatico-musical settings, the complaint does not allege, nor is evidence presented, that the conspiracy was directed toward these rights, and hence this furnishes no basis for holding that plaintiffs have standing to sue.

Neither does the right to resign from ASCAP give the plaintiffs standing to sue for alleged diminution of income received from ASCAP during the period of membership. Plaintiffs in fact have not resigned. Even if they did, while it would terminate all existing assignments, the resignation would be subject to any right or obligation existing between ASCAP and its licensees and further, to the withdrawing members' right to a proportionate share of distributions from royalties accruing under existing licenses. ASCAP would continue to have the right to grant nonexclusive licenses in a resigned writer's composition as long as his publishers and collaborators remained members of ASCAP.[32]

The rights retained by plaintiffs, whether they be called rights of reversion, recapture, restriction, resignation or otherwise, upon this record are not of such a nature that they are susceptible of direct damage or [30] The defendants dispute that the plaintiffs still retain this nonexclusive right in view of their contracts with the publishers which granted them "all rights" in the compositions not granted to ASCAP. In view of the disposition here made it is unnecessary to decide this issue.

[31] While plaintiff Schwartz in his affidavit suggests that some of the composers granted consents to users of music, his answers to interrogatories categorically state: "The licenses for nondramatic performance for profit for all compositions noted in Schedule A have, since 1940, been issued by ASCAP." It appears that the very limited consents referred to were not for nondramatic performances but were rather consents to perform songs on ASCAP's restricted list or consents to make dramatic performances. At best they are de minimis.

support a claim of direct injury under the charged conspiracy. The hard fact that will not down is that, despite these retained rights, plaintiffs have not, during the period of the conspiracy, licensed public performances of their compositions. ASCAP and ASCAP alone performed that function. There is no showing that the plaintiffs intended to exercise these rights for the purpose of licensing their songs for public performance,[33] or that the defendants did anything to interfere with plaintiffs' exercise of them. Injury to them, if any, was not only remote but the fact remains that the primary impact an injury was upon ASCAP as the licensor of its members' songs and the recipient of the fees therefor.

Finally, plaintiffs stress their promotional activities to popularize their songs to derive greater income and urge this as constituting part of their business which they say has been injured by the defendants' conduct. They refer to individual efforts to induce orchestra leaders, performers, disc jockeys, and others, to play their songs as well as efforts to interest record companies in recording them. But these various activities are no different from those engaged in by an author attending a book luncheon, lecturing before college and other groups, or appearing on radio and television programs. The activities of a composer, even though the end result may mean increase in sales of sheet music or records of his composition, do not mean he is in the business of promoting his songs any more than an author of a book is in the business of publishing simply because he seeks by promotional action to increase the sales of his books.

[Avenue of Relief—Action by Association Itself]

In the instant case, unlike others where a plaintiff who was held to be indirectly damaged was denied a right to sue, an avenue of relief is open to the plaintiffs and all other members of ASCAP on whose behalf they allege they bring this action. No substantial reason has been advanced why ASCAP has not brought the action or why it has not been vouched into the action. The fact that ASCAP is a nonprofit organization does not mean that direct injury cannot be inflicted upon it by illegal antitrust conduct of others, just as that fact does not mean that ASCAP cannot itself indulge in antitrust conduct.[34] The fact is that ASCAP has sued and has been sued. Indeed, were ASCAP to bring an action based upon the alleged illegal conduct of the defendants by reason of claimed injury and recover a judgment, the proceeds in the first instance would be the property of the association, and subject to the payment of its debts. A recovery would permit distribution to be made to the individual plaintiffs and other members of ASCAP as determined by the Writers' Classification Committee in accordance with the by-laws.[35]

[No Capacity to Sue]

Upon all the foregoing, the Court holds that with respect to the nondramatic public performance rights, the plaintiffs are without standing to sue.

We now consider whether the plaintiffs have standing to sue with respect to publishing and recording rights.

The Publishing and Recording Rights and the Publishers

[Rights Transferred to Publishers]

The plaintiffs have entered into agreements with 300 music publishers, who are also members of ASCAP. Under these they have transferred to the publishers their unpublished original compositions with the right to secure copyright therein and all rights thereunder, subject to the performance rights granted to ASCAP. The agreements cover approximately 5,800 of the 7,000 compositions written by the plaintiffs. They are substantially similar and provide:

[33] Cf. Triangle Conduit & Cable Co. v. National Electric Products Corp. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,422], 152 F. 2d 398, 399 (3d Cir. 1945); American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 166 Fed. 261 (2d Cir. 1908), aff'd 213 U. S. 347 (1909).

[34] American Medical Ass'n v. United States [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,254], 317 U. S. 519 (1943).

[35] Cf. American Cooperative Serum Ass'n v. Anchor Serum Co. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,447], 153 F. 2d 907, 912-13 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 329 U. S. 721 (1946). What was said in Loeb v. Eastman Kodak Co., 183 Fed. 704, 709 (3d Cir. 1910), although the reference was to stockholders of a corporation is equally pertinent here:

"Certainly it is not apparent that the [antitrust act] was intended to or did confer upon hundreds or thousands of stockholders individual rights of action when their wrongs could have been equally well and far more economically redressed by a single suit in the name of the corporation."

"The Writer hereby sells, assigns, transfers and delivers to the Publisher a certain heretofore unpublished original musical composition written and/or composed by the above-named Writer now entitled * * * including the title, words and music thereof and the right to secure copyright therein throughout the entire world, to have and to hold the said copyright and all rights of whatsoever nature thereunder existing * * *."

The agreement further provides for the payment by the publisher to the writer of stipulated royalties based upon the number of copies of sheet music sold, and a percentage of gross sums received from recording licenses. There can be no doubt that the essential marketing and exploitation of the publishing and recording rights has been carried on under the contracts by the plaintiffs' publishers; that plaintiffs themselves, with but rare exceptions, have never granted any license pertaining to any right in such compositions; that it is the publishers who are in the business of publishing and issuing licenses for recordings and other mechanical reproductions of the plaintiffs' compositions.

Again the defendants stress that it is the publishers who in the first instance receive the income from the sale of sheet music and the licensing of recording upon which royalty payments to the plaintiffs are based. Thus, insofar as the complaint charges interference with the exploitation of the publishing and recording rights in plaintiffs' songs, the case at first blush would seem to compel the same conclusion as that reached in the instance of ASCAP.[36] Notwithstanding, plaintiffs, aside from questioning their precise relationship with their publishers,[37] here urge that other factors are present which give them standing to sue.

[Charges—Suppression of Musical Compositions]

The plaintiffs have offered testimony on their pretrial examinations and in their affidavits in opposition to this motion with respect to various practices allegedly engaged in by the defendants in furtherance of the conspiratorial objective.

They charge that music publishers with whom they had contracts were induced by subsidies, restrictive covenants, incentive payments and other devices including payments of salaries of publishers' employees, to refrain from publishing and exploiting plaintiffs' songs; that recording companies were induced by various methods not to record plaintiffs' songs; that these activities were all for the purpose of suppressing plaintiffs' musical compositions altogether or to discriminate in favor of BMI songs. Plaintiffs further allege that some publishers, who were ASCAP houses, organized BMI companies and although in theory functioning separately, in fact, because of special concessions granted by BMI to the publishers, refrained from promoting non-BMI music or curtailed its exploitation. Plaintiffs name firms who engaged in this practice.

Publishers to whom plaintiffs transferred their compositions with the right to secure the copyrights were obligated to exploit them in good faith for the benefit of the composers, as well as for themselves.[38]

[Alleged Payments to Publishers]

The essence of these charges is that the defendants, in furtherance of the alleged conspiratorial objective to control the music market, induced publishers, including some under contract to plaintiffs, by various means, to withhold exploitation and marketing of plaintiffs' compositions in printed and recorded form; that in order to induce the publishers to do so, the defendants made payments to the publishers to cover their loss in income by reason of nonexploitation of plaintiffs' songs, thus making them whole to the detriment of the plaintiffs; that by such payments, defendants removed the incentive for, and interfered with the duty upon, the publishers to promote the marketing of plaintiffs' songs.

[36] The defendants point out that the rights given to the publishers are not burdened with the same reserved rights as in the instance of ASCAP.

[37] Plaintiffs contend that their contractual relationship with the publishers is a profit-sharing arrangement. The courts, however, appear to have held otherwise, and term the relationship as one of debtor and creditor. Steinbeck v. Gerosa, 4 N. Y. 2d 302, 317, 151 N. E. 2d 170, 178, appeal dismissed, 358 U. S. 39 (1958). See also, Ring v. Spina, 148 F. 2d 647, 652 (2d Cir. 1945). Plaintiffs also claim that their agreement with the publisher is "a personal service arrangement."

[Damage to Songwriters]

The Court's function on this motion is not to weigh and pass upon the merits of the charges. Should the proof sustain the charges, it would be difficult to challenge plaintiffs' claim of direct injury. This branch of the conspiracy appears, upon the facts alleged, to be directed not against the publishers but rather against the songwriters. A conspiracy may have more than one objective and its force directed against one or more intended victims. The target area of the conspiracy was broad enough to include plaintiffs insofar as the publication and recording rights are concerned.[39] Upon the facts alleged, the publishers were not damaged since they received compensating payments from the defendants; the only persons damaged were the songwriters. The wrongful acts had a direct impact upon the composers who were injured thereby and not upon the publishers who were made whole. The bounties granted to the publishers removed them from the target area of the defendants' attack and placed plaintiffs directly in the line of fire. We note particularly the comment of the Court of Appeals in Productive Inventions, Inc. v. Trico Products Corp.:[40]

> "No hard and fast rule can be laid down in these situations as the line between direct and incidental damage is not always definable with clarity."

[Situations Distinguished—Participation in Wrongful Conduct]

The fact that the plaintiffs divested themselves of the publishing and recording rights does not deprive them of standing to sue. They could receive royalties only if the publishers, in good faith, worked their compositions. Here the charge is that the very function which the publishers undertook to perform had been interfered with and rendered sterile by the acts of the defendants.

The significant distinction in the ASCAP situation is that no claim is made that ASCAP participated in or lent itself to any conduct in violation of its duty to market plaintiffs' compositions, which resulted in diminution of income to the plaintiffs. On the contrary, as already noted, the force of the conspiracy was directed against ASCAP as the licensor of its entire catalogue of songs.

The instant situation is also readily distinguishable upon the facts from the cases relied upon by the defendants. It is more nearly akin to the case of a landlord who is permitted to maintain a suit for damages where his lessee is charged with being a co-conspirator or a participant with the defendants in the wrongful conduct which led to a diminution of the landlord's income. While here it is not charged that the music publishers were co-conspirators, sufficient has been alleged to indicate that the defendants in effect used ready and complaisant music publishers to deprive plaintiffs of a market with respect to the publishing and recording of their compositions.

["Direct Injury" Sufficiently Charged]

Under all the circumstances presented, plaintiffs have set forth enough to support their claim of direct injury due to the acts and conduct charged against the defendants so as to entitle them to maintain this claim. Accordingly, this aspect of the defendants' motion is denied.

Plaintiffs' 1200 Songs as to Which No Publisher Contracts Are in Effect

[Interest Susceptible to Damage]

There remains for final consideration the defendants' contention with respect to the 1,200 songs as to which no publisher contracts are in effect. These constitute works of which the respective plaintiffs were either a registered proprietor of statutory copyright, a holder of legal title to common law copyright, or are compositions in which a publisher's right has terminated because of cancellation of the contract. The interest of plaintiffs therein was susceptible to damage by the charged conspiracy. Here the plaintiffs claim the publishing and recording market was entirely foreclosed to them by reason of defendants' action. While defendants acknowledge that plaintiffs are the common law or statutory copyright owners of these compositions, they minimize their value and contend that any injury was only collateral and any damage inconsequential. This contention is without substance. Whether the damage is great or slight is a question of fact to be decided by the trier of the fact. Accordingly, the defendants' motion likewise is denied with respect to the 1,200 songs.

Clayton and Sherman Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Injury to Corporation Created as Result of Alleged Conspiracy—Summary Judgment.—A summary judgment against the trustees of a dissolved theatre operating corporation was affirmed on the ground that the trustees failed to show that the corporation had been injured. The corporation, according to the complaint, was the fruition of an alleged conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws, that is, it was claimed that but for the alleged violation, the corporation would never have come into existence. To escape their predicament of complaining that the very acts which created their corporation also injured it, the trustees contended that a co-conspirator, though not a defendant, received more from the corporation than it contributed. For the co-conspirator's $1,000 contribution to the corporation's $2,000 capital, the co-conspirator received exactly what it paid for, a 50 per cent interest in a corporation that had no assets except the capital paid in. Even assuming that there was evidence that the rent paid by the corporation was unfairly low and that the point was still open to plaintiffs despite their failure to appeal an order finding the rent to be fair, the aggrieved party was the lessor, another plaintiff, and not the operating corporation.

Before LUMBARD, WATERMAN and FRIENDLY, Circuit Judges.

[Ownership and Operation of Theatre]

WATERMAN, Circuit Judge [In full text]: From the year 1928 to the present time the Walder family, through various corporations has had exclusive ownership of the Tivoli Theatre, a neighborhood motion picture house in Miami, Florida. Save for the period between 1937 and 1947 operation of the theater also has been exclusively in the hands of the Walders. Until 1931 ownership and operation were both in the name of Tivoli Theatre, Inc. In 1931 ownership was transferred to Walwal Corporation. In 1937 Tivoli Operating Corporation was organized to replace Tivoli Theatre, Inc. in the operation of the theater. The total subscribed capital of Operating consisted of $2,000: $1,000 paid in by Walwal and $1,000 paid in by Paramount Enterprises, Inc.[1] Operating paid Walwal an annual rent of $9,600; Enterprises exerted its efforts in obtaining films for the Tivoli; and the net proceeds were divided between Walwal and Enterprises in proportions which varied over the ten-year existence of the arrangement. In 1947 these arrangements were terminated, and operation of the theater passed to Tivoli Amusement Company, Inc., a corporation wholly owned by the Walder family. In 1951 the members of the Walder family, in their various capacities, filed a private antitrust action alleging that Enterprises was included in management of the Tivoli Theatre, and in the profits therefrom, only because of prior coercion exerted by defendants in preventing the Tivoli Theatre from receiving motion pictures for exhibition which the theater would have obtained had distribution been on a properly competitive basis. Thus plaintiffs alleged injury from practices condemned in United States v. Paramount Pictures [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,244], 334 U. S. 131 (1948).

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Plaintiffs]

In the complaint there were five plaintiffs or groups of plaintiffs—(1) the members of the Walder family individually; (2) the members of the Walder family as trustees for Tivoli Theatre, Inc., a dissolved corporation; (3) the Walwal Corporation; (4) Tivoli Amusement Company, Inc.; (5) two members of the Walder family as two of the surviving three trustees of Tivoli Operating Corporation, a dissolved corporation.[2] At various stages of the pre-trial proceedings all the plaintiffs have been eliminated from the case[3] except the plaintiffs in category (5), the trustees of Operating Corporation. As to them, on September 29, 1958 the district court, in an unreported opinion, granted defendants' motion for summary judgment [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,150]. This appeal followed.

[Injury to Corporation]

This lengthy discussion of the facts and the present posture of the case has been necessary in order to underscore the fact that the solitary question facing this court is the propriety of the district court's action in entering summary judgment against the trustees of Operating Corporation. No other plaintiffs are involved. As stated in the preceding paragraphs, Operating Corporation was, according to the Walder complaint, the fruition of the alleged conspiracy in violation of the antitrust laws; i.e., plaintiffs claim that but for the alleged violations Operating Corporation would never have come into existence. Thus the present plaintiffs complain that the very acts which created their corporation have also injured it, a difficult position for the trustees here to maintain successfully. In an effort to escape their predicament plaintiffs contend that Enterprises, a named co-conspirator though not a defendant, received as a result of the alleged coercion more from Operating than it contributed. Plaintiffs argue that Enterprises contributed only $1,000 in exchange for the far more valuable right to proceeds from the management of the theater resulting from the extremely favorable lease which Walwal offered to Operating. Plaintiffs' argument, however, is

[1] During the period here involved Paramount Enterprises operated theaters in the Miami region and was a wholly owned subsidiary of defendant Paramount Pictures, Inc.

[2] Operating was formally dissolved on Oct. 12, 1948.

[3] A detailed history of the litigation is necessary at this point. The original complaint was filed on September 4, 1951. In an opinion dated June 24, 1955 and reported at [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,097] 132 F. Supp. 912 (S. D. N. Y. 1955), Judge Weinfeld granted defendants' motion for summary judgment to the extent of eliminating the Walders from the case, both as individuals and as trustees of Tivoli Theatre, Inc. Judge Weinfeld reasoned that the Walders individually had no standing since the only injuries alleged related to corporations of which the Walders were stockholders. Judge Weinfeld then held that under the controlling Florida law, the trustees of a dissolved corporation, fully as much as the dissolved corporation, were bound by the requirement that suits by a dissolved corporation be brought within three years after final dissolution.

On December 17, 1956 Judge Leibell granted summary judgment dismissing Walwal from the case. He held that Walwal had received a fair rent from Operating in the ten-year period of Operating's existence. Walwal appealed from this decision, but on June 12, 1957 the appeal was dismissed for failure to prosecute.

On June 5, 1958 Judge Dimock dismissed the complaint as to Tivoli Amusement. No appeal was taken.

patently unsound. For its $1,000 contribution to Operating's capital Enterprises received exactly what it paid for, a 50% interest in a corporation that had no assets except the capital the two parties paid in. And even if we should assume that there was evidence to support plaintiffs' contention that the rent under the lease was unfairly low and that the point was still open to plaintiffs despite their failure to prosecute their appeal from Judge Leibell's order finding the rent to be fair,[4] the aggrieved party would be Walwal, not Operating. The district court quite properly concluded that Operating could not demonstrate injury. Cf. Fanchon & Marco, Inc. v. Paramount Pictures [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,125], 133 F. Supp. 839, 845 (S. D. N. Y. 1955).

[Affirmed]

Disposing of the case as we do, we do not reach appellees' other contentions.

Judgment affirmed.

Sherman Antitrust Act and Interstate Commerce Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Construction of Sherman Act—Applicability to Common Carriers and Regulated Industries—Rail Carriers—Acquisitions Exempted from Antitrust Laws by Interstate Commerce Act.—A trial court properly found that a railroad acquisition approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission did not violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act or Section 7 of the Clayton Act. Section 5(11) of the Interstate Commerce Act, a more recent and more specific expression of congressional policy, relieves acquiring carriers "from the operation of the antitrust laws" where the Commission approves the transaction. The Commission is not authorized by that section to "ignore" the antitrust laws, but it is not so bound by them that it must permit them to "overbear" what it finds to be in the "public interest." A contrary view would permit the Commission to authorize only those acquisitions which do not offend the antitrust laws, a conclusion that would render meaningless the exemption provided for in Section 5(11). Congress left the task of determining the competitive effects of railroad acquisitions to the wisdom and experience of the Commission. Here, after an extended analysis of the facts and the evidence, the Commission found that no significant lessening of competition would result from the acquisition, a determination which rested upon adequate findings that were, in turn, supported by substantial evidence.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2039.70.

Interlocking Directorates—Transactions Between Organizations Having Directors in Common—Competitive Bidding Requirements of Clayton Act, Section 10—Antitrust Exemption Provided by Interstate Commerce Act.—A trial court properly found that a railroad's proposed purchase of another railroad's stock did not violate Section 10 of the Clayton Act. That section prohibits a common carrier from having "any dealings in securities" of more than $50,000, in the aggregate, in any one year, with another corporation having directors in common with the carrier, unless the purchases are made by competitive bidding under regulations prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The evident purpose of that section was to prohibit a corporation from abusing a carrier by "palming off" upon it securities, supplies, and other articles without competitive bidding and at excessive prices through "overreaching" by, or other misfeasance of, common directors. But here, even if the transaction might, under other circumstances, violate Section 10 of the Clayton Act, Section 5(11) of the Interstate Commerce Act authorizes the Commission to approve the purchase if the Commission finds that the approval would be in the public interest. Further, Congress has expressly said that, upon such approval by the Commission, the carrier shall be relieved "from the operation of the antitrust laws." Here, the Commission fully considered all the factors bearing on the matter, including the contracts under which the railroad proposed to acquire a 50 per cent interest in the other railroad's stock, and, after doing so, approved them. That action of the Commission did not exceed the statutory limits of its discretion and, under Section 5(11), operated to relieve the acquiring carrier from the operation of Section 10 of the Clayton Act.

[4] See footnote 3, supra.

[Railroad "Acquisitions" Under Antitrust Laws]

MR. JUSTICE WHITTAKER delivered the opinion of the Court [In full text]: These appeals present questions arising out of rival applications by several rail carriers to the Interstate Commerce Commission under § 5(2) of the Interstate Commerce Act[1] for

[1] Section 5(2) of the Interstate Commerce Act (24 Stat. 380, as amended, 54 Stat. 905, 49 U. S. C. § 5(2)) provides, in pertinent part, that:

"(a) It shall be lawful, with the approval and authorization of the Commission, as provided in subdivision (b) of this paragraph—

"(i) for . . . two or more carriers jointly, to acquire control of another through ownership of its stock or otherwise . . . .

"(b) Whenever a transaction is proposed under subdivision (a) of this paragraph, the carrier . . . . seeking authority therefor shall present an application to the Commission, and thereupon the Commission shall notify . . . [designated parties], and shall afford reasonable opportunity for interested parties to be heard. If the Commission shall consider it necessary in order to determine whether the findings specified below may properly be made, it shall set said application for public hearing; and a public hearing shall be held in all cases where carriers by railroad are involved unless the Commission determines that a public hearing is not necessary in the public interest. If the Commission finds that, subject to such terms and conditions and such modifications as it shall find to be just and reasonable, the proposed transaction is within the scope of subdivision (a) of this paragraph and will be consistent with the public interest, it shall enter an order approving and authorizing such transaction, upon the terms and conditions, and with the modifications, so found to be just and reasonable. . . .

"(c) In passing upon any proposed transaction under the provisions of this paragraph, authority to acquire control of Toledo, Peoria & Western Railroad Company.

["Acquired" Railroad—Background]

"Western" is an independent, short-line "bridge carrier"[2] of through east-west traffic by-passing the congested Chicago gateway. Its line is about 234 miles long, extending from its connection with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company ("Pennsylvania") at Effner, on the Illinois-Indiana state line, westward, through Peoria, to its connection with the main line of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Company ("Santa Fe") at Lomax, Illinois, and thence southwesterly a short distance to Keokuk, Iowa. Its headquarters, shops and yards are located in East Peoria where it has 24 executives and where, and elsewhere along its line, it has about 225 other employees. It has connections for the interchange of traffic with 16 railroads, the principal ones being with the Pennsylvania at Effner, with the Santa Fe at Lomax, and with the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Company ("Nickel Plate"), the Illinois Terminal Railroad Company, the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company ("Burlington") and the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway Company ("Minneapolis") at Peoria. Its interchange connections with the other 10 railroads are at 17 other towns along its line.

Western has outstanding 90,000 shares of common capital stock, 82% of which is owned by the testamentary trustees of the estate of George P. McNear—Wilmington Trust Company and Guy Gladson—and the remaining 18% is owned by members of the McNear family, a bank and the president of Western. In 1954, the trustees determined to sell their Western stock, and rival efforts were commenced by Minneapolis, on the one hand, and by the Santa Fe and Pennsylvania, on the other hand, to purchase it. (Four of Wilmington Trust Company's directors were also directors of Pennsylvania.) Those negotiations culminated in a contract between the trustees and the Santa Fe, dated May 26, 1955, providing for the sale by the former and purchase by the latter of the stock at a price of $135 per share, subject to the Commission's approval.[3] Soon afterward, like agreements were made by the Santa Fe with the holders of the remaining 18% of the Western stock.

On June 28, 1955, the Santa Fe entered into a contract to sell to the Pennsylvania Company, a wholly owned subsidiary of Pennsylvania, 50% of the outstanding capital stock of Western at $135 per share,[4] subject to approval of the Commission.

the Commission shall give weight to the following considerations, among others: (1) The effect of the proposed transaction upon adequate transportation service to the public; (2) the effect upon the public interest of the inclusion, or failure to include, other railroads in the territory involved in the proposed transaction; (3) the total fixed charges resulting from the proposed transaction; and (4) the interest of the carrier employees affected.

"(d) The Commission shall have authority in the case of a proposed transaction under this paragraph involving a railroad or railroads, as a prerequisite to its approval of the proposed transaction, to require, upon equitable terms, the inclusion of another railroad or other railroads in the territory involved, upon petition by such railroad or railroads requesting such inclusion, and upon a finding that such inclusion is consistent with the public interest.

"(f) As a condition of its approval, under this paragraph, of any transaction involving a carrier or carriers by railroad subject to the provisions of this chapter, the Commission shall require a fair and equitable arrangement to protect the interests of the railroad employees affected . . . ."

[2] The term "bridge carrier" appears to mean a short-line carrier which transports through traffic from one long-line carrier to another.

[3] During the negotiations, Minneapolis first offered $69.50, and later $80, per share for the stock. On April 15, 1955, the Santa Fe and Pennsylvania each obtained letter commitments from the trustees for the sale to each of them of 26% of the Western stock at a price of $100 per share. (Near the same time the Rock Island made a like offer to the trustees for 26% of the Western stock, but that offer was not accepted.) But a dispute arose—and apparently still exists between the trustees and Pennsylvania—with respect to the validity of those commitments. Thereupon, Minneapolis offered the trustees $133 per share for the Western stock, but that offer was not accepted, and on May 26, 1955, the Santa Fe, acting, as the Commission found, "on behalf of that carrier alone," agreed with the trustees for the sale by the former and purchase by the latter of all of the Western stock held by the trustees at a price of $135 per share, and those parties on that date entered into a contract, accordingly, subject to approval of the Commission.

[4] The contract of June 28, 1955, between the Santa Fe and the Pennsylvania Company provided that it was without prejudice to any claims, causes of action or rights, which Pennsylvania may have against the trustees of the McNear estate with respect to the letter commitment of April 15, 1955, for the sale by the trustees to Pennsylvania of 26% of the Western

[Proceedings Before the ICC]

On July 8, 1955, the Santa Fe and Pennsylvania Company and its parent, Pennsylvania, applied to the Commission under § 5(2) of the Act[5] for approval of those stock purchase agreements and the consequent joint control of Western. The Minneapolis intervened and objected to the application, as did also the States of Minnesota and South Dakota and their respective public service regulatory commissions.

Thereafter, on October 13, 1955, the Minneapolis applied to the Commission, under the same section of the Act, for authority to acquire sole control of Western, expressing its willingness to enter into contracts with Western's stockholders to purchase their stock at the same price and on the same terms as set forth in their existing contracts with the Santa Fe. The Santa Fe, the Pennsylvania Company and Pennsylvania intervened in the latter proceeding and objected to the Minneapolis application.

On motion of Minneapolis, the Commission consolidated the two proceedings. Thereafter, seven other railroads having interchange connections with Western's line intervened. Two of them sought authority, at all events,[6] and two others of them sought authority, under stated conditions,[7] to participate, under § 5(2)(d) of the Act, in the acquisition of the Western stock on an equal basis with the successful applicant. The State of Illinois, 18 cities or towns and seven chambers of commerce located on or along Western's line, two labor organizations representing Western's employees, and a large number of shippers over Western's line, intervened in support of the Santa Fe-Pennsylvania application and in opposition to the Minneapolis application.

After an extended consolidated hearing before him, the Commission's examiner issued a proposed report recommending approval of the Santa Fe-Pennsylvania application and dismissal of the Minneapolis application. Thereafter, upon exceptions, and briefs and arguments in their support, Division 4 of the Commission issued its report. It was confronted, as it said, with four alternative proposals, (1) for authorization of joint control of Western by the Santa Fe and Pennsylvania, (2) for authorization of sole control by the Minneapolis, (3) for authorization of two other railroads, at all events, and of two more railroads, under stated conditions, to participate in the acquisition of the Western stock on an equal basis with stock: and that, in the event Pennsylvania should acquire from the trustees, under that letter commitment, all or any part of such shares, the obligation of the Santa Fe under the contract to sell Western shares to the Pennsylvania Company was to be reduced accordingly. It appears that litigation was then, and is yet, pending by Pennsylvania against the trustees for the enforcement of the letter commitment of April 15, 1955.

The contract also contained a covenant which, in essence, provided that (1) Western "will continue to be operated as a separate and independent carrier with responsible management located along its line in order to preserve to shippers and communities the present direct access to its officials," (2) that Western's properties will be maintained and improved, (3) that Western "will continue to maintain its own solicitation forces and will be entirely free to solicit traffic in such manner as best to serve the interests of" Western, (4) that all "existing routes and channels of trade via [Western] will be maintained and kept open without discrimination between connecting lines of railroad," and (5) that the Board of Directors of Western shall consist of 11 members, of whom one shall be the president of the company, two shall be officers of the Santa Fe, two shall be officers of the Pennsylvania Company, or Pennsylvania, or both, and the remaining six shall be prominent citizens not connected with either of the parties but selected by them through mutual agreement.

[5] See note 1.

[6] The New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Company ("Nickel Plate") and the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Company ("Rock Island") sought authority, under § 5(2)(d) of the Act (see note 1), to be included in the acquisition of Western's stock on an equal basis with the successful applicant or applicants.

[7] The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company ("Burlington") and the Wabash Railroad Company ("Wabash") did not object to approval of the Santa Fe-Pennsylvania application, provided the order required continuation of present routes and channels of trade via existing junctions and gateways and of all existing traffic and operating relations and arrangements, but they asked, in the event any railroad other than the Santa Fe and Pennsylvania be authorized to acquire an interest in Western's stock, that they, too, be authorized to participate therein to the same extent as any such other railroad.

The Illinois Central Railroad Company ("Illinois Central"), the Gulf, Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company ("Gulf") and the Chicago & North Western Railway Company ("North Western") asked that, if either application be approved, the order be conditioned to require the maintenance of all routes and channels of trade via existing gateways. The Monon Railroad Company asked that if the Santa Fe-Pennsylvania application be approved, the order contain a requirement that Pennsylvania shall grant to it certain trackage rights, and, if not done, that the Santa Fe-Pennsylvania application be denied.

the successful applicant,[8] and (4) denial of both applications.

The Commission observed that

> "[t]hese proceedings represent a new and more complicated phase in the administration of § 5, since [they involve] 2 applications for authority to control the same property, and petitions by 4 other carriers for inclusion in the transaction under varying circumstances."

It recognized that, under § 5(2) of the Act and the National Transportation Policy,[9] it was required to

> "weigh whether each application is consistent with the public interest, with or without inclusion of other railroads, considering not only other intervening petitions seeking such inclusion but also the other applicant and nonparticipating railroads as well."

It thought that the burden of proof was

> "most heavy for an applicant in a proceeding like this, because it must not only overbalance the claims of those seeking to share in the control but also of those seeking to exclude it from the transaction."

It conceived it to be its duty, under the Act and the National Transportation Policy, to "arrive at a standard of public interest and determine which of the various plans of control most nearly approximates it."

The Commission found that the Santa Fe-Pennsylvania plan contemplates that Western "will continue to be operated as a separate and independent carrier with responsible management located along its lines"; that it "will continue to maintain its own solicitation forces and will be entirely free to solicit traffic in such manner as best to serve the interests of the Western," and that all "existing routes and channels of trade via the Western will be maintained and kept open without discrimination between connecting lines of railroad." It found, on the other hand, that the Minneapolis plan "unequivocally contemplates the disappearance of the Western as an independent and neutral connection for the other 15 carriers with which it presently works"; that "[f]or all practical purposes the Western would be integrated, consolidated and merged into the Minneapolis for ownership, management, and operation"; that features of the Minneapolis plan "would be extremely harmful to other carriers"; that Western's headquarters office at Peoria would be eliminated, leaving only a trainmaster and a roadmaster at that point, and that the employment of most of Western's 24 executives and 225 other employees would be severed.

[Acquisition Consistent with Public Interest]

The Commission further found that "[o]nly the Minneapolis and its supporting interveners, the States of Minnesota and South Dakota, advocate the disappearance of the Western as a separate and independent operating carrier," and that all other parties to, and intervenors in, the proceedings "insist that the separate and independent operation of the Western under its present local management is a public necessity." It then found that the "[p]ublic interest demands that the present policies of the Western in all respects be continued." It thereupon made the ultimate finding, required by § 5(2)(b) of the Act, that the acquisition and plan of operation by the Santa Fe and Pennsylvania, subject to stated conditions, was

> "within the scope of § 5(2) of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended; that the terms and conditions proposed [by them] are just and reasonable; and that the transaction will be consistent with the public interest."

The Commission then entered its order approving the Santa Fe-Pennsylvania application, dismissing the Minneapolis application, and denying the petitions of the several intervening railroads which sought to participate in the acquisition of the Western stock. 295 I. C. C. 523.

Thereafter, Minneapolis petitioned the whole Commission for a reconsideration, and alternatively requested that, if the approval of the Santa Fe-Pennsylvania application be permitted to stand, it be authorized to participate equally with those railroads in the purchase of Western's stock on the same terms. That petition was denied.

[Proceedings in Trial Court]

Minneapolis then timely filed a complaint in the District Court for Minnesota against the United States and the Interstate Commerce Commission to vacate the Commission's order. The States of Minnesota and South Dakota and their respective regulatory commissions, being interested in strengthening the Minneapolis, which operates in those States, intervened in support of the complaint. The defendants answered, asserting the full legality of the Commission's order. The Santa Fe, the Pennsylvania, the Pennsylvania Company, the State of Illinois, the 18 cities and seven chambers of commerce and the numerous shippers who were intervenors before the Commission, intervened in opposition to the complaint. The Nickel Plate intervened, complaining that the Commission had improperly denied its request to participate in the purchase of the Western stock.

A three-judge court was convened and, after hearing, rendered its opinion and judgment sustaining the Commission's order. [1958 TRADE CASES ¶69,140] 165 F. Supp. 893. On separate appeals by the Minneapolis, the State of Minnesota and its regulatory commission, and the State of South Dakota and its regulatory commission, the case was brought here and we noted probable jurisdiction. 359 U. S. 933. All of those who were defendants and intervenors in opposition to the complaint in the District Court, except the Nickel Plate, are appellees in this Court.

[Contentions—Fairness of ICC]

Minneapolis, supported by the States of Minnesota and South Dakota, contends, first, that the Commission improperly adopted at the outset of its report the standard of "separate and independent management" of Western as the criterion governing the comparative merits of the rival plans, which was antithetic to its application, and thereby deprived it of "fair comparative consideration," and that the District Court erred in approving the Commission's action.

The record does not support that contention. Rather, it shows that the Commission's governing standard was the "public interest," although it ultimately did find that the public interest would be best served by Western's continued operation as a "separate and independent carrier." We believe that the recited findings show that the Commission carefully "weighed" and considered "each application" in its labors to determine which, if either, of them was "consistent with the public interest." Its subsidiary findings (a) that the Minneapolis plan "unequivocally contemplates the disappearance of the Western as an independent and neutral connection for the other 15 carriers with which it presently works," (b) that certain features of the Minneapolis plan "would be extremely harmful to other carriers," (c) that the Minneapolis plan contemplates the elimination of Western's office and the separation of its employees, and (d) that numerous witnesses insisted "that the separate and independent operation of the Western under its present local management is a public necessity," fully support its conclusionary finding that the "[p]ublic interest demands that the present policies of the Western in all respects be continued." That finding, though antithetic to Minneapolis' application, did not deprive it of "fair comparative consideration," but, on the contrary, it seems to us, was made by the Commission after full and fair consideration, and the District Court did not err in so holding.

[Exemptions from Antitrust Laws—Acquisition Approved by ICC]

Appellants' principal contention appears to be that acquisition of control of Western by Santa Fe and Pennsylvania will create a combination in restraint of commerce in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act[10] and will lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act,[11] and that the Commission's approval of their application was an abuse of power.

On their face these contentions would seem to run in the teeth of the language and purpose of § 5(11) of the Interstate Commerce Act. That section, in substance, provides that > "The authority conferred by this section shall be exclusive and plenary, and any carrier or corporation participating in . . . any transaction approved by the commission thereunder, shall have full power . . . to carry such transaction into effect and to own and operate any properties and exercise any control or franchises acquired through said transaction . . . and any carriers . . . participating in a transaction approved or authorized under the provisions of this section shall be and they are hereby relieved from the operation of the antitrust laws and of all other restraints, limitations, and prohibitions of law . . . insofar as may be necessary to enable [it] to carry into effect the transaction so approved or provided for in accordance with the terms and conditions, if any, imposed by the commission, and to hold, maintain, and operate any properties and exercise any control or franchises acquired through such transaction." 24 Stat. 380, as amended, 54 Stat. 908, 49 U. S. C. § 5(11).

[10] 15 U. S. C. § 1, 26 Stat. 209.

[11] 15 U. S. C. § 18, 38 Stat. 731.

Section 5(11) is both a more recent and a more specific expression of congressional policy than § 1 of the Sherman Act and § 7 of the Clayton Act, and in terms relieves the acquiring carrier, upon approval by the Commission of the acquisition, "from the operation of the antitrust laws . . . ." Although § 5(11) does not authorize the Commission to "ignore" the antitrust laws, McLean Trucking Co. v. United States [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,203], 321 U. S. 67, 80, there can be "little doubt that the commission is not to measure proposals for [acquisitions] by the standards of the antitrust laws." 321 U. S., at 85-86. The problem is one of accommodation of § 5(2) and the antitrust legislation. The Commission remains obligated to > "estimate the scope and appraise the effects of the curtailment of competition which will result from the proposed [acquisition] and consider them along with the advantages of improved service [and other matters in the public interest] to determine whether the [acquisition] will assist in effectuating the over-all transportation policy." 321 U. S., at 87.

Even though such acquisitions might otherwise violate the antitrust laws, Congress has authorized the Commission to approve them, if it finds they are in the public interest,

> "because it recognized that in some circumstances they were appropriate for effectuation of the national transportation policy. It was informed that this policy would be furthered by 'encouraging the organization of stronger units' in the . . . industry. And in authorizing those [acquisitions] it did not import the general policies of the anti-trust laws as a measure of their permissibility. It in terms relieved participants in appropriate [acquisitions] from the requirements of those laws. § 5(11)." 321 U. S., at 85.

It must be presumed that, in enacting this legislation, Congress took account of the fact that railroads are subject to strict regulation and supervision.

> "Against this background, no other inference is possible but that, as a factor in determining the propriety of [railroad acquisitions] the preservation of competition among carriers, although still a value, is significant chiefly as it aids in the attainment of the objectives of the national transportation policy." 321 U. S., at 85-86.

As respects railroad acquisitions, the Commission is not so bound by the antitrust laws that it must permit them to overbear what it finds to be in "the public interest." A contrary view would, in effect, permit the Commission to authorize only those acquisitions which would not offend those laws.

> "As has been said, this would render meaningless the exception relieving the participants in a properly approved [acquisition] of the requirements of those laws . . . ." 321 U. S., at 86.

Resolution of the conflicting considerations

> "is a complex task which requires extensive facilities, expert judgment and considerable knowledge of the transportation industry. Congress left that task to the commission 'to the end that the wisdom and experience of that commission may be used not only in connection with this form of transportation, but in its coordination of all other forms.' 79 Cong. Rec. 12207. 'The wisdom and experience of that commission,' not of the courts, must determine whether the proposed [acquisition] is 'consistent with the public interest.' Cf. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central R. Co., 215 U. S. 452; Pennsylvania Co. v. United States, 236 U. S. 351; United States v. Chicago Heights Trucking Co., 310 U. S. 344; Purcell v. United States, 315 U. S. 381." 321 U. S., at 87-88.

[Antitrust Issues Considered by ICC]

Here, the Commission gave extensive consideration to the anti-competitive contentions advanced by appellants, devoting more than five pages of its report to that matter. It found that "[a]ll the carriers endeavoring to participate in its control are in competition with Western"; that the "important thing is not whether there is possibility of competition, but whether there is probability of existing or potential competition being diminished or strangled by the Western under the control of the Santa Fe and the Pennsylvania." After an extended analysis of the complex facts and conflicting evidence, the Commission found that control of Western by the Santa Fe and Pennsylvania would not result in any significant lessening of competition. It pointed to the fact that although the Santa Fe's

"long haul" is to Chicago and the Pennsylvania's "next to longest haul" is also to Chicago (its longest haul being to St. Louis) the Santa Fe has agreed, and is bound, "to place Lomax on a parity with Chicago from a solicitation standpoint, and . . . the Pennsylvania will recognize Effner as one of its principal interchanges along with Chicago and St. Louis"; that "there may be some diversion of traffic, but such diversion would not jeopardize the maintenance of adequate transportation service by the objecting intervening carriers."

The Commission also pointed to the fact that Western had been in a prolonged receivership until 1927 when George P. McNear acquired its stock at a receiver's sale, Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. Acquisition, 124 I. C. C. 181. It further found that Western's modern existence began at that time and, under the guidance of McNear, was built into a fine railroad; that since McNear's death, in 1947, the present management has continued with much success, the policies he established. Those policies, the Commission found, were, and are, "to maintain strict neutrality between all connections, and to participate in any haul of traffic no matter how slight [as a bridge] carrier through Peoria as an alternative route, bypassing the congested terminals of Chicago and St. Louis," and that those policies are to be continued under the Santa Fe-Pennsylvania plan.

[No Abuse of Discretion]

We think it is clear from this summary of its analysis and findings that the Commission fully estimated the scope and appraised the effects of any curtailment of competition which might result from the acquisition of Western by the Santa Fe and Pennsylvania, and, after having done so, concluded that their acquisition and plan of operation of Western would not result in any significant lessening of competition. Congress has left the task of making that determination to the wisdom and experience of the Commission. The determination it has made rests upon adequate findings which are, in turn, supported by substantial evidence and is well within the limits of its discretion under the Act.

[Interlocking Directorates Under Clayton Act, Section 10]

Appellants argue that the Pennsylvania, in actuality, contracted to purchase 50% of the Western stock from Wilmington Trust Company, a co-trustee of the McNear trust, and that, since four persons were directors of both companies, that proposed stock purchase violates § 10 of the Clayton Act; that the Commission was without power to approve it; that, in any event, its action in "condoning" it was an abuse of power; and that the District Court, for those reasons also, erred in upholding the Commission's order.

The Commission found that the Santa Fe in entering into the contract of May 26, 1955, with the trustees of the McNear trust was "acting on behalf of that carrier alone." But even if we assume, for present purposes, that it was acting as well for the Pennsylvania, the result must be the same. Section 10 of the Clayton Act prohibits a common carrier engaged in commerce from having "any dealings in securities" of more than $50,000, in the aggregate, in any one year,

> "with another corporation, . . . when the said common carrier shall have upon its board of directors . . . any person who is at the same time a director [of] such other corporation . . . ., except such purchases [as] shall be made . . . by competitive bidding under regulations to be prescribed by [the] commission." 38 Stat. 734, 15 U. S. C. § 20.

Section 10 of the Clayton Act is, of course, an antitrust law,[12] and much of what we have just said relative to the problem of accommodation of § 5(2) of the Interstate Commerce Act and the antitrust laws is equally applicable to this contention. The evident purpose of § 10 of the Clayton Act was to prohibit a corporation from abusing a carrier by palming off upon it securities, supplies and other articles without competitive bidding and at excessive prices through overreaching by, or other misfeasance of, common directors to the financial injury of the carrier and the consequent impairment of its ability to serve the public interest.[13] But, even if this purchase of securities might, under other circumstances, violate § 10 of the Clayton Act, Congress, by § 5(11) of the Interstate Commerce Act, has authorized the Commission to approve it if it finds that so doing is in the public interest. And Congress has expressly said that, upon such approval, the carrier shall be relieved "from the operation of the anti-trust laws . . . ." A contrary view would, in effect, permit the Commission to authorize only those stock purchases which would not, in the absence of § 5(11), offend the antitrust laws. "As has been said, this would render meaningless the exemption relieving the participants in a properly approved [acquisition] of the requirements of those laws . . . ." McLean Trucking Co. v. United States, supra, at 86.

[12] It is clear that § 10 of the Clayton Act is included in the "antitrust laws" referred to in § 5(11) of the Interstate Commerce Act. Section 1 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. (1952 ed.) § 12, provides that " 'anti-trust laws,' as used in sections 12, 13, 14-21, and 22-27 of this title, includes sections 1-27 of this title." Moreover, § 5(11) avoids any ambiguity by including "all other restraints, limitations, and prohibitions of law, Federal, State or municipal."

Here, the Commission fully considered the contracts under which the Pennsylvania proposes to acquire a 50% interest in the Western stock and all other factors bearing on that matter and, after doing so, approved them. That action by the Commission did not exceed the statutory limits within which Congress has confined its discretion.

Minneapolis contends that § 5(11) operates only in futuro and confers "no authority to purge the taint of a transaction illegal at the time it was brought to the commission." Whether there is merit in that contention, as a legal abstraction, we need not decide, for here the existing contractual arrangements through which Pennsylvania asks authority to acquire 50% of the Western stock look entirely to the future. Neither the stock sale and purchase contract between the trustees and the Santa Fe nor the one between the Santa Fe and the Pennsylvania Company is a consummated transaction, but each is expressly subject to, and will become effective only upon, approval by the Commission. Apart from criminal prosecutions with which we are not here concerned, it seems plain that approval of an acquisition by the Commission operates under § 5(11), as that section says, to relieve the acquiring carrier "from the operation of the anti-trust laws . . . ."

[Procedural Matters—Findings]

Appellants next contend that the Commission violated § 8(b) of the Administrative Procedure Act by failing to make findings which, they think, were compelled by the evidence.

There can be no doubt that the Administrative Procedure Act applies to proceedings before the Commission, Riss & Co. v. United States, 341 U. S. 907, and see Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. Co. v. United States, 344 U. S. 917.

The last sentence of § 8(b) provides:

> "All [administrative] decisions . . . shall become a part of the record and include a statement of (1) findings and conclusions, as well as the reasons or basis therefor, upon all the material issues of fact, law, or discretion presented on the record; and (2) the appropriate rule, order, sanction, relief, or denial thereof."[14]

[Fairness of Price]

Upon the basis of that language, appellants argue that the Commission should have found that the price which the Santa Fe agreed to pay for the Western stock of $135 per share was excessive. Though the Commission made no express finding upon that matter it did discuss it, pointing out that the certified value of Western's properties for ratemaking purposes was more than $13,500,000; that it has no outstanding preferred stock and is relatively free of debt; that it has a fine earning record; that the transaction was at arm's length; that Minneapolis had offered $133 per share for the stock within a few days of the time when the Santa Fe contracted for its purchase at $135 per share, and that the Minneapolis sought authority in this proceeding to acquire the stock at the same price. The Commission concluded that if $135 per share was a fair price for the one it was also for the other.

[Operating Expenses]

Upon the same basis, appellants also argue that the Commission should have found that the Minneapolis application was in the public interest in that its acquisition of Western would greatly strengthen both Minneapolis and Western by eliminating many duplicating facilities and by reducing operating expenses by more than $1,770,000 annually. The Commission did not make a specific finding upon that matter, but it did give consideration to it and found that most of that saving—more than $1,300,000 annually—would be at the expense of Western's employees—a matter which, because of the express command of clause 4 of § 5(2)(c) of the Interstate Commerce Act (see note 1), it evidently thought was not consistent with the public interest. Appellants further argue that the Commission should have found that the Minneapolis plan afforded adequate protection to Western's employees by providing for their absorption into the Minneapolis as attrition among its own employees permitted. Again, although the Commission made no specific finding upon that contention it did consider and discuss it, and we think the law required no more.

[Subsidiary Findings]

Appellants challenge the Commission's failure to make a number of other subsidiary findings, all of which have been considered, but we find that they relate to contentions that are so collateral or immaterial that the law did not require specific findings upon them. By the express terms of § 8(b), the Commission is not required to make subordinate findings on every collateral contention advanced, but only upon those issues of fact, law, or discretion which are "material." From a thorough examination of the record we are persuaded that the Commission has made adequate subsidiary findings upon all material issues and has made the ultimate findings required by § 5(2), that they support the Commission's order, and are, in turn, supported by substantial evidence.

[Fairness of Judicial Review]

Finally, appellants contend that the District Court, because of inadequate subsidiary findings by the Commission, was unable to, or at least did not, afford them a proper judicial review, and merely "rubber stamped" the Commission's order. Whether or not we approve all of the reasons and legal conclusions of the District Court, it is clear that it fairly considered and decided all of the issues raised by appellants, accorded to them a full and fair judicial review, and reached a right result. Accordingly the judgment is Affirmed.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Combinations and Conspiracies—Conspiracy To Lessen Competition in Long-Haul Carriage of Freight—Campaign To Destroy Good Will of Industry—Fomentation of Governmental Restrictions—Damages—Injunctive Relief.—A trial court finding that railroads, their local association, and a public relations firm engaged in an unlawful conspiracy to injure interstate long-haul truckers and their local association in the northeastern section of the United States was affirmed on the ground that it was soundly based on substantial evidence. On overwhelming evidence, the trial court found that it was no series of individual conspiracies in the various states involved but one large ever-growing conspiracy having as its goal to injure and/or destroy the long-haul trucking industry, and that the main means used to attain such end was primarily a campaign designed to destroy the good will of the truckers and to instigate and foster government restrictions by creating public hostility to the truckers, bringing this to the attention of the various legislatures, then proposing legislation crippling to the trucking industry and favored by the railroads, all under the guise of public spirited organizations and with the defendants' interest concealed. "The third party apparatus employed by the defendants, while concealing their own adroit manipulation thereof, in seeking to procure legislative and executive action" was contrary to public policy and illegal. Even assuming that the interference with legislation and executive action was lawful, its entire motivation was shown to emanate from the conspiracy. It was part of the defendants' scheme, and, as such, it violated the Sherman Act.

The record showed the conspiracy completely established against all of the defendants named in the decree, both legal and illegal methods to obtain the illegal objective, and injury to the plaintiffs and to the public. Also, the record justified the injunctive relief against continuing illegal activities; the compensatory damages allowed the plaintiff-association, together with costs and counsel fees; the holding that the other plaintiffs, by reason of a stipulation, were only entitled to nominal damages; and the dismissal of the defendants' counterclaim. The suggestion that the railroads' entire activity, spearheaded by the public relations firm, was merely a perfectly legitimate public relations campaign for legislation "is fanciful in view of the impressive documentation in the record" of the finding "that the entire campaign and its objectives did not constitute a mere appeal to the legislature; nor was it a large scale lobbying campaign. * * *"

Opinion of the Court

[Parties]

Per Curiam [In full text]: In this anti-trust action for an injunction and treble damages,[1] forty-one long distance trucking companies and their trade association, Pennsylvania Motor Truck Association, sued twenty-four major eastern railroads, Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference and Carl Byoir Associates, Inc. a New York corporation, the public relations agency for the Conference.

[Complaint—Counterclaim]

Plaintiffs charged in their complaint (filed April 30, 1953) inter alia, that in or about May, 1949, the defendant Railroads embarked upon an illegal conspiracy, in violation of the civil and criminal provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States, aimed at destroying the plaintiffs and those similarly situated as competitors in the field of the hauling of freight, and at carving out exclusive, monopolistic spheres of operation in the freight transportation business of the United States, so that the railroads would have a monopoly on freight hauling in interstate commerce; that the defendant Railroads worked for those ends through the defendant Conference; that the latter retained defendant Byoir as publicity agent to carry said conspiracy into effect; that thereafter the Conference, its committees, members thereof, the defendant Railroads, their presidents and trustees and other individual defendants and Byoir, with divers other persons unknown to plaintiffs, have acted in combination and concert to obtain the objectives of the conspiracy. The means used are detailed in the complaint; a continuing conspiracy to the date of the complaint is alleged; damage to each of the plaintiffs is asserted, irreparable, continuing injury stated and an injunction asked. Defendants denied the charges of the complaint. In 1956, after the case had been assigned a trial date, October 1, 1956, and while discovery procedures were pending, some of the Railroads and the Conference sought permission to and were allowed to file a counterclaim against the plaintiffs. This claimed that plaintiffs were engaged in an illegal conspiracy to obtain a monopoly of the long haul freight industry in the same part of the United States as set out in the complaint and to force the Railroads out of that part of the transportation business in that area.

[Trial]

The case went to trial before Judge Clary on October 1, 1956 and lasted almost four months. There were many witnesses and 968 exhibits. On October 10, 1957, the court in an exhaustive opinion (it covers 73 pages in [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,827] 155 F. Supp. 768-841) found in favor of the plaintiffs against all the defendants on plaintiffs' cause of action and against the defendant counterclaimants and in favor of the plaintiffs on the counterclaim.

[Substantial Evidence]

Soundly based on substantial evidence, the trial court found that the Railroads and Byoir, as contended, had conspired in unreasonable restraint of trade to injure the truckers in their competitive position in the long haul freight industry in the northeastern part of the United States; that their immediate purpose was to create public resentment to the truckers, not only in the minds of the general public but in the minds of those who utilized the services of the trucks and in such a manner as to interfere with business relations between shippers and truckers; that instead of meeting the truckers competition in the long haul freight field, the Railroads and Byoir combined to injure and/or destroy the truckers and thereby force the shippers to their detriment to continue to use the Railroads; that they adopted and carried out a full program to obtain that objective; that serious private injury to the truckers was accomplished, definitely a loss of good will to the trucking industry and in some instances that loss of good will being extreme; that their actions destroyed to a large extent the public confidence which the truckers had fairly earned and which might have been increased in the light of the innumerable beneficial accomplishments of the truckers in long haul transportation.

The court found on overwhelming evidence that it was no series of individual conspiracies in the various states involved but one large ever-growing conspiracy as charged having as its goal to injure and/or destroy the long haul trucking industry and that the main means used to attain such end was primarily a campaign designed to destroy the good will of the truckers and to instigate and foster government restrictions by creating public hostility to the truckers, bringing this to the attention of the various legislatures, then proposing legislation crippling to the trucking industry and favored by the Railroads, all under the guise of public spirited organizations and with the defendants' interest concealed.[2]

The record shows the defendants' antitrust conspiracy completely established against all the defendants named in the decree.[3] It

[2] The third party apparatus employed by the defendants, while concealing their own adroit manipulation thereof, in seeking to procure legislative and executive action is contrary to public policy and illegal. *Marshall v. [3] The attempt to influence legislation and executive action while rightly held by the trial court to be less important than the direct vilification of the long haul trucking industry was nevertheless properly found to be a vital element of the defendants' conspiracy to injure and/or destroy that group. Even assuming the brazen interference with legislation and executive action in this instance was lawful, its entire motivation was shown to emanate from the conspiracy charged. It was part of defendants' scheme to wreck their competitor, to monopolize that branch of commerce for themselves. As such it violated the Sherman Act. Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,391], 336 U. S. 490, 497-502 (1949); United States v. Krasnov [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,421], 143 F. Supp. 184 (E. D. App. D. C. 1958).

American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 213 U. S. 347 (1909), urged below and here by the Railroads, has no real application to the facts before us. The later decisions of the Supreme Court in United States v. Sisal Sales Corporation, 274 U. S. 268 (1927) and Steele v. Bulova Watch Co., 344 U. S. 280 (1952), clearly indicate that the Banana Company opinion is limited to the proposition that the Sherman Act cannot be invoked against persuading a foreign sovereign to act. *Okefenokee Rural Electric Membership Corp. v. shows both legal and illegal methods to obtain the illegal objective of injuring and/or destroying the long haul trucking industry. It shows injury to the plaintiffs and to the public. It justifies the injunctive relief against continuing illegal activities of the defendants. It justifies the compensatory damages (trebled by statute) allowed plaintiff Pennsylvania Motor Truck Association, together with costs and counsel fees. It justifies the holding of the district court that the other plaintiffs, by reason of the stipulation which is very clear and is part of the record, are only entitled to nominal damages. It justifies the dismissal of the counterclaim, which action is not disputed by the Railroads except in line with their argument that the counterclaim is similar in content to the plaintiffs' claim.

Though we think it plain from what we have said, it might be well to expressly note that the suggestion that the Railroads' entire activity, spearheaded by Byoir, was merely a perfectly legitimate public relations campaign for legislation is fanciful in view of the impressive documentation in the record of the finding of the trial court > "* * * that the entire campaign and its objectives did not constitute a mere appeal to the legislature; nor was it a large scale lobbying campaign. True, one phase of the activities was of a legislative nature—but a rather new approach to legislation, to say the least. The other phase, and the more important one of the campaign, was one of vilification designed to destroy the good will of the long-haul trucking industry. Hence, the Court has rejected the contention of the defendants that their combination was entirely legislative. I have further determined that the railroads were not acting as the guardian of the public welfare, as they have so earnestly asserted." (Italics supplied).

[Affirmed]

Judge Clary's opinion is soundly predicated on the facts and law of this litigation. We are in accord with it. The decree and orders of the district court of July 22, 1958 [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,085] and July 31, 1958 will be affirmed.

[Dissenting Opinion]

BIGGS, Chief Judge, dissenting.

The case at bar merits the attention of the reviewing Court. The record demonstrates that no cognizable offense has been proved under Section 1 or Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1 and 2, and that therefore relief cannot be granted to the plaintiffs under Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act. 15 U. S. C. A. §§ 15 and 26. Moreover, the reach of the decision of the court below is disastrous for it applies the Sherman Act to governmental restraints imposed by statutes enacted by state legislatures and to private activity in procuring such legislation. If the interpretation of the court below and of this court be correct the reach of the First Amendment which guarantees freedom of petition will be unduly limited and to an extent at least, destroyed. Rights guaranteed to the States and to the people by the Tenth Amendment will be endamaged. Heavy sanctions, criminal as well as civil, can be imposed on persons who seek the enactment of laws by Congress or by the legislatures of the States. I shall endeavor to deal first with what can perhaps be properly described as "conventional" antitrust law in relation to the case at bar and at a later point in this opinion will discuss the application of the constitutional guarantees referred to.

What the record proves is the following. Certain interstate trucking companies [1] were engaged in hot economic competition with twenty-four major eastern railroads [2] in the interstate transportation of long-haul freight. The Railroads and the Truckers as groups were avidly desirous of increasing their own respective interstate freight haulage and profits and decreasing those of the competing group. Both Railroads and Truckers hired public relations agencies to aid them. The ERPC engaged Byoir. PMTA engaged Allied Public Relations Associates. The methods employed by the public relations sion stressed by the Railroads in the district court and on appeal. That too is hardly an authority for anything pertinent under the instant unescapable facts. There the complaint made no allegation that the conspiracy was directed to ruining a competitor in his business. The later case of Crummer v. du Pont [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,042], 223 F. 2d 238 (5 Cir. 1955) and 255 F. 2d 425 (5 Cir. 1958) [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,031], cert. den. 358 U. S. 884 (1958), leaves no doubt but that as of now in the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, a conspiracy to drive a competitor out of business is a violation of the Sherman Act even though, as in Crummer, its most important element was the obtainment of its objective by secretly moving under the guise and protection of the public interest and through the public authorities.

agencies of both the Railroads and the Truckers left much to be desired in respect to moral consciousness. Sources of propaganda were concealed by both sides by the use of the so-called "third-party" technique.

Both Railroads and Truckers and their agencies desired to influence public opinion in order to increase their own good will and to damage that of each other and thereby to procure legislation favorable to themselves and unfavorable to the competing group.[3] There was no difference in substance between the methods employed by Byoir for the Railroads and those employed by Allied Public Relations Associates for the Truckers except that Byoir was more vigorous, more vocal, and more effective. It was a no-holds-barred fight by both sides. The methods employed might well cause justifiable fear to those concerned with the viability of our representative form of government.

Conventional Principles of Law Hitherto Deemed Applicable to Section 1 and Section 2 of Sherman Act Suits

As has been said, the action is based on Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.[4] It is necessary to discuss the applicability of both sections and it is more convenient to proceed first with a discussion of Section 2. The Truckers' case is deficient when viewed in the light of Section 2, the "Monopoly" section, of the Sherman Act. Section 2 provides: "Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. . . ." The offense of monopolizing means ". . . to combine or conspire to acquire or maintain the power to exclude competitors from any part of the trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations, provided they also have such a power that they are able, as a group, to exclude actual or potential competition from the field and provided that they have the intent and purpose ot exercise that power."[5] American Tobacco Co. v. U. S. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,468], 328 U. S. 781, 809 (1946). Since the Railroads have not effected a monopoly on long-haul freight traffic or destroyed the Truckers' business[6] only an attempt to monopolize or of a conspiracy to attempt to monopolize can be proved against them.[7] A necessary element of an attempt to monopolize is a specific intent to effect that result. United States v. Columbia Steel Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,260], 334 U. S. 495, 531-534 (1948).

This leads to the issue which is dispositive of the Section 2 phase of the instant case. Can an attempt to monopolize the [3] A typical example is supplied by Senate Bill No. 615, Session of 1951 of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, referred to from time to time in the testimony as the "Big Truck Bill", caused to be introduced by the Truckers, which would have raised the permissible weight limits of heavy trucks from 45,000 to 60,000 pounds. The defendants procured the veto of this bill by Governor Fine. A somewhat similar bill, also proposed by the Truckers, was "Bill A-13" in the New Jersey Legislature. Similar legislation was also before the legislatures of New York and Ohio. I shall not detail the various bills in the various State legislatures involved. These are set out in full, with many allied matters, in the opinions of the court below. See [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,827] 155 F. Supp. 768, and opinion on damages. [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,085] 166 F. Supp. 166.

[4] It should be noted that neither the opinion of the court below, [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,827] 155 F. Supp. 768, nor that of this court, pinpoints whether the action is sustained under Section 1 or Section 2 of the Sherman Act.

[5] The complaint alleges a conspiracy to create a monopoly. See paragraphs 12, 13 and 14 of the complaint. I assume therefore that the action at bar was one brought under Section 2 of the Sherman Act but I make no point of any deficiency in pleading as will appear from this opinion in the discussion of the applicability of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, the "restraint of trade" section.

[6] Proof in the record aside, the court below and this court are entitled to take judicial notice that the Railroads have not driven the Truckers out of business.

[7] The circumstances are peculiarly unfitted for the maintenance of a Section 2 case. We do not have before us a situation where one corporation, or even a few corporations, attempt to eliminate all competition so that it, or they will be left with unbridled power over prices, output, and entry into the competitive field. An entire section of what may be called the "transportation industry" consisting of many roads is accused of trying to eliminate another section of the transportation industry, the Truckers, a situation that as far as research indicates has never previously resulted in successful antitrust litigation. Even if the Railroads had actually eliminated the Truckers' competition completely the Railroads' position would be far different than that of the successful monopolist since there still would be competition among the various railroads. Furthermore the interstate ground transportation industry is a regulated industry, with almost every phase of its activity controlled by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

transportation of long haul freight in the sense required by Section 2 be inferred from the evidence? The elements necessary to establish an attempt to monopolize in violation of Section 2 were set out in classic form in Swift and Company v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 396 (1905), and have remained unchanged. In the opinion last cited the Supreme Court said:

> "Intent is almost essential to such a combination and is essential to such an attempt. Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to prevent—for instance, the monopoly—but require further acts in addition to the mere forces of nature to bring that result to pass, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen. Commonwealth v. Peaslee, 177 Massachusetts, 267, 272. But when that intent and the consequent dangerous probability exist, this statute, like many others and like the common law in some cases, directs itself against that dangerous probability as well as against the completed result."

Thus it is clear that in addition to an intent to monopolize, the evidence must prove that the activities of defendants in a Section 2 case create a dangerous probability of monopoly. See again United States v. Columbia Steel Co., supra.

The court below found as a fact that vigorous efforts were made by the Railroads and Byoir to injure the Truckers' good will business-wise, to decrease the number of the Truckers' customers, to pass anti-trucking legislation and to increase trucking costs and to prevent the enactment of legislation which would decrease those costs. The proof is not sufficient in the instant case to sustain a Section 2 charge. There is no evidence in this record proving that the efforts of the Truckers or Byoir were liable to bring the long-haul trucking industry to an end. There is no showing that even the most optimistic of the Railroads or Byoir intended, expected, or even hoped, to destroy interstate trucking. The circumstances at bar do not traverse the limitations imposed by the Columbia Steel Co. decision. Moreover, there is no proof whatsoever of a "dangerous probability" that a monopoly could result as required by the Swift decision. Under the circumstances a cause of action based on Section 2 falls. If the judgment of the court below against the Railroads is to be sustained it must be under Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

But the Truckers have not proved a cause of action cognizable under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits "Every contract, combination . . . or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states. . . ." As was said in Northern Pac. R. Co. v. United States [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,961], 356 U. S. 1, 5 (1958), "Although this prohibition is literally all-encompassing, the courts have construed it as precluding only those combinations which 'unreasonably' restrain competition". Mr. Justice Black went on to say that certain agreements or practices have such a pernicious effect on competition that they are "conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use". Mr Justice Black then designates the kind of practices which the courts have deemed to be unlawful in and of themselves and cites the relevant cases.[8] The acts of the Railroads and Byoir were not proved to be such as to cause the case at bar to fall within the category of cases where the principle of unreasonableness is automatically applicable. The court below so found.[9] The issue then becomes: Did the combination or conspiracy here "unreasonably restrain competition"? The record fails to demonstrate that the Railroads and Byoir did so here.

Moreover, and quite aside from the foregoing, restraints which constitute violations of Section 1 are those which involve conspiracies of members of an industry to follow a mutually self-restricting course in the area of their own competence in order to obtain unlawful commercial advantages over customers or suppliers. The plan here, as proved, was to decrease the business of fellow members of the interstate transportation industry, the Truckers. Furthermore the essence of the campaign was not joint action for any one of the Railroads acting alone could have achieved the result which was attained. Any Railroad could have hired Byoir. If the law is to be changed in these important respects the revision should be effected expressly by the Supreme Court and not by this tribunal.[10]

But without regard to what I have termed "conventional" antitrust law and whether the suit is sought to be maintained under Section 1 or Section 2, or both sections, I am of the view that the provisions of the Sherman Act are not applicable here because of what is set out in the following three headings of this opinion.

Principles of Antitrust Law Applicable Under the Circumstances at Bar Where Legislative Action Was Invoked or Avoided

The objectives of the Railroads, as found by the court below, are set out and discussed hereinafter under the heading "As to Damages". It is desirable to state again at this point that the principle objective of both Railroads and Truckers was to achieve legislation which would increase their own profits from interstate freight haulage and decrease those of the competing group. The actions of the Railroads and Byoir in this respect were described by the court below as the "fomenting of governmental restriction . . . increasing the cost of operation and/or preventing the carrying of greater loads" by the Truckers, and was held to be an unreasonable restriction of competition.[11] The public interest must be deemed, of course, to be involved here as it is in every antitrust suit but there is also a potent public interest in the right of the individual to act in support of or in opposition to legislation. Does the public interest in this latter right rise superior to the public interest sought to be preserved by the antitrust laws? Does the Sherman Act apply to legislative restraints or to private activity in support of such restraints? I think the decisions demonstrate that the Sherman Act cannot be employed to make such private activities illegal and that whether successful or unsuccessful they do not constitute unreasonable restraints on interstate commerce.

In Olsen v. Smith, 95 U. S. 332, 344-345 (1904), where the restraint was imposed by a Texas statute, it was held that the intent of Congress in enacting the Sherman Act was to prevent private, not governmental, actions in restraint of competition.[12] In American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 213 U. S. 347, 358 (1909), the Supreme Court dealt with a very similar issue, Costa Rica, by what was in effect law, having confiscated property of one corporation at the instigation of a trade rival. Mr. Justice Holmes said that

> "The fundamental reason why persuading a sovereign power to do this or that cannot be a tort . . . is that it is a contradiction in terms to say that within its jurisdiction it is unlawful to persuade a sovereign power to bring about a result that it declares by its conduct to be desirable and proper . . . It makes the persuasion lawful by its own act. The very meaning of sovereignty is that the decree of the sovereign makes law."

In Parker v. Brown [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,250], 317 U. S. 341, 351 (1943), California had passed a proration statute which restricted competition among raisin growers and fixed prices. Mr. Chief Justice Stone stated: "The Sherman Act makes no mention of the state, as such, and gives no hint that it was intended to restrain state action or official action directed by a state."

There is no doubt that a State of the United States in the exercise of its police power may legislate for the health, safety or welfare of its people or that a State may enact legislation affecting interstate commerce if the law passed does not "impede substantially the free flow of commerce from State to State." Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona, 325 U. S. 761, 767 (1945). An exercise of State police power by the enactment of legislation by the State for a proper objective is constitutionally permissible. In

Stephenson v. Binford, 287 U. S. 251, 276 (1932), the Supreme Court stated:

> "We need not consider whether the [State] act [regulating carriage by truck] in some other aspect would be good or bad. It is enough to support its validity that, plainly, one of its aims is to conserve the highways. If the legislature had other or additional purposes, which, considered apart, it had no constitutional power to make effective, that would not have the result of making the act invalid."

Cf. Sproles v. Binford, 286 U. S. 374 (1932). One of the admitted purposes of the legislation with which we are here concerned was the preservation of State highways and another was the raising of State revenues. It appears clearly that the States involved in the instant case acted within their constitutional power, just as Governor Fine acted within his constitutional power when as Chief Executive of Pennsylvania he vetoed Senate Bill No. 615.[13] To hold otherwise would be to nullify substantially State legislative power.

It is asserted that United States v. Sisal Sales Corp., 274 U. S. 268 (1927), and Steele v. Bulova Watch Co., 344 U. S. 280 (1952), in effect overruled the American Banana Co. decision. In the Steele case the action was one brought under the Lanham Trade-Mark Act of 1946, 15 U. S. C. A. § 1051 et seq., and was not based on the antitrust laws but more importantly an act of a sovereign was not involved. In the Sisal case it was held that the Sherman Act did not apply to what the defendants did in Mexico and Yucatan: i. e., procure discriminatory legislation there. Mr. Justice McReynolds stated, 274 U. S. at p. 276,

> "True, the conspirators were aided by discriminating legislation, but by their own deliberate acts, here and elsewhere, they brought about forbidden results within the United States. They are within the jurisdiction of our Courts and may be punished for offenses against our laws."

The American Banana Co. decision expressly was not overruled. I can find no Supreme Court decision, unless it be Foster-Fountain Packing Co. v. Haydel, 278 U. S. 1, 10-11 (1928), note 13, supra, which indicates a holding contrary to that of the American Banana Co. decision. The Foster Fountain Packing Co. case seems distinguishable on the ground appearing in the note cited. But in any event in United States v. Rock Royal Co-Op., 307 U. S. 533, 560 (1939), the defendants attempted to prevent enforcement of a minimum Price Order[14] made by the Secretary of Agriculture on the ground that their competitors had engaged in a conspiracy to monopolize in violation of the Sherman Act by securing the drafting, adoption, and acceptance of the order. Mr. Justice Reed stated:

> "If ulterior motives of corporate aggrandizement stimulated their activities, their efforts were not thereby rendered unlawful. If the Act and Order are otherwise valid, the fact that their effect would be to give cooperatives a monopoly of the market would not violate the Sherman Act or justify the refusal of the injunction."

The facts in Okefenokee Rural Elec. Mem. Corp. v. Florida P. & L. Co. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,809], 214 F. 2d 413, 418 (5 Cir. 1954), present an interesting analogy to those at bar and are very similar, save only that legislative action was not involved. It was alleged, however, that the State Road Department of Florida acting as a result of a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act between Florida Power and Light Company and others, prevented the Okefenokee Rural Electric Membership Corporation from making use of the only feasible route for an electric line along a public highway. It was alleged in the complaint that the defendants had been guilty of a "smear campaign", had made false arguments and had conducted dishonest activities as a result of which the State Road Department refused to grant the permit for the power line. Treating the facts alleged in the complaint as true, the Court of Appeals, in dismissing the suit, stated:

> "As so forcibly illustrated in Keogh v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 260 U. S. 156, 163, 'Injury implies violation of a legal right.' The plaintiff had no legal right to use the state highway without a permit from the State Road Department, nor the county roads without permission of the Board of County Commissioners, and those authorities have decided against the plaintiff. So long as their decisions stand the plaintiff has not been legally injured, notwithstanding it may have been irreparably damaged."

S. 1, 10-11 (1928), wherein the Supreme Court, granting a temporary injunction, held that the purpose of the State act procured by private activity, allegedly to conserve hulls and heads of unprocessed shrimp, was a feigned purpose and therefore was not a valid exercise of State police power.

Implicit in this ruling is the legal conclusion that liability under the Sherman Act cannot be sustained by virtue of official action of a State agency however inspired by the acts of individuals.

I conclude (1) that the Sherman Act was not intended by Congress to be applicable to governmental restraints by way of legislation whether or not induced by private activity and (2) that private activities such as those conducted by the Railroads and Byoir under the circumstances presented here cannot be deemed to constitute unreasonable restraints or monopoly under the Act.[15]

The Constitutional Issue

If the reasoning of this opinion as expressed thus far be erroneous, it is necessary to discuss the constitutional questions which are posed by the circumstances and the decision at bar. As I read the opinion of the court below the constitutional protection asserted by the defendants was rejected on the ground that by resorting to a campaign of defamation the Railroads and Byoir invalidated the guarantees of the First Amendment.[16] The majority opinion seems to take a similar view. But I had not hitherto imagined that a constitutional guarantee could be avoided because of the bad conduct of the individual asserting the constitutional right. I do not believe so now. It might be argued, of course, that a determination that a restraint is unreasonable obviates constitutional guarantees but to state this argument demonstrates its invalidity. Cf. United States v. Columbia Steel Co., supra, 334 U. S. at p. 522. The vast importance of the right to petition, usually exercised by joint action, was set out by Mr. Justice Brandeis in his dissenting opinion in Gilbert v. Minnesota, 254 U. S. 325, 337-338 (1920), as follows:

> "The right [to petition] . . . necessarily includes the right . . . to endeavor to make [one's] . . . own opinion concerning laws existing or contemplated prevail. . . . Full and free exercise of this right by the citizen is ordinarily also his duty; for its exercise is more important to the Nation than it is to himself. Like the course of the heavenly bodies, harmony in national life is a resultant of the struggle between contending forces. In frank expression of conflicting opinion lies the greatest promise of wisdom in governmental action; and in suppression lies ordinarily the greatest peril."

Mr. Justice Brandeis' view in the Gilbert case became the law in Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 (1951). The First Amendment protects "secular" causes as well as "religious or political ones." Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516, 530-531 (1945). A proposal to tax trucks stands upon the same ground as a religious speech or an unpopular political idea. The expression of "bloc sentiment" is an integral part of our legislative process. United States v. C. I. O., 335 U. S. 106, 143-144 (1948). There can be no question that the "idea" that trucks should or should not be taxed by the States has "social importance". Roth v. United States, 354 U. S. 476, 484 (1957).

If persons are to be prohibited access to legislators because their utterances may be offensive to personal taste or morals we have moved far away from the Framers' conception of our republican form of government. The concept of lack of access by [15] Parenthetically, the court below reached, to me at least, the unusual result that the counterclaims asserted by the Railroads against the Truckers could not be maintained though the counterclaims allege acts of substantially the same character and nature as those of the Railroads and Byoir upon which judgment here is based. It is true that the Railroads conceded that the counterclaims are without merit. This concession was, I think, a necessary one. My view is based on the conclusion expressed in this opinion that the Truckers have not proved a cause of action under the Sherman Act. But the court below held that the Truckers' attempts at favorable legislation were permissible because they were attempting to procure laws that would better their competitive positions in relation to the Railroads. The court explains that the legislation sought would have permitted the Truckers to enter fields previously closed to them and that therefore no violation of the antitrust laws was involved. But business gained by interstate truckers of necessity would be at the expense of interstate railroads. Moreover the position of the court below in respect to the counterclaims not stating a valid and proved cause of action overlooks the "good will theory" advanced by the court itself as the basis for its judgment. That there were attacks made by the Truckers on the good will of the Railroads is indubitable and the court below so found. See 155 F. Supp. at p. 803. The distinction attempted to be made by the court is too subtle for me to grasp. It seems to be based on the theory that under the Sherman Act what is one competitor's meat may be another competitor's poison.

the people to a legislature is in its essence totalitarian. If material contrary to good morals, such as obscene matter, is placed by an individual or a group in unenlightened self interest before a State legislature it is, of course, permissible for the State to punish the projectors of such material by criminal or civil sanctions. But the imposition of such sanctions assuredly is not the function of the antitrust laws of the United States. To say that an individual legislator may be over-persuaded or wrongly convinced as to how he should vote is to state a commonplace but to deprive an individual of the right to petition under the guise of protecting private companies from restraint of trade or monopolistic practices is to say far too much and to say it badly. To whom may a person go to attempt to create or change the laws under which he lives if not to his Senators or Representatives, State or National? True, ills may inhere in this democratic process. The legislature may be propagandized by material from a tainted source but this is an abuse which is curable as Congress has cured it.[17] If persons are to be deprived of the right to petition because that right has been subject to abuse, liberty visibly will take flight.

I think that every thoughtful person will agree that the legislative processes cannot be conducted successfully and should not be conducted at all unless members of the public and all interested groups are allowed free access to legislators and legislatures in respect to legislation, pending or proposed. The application of the Sherman Act to limit the free expression of ideas by the public and interested groups, the right to petition, in order to give information, whether pertinent or impertinent, to their legislators and legislatures, would foil the legislative processes which consist in a large part of the balancing of conflicting interests and influences. In this field limitation is the equivalent of prohibition for if persons exercising their right to petition are to be subject to prosecution under the Sherman Act or to damages in civil suits under the Clayton Act, or go in fear of such prosecution or such suits, these persons will not exercise the right to petition and a fundamental constitutional right will be limited or destroyed. Sources of information now open to legislators as to pertinent conflicting interests will be choked-off or obliterated. The scope of the Sherman Act has been greatly enlarged in recent years and it is indeed a flexible statute but I cannot conceive that Congress intended it to be applied to limit or prohibit free access to legislatures or to the inducing of legislative action by private activity.

Moreover, in the instant case the exercise of State police or taxing power is a most delicate area in the fine balance which must be preserved between the States and the National Government. The enactment of legislation in the two fields designated is peculiarly a concern of the States and the enactment of such laws by the legislatures is the last sanctuary of States' rights. Here another provision of the Constitution comes into play. The Tenth Amendment provides that:

> "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

True, State police power has been curbed in the past by Congress by way of the Civil Rights Acts and State taxation has been limited by Congress where it has been deemed to trench on interstate commerce. And see again the quotation from Mr. Chief Justice Stone's opinion in Parker v. Brown, supra, 317 U. S. at p. 351, where California had passed a proration statute which restricted competition among growers of raisons and also fixed prices. The principle enunciated is central to the Tenth Amendment for one must always ask oneself, as indicated above, how a State legislature could legislate effectively without information or petitions from those affected by legislation? The argument made by the Truckers in substance is that State action is not being affected but only nefarious conduct by those who induced State action is being curbed. It would seem that action by the State under the circumstances at bar must surely cauterize action by individuals. But if the great liberties guaranteed by the Constitution must be exercised reasonably, surely the circumstances presented here do not warrant limitation of the right to petition by the Sherman Act. I believe that Congress did not intend or even contemplate such a result.

[17] It should be observed that the court below effected legislation for it requires the Railroads and Byoir not to publicize material relating to the Truckers "without disclosing their [own] participation". See paragraph "IV-(6)" of the final decree. I would conclude that this alone would require modification of the form of the injunction entered by the court below and approved by this court. Cf. N. A. A. C. P. v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449 (1958), in which the Supreme Court interdicted the prohibition of "privacy in group association".

As to Damages

The court below, as I grasp the contents of its opinion, has concluded that because the Railroads and Byoir embarked on a "Campaign of Vilification" against the Truckers legal damage resulted to them in the form of loss of "good will".[18] The court divided "good will" into two categories: first, good will of the Truckers in respect to their customers, injury by way of loss of business, and, second, loss of the good will of the public, the injury being defined in terms of disability "to avoid the imposition of crippling burdens and restrictions".[19] By stipulation it was agreed by the parties that the only damages claimed by the Truckers were those resulting from gubernatorial veto of certain legislation.[20] Single damages, subsequently trebled were awarded to PMTA. These were assessed on the basis principally of the money, $217,358, spent by PMTA, through Allied Public Relations Associates, for "defensive measures", measures employed by PMTA to aid the Truckers, including the prosecution of the suit at bar. The monies which PMTA spent were expended for the very purposes for which they were contributed by the Truckers to PMTA.[21] It appears therefore that these expenditures made by PMTA were in reality paid for by the Truckers and that PMTA was a mere agent or conduit for the sums expended. I therefore can perceive no basis for the reimbursement of these sums to PMTA by way of allowance of damages to PMTA.

Moreover, the court below, while expressly refusing to allow damages to the Truckers because of the successful efforts of the Railroads and Byoir in defeating legislation sought by the Truckers, nonetheless allowed each of the Truckers nominal damages of six cents, trebled, eighteen cents, because of the Railroads' and Byoir's bad conduct. Since the court below held that no legally cognizable damages could ensue from acts entirely governmental[22] no legal foundation to support these nominal awards appears.

A substantial counsel fee was also allowed to counsel for the PMTA. This award also must fall if the judgment is reversed as I believe it must be.

I am also of the opinion that the injunctive relief granted under Section 16 of the Clayton Act is without justification. My conclusion in this regard is not based on any alleged abuse of legal discretion by the court below. It rests on the broad ground that no facts were proved which,

[18] The court below stated: ". . . [A] real private injury to the truckers was accomplished. There was definitely a loss of good will to the trucking industry and in some instances that loss of good will was extreme." 155 F. Supp. at p. 810 ("Summary").

[19] The court stated: "[T]he use of the term 'good will' . . . relates not only to the direct damage done to the truckers, i.e., the refusal of truck users, because of the campaign, to avail themselves of that form of transportation (loss of business), but refers also to the more subtle type of injury done the entire trucking industry by discrediting it in the eyes of the general public, the 99% users of the highways, and eliminating the likelihood of public appreciation of the trucking industry as such or sympathy with the truckers' position which would be fundamental in gaining general public support to avoid the imposition of crippling burdens and restrictions." 155 F. Supp. at p. 810-811 ("Summary").

[20] Section 3 of the Stipulation is as follows: "The only damages claimed by the plaintiffs (except plaintiff Pennsylvania Motor Truck Association) are those that each of them may have suffered because of its inability to carry more than the weight limits fixed by the laws of Pennsylvania prior to the change in the law in 1955."

The court took the position that the section of the stipulation quoted limited the money value of the Truckers' claims but not the nature of their claims. This was an erroneous interpretation of the stipulation. The Truckers called to testify conceded that their respective businesses had been harmed only by the legislative action or inaction that the Railroads and Byoir had effected. At pre-trial conference it was stipulated that the Truckers who had not testified as to this issue would give similar evidence. Following this agreement the stipulation set out in Section 3, supra, was entered into. The distinction made by the court between the nature of the damage and the scope of the damage money-wise is invalid and also does violence to the intent of the parties.

[21] See opinion on damages. 166 F. Supp. at pp. 166-168. As has been indicated PMTA is a Truckers' service organization. There is nothing in the record which would support its right to maintain a class suit, real or "spurious", on behalf of the Truckers. No satisfactory theory appears under which PMTA can be held to be entitled to maintain a suit in a representative capacity. See Rule 23, Fed. R. Civ. Proc., 28 U. S. C. Cf. United States v. Association of American Railroads [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,417], 4 F. R. D. 510 (N .D. Neb. 1945).

under the antitrust laws, could justify the injunctive relief granted.

In conclusion, on the issue of damages, it is desirable, although perhaps not necessary, to comment briefly on the approach of the court below to loss of "good will" as elements of damage. If damages are to be recovered under Section 1 (or for that matter, under Section 2) of the Sherman Act in conjunction with Section 4 of the Clayton Act, there must be proof of damage. As to the loss of good will by the Truckers, business-wise in respect to their customers as defined by the court below, quoted in note 19 supra, it is clear there was no showing of any loss of business by any individual Trucker. None of the Truckers had or could have a legally protected interest in the good will of the trucking industry as a whole. Cognizable injury under the Sherman Act must be to some "business or property", i. e., a violation of some property right or business which is recognized by the law.[23] The court below took the position that the trucking industry is a legal entity possessing a cognizable interest in a kind of general good will belonging jointly to all Truckers in the suing group. But the suit at bar is a private antitrust suit. No joint right whatsoever is involved and each Trucker must maintain and vindicate his own separate and individual right.[24] There can be no good will in gross. There is no evidence that any of the Truckers individually suffered or was threatened with any injury to his good name or to his business reputation. This element of damage attempted to be proved by the Truckers was shown to be completely lacking in factual foundation.

For the reasons stated I must dissent. I would reverse the judgment of the court below save only as to that portion of it which denies relief under the counterclaims.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Brokerage Commissions Under Clayton Act, Section 2(c)—Seller's Reduction of Prices by Elimination of Its Own Broker—"Discrimination" and "Brokerage" Violations Distinguished.—A complaint in which a broker charged its principal, a manufacturer of plastic cups, with terminating the broker's services and then selling directly to a particular buyer at reduced prices was properly dismissed for failure to state a cause of action under Section 2(c) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. After discharging its broker, the manufacturer paid no brokerage, as such, to anyone. Therefore, the question was whether the alleged reduced price to the favored buyer was "an allowance or discount in lieu" of brokerage. All that appeared from the complaint was that the seller would not have been able to make the reduction if it had continued to pay commissions to its broker. However, the court refused to construe the Act as prohibiting a manufacturer from converting to "direct" selling, or from passing on savings to his customers if he did convert to such "direct" selling. Here, even if there were "discrimination," that is, if the prices were not reduced to everyone but only to the buyer in question, it did not mean that the favored buyer received "brokerage," the only matter covered by section 2(c). Just as proof of a "brokerage" violation would not be dispelled by a showing that there was no "discrimination," it must equally follow that a showing of "discrimination" does not, of itself, establish a "brokerage" violation. If, after ceasing to employ brokers, a manufacturer improperly discriminates between customers, section 2(a), which prohibits such discriminations, will accomplish the purposes of the Act.

The court, noting that there had been another action between the parties on "apparently the same grounds," expressed "some doubts" about the case of Henry Broch & Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,208, on which the other Robinson decision (1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,453) was based. Both cases held that a seller's broker is not covered by section 2(c).

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Jurisdiction of Federal Courts—State and Federal Claims Joined in Single Action—Jurisdiction Over State Claim Where Federal Antitrust Claim Dismissed—"Pendent" Jurisdiction.—Where a Federal District Court found that certain Federal antitrust claims stated no cause of action, it was proper for the court to dismiss other related common law claims. Whatever the limits of "pendent jurisdiction" under the doctrine of Hurn v. Oursler, 289 U. S. 238, that doctrine did not require the retention of "dubious" state claims after the Federal claim had been dismissed on the pleadings.

Opinion of the Court

[Treble Damage Action—Price Discrimination]

ALDRICH, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This action was brought by plaintiff-appellant, a citizen of Massachusetts, in the district court for the District of Massachusetts under section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. § 15, to recover treble damages for injuries alleged to have been suffered because of a violation of section 2(c) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. § 13(c). The defendants were one Gahm, of New Jersey, doing business as Plura Plastics, hereinafter called Plura, as to whom a dismissal was entered for lack of service, and appellee, Stanley Home Products, Inc., a Massachusetts corporation, hereinafter called Stanley. Plaintiff appeals from the allowance of Stanley's motion to dismiss the amended complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted.[1]

The amended complaint is somewhat inartistic and loosely drawn, and the first question is one of construction. We have attempted to separate the primary facts from various conclusions of the pleader, in order to apply the familiar rule that only material facts well pleaded are to be considered on a motion to dismiss. Dunn v. Gazzola, 1 Cir., 1954, 216 F. 2d 709. The first four paragraphs set forth the basic facts already stated. Paragraph 5 alleges that the plaintiff is a manufacturer's representative in Massachusetts and elsewhere in New England; that he had been employed by Plura as exclusive New England representative to promote the sale of Plura's products (which were to be shipped from New Jersey in interstate commerce), and that plaintiff was to receive a commission on all New England sales "whether or not actually consummated by him." Nothing was mentioned as to the term of this agreement, from which we must assume that it was terminable at will by either party. At the argument plaintiff conceded this assumption to be correct.

[1] The parties have neglected to call to our attention another, seemingly later, action between them on apparently the same grounds, in which the complaint was dismissed as against Plura (whether Stanley was ever served does not appear) for failure to state a violation of the Act. Robinson v. Stanley Home Products, Inc., D. C. D. N. J., 1959 [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,453], 174 F. Supp. 414. We shall not further refer to it, since we have some doubts about the case of Henry Broch & Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 7 Cir., 1958 [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,208], 261 F. 2d 725, cert. granted, 1959, 360 U. S. 908, upon which that decision was based.

[Charges—Improper Brokerage Commission]

Abbreviating its rather lengthy allegations, paragraph 6 asserts that plaintiff procured two orders from Stanley for folding cups made by Plura; that thereafter Stanley made an offer directly to Plura to purchase cups in large quantities at what it knew to be "an unreasonably low price" that > "could be accomplished only by the elimination of the Plaintiff's commission . . . but Stanley wished to procure the elimination of the Plaintiff's services and commission so that it might purchase said cups at the substantially reduced price and thereby obtain the Plaintiff's commission for itself in the form of an unlawful discount, all in violation of 15 U. S. C. Section 13(c)."

Plaintiff further alleged that "Plura forthwith terminated the Plaintiff's services as New England representative[2] and immediately accepted Stanley's offer." There is, incidentally, no allegation of any correlation in amount between the reduction in price and plaintiff's former commission.

Paragraph 7 is not too happily expressed, but we shall construe it, in plaintiff's favor, to mean that following plaintiff's discharge Plura reduced its prices to Stanley only, and not to other customers. However, since there is no indication that Plura employed other brokers, we take plaintiff's stated claim to be that all customers thereafter, and not merely Stanley, purchased direct. Paragraphs 8 and 9 add nothing of substance, other than general allegations of damage. Paragraph 10 is against the now-dismissed defendant, Plura. The remaining paragraphs allege common-law claims against Stanley with which we shall deal later.

[Conversion to "Direct" Selling Not Prohibited]

While a party need not plead his evidence, the complaint must contain a sufficient statement of facts which show there is a basis to the claim. Plaintiff here claims under subsection (c) of section 2 of the Robinson-Patman Act, and no other. The specific question under that subsection is whether Stanley accepted from Plura "a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof . . . ."[3] On the facts alleged, after plaintiff's discharge Plura paid no commission, as such, to anyone. The next question, therefore, is whether plaintiff sufficiently shows an "allowance or discount in lieu thereof" within the meaning of the act. There is little discussion of these words in the cases. In Quality Bakers of America v. Federal Trade Commission, 1 Cir., 1940 [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,060], 114 F. 2d 393, at 400, we used the phrase "commissions or their equivalent." While a reduction in price to the buyer could fall within this definition, obviously not every one would do so. The question must be, what was the purpose of, or the reason for, the reduction? Plaintiff pleads only his unsupported conclusion that it was a discount in lieu of brokerage. He does not allege that the parties so described it; or that it was designed to reimburse Stanley for some brokerage or servicing obligation ostensibly incurred, or even that it was the mathematical equivalent of what Plura formerly paid to the plaintiff. All that appears is that Plura would not have been able to make this reduction if it still paid brokerage. To say that a manufacturer who makes a price reduction when he converts to direct selling has, without more, made an allowance in lieu of brokerage would either be to say that he cannot so convert, or that, if he does, the act forbids his passing on any saving to the customer. We do not so construe it.

["Brokerage" and "Discrimination" Distinguished]

It is true that we have interpreted the complaint as alleging that after Plura ceased to employ a broker its prices were not reduced to everyone. But the fact that there was discrimination between customers does not mean that the favored one received brokerage. The matter covered by section 2(c) is unearned brokerage, per se, not discrimination. Federal Trade Commission v. Simplicity Pattern Co., 1959 [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,361], 360 U. S. 55, 65; Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 3 Cir., 1939 [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,242] 106 F. 2d 667, cert. denied, 1940, 308 U. S. 625; rehearing denied, 309 U. S. 694. Just as proof of the conduct prohibited by this section is not dispelled by showing that there was no discrimination, Southgate Brokerage Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 4 Cir., 1945 [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,396] 150 F. 2d 607, cert. denied, 326 U. S. 774, it must equally follow that a showing of discrimination does not of itself establish a violation. There is no necessity for calling something brokerage that is not. If, after ceasing to employ brokers, a manufacturer improperly discriminates between customers, section 2(a) will accomplish the purposes of the act. The district court correctly dismissed the federal cause of action.

[2] Plaintiff conceded at the argument that this meant a total discharge, not merely as to Stanley.

[3] We do not reach the question of whether a broker whose possible commission has been diverted is a "person . . . injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws" (15 U. S. C. § 15), a matter on which the court below expressed doubt.

[State Claims]

The remaining paragraphs of the complaint, 11 and 12, purport to set forth two common-law claims. After incorporating the allegations of paragraphs 1-9, paragraph 11 alleges that "Stanley conspired with Plura to deprive the Plaintiff of his rightful commissions as manufacturer's representative for Plura and to divert said commissions to Stanley." Paragraph 12 alleges that "Stanley did induce and procure Plura to breach the contract between the Plaintiff and Plura so that the commissions that would otherwise be paid to the Plaintiff would be diverted to Stanley in the form of unreasonably large discounts." We have considerable doubts whether either paragraph asserts a valid cause of action for unjustifiable interference with a contractual, or continuing business, relationship. Stanley, as a purchaser from Plura, had a legitimate economic interest to further. Such interest would appear to furnish defendant with a privilege unless defendant had adopted or advocated some illegal conduct. See Restatement, Torts, Ch. 37, § 771. The only impropriety suggested is an alleged violation of section 2(c) of the Robinson-Patman Act, the allegation we have already held unsupported. The district court did not pass on the merits of these claims, however, but held that the federal claim having been dismissed on the pleadings, the court was not obliged to retain a common-law dispute between two Massachusetts citizens, citing Massachusetts Universalist Convention v. Hildreth & Rogers Co., 1 Cir., 1950, 183 F. 2d 497, and Dixon v. Martin, 5 Cir., 1958, 260 F. 2d 809. Whatever may be the limits of pendent jurisdiction, we do not regard Hurn v. Oursler, 1933, 289 U. S. 238, as requiring, when the federal claim is dismissed on the pleadings, the retention of state claims which are, at best, dubious on their face.

[Judgment Affirmed]

Judgment will enter affirming the judgment of the District Court.

[¶ 69,548] The Fair v. Federal Trade Commission.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. No. 12628. Dated December 8, 1959.

On Petition to Review an Order of the Federal Trade Commission.

Federal Trade Commission Act and Fur Products Labeling Act

Fur Labeling—Guaranty by Manufacturer or Supplier Against Mislabeling—Defense for Retailer—Duty of Retailer to Correct Errors in Labeling.—A department store was not guilty of selling misbranded fur products in violation of the Fur Products Labeling Act where it relied in good faith on guarantees from the manufacturer or supplier of each garment that the products were not misbranded. While Rule 34(a) under the Fur Products Labeling Act provides that a person subject to the Act shall corrrect all labels which he has reasonable cause to believe are incorrrect, it merely permits a retailer to correct errors and it does not impose a legal obligation on the retailer to examine the labeling of fur products for errors and to correct all such errors under the burden of forfeiture of its rights under Section 10(a) for failure to discover any such errors as may exist. Lack of good faith, therefore, could not be inferred solely on the ground that the department store was obligated to examine the labels, regardless of guarantee, and that the store was, therefore, responsible for all errors discernible.

See Fur Labeling, Vol. 2, ¶ 6655.

Fur Labeling—Persons Subject to the Act—Lessor of Independent Contractor Who Retains Degree of Business Control.—Where a department store leased its fur department to an independent contractor, but retained a large measure of business control such as hiring employees, adjusting customer complaints, and advertising furs in its name, it was subject to the Fur Products Labeling Act. The customers had no way of knowing that they were dealing with an independent contractor. It could not be said that the store had gone out of the fur business.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5201.

Fur Labeling—False or Deceptive Advertising—Price or Value—"Fictitious Pricing".—A department store was found to have engaged in "fictitious pricing" in advertising fur products to be sold at prices reduced from "usual" prices. The "usual" prices were not prices at which such merchandise was usually sold by the store. In answering the argument that "usual" meant prices charged by the store or by other merchants for similar goods rather than the same item reduced in price, the court held that the controlling test was the understanding of the consumer who might well believe that the use of the word "usual" price in this sense meant that the item had been "marked down".

See Fur Labeling, Vol. 2, ¶ 6631.46.

Fur Labeling—Records To Be Maintained by Dealer—Price and Value Records.—A department store was found not to have maintained records to support its own contention of what were "usual" prices by its own definition where the testimony of its comparison buyer indicated such inadequate records. Records consisting of prices paid for furs by the store and of prices at which the store offered these furs at retail, including mark-downs and reductions, did not constitute adequate records in the instant case.

See Fur Labeling, Vol. 2, ¶ 6646.61.

Fur Labeling—False or Deceptive Advertising—Quality of Furs—Illustrations.—A department store falsely advertised mink jackets through a misleading illustration. The garments advertised were split-skin mink jackets, while the illustration, although accurately showing the style of the garments offered for sale, pictured a let-out mink jacket—admittedly a higher quality fur garment.

See Fur Labeling, Vol. 2, ¶ 6631.

Fur Labeling—False or Deceptive Invoicing of Furs—Retail Sales Slips.—A department store falsely and deceptively invoiced fur products where the evidence of such invoicing consisted of sales slips issued to the store's retail customers. Such sales slips constituted invoices within the meaning of the Fur Products Labeling Act.

Enforcing in part and vacating in part a Federal Trade Commission order to cease and desist in Dkt. 6822.

[Misbranding Fur Garments]

KNOCH, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This proceeding was instituted June 17, 1957, in a complaint filed by the Federal Trade Commission, charging violations of the Federal Trade Commission Act, the Fur Products Labeling Act, and Rules and Regulations promulgated thereunder, in labeling, invoicing and advertising fur garments sold in The Fair stores.

Both the counsel supporting the complaint and The Fair appealed from the © 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Hearing Examiner's provisional order to cease and desist. The Commission, after considering the cross-appeals, vacated and set aside the initial decision. Findings, conclusions, and order of the Commission were substituted in toto for the Hearing Examiner's decision. The Fair seeks to review and set aside the Commission's cease and desist order.

[Issues]

The issues may be summed up as: (1) whether guaranties furnished by suppliers were "received in good faith" by The Fair, so as to afford a defense to charges of misbranding and deceptive advertising; (2) whether the Commission's findings were supported by substantial evidence; and (3) whether the Commission's order was unduly broad.

[Proper Defendant]

In February 1957, The Fair leased its fur departments to an independent contractor who operates them as an independent entity. However, a large measure of control is retained by The Fair in that, for example, all business and advertising is done in the name of The Fair, which approves and actually hires the lessee's employees, makes independent adjustments of customer complaints and accounts, and retains the right to approve advertising. The customers have no way of knowing that they are dealing with an independent contractor. We agree with the Commission in its conclusion that action on the complaint was not barred on the ground that The Fair had gone out of the fur business.

[Statute and Regulations]

The Fur Act describes a fur product as misbranded if there is not affixed to it a plainly legible label showing the name or names of the fur producing animal; the fact (if that is the case) that the product contains used, bleached, dyed or otherwise artificially colored fur, or is composed in whole or substantial part of paws, tails, bellies, or waste fur; the registered identification of those who manufacture the product for introduction, introduce it, sell it, advertise or offer it for sale, transport or distribute it into commerce; and country of origin of imported furs.

The Rules and Regulations of the Commission provide for size of type or hand printing, prohibit handwriting, require placement of the above required information on one side of the label only, (with non-deceptive, non-required information on the reverse side where lot or style number and size may be placed) and separate information respecting each different animal fur where more than one is used in the same garment.

[Misbranding Violations]

The violations in branding or labeling charged here included: a few handwritten labels containing (in addition to the required data) non-required words "fur name" on the same side; one garment with no fur identification; a handwritten label which omitted the information that the fur was dyed and which contained the non-required words "romance flank muskrat"; more than thirty labels containing non-required words, e. g. "romance" and "fur name"; several labels omitting the information that the fur was dyed; about ten labels omitting name or registered number of marketer; several labels omitting the name of mink trimming used on a garment of another fur; more than a dozen labels having the words "Southwest Africa" abbreviated as "S. W. Africa"; and several labels on garments of Persian Lamb in which the word "Lamb" was omitted.

[Guaranties of Suppliers]

The Fair contended that any such misbranding was immaterial in character and quantity, but its primary defense was that it relied on a guarantee, allegedly received in good faith, from the manufacturer or supplier of each garment (pursuant to Section 10(a) of the Fur Act) to the effect that the fur products were not misbranded.

Section 10(a) provides:

"No person shall be guilty . . . if he establishes a guaranty received in good faith signed by and containing the name and address of the person residing in the United States by whom the fur product or fur guaranteed was manufactured or from whom it was received, that said fur product is not misbranded or that said fur product or fur is not falsely advertised or invoiced under the provisions of this Act. Such guaranty shall be either (1) a separate guaranty specifically designating the fur product or fur guaranteed, in which case it may be on the invoice or other paper relating to such fur product or fur; or (2) a continuing guaranty filed with the Commission applicable to any fur product or fur handled by a guarantor, in such form as the Commission by rules and regulations may prescribe."

The Hearing Examiner found that all these labels were those of the manufacturer or other suppliers, that the majority of the defects were not obvious and could easily have been overlooked, that their discovery required careful scrutiny by one skilled in furs and well versed in the Fur Act and the Commission's Regulations; that the one error of a missing label which could have been easily detected was merely overlooked and had been corrected. Accordingly the Hearing Examiner held that The Fair was entitled to rely on the guarantee and that it could not be held guilty of misbranding.

[Retailer's Duty to Correct Errors]

In the Commission's view, however, The Fair was legally obligated to examine and to correct the labels; and The Fair's fur buyer was possessed of the requisite skill to discern the deficiencies, which the Commission thought were all readily apparent on the face of the labels. Thus, the Commission found The Fair's contention of reliance "in good faith" on suppliers' guaranties unconvincing, on the theory that the defects should have been discovered by exercise of ordinary diligence. The Commission relies on its Rule 34(a) which reads:

> "If a person subject to . . . the Act with respect to a fur product finds or has reasonable cause to believe the label affixed thereto is incorrect or does not contain all the information required by the Act and the rules and regulations, he shall correct such label or replace same with a substitute containing the required information."

However, as we read Rule 34(a), it merely permits the retailer to correct errors. It does not, as the Commission contends, impose a legal obligation on The Fair to examine the labeling of fur products for errors in compliance and to correct all such errors under the burden of forfeiture of its rights under Section 10(a) supra for failure to discover any such errors as may exist. The Hearing Officer found that The Fair's good faith had not been attacked. He analyzed Section 10(a) as expressing Congressional intention (1) to stop misbranding and faulty labeling at the source; and (2) that enforcement was to be exercised where labeling is initiated, by the manufacturer or supplier who is in the best position to know the character of the furs from which the products are made. We agree. The Commission inferred a lack of good faith solely on the ground that The Fair was obligated to examine the labels, regardless of guarantee, and that The Fair was, therefore, responsible for all errors discernible, by exercise of ordinary diligence, to one possessed of the requisite skill and knowledge of the Act and regulations. As indicated, it is our conclusion that no such duty has been imposed.

The same reasoning applies to the three or four mislabeling defects carried over into advertising copy. Typical of those was omission of the word "lamb" in describing "Persian Paw" and "Black Dyed Broadtailed" jackets.

[Fictitious Pricing]

The Commission also found that The Fair engaged in "fictitious pricing" in advertising fur products to be sold at prices reduced from "usual" prices, where the "usual" prices were not prices at which such merchandise was "usually" sold by The Fair. Some, but not all, of these garments had in fact been "marked down". With respect to the others, The Fair contends that "usual" means prices charged by The Fair or by other merchants for similar goods, rather than the same item reduced in price, citing the "Guide for Retail Advertising and Selling", Fifth Edition, 1956, Association of Better Business Bureaus, Inc. That publication warns against use of the word "usually" to mean mark-down in one's own store because the term is to be used to express a comparative price on a special purchase.

As the Commission argues, however, the controlling test is the understanding of the consumer, who might very well believe that use of the word "usual" price in this regard meant that the item had been "marked down." Progress Tailoring Co. v. F. T. C. (7 Cir., 1946) [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,440] 153 F. 2d 103, 105; Mandel Brothers, Inc. v. F. T. C. (7 Cir., 1958) [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,993] 254 F. 2d 18, 21.

[Inadequate Records]

The Commission's finding of failure to maintain full and adequate records rested on the above described finding of fictitious pricing. The Commission concluded that records which did not support the prices advertised must be inadequate. This does not necessarily follow. The Fair never asserted that the "usual" prices listed in the advertisements were in all cases its own prices. Besides, The Fair's assistant comptroller testified that many of the records were destroyed in 1957 when the lease to the independent contractor went into effect.

However, the testimony of The Fair's comparison shopper, as to her duties and the type of records she made, did indicate that she was not a fur expert, that her checking duties were performed in no regularly scheduled manner, and that her notations of her investigation of other merchants' prices were not such as to constitute adequate records, even had they all been preserved for submission as evidence.

It is, therefore, apparent that The Fair had not maintained records to support its own contention of what were "usual" prices by its own definition. The Hearing Examiner had based his finding that adequate records were maintained solely on the fact that complete records existed of prices paid for garments by The Fair, and prices at which The Fair offered these same garments at retail, including mark-downs and reductions of those garments.

[Misleading Illustrations]

There was one instance of a misleading illustration in advertising. The garments advertised were split-skin mink jackets. The illustration accurately showed the style of the actual garments offered for sale, but, in fact, pictured a let-out mink jacket—admittedly a higher quality fur garment. The Hearing Examiner found that only a fur expert could detect the difference from studying the illustration and that the purchasing public was unlikely to be deceived. He applied the de minimus rule and concluded that no violation had occurred. The Commission held otherwise. This was a clear and actual violation and thus, in our opinion, it constituted ground for issuance of a cease and desist order prospective in effect to protect the public.

[Sales Slips]

The evidence of false and deceptive invoicing of fur products consisted of sales slips issued by The Fair to its retail customers. The Fair does not contend that these sales slips conformed to the requirements of the Fur Act, or the Rules augmenting it, with respect to invoicing. The Hearing Examiner initially decided that sales slips did not constitute "invoices" within the meaning of the Act. The Commission reversed that decision.

The issue has been resolved for us, in the Commission's favor, by the U. S. Supreme Court in F. T. C. v. Mandel Brothers, Inc. [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,342] 359 U. S. 385, 390 (1959).

[Order Vacated in Part]

We, therefore, direct that the Commission's Cease and Desist Order be vacated and set aside only insofar as it relates to the subject of misbranding. In all other respects, the petition to review and set aside the Order is denied and enforcement is ordered.

Enforcement ordered in part and in part denied.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Monopolies—Practices—Exclusion from Trade—Exclusive Dealing—"Accumulation" of Exclusive Distributorships—Legality—Distribution of Newspapers and Magazines.—Officials of a labor union and wholesale newspaper and magazine distributors were denied a motion to dismiss a monopoly count in an indictment charging them with conspiring to restrain and monopolize trade in the distribution of newspapers and magazines in certain New York counties. That count charged that the conspirators had agreed to exclude actual or potential competitors of the defendant-distributors from engaging in the distribution of such products in that market. Since there is no objection to an agreement between a manufacturer and a dealer for an exclusive distributorship, the court assumed that it would be lawful for a magazine publisher to allot to a wholesaler an exclusive distributorship in the pertinent area. It did not follow, however, that it was lawful for a single wholesaler to "accumulate" the exclusive distributorships from all of the publishers, as the indictment here alleged.

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.300.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Indictments—Sufficiency of Allegations—Conspiracy to Restrain Distribution of Newspapers—Monopolization—Necessity for Allegation of Public Injury.—A count of an indictment charging officials of a labor union and wholesale newspaper distributors with conspiring to restrain the distribution of newspapers by coercing distributors to pay money to the conspirators as a prerequisite to obtaining labor contracts and by excluding competitors of the defendant-distributors from the trade was held insufficient in law by reason of its failure to allege "public injury." The only specific act charged was "the use of union influence, duress and threats of strikes to compel the payment" of money to certain defendants in connection with the negotiation of labor contracts. Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, 1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,316, did not abolish the rule that there is no violation of the antitrust laws unless there is public injury; it merely pointed out that there is an exception to that rule where a group boycott is involved. It is only in cases of such per se violations as price fixing, division of markets, group boycotts, and tying arrangements that proof of public injury is unnecessary. The present conspiracy count did not allege one of those per se violations and was therefore insufficient in law.

However, another count of the indictment charging that a monopoly had been obtained was not defective although it alleged no direct public injury. There is high authority for the proposition that monopoly of the relevant market is per se unlawful. The court, rejecting the contention that a monopoly in the distribution of magazines could cause no injury to the public because magazines are always sold at "fixed prices," held that other evils of monopoly would remain even if prices were not affected.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8025.570.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Indictments—Sufficiency of Allegations—Interstate Commerce—Conspiracy to Monopolize Local Distribution of Publications Received from Publishers in Interstate Commerce.—An indictment's monopoly count charging wholesale distributors of newspapers and magazines with conspiring to monopolize the local wholesale distribution of publications received from publishers in interstate commerce sufficiently disclosed the manner in which the alleged conspiracy "affected" interstate commerce. It was hard to see what more could have been said. The alleged monopoly was one that completely controlled the flow of magazines to wholesalers in two New York counties from outside the state. The defendants would not be immune even if, as contended, all of their operations were intrastate.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8025.620.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Indictments—Sufficiency of Allegations—Description of Conspiracy.—It was not necessary for an indictment to state the manner in which alleged conspirators joined in a conspiracy. As long as the conspiracy itself was described in detail, and the defendants would have no difficulty in pleading the judgment in bar of a second prosecution, the indictment was sufficient. The matter could be discovered, if at all, by a motion for a bill of particulars.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8025.500, 8025.800.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Indictments—Sufficiency of Allegations—Repetitious Counts.—Two counts of an indictment, one charging a violation of a statute making it a crime to conspire to monopolize commerce, and another charging a violation of a statute making it a crime to conspire to obstruct commerce by extortion, were not repetitious of each other. There was nothing inconceivable about there being two separate conspiracies, even though it appeared likely that proof under the allegations of one count would be sufficiently broad to justify a verdict of guilty under the other count. The indictment, in alleging that there were two conspiracies, had to be accepted as true. Also, the two counts were permissible to meet the different interpretations which might be placed on the evidence by the jury.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8025.520.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Sufficiency of Allegations—Duplicity—Charging Two Conspiracies in Single Count.—An indictment's monopoly count was not duplicitous by reason of the fact, that it contained, in addition to the charge of a general conspiracy to monopolize, the allegation that the conspiracy was effectuated by acts which, in another count of the indictment, were alleged to constitute an extortion conspiracy. "The conspiracy is the crime, and that is one, however diverse its objects."

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8025.540.

Opinion

[Motions to Dismiss]

Edward J. Dimock, District Judge [In full text]: The allegations of Count One of the indictment will first be summarized. Since these motions deal only with the face of the indictment, this opinion will deal only with the facts therein alleged without regard to actuality.

[Defendants]

Newspaper and Mail Deliverers' Union of New York and Vicinity, hereinafter "the Union", has labor contracts with the publishers of all of the principal New York City newspapers and all of the principal magazines published throughout the United States covering such of their employees as are engaged in the handling of newspapers and magazines. It is a provision of these contracts that such publishers can use as wholesalers only such distributors as are themselves under labor contractual relations with the Union. Suburban Wholesalers Association, Inc., hereinafter Suburban Wholesalers, is a New York membership corporation consisting of twelve members who are such distributors and in labor contractual relations with the Union. The necessity of keeping in labor contractual relations with the Union in order to retain the position of wholesaler to the publishers gives strikes and threats of strikes a coercive effect.

The twelve members of Suburban Wholesalers are alleged to distribute the newspapers and magazines in specified sub-areas of the so-called Suburban Area outside of New York City which do not overlap but there is no allegation that they are the sole distributors of the newspapers and magazines in those sub-areas.

Prominent in the list of defendants are officers and representatives of the Union. The rest of it is made up of defendant Bi-County News Corp., hereinafter "Bi-County", and officers, employees and stockholders of various other corporations of undescribed purposes.

Defendants Irving Bitz, Charles Gordon and Bi-County are engaged in the wholesale distribution of newspapers and magazines. Bi-County is alleged to have its principal place of business in Westbury, Long Island. The place of business of the two individuals is not stated.

[Restraint of Trade]

Count One of the indictment charges a combination and conspiracy, in restraint of the continuous and regular flow in interstate commerce of newspapers and magazines from various states to members of Suburban Wholesalers located in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, in violation of Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies" as amended, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. Section 1, commonly known as the Sherman Act.

[Antitrust Conspiracy]

The combination and conspiracy is alleged to have consisted in a continuing agreement and concert of action among defendants and co-conspirators. Its substantial terms have been and are:

"a. To restrain the members of Suburban Wholesalers in their wholesale distribution of newspapers and magazines by coercing and compelling said members to pay to the conspirators various sums of money, as a pre-requisite to obtaining labor contracts with the Union to avoid strikes or the continuation of strikes already called by said Union;

"b. To prevent the shipment of newspapers and magazines in interstate commerce to members of Suburban Wholesalers not acceding to the demands of the conspirators; and

"c. To hinder and exclude or attempt to hinder and exclude actual or potential competitors of defendants Irving Bitz, Charles Gordon and Bi-County."

The combination and conspiracy is alleged to have had the following effects, "among others":

"a. All the members of Suburban Wholesalers have been compelled to pay financial tribute as a condition for engaging in the aforesaid trade and commerce;

"b. Newspaper and magazine publishers have been hindered, restrained or prevented from distributing newspapers and magazines in the Suburban Area to their financial loss and detriment;

"c. Retail news dealers in the Suburban Area have been hindered, restrained or prevented from selling newspapers and magazines to their financial loss and detriment;

"d. Competitors of Irving Bitz, Charles Gordon and Bi-County have been deprived of an equal opportunity to obtain labor contracts with the Union and to compete with these defendants in the wholesale distribution of newspapers and magazines; and

"e. Interstate trade and commerce in the wholesale distribution of newspapers and magazines in the Suburban Area has been unreasonably restrained."

[Extortion as Means of Effectuating Conspiracy]

The only allegation as to the means by which the combination and conspiracy has been effectuated is as follows:

"During the period covered by the indictment, the said combination and conspiracy has been effectuated by various means and methods including, but not limited to, the use of union influence, duress and threats of strikes or strikes to compel: (a) the payment of $25,000 by the members of Suburban Wholesalers to defendants Angelo Lospinuso, William Walsh and Harry Waltzer on or about January and February 1955, in connection with the negotiation of a labor contract between the Union and Suburban Wholesalers effective February 1, 1955; (b) the payment of $45,000 by Suburban Wholesalers to defendant Irving Bitz and to defendants Sam Feldman, Stanley J. Lehman, John J. Lawrence, Jr. and Harry Waltzer in connection with the negotiation of a labor contract between the Union and Suburban Wholesalers effective February 1, 1957; and (c) other payments by members of Suburban Wholesalers to various Union officials."

Thus the only allegation of a specific act of any defendant is "the use of union influence, duress and threats of strikes to compel the payment of $25,000 by the members of Suburban Wholesalers" to certain defendants in connection with the negotiations of a labor contract between the Union and Suburban Wholesalers effective February 1, 1955, and the payment of $45,000 by Suburban Wholesalers to certain defendants in connection with the negotiation of a labor contract effective February 1, 1957.

[Monopoly]

Count Two of the indictment charges an unlawful combination and conspiracy to monopolize for defendants Irving Bitz, Charles Gordon and Bi-County the interstate commerce of newspapers and magazines from various states in the United States to the members of Suburban Wholesalers in Nassau and Suffolk Counties in the State of © 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

New York, in violation of Section 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies" as amended, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. Section 2, commonly known as the Sherman Act.

The combination and conspiracy is alleged to have consisted in an agreement and concert of action with the same terms as that alleged in Count One.

The effects of the combination and conspiracy to monopolize are alleged to be the following, "among others":

"a. Publishers of newspapers and magazines have been deprived of an opportunity to use the distributor of their choice in Nassau and Suffolk Counties;

"b. Wholesale distributors that might compete with defendants Irving Bitz, Charles Gordon and Bi-County have been deprived of an opportunity to distribute newspapers and magazines in Nassau and Suffolk Counties;

"c. Competition in the aforesaid interstate trade and commerce in the wholesale distribution of newspapers and magazines in Nassau and Suffolk Counties has been hindered and impeded; and

"d. Defendants Irving Bitz, Charles Gordon and Bi-County have obtained a monopoly in the wholesale distribution of magazines in Nassau and Suffolk Counties."

[Coercion—Exclusion of Competitors]

It is alleged that the combination and conspiracy to monopolize has been effectuated by the same acts which were alleged in Count One to have effectuated the combination and conspiracy there charged. Count two adds, however, the following:

"In addition, said offense was effectuated by acts of violence and intimidation in 1958 to coerce publishers to deal with defendants Irving Bitz, Charles Gordon and Bi-County and to exclude competitors from obtaining business from such publishers."

[Extortion]

Count Three alleges that defendants Lospinuso, Walsh and Waltzer obstructed commerce and the movement of newspapers and magazines in such commerce by extortion, as defined in Section 1951 of Title 18 U. S. Code, in that they obtained $25,000 from the officers and agents of Suburban Wholesalers, induced by the wrongful use of fear in that defendants named in Count Three

"did threaten the members of Suburban Wholesalers with labor disputes, workstoppages, and other labor troubles in connection with the trade and commerce aforesaid unless and until the members of Suburban Wholesalers paid the aforesaid defendants the said amount of money."

Count Four alleges that the said three defendants conspired to commit the crime charged in Count Three.

Count Five is similar to Count Three in that it charges that the offense of extortion was committed by defendants Bitz, Feldman, Lehman, Lawrence, Waltzer and Spozate, in obtaining $45,000 from officers and agents of Suburban Wholesalers.

Count Six alleges that the said six defendants conspired to commit the crime charged in Count Five.

In Count One all of the named defendants are made defendants.

In Count Two all of the defendants named in Count One except defendants Walsh and Lospinuso are made defendants.

In Counts Three and Four, defendants Lospinuso, Walsh and Waltzer are made defendants.

In Counts Five and Six defendants Bitz, Feldman, Lehman, Lawrence, Waltzer and Spozate are made defendants.

[Pleas—Motions to Dismiss]

Defendant Bitz has pleaded guilty to all of the counts in which he was named, Counts One, Two, Five and Six.

All of the other defendants have moved to dismiss Count One. All of them except defendants Walsh and Lospinuso have moved to dismiss Count Two. Defendants Feldman, Lehman and Lawrence have moved to dismiss Counts Five and Six.

[Public Injury—Klor's Case]

The motions to dismiss by defendants first raise the question whether Count One charges a crime. It is said that the count does not allege injury to the public and that the other facts alleged do not constitute a crime in its absence. The Government in answer says that Klor's v. Broadway-Hale Stores [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,316], 359 U. S. 207, "reversed a Court of Appeals decision to the effect that 'public injury' is a necessary allegation 'before an antitrust violation' can be found. 255 F. 2d 217 (C. A. 9, 1958)".

The Klor's case did not abolish the rule that there is no violation of the antitrust laws unless there is public injury; it merely pointed out that there is an exception to that rule where a group boycott is involved. Mr. Justice Black, in discussing Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, said for the court at p. 211:

> "The Court recognized that there were some agreements whose validity depended on the surrounding circumstances. It emphasized, however, that there were classes or restraints which from their 'nature or character' were unduly restrictive, and hence forbidden by both the common law and the statute. 221 U. S. at 58, 65. As to these classes of restraints, the Court noted, Congress had determined its own criteria of public harm and it was not for the courts to decide whether in an individual case injury had actually occurred. Id., at 63-68."

He went on to hold that group boycotts were "in the forbidden category".* In a footnote to this reference to a "forbidden category" he cited Northern Pacific R. Co. v. United States [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,961], 356 U. S. 1, 5. The Court in the Northern Pacific case at that page said:

> "However there are certain agreements or practices which because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use. This principle of per se unreasonableness not only makes the type of restraints which are proscribed by the Sherman Act more certain to the benefit of everyone concerned, but it also avoids the necessity for an incredibly complicated and prolonged economic investigation into the entire history of the industry involved, as well as related industries, in an effort to determine at large whether a particular restraint has been unreasonable an inquiry so often wholly fruitless when undertaken. Among the practices which the courts have heretofore deemed to be unlawful in and of themselves are price-fixing, United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 210; division of markets, United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co., 85 F. 271, aff'd 175 U. S. 211; group boycotts, Fashion Originators' Guild v. Federal Trade Comm., 312 U. S. 457; and tying arrangements, International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392."

[Conspiracy Allegation Insufficient]

I hold, therefore, that it is only in cases of such per se violations as price fixing, division of markets, group boycotts and tying arrangements that proof of public injury is unnecessary. Court One lacks any allegation of public injury or of facts from which it can be inferred. Since it does not allege one of the per se violations of the Sherman Act the count is insufficient in law.

[Monopoly—Public Injury Not Required]

Count Two cannot be disposed of so easily. Like Count One it alleges no direct public injury. It contains the statement that an effect of the alleged combination and conspiracy to monopolize is that defendants Bitz, Gordon and Bi-County "have obtained a monopoly in the wholesale distribution of magazines in Nassau and Suffolk Counties."

There is high authority for the proposition that monopoly of the relevant market is per se unlawful. It will not do to say, as is said here, that a monopoly in the distribution of magazines in Nassau and Suffolk Counties causes no injury to the public since magazines are always sold at fixed prices. Chief Judge Learned Hand in United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 2 Cir. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,342], 148 F. 2d 416, pointed out that Congress, in passing the antitrust act, was not actuated by economic motives alone, saying, at page 427:

> "It is possible, because of its indirect social or moral effect, to prefer a system of small producers, each dependent for his success upon his own skill and character, to one in which the great mass of those engaged must accept the direction of a few. These considerations, which we have suggested only as possible purposes of the Act, we think the decisions prove to have been in fact its purposes."

It is true that Judge Hand went on at page 428 to equate monopoly with price fixing because "the only price at which it

* Professor Milton Handler in commenting on the Supreme Court's reversal of Circuit Judge Barnes' decision in the Klor's case, Recent Antitrust Developments, 14 Record of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York 318, 349, said:

> "Thus, the principal error of Judge Barnes was not that he assimilated public injury into the rule of reason, but rather that he applied the standard of reason to a restraint which properly falls in the per se category. It does not follow that the Barnes approach will not have vitality outside the per se arena."

© 1959, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

could sell is the price which it itself fixed". Nevertheless he followed that with the statement that we are not left to deductive reasoning and cited for the general proposition that monopoly is always unlawful: Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 396; Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1; Sugar Institute v. United States [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,107], 297 U. S. 553; Appalachian Coals, Inc. v. United States [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,025], 288 U. S. 344, 374 and Fashion Originators' Guild v. Federal Trade Commission [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,101], 312 U. S. 457.

[Exclusive Dealing]

Defendants rightly say that there is no objection to an agreement between a manufacturer and a dealer for an exclusive distributorship. Mr. Justice Black in the Klor's decision, at page 212, carefully distinguished the case that he had in hand from such an arrangement when he said,

> "This is not a case of a single trader refusing to deal with another, nor even of a manufacturer and a dealer agreeing to an exclusive distributorship."

See also Denver Stock Yard Co. v. Livestock Assn. [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 69,019], 356 U. S. 282, 288. Thus I must assume that it would be lawful for the publisher of a magazine to allot to a wholesaler an exclusive distributorship in Nassau and Suffolk Counties. It does not follow, however, that it would be lawful for a single wholesaler to accumulate the exclusive distributorships from all publishers as is here alleged. It may be that the practice of selling magazines at universally fixed prices would prevent such a monopoly from affecting prices but the other evils of monopoly outlined by Judge Hand in the Aluminum case would remain.

Defendants say that the matter has been determined in their favor in this Circuit by authority. They say that just such an arrangement as is here alleged was approved in Interborough News Co. v. Curtis Publishing Co., 2 Cir. [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,129], 225 F. 2d 289. There the Curtis Publishing Co. and other publishers transferred their distribution in the metropolitan area from Interborough News Co. to a group of thirteen wholesalers. The Court of Appeals affirmed a judgment dismissing Interborough News Co.'s complaint that it had been the victim of an illegal boycott. The plaintiff was in no position to urge that distributorships which it had enjoyed alone constituted a monopoly when parceled out among thirteen wholesalers. Even if it had done so, however, the answer would have been the finding, approved by the Court of Appeals at page 293, that "Each new wholesaler was in spirited competition with plaintiff and each other".

[Sufficiency of Indictment—Details Required]

Defendants William Fello, Rocco Fello, Bi-County News Corp., Gordon and Feldman move to dismiss Count Two of the indictment as to them on the ground that it fails adequately to inform them of the charges against them in violation of the sixth amendment of the Constitution and Rule 7(c) F. R. Crim. P.

This objection is without substance. The conspiracy is described in detail. The moving defendants would have no difficulty in pleading the judgment in this case in bar of a second prosecution. All that the count lacks is a description of the manner in which these defendants joined the conspiracy. That is not required of indictments in conspiracy cases. The Government's claim in that respect is to be discovered, if at all, by means of a motion for a bill of particulars.

[Interstate Commerce]

Defendants Lehman and Lawrence move to dismiss as to them Count Two, among others, on the ground that it does not disclose the manner in which the alleged conspiracy affected interstate commerce. It is hard to see what more could be said than that it was a conspiracy to monopolize the distribution at wholesale of publications which were received by the wholesalers from the publishers in interstate commerce. United States v. Starlite Drive-In, 7 Cir. [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,495], 204 F. 2d 419, cited by defendants, went off on the distinction between the business of exhibiting motion pictures and the business of distributing motion picture films. Here the alleged monopoly is one that completely controls the flow of magazines to wholesalers in Nassau and Suffolk Counties from states outside of New York. The fact, if it be a fact, that all of defendants' operations are intrastate does not give them immunity. U. S. v. Women's Sportswear Assn. [1948-

1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,390], 336 U. S. 460, 464.

[Failure to State a Crime]

Defendant Feldman moves to dismiss Counts Five and Six on the ground that they fail to state a crime.

His motion is based largely on the case of United States v. Callanan, D. C. E. D. Mo., 113 F. Supp. 766. There the court dismissed a count of an indictment charging a violation of section 1951 of title 18 U. S. Code, the same section as is here involved.

The language used in the Missouri indictment, as stated by the court, deviated from the words of the statute only to name, by reference, a corporation and to state an amount of money. Counts Five and Six of the instant indictment give much more information than did the one in Callanan. Indeed they give much more information than the indictment in United States v. Palmiotti, 2 Cir., 254 F. 2d 491, which was upheld as charging a crime under the same section. Defendant Feldman's motion to dismiss Counts Five and Six for failure to state a crime is denied.

[Repetitious Counts]

Defendant Feldman moves also to dismiss Count Two and Count Six because they are repetitious of each other and should have been included in one single conspiracy count. It is to be noted that Count Two charges a violation of a statute which makes conspiracy to monopolize commerce a crime while Count Six charges a violation of a different statute which makes conspiracy to obstruct commerce by extortion a crime.

There is nothing inconceivable about there being two separate conspiracies even though it appears likely that proof under the allegations of Count Two would be sufficiently broad to justify a verdict of guilty under Count Six. American Tobacco Co. v. United States [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,468], 328 U. S. 781, 788. We are at present dealing only with the indictment and it must be accepted as true in alleging that there are two conspiracies. Braverman v. United States, 317 U. S. 49, 52; Schultz v. Hudspeth, 10 Cir., 123 F. 2d 729, 730.

It is true that the jury might render a verdict of guilty on both counts and an appellate court might be of opinion that only one conspiracy had been proved but the "two counts were permissible to meet the different interpretations which might be placed on the evidence by the jury" and harm could be guarded against by limiting the sentence to the lesser maximum permissible under either statute. United States v. McKnight, 2 Cir., 253 F. 2d 817, 819-20. In no event can it be said at this stage of the proceedings that the counts are repetitious.

[Duplicity]

Defendants Lehman and Lawrence move to dismiss Count Two as improperly combining two or more conspiracies. It will be recalled that it charges a general conspiracy to monopolize and alleges that it was effectuated by the use of union influence to compel payments of $25,000 and $45,000 which are presumably the same as those which defendants are alleged in Count Six to have conspired to obtain. Defendants cite as authority Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U. S. 750. That was not a case, however, where the indictment was dismissed because it combined in one count more than one conspiracy. It was a case where a conviction was reversed because a single conspiracy had been alleged and several proved. To quote the opinion in Braverman v. United States, 317 U. S. 49, 54, supra,

> "The allegation in a single count of a conspiracy to commit several crimes is not duplicitous, for 'The conspiracy is the crime, and that is one, however diverse its objects.' "

Other grounds urged for the dismissal of Counts Two, Five and Six do not warrant discussion. All motions to dismiss those Counts are denied.

[Other Motions]

Defendants have made, but not argued, various other motions before me which have been held in abeyance pending decision of the motions to dismiss. In accordance with an arrangement made when the motions to dismiss were argued, counsel will please, within fifteen days from the date of publication of a note of this decision in the New York Law Journal, arrange among themselves and with the court for a time for argument of any undecided motions.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civ. 96-170. Filed November 19, 1959.

Case No. 1207 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Suits for Injunctive Relief—Discovery and Production of Evidence—Admissions—Objections.—The Government's request for admissions of fact, in a civil action charging antitrust violations in the watch industry, was apparently made in good faith, and was not, therefore, stricken in its entirety for alleged irrelevance and ambiguity. However, the defendants did not have to admit or deny whether any "rulings" were "binding" on anyone, since legal rather than factual circumstances were involved in that term. Similarly, they did not have to make a judgment as to what were "more important" circular letters and bulletins. The terms "price cutting activities", "excessive quantities", and the like, were clearly objectionable as used in the request.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8225.200.

For the plaintiff: Richard B. O'Donnell, Chief, New York Office, Antitrust Division, and Mary Gardiner Jones, Attorney, Department of Justice.

For the defendants: Goodwin, Denforth, Savage & Whitehead, New York, N. Y. (James V. Hayes, William F. Clare, Jr., and John A. Manning, of counsel), for Longines-Wittnauer Watch Co., Inc. and Wittnauer et Cie, S. A.

For prior opinions of the U. S. District Court, Southern District of New York, see 1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,516 and 69,314 and 1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,096 and 68,145.

[Admissions of Facts]

CASHIN, District Judge [In full text]: Considered herein are objections to plaintiff's request for admissions of facts noticed by defendants Longines-Wittnauer Watch Co., Inc. and Wittnauer et Cie, S. A., and an informal motion by plaintiff apparently seeking further answers from those defendants to a request for admissions.

[Motion for Further Answers]

Plaintiff's informal motion may be quickly disposed of. Rules 36 and 37(c) appear to me to preclude any such motion as made by the plaintiff. A party served with a request for admissions shall be deemed to have admitted the facts unless a sworn statement is served denying the matters of which the admissions were requested or setting forth in detail the reasons why they cannot truthfully be admitted or denied. If a denial of either kind is served, the sole sanction against the party so denying is provided for in Rule 37(c). That sanction is the payment by the denying party to the requesting party of the reasonable expenses incurred in proving the denied facts, including reasonable attorney's fees if the denial was not warranted. (Rabjohn v. Minute Maid Corporation (SDNY) Civ. 117-23, Opinion filed July 18, 1958).

[Objections to the Requests]

Defendants' objections to plaintiff's requests are on the grounds—

(1) that certain of the requests are improper because they incorporate by reference other documents;

(2) that certain of the requests are "ambiguous and lacking in clarity, thus making it impossible" for them to be answered clearly and unequivocally; and

(3) that certain of the requests cover irrelevant matters not admissible in evidence at the trial.

[Incorporation by Reference]

The first category of objections by defendants is generally sustained. Ordinarily the facts admitted in an answer to a request for admissions should be ascertainable merely by examination of the request and of the answer. (cf. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Micro-Moisture Controls (SDNY 1957) 21 F. R. D. 164). This rule, however, is flexible and thus a certain amount of incorporation by reference may in exceptional circumstances be allowed. Plaintiff herein states that a chart, attached as an exhibit to its request, is an example of such incorporation by reference which is warranted by exceptional circumstances. The plaintiff has further offered to revise the chart to clarify the exact facts concerning which it is seeking admissions. In view of this offer I will not, at this time, rule on whether the incorporation is warranted. However, the offer of the plaintiff seeks, as a condition to the revision of its chart, an order at this time that defendants admit or deny the request as it will appear in its final form. As pointed out in disposing of the Government's informal motion, such an order would not be warranted in any event, and certainly could not be warranted here since the request in final form is not before the court.

Defendants' objections to the items of the request numbered 5, 12, 16, 19, 22 and 23 are sustained. Plaintiff may serve a further request for admissions wherein no incorporation by reference is utilized with the exception of Item No. 5 as noted above. However, each item of the further request shall contain a citation to plaintiff's source material for the facts concerning which admissions are sought.

Defendant's objections to the items of the request numbered 5, 12, 16, 19, 22 and 23 on the ground that they are ambiguous will not be ruled upon at this time since those items are to be the subject of a further request in accordance with the previous ruling.

[Ambiguity]

The remaining items objected to for ambiguity shall be considered separately.

Defendants' objection to item No. 4 of the request is in general overruled. The documents in the form of Regulations, Memoranda, Bulletins and Circular Letters are certainly documents of whose existence defendants are aware. Any objection on the ground that such documents are not sufficiently identified can be characterized only as captious. However, certain of the objections of defendants to the request have merit. Accordingly, defendants cannot be forced to admit or deny whether any rulings are "binding" on any one since legal, rather than factual, circumstances lurk in that term. Generally, defendants should not be forced to make a judgment as to what the "more important" FH Circular Letters and Bulletins are. Therefore, defendants need not answer the next to the last subparagraph of Item No. 4 of the request and the clause "and the rulings they contain are binding on FH members" is stricken from the preceding subparagraph. In all other respects defendants' objection is overruled.

Defendants' objection to Item No. 13 of the request is overruled. It is obvious that the entities to whom Ebauches S. A. is said to have directed its request that repair parts be not exported from the United States were those entities to whom they are sold and who are listed in the item.

Defendants' objection to Item No. 25 is sustained. Use of the terms "price cutting activities", "excessive quantities" and the like, is clearly objectionable. (Securities and Exchange Commission v. Micro-Moisture Controls, supra). Plaintiff may, however, serve a further request covering the same subject matter, susceptible of an unequivocal answer.

Defendants' objection to items numbered 31 and 32 are overruled. A review of these items clearly indicates that they can be answered unequivocally if defendants have the requisite knowledge.

[Relevancy]

Defendants' objections on the ground of irrelevancy are overruled in their entirety. I will not at all attempt to review in detail the numerous items objected to and indicate why the facts concerning which admissions are sought are relevant. Suffice it to say that all of the facts concern the existence or operation of the charged conspiracy and thus are relevant. Any question of admissibility will be reserved for the trial of the action.

The overruling of many of the defendants' objections to the request for admissions is not at all to be considered a holding that defendants must unequivocally admit or deny the facts. Rather, as pointed out in a prior part of this opinion, defendants may deny any or all of the facts concerning which admissions are sought at the peril, however, of incurring the sanction provided by Rule 37(c).

[Coverage of Request]

Although specific objections were made by the defendants to specific items in the request, a further request was made both at the oral argument and in the reply memorandum that the request as a whole be stricken. I am aware, of course, that a request for admissions should not attempt to cover virtually the entire case. It should be confined to facts which are not in substantial dispute. Thus, in a proper case, the entire request may be stricken because it is entirely ill-conceived. (cf. Syracuse Broadcasting Corporation v. Samuel I. Newhouse, et al., [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,519], Docket No. 25074, October Term, 1958). However, the request under consideration appears to me to be a good faith attempt by the plaintiff properly to utilize the provisions of Rule 36 and thus will not be stricken in its entirety.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

The motions are disposed of as indicated above.

It is so ordered.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Pretrial Procedures—Striking Irrelevant or Prejudicial Matters—Complaint.—In a motion picture antitrust treble damage action, all references to a prior government decree entered against some of the present defendants were ordered stricken from the complaint on the ground that they were immaterial and irrelevant in pleading the claim. It was found that these repeated references served no useful purpose as far as the claim was concerned and might have been prejudicial to the defendants. The plaintiff was not entitled to "honeycomb" its complaint with evidential references to various alleged incidents prior, incidental, and subsequent to the entry of the decree and alleged violations of it. However, in serving an amended complaint, the plaintiff would be permitted to allege the entry of the decree and that it intended to rely on the decree as evidence.

For the defendant: Royall, Koegel, Harris & Caskey for Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation (Delaware); Benjamin Melniker for Loew's Incorporated; Leonard Kaufman for Paramount Pictures Corp.; Howard Levinson for Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc. and Warner Bros. Pictures Distributing Corp.; Jerome Golden for American Broadcasting-Paramount Pictures, Inc. and Wilby-Kincey Service Corp.; Charles F. Young for Citation Films, Inc.; and Adolph Schimel for Universal Pictures Co. and Universal Film Exchanges, Inc., all of New York, N. Y.

For a prior opinion of the U. S. District Court, Southern District of New York, see 1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,432.

[Striking Irrelevant Matter]

Edward Weinfeld, District Judge [In full text]: Rule 8(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires that a pleading contain a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. The liberality of pleading permitted by Nagler v. Admiral Corp. [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,839], 248 F. 2d 319 (2d Cir. 1957), neither overcomes the Rule nor does it justify the inclusion in the complaint of such matters, for example, as what a defendant proposed for inclusion in the Paramount decree or references to applications which may have been made for modification of the decree.

[Reference to Prior Decree in Complaint]

The complaint is interlarded with numerous other allegations of an evidential nature touching upon the decree, alleged violations thereof, and alleged reasons for happenings thereunder. These serve no useful purpose as far as the plaintiff's claim is concerned.

On the other hand, the repeated references to the decree and alleged violations may well be prejudicial to the defendants. Plaintiff's claim must rest upon alleged violation of the antitrust statutes and not upon any claimed violation of the decree.

Plaintiff should plead the ultimate fact claim and not evidentiary details allegedly supporting it. If the defendant achieved, as plaintiff alleges in paragraph 37 of its complaint, a "position of monopoly, dominance and control of the first-run exhibition field in Chattanooga", this can be pleaded simply and directly without an allegation such as that now contained therein starting:

"Thus, in direct violation of its express representation in the decree * * *."

While the plaintiff may be entitled upon the trial to avail itself of the Paramount decree with respect to facts necessarily adjudicated in that action (defendants here challenge plaintiff's right to rely on the decree but this issue need not now be decided), it is not entitled to honeycomb its complaint with evidential references to various alleged incidents prior, incidental, and subsequent, to the entry of the decree and alleged violations thereof. Even the Nagler case did not look kindly upon the practice of pleading evidential matter. If plaintiff relies, in support of its claim, upon a fact or circumstance which occurred prior to, contemporaneously with, or subsequent to the entry of the decree, the fact can be stated without reference to the decree itself.

What the precise issues are that were determined against the defendants under the Paramount decree are for the Trial Court to decide as a matter of law, not for the plaintiff's counsel to interpret in a pleading. Emich Motors Corp. v. General Motors Corp. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,778], 340 U. S. 558, 571 (1951).

[Holding]

Accordingly, all references to the Paramount decree are ordered stricken under Rule 12(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on the ground that they are immaterial and irrelevant in pleading the claim. Paragraphs 37 and 40 are so drawn that it will be necessary to replead them.

Plaintiff in serving an amended complaint may, if so advised, allege the entry of the decree and that it intends to rely thereon pursuant to Title 15 U. S. C. section 16. Normandie Amusement Corp. v. Loew's Inc. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,670], 140 F. Supp. 257 (S. D. N. Y. 1954).

Private Enforcement and Proceduce—Civil Damage Action—When Recovery May Be Barred—Statute of Limitations—Applicable Statute—"Borrowing" Provisions—"Forfeitures Upon Penal Statutes".—A Federal District Court sitting in New York, in a treble damage action based on the Federal antitrust laws, applied a New Jersey two-year "forfeiture" statute of limitations to the action on the ground that the cause of action arose in New Jersey and was an action for a "forfeiture upon a penal statute" within the meaning of New Jersey law. Since the federal statute was inapplicable (the action was filed prior to the effective date of the Federal statute), the Federal court looked to the statute of the forum. A New York "borrowing" statute directed the application of New Jersey law, since the cause of action arose in that state. Thus, "The law of the United States adopts the law of New York and the law of New York adopts the law of New Jersey."

Opinion

[Motion to Dismiss—Statute of Limitations]

DIMOCK, District Judge [In full text]: In this private treble damage antitrust case defendants move for summary judgment dismissing all claims of plaintiffs which accrued with respect to certain theatres in the State of New Jersey more than two years before the commencement of this action. The motion is made on the ground that such claims are classed as forfeitures upon penal statutes and barred by the two-year statute of limitations of the State of New Jersey[1] as made applicable by Section 13 of the New York Civil Practice Act.[2] Plaintiffs are non-residents of New York and thus do not come within the exception expressed in that section.

[Statute of the Forum]

The present federal statute of limitations governing private antitrust causes, 69 Stat. 283, 15 U. S. C. § 15b, is not applicable because it applies only to actions begun after January 7, 1956, and this action was begun in 1953. "In the absence of an applicable federal statute of limitations, federal courts look to the statute of the forum". Bertha Building Corp. v. National Theatres Corp., 2 Cir. [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,444], 269 F. 2d 785, 788, decided August 24, 1959, citing Chattanooga Foundry v. Atlanta, 203 U. S. 390, 397. The limitation statute of the forum to be looked to includes such borrowing provisions as those of Section 13 of the Civil Practice Act. Seaboard Terminals Corporation v. Standard Oil Co. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,188], D. C. S. D. N. Y., 24 F. Supp. 1018, aff'd on opinion below, 104 F. 2d 659; Electric Theater Co. v. Twentieth Century-Fox F. Corp. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,560], D. C. W. D. Mo. W. D., 113 F. Supp. 937, 939; Walder v. Paramount Publix Corporation [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,097], D. C. S. D. N. Y., 132 F. Supp. 912, 919. See also Cope v. Anderson, 331 U. S. 461, 465.

[New Jersey Statute]

Since the claims which are the subject of this motion arose in New Jersey, see Seaboard Terminals Corporation v. Standard Oil Co. and Walder v. Paramount Publix Corporation, supra, they are barred under the New York borrowing statute if they are barred under New Jersey law. Therefore, if we find that they are barred under New Jersey law, we need go no further. Our first task will thus be to determine the New Jersey period of limitation.

It is a New Jersey statute of limitations, not a federal statute, that we are applying. We are trying to find out whether when the New Jersey legislature spoke of an action "for any forfeiture upon any penal statute" * * * "when the benefit of the forfeiture and the action therefor is or shall be limited or given to the party ag-

[1] Title 2A, New Jersey Statutes, § 14-10 provides:

"All actions at law brought for any forfeiture upon any penal statute made or to be made, shall be commenced within the periods of time herein prescribed:

* * *

"b. Within 2 years next after the offense committed or to be committed against the statute, or cause of action accrued, when the benefit of the forfeiture and the action therefor is or shall be limited or given to the party aggrieved * * *."

[2] Section 13 provides:

"Where a cause of action arises outside of this state, an action cannot be brought in a court of this state to enforce such cause of action after the expiration of the time limited by the laws either of this state or of the state or country where the cause of action arose, for bringing an action upon the cause of action, except that where the cause of action originally accrued in favor of a resident of this state, the time limited by the laws of this state shall apply."

grieved", it meant to include an action like an antitrust action under the Sherman Act for treble damages. We are seeking the meaning of the quoted words when used in a statute of New Jersey; decisions as to their meaning in a statute of the United States or of some other state are important only for such slight bearing as they may have in the determination of what the legislature of New Jersey meant.

[Type of Action]

Even if the Sherman Act had declared that an action thereunder for treble damages should not be deemed to be an action upon a penal statute with the benefit of the forfeiture and the action thereon limited or given to the party aggrieved, the question would still be open whether the action was not in fact, if not in its federal name, one of the actions which the New Jersey legislature intended to be within the bar of the two-year statute. Congress and the decisions of the federal courts are supreme in determining the actual nature of a treble damage action under the Sherman Act but the legislature and the decisions of the courts of the state where the action is brought are (or were before the adoption of the federal statute of limitations) supreme in determining whether an action of a nature so determined is within the bar of that state's statute of limitations. See the reliance on a New York decision interpreting New York statutes of limitation in Bertha Building Corp. v. National Theatres Corp., supra [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,444], 269 F. 2d 785, 788.

[Case Distinguished]

In Chattanooga Foundry v. Atlanta, 203 U. S. 390, the Supreme Court held that a treble damage action under the Sherman Act was not an action "for any penalty or forfeiture" within the meaning of the five-year limitation in section 1047 of the Revised Statutes, 28 U. S. C. § 791 (1940 ed.), that since it was not within any federal statute of limitations the Tennessee statute would apply, and that it was not within a Tennessee statute providing that actions for "statute penalties" must be brought "within one year after cause of action accrued" but rather within a Tennessee statute providing that "all other cases" should be brought within ten years. In holding that the one-year "statute penalty" statute did not apply, the Supreme Court affirmed the Circuit Court of Appeals which had reached that result on the authority of Massachusetts, Federal and Tennessee case law construing the word "penalty". The Court's opinion, 127 F. 23, was written by Judge Lurton who had earlier been Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Tennessee. In affirming, Mr. Justice Holmes said at page 398:

> "Although the decision is appealed from, as this question involves the construction of local law we cannot but attribute weight to the opinion of the judge who rendered the judgment, in view of his experience upon the Supreme Court of Tennessee."

It is true that Justice Holmes in the Chattanooga case referred to federal decisions as well. It must be remembered, however, that he was dealing with the laws of but two sovereignties, the United States and the state of the forum. Here we are concerned with the laws of three, the United States, the State of New York and the State of New Jersey. The law of the United States adopts the law of New York and the law of New York adopts the law of New Jersey. If attention is to be paid to any law other than that of New Jersey we would naturally turn first to that of New York. Under the law of that sovereignty it is settled that, where there is interplay of the laws of two sovereignties, the words of a state statute are to be construed in the way that the law of that state construes them. Matter of Donegan, 282 N. Y. 285, 290. We are here concerned only with the name that the New Jersey Legislature would have given an action having the nature of this one.

[Case Followed]

The decision of the Third Circuit in Gordon v. Loew's Incorporated [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,783 and 68,820], 247 F. 2d 451, is precisely in point. The court there held that a case of this type is barred by the two-year statute of limitations, section 14-10 of title 2A of the New Jersey Statutes, set out in footnote 1 above.

Plaintiffs claim that the Third Circuit not only was wrong in attempting to apply the New Jersey law but failed in the attempt. The New Jersey case on which the court relied was Addiss v. Logan Corporation, 23 N. J. 142. There the New Jersey Supreme Court held the two-year statute applicable to an action under a statute permitting the recovery of three times the amount of a landlord's overcharge of rent. Plaintiffs argue that the Addiss case recognized that an action under the antitrust laws was not barred by the two-year statute of limitations. This argument is based on the following portion of the Addiss opinion quoted in Gordon v. Loew's Incorporated [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,820], 247 F. 2d at 456:

> "The statutory penalty of N. J. S. 2A:42-38, N. J. S. A., is both remedial and penal, a factor inferentially recognized in Friedman v. Podell, supra [21 N. J. 100, 121 A. 2d 17.] Cf. Ryan v. Motor Credit Co., Inc., 130 N. J. Eq. 531 (Ch. 1941) affirmed 132 N. J. Eq. 398, 28 A. 2d 181, 142 A. L. R. 640 (E. & A. 1942). * * * A further point why the court below was correct in applying the limitation is the desire to prevent actions such as this, having penal characteristics, from being unlimited. See Boswell v. Robinson, 33 N. J. L. 273 (Sup. Ct. 1869); Borough of Fair Lawn v. Fairlawn Transportation, Inc., 25 N. J. Misc. 331, 53 A. 2d 628 (Sup. Ct. 1947). But cf. Shelton Electric Co. v. Victor Talking Mach. Co., 277 F. 433 (D. C. N. J. 1922). We concur in the conclusion that the two-year limitation of N. J. S. 2A:14-10(b), N. J. S. A. was applicable to the plaintiffs' causes of action."

Plaintiffs say:

> "In enunciating one of the very reasons for holding the rent overage proceeding penal—namely that otherwise it would be subject to no limitation period—the court in the Addiss case contrasted that proceeding with the Shelton case, an action under the Clayton Act, thereby clearly indicating that such an action was already subject to a limitation statute, to wit, the six year one as held in the Shelton case."

This is an ingenious argument based on the form in which the New Jersey court cited the Shelton case, but I reject the conclusion. The expression "but cf." is too cryptic to serve as a basis for a conclusion that the court intended by it to approve an apparently contrary case. The expression precedes the citation of the Shelton case and follows a statement that the court below was correct in applying the two-year limitation for the further reason that courts incline toward finding limitations for penal actions and a citation of two cases which are applications of that reason. While the court in the Shelton case did not say that it was influenced in refusing to apply the two-year statute by the fact that there would still be some limitation of the time during which the claim could still be asserted, it must be admitted that the Shelton case did present a state of facts and law where that argument could have been applied. If we assume, as plaintiff urges, that the court in the Addiss case did cite the Shelton case as an approved example of the successful application of that argument, it is hard to understand the court's use of the conjunction "But" before the abbreviation "cf.". The court in the Addiss case, in the beginning of the same paragraph, used the expression "cf.", without any "But", for its usual function of indicating an example of an application of the same rule to a different state of facts rather than an example of a contrary decision. Though delphic, I take the addition of "But" to the "cf." to be a recognition that the cited decision is contrary to the decision below which, in the first part of the preceding sentence, the court had said was correct. Thus it is an indication of disapproval of the Shelton case rather than an indication of its approval as an example of the proper result of the absence of facts which would bring into play the just stated "desire to prevent actions * * *, having penal characteristics from being unlimited." The fact that the expression is contained in the same paragraph with the statement of that desire is evidently without significance. That paragraph is quite as much concerned with the general proposition that the two-year statute applies as with the desire to prevent actions from being unlimited. In its beginning it states the conclusion that the action for recovery of three times the overcharge is both remedial and penal. It then passes to the quoted approval of the decision of the court below and discussion of the policy of leaning toward limitations of penal actions, citing cases on that point. Then, set off by full stops, comes the bone of contention, "But cf. Shelton Electric Co. v. Victor Talking Mach. Co., 277 F. 433 (D. C. N. J. 1922)", followed closely by a return to approval of the decision of the court below.

Incidentally, the Shelton case, though contrary to Gordon v. Loew's, is distinguishable from that at bar in that the Federal Court was applying the New Jersey limitation directly and not through the medium of a borrowing statute of another state.

Aside from the fact that the Third Circuit's opinion in the Gordon case, although not binding on this court, is entitled to weight, see Hardy v. Rossell, D. C. S. D. N. Y., 135 F. Supp. 260, 266, I quite agree with the Gordon holding. It has been twice reaffirmed. Carlton Lamp Corporation v. General Electric Company, 3 Cir., 254 F. 2d 815; Dean Oil Company v. American Oil Company, 3 Cir. [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,075], 254 F. 2d 816, cert. denied 358 U. S. 835.

[Holding]

My decision is thus that the period of limitation which would be applied by the State of New Jersey is two years. Since it is not claimed that there is a shorter period of limitation applicable under the law of the State of New York, all claims accruing with respect to theatres in the State of New Jersey more than two years before the commencement of this action must be dismissed.

Motion granted. Settle order on notice.

complaint states a claim for relief against the defendant, The Hoover Company, under Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as The Sherman Act, as amended.

II.

[Definitions]

As used in this Final Judgment:

(a) "New York Metropolitan Area" means the area comprising the City of New York, the New York counties of Westchester, Suffolk and Nassau, and the New Jersey counties of Hudson, Bergen, Essex, Union, Passaic and Middlesex;

(b) "Person" means an individual, partnership, firm, association or corporation, or any other legal entity;

(c) "Hoover" means defendant, The Hoover Company, which, together with its subsidiaries and with its officers, directors, employees and agents when acting in such capacities, shall be considered to be one person;

(d) "Hoover cleaners" means electric vacuum cleaners manufactured and sold by Hoover other than cleaners of the type heretofore manufactured and sold by Hoover only to wholesale distributors;

(e) "Fair trade agreement" means any resale price maintenance contract, or supplement thereto, pursuant to which the resale price of Hoover cleaners is lawfully fixed, established or maintained under the fair trade laws of any state, territory or possession and the act of Congress of August 17, 1937, commonly called the Miller-Tydings Act, or the act of Congress of July 14, 1952, commonly called the McGuire Act, or any legislation having a similar purpose that may hereafter be enacted.

III.

[Applicability]

The provisions of this Final Judgment shall apply to Hoover, its subsidiaries, successors and assigns, and to each of its officers, directors, agents and employees, and to all other persons in active concert and participation with Hoover who shall have received actual notice of this Final Judgment by personal service or otherwise. The provisions of this Final Judgment are not applicable to activities of Hoover or its successors or assigns conducted outside the United States and not affecting the domestic commerce of the United States.

IV.

[Price Fixing and Price Lists]

Hoover is enjoined and restrained from:

(a) Entering into, adhering to, or maintaining any contract, agreement, understanding or combination with any other person to fix, stabilize or maintain prices for the sale of Hoover cleaners to any third person; provided, however, that nothing contained in this Section IV shall be deemed to prohibit or restrict Hoover from entering into, adhering to or enforcing fair trade agreements:

(1) From the date of entry of this Final Judgment with respect to sales of Hoover cleaners outside of the States of New York and New Jersey; or

(2) After the expiration of one year from the date of entry of this Final Judgment with respect to any sales.

(b) Disseminating or circulating in any manner for a period of two years from the date of entry of this Final Judgment to any retail dealer in the New York Metropolitan Area (or to any retail store in the New York Metropolitan Area owned or operated by a retail dealer outside of the New York Metropolitan Area) price lists containing suggested prices for the sale of Hoover cleaners by retail dealers.

V.

[Refusal to Deal—Coercion]

Hoover is enjoined and restrained from entering into, adhering to or maintaining, with any other person, any contract, agreement, understanding, plan or program to prevent any retail dealer from selling or shipping Hoover cleaners to whom or wherever the retail dealers desires to sell.

VI.

[Boycotts—Refusal to Deal]

Hoover is enjoined and restrained, for a period of five years from the date of entry of this Final Judgment, from

(a) boycotting or otherwise refusing to deal with, or from threatening to boycott or otherwise to refuse to deal with any retail dealer in the New York Metropolitan Area regularly designated by defendant to act as such dealer for the sale of Hoover cleaners who adequately represents defendant in the sale of Hoover cleaners and who complies with defendant's reasonable standards for such retail dealers not inconsistent with any of the terms of this Final Judgment; and

(b) impeding or restricting, or from attempting to impede or restrict, directly or indirectly, the free choice of any such retail dealer in selecting the latter's customers for Hoover cleaners.

VII.

[Notice of Judgment]

Hoover is ordered and directed, within sixty (60) days from the date of entry of this Final Judgment, to mail a copy thereof to each of its franchised retail dealers in the New York Metropolitan Area and to each other person who was a franchised retail dealer in the New York Metropolitan Area on February 1, 1955, at the most recent address of such other person appearing on Hoover's records, and within thirty (30) days after such mailing, to file with this Court, with a copy to the plaintiff herein, a report of compliance with this Section VII.

VIII.

[Enforcement and Compliance]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to Hoover at its principal office, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege, (a) reasonable access, during office hours, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of Hoover, relating to any of the matters contained in this Final Judgment and (b) subject to the reasonable convenience of Hoover, and without restraint or interference from it, to interview regarding any such matters officers and employees of Hoover, who may have counsel present.

Upon the written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, Hoover shall submit such written reports with respect to any of the matters contained in this Final Judgment as from time to time may be necessary for the enforcement of this Final Judgment. No information obtained by the means provided in this Section VIII shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Executive Branch of the plaintiff except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

IX.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this Final Judgment to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this Final Judgment, the enforcement of compliance therewith and the punishment of violations thereof.

[¶ 69,554] United States of America v. The Procter & Gamble Company, et al.

In the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. Civil Action No. 1196-52. Dated December 10, 1959.

Case No. 1150 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Discovery and Production of Evidence—Discovery of Grand Jury Testimony Where Government Decided To Institute Civil Rather Than Criminal Proceedings—Suppression—Disclosure.—Where a grand jury sat for a year and a half and the government decided eleven days before termination of such proceeding to institute a civil rather than a criminal action, the court denied defendant's motions for suppression, for impounding, or for full disclosure of all testimony before the jury and leads derived from it. It was held that a wiser method of placing the parties on an equal basis was generally by making the evidence in question available to both sides rather than by making the evidence basic to the cause unavailable to either side by its suppression or impounding. In determining how much disclosure was permissible in the instant case the court looked to U. S. v. Procter & Gamble Co., 1958 Trade Cases ¶ 69,046, and interpreted it as holding that (1) if the Government's use of the grand jury had been completely wrong from the beginning the entire grand jury transcript was discoverable to the defendants without the showing of other cause; (2) but if there was a subversion by the partial unlawful use of the grand jury for a purely civil purpose, then that portion of the transcript was to be discovered wholesale without the showing of other particularized cause; and (3) if the testimony was properly taken before the grand jury, then, before the defendants become entitled to any disclosure, they must show particularized cause. The facts of the instant case have placed it within points (2) and (3). Thus, the testimony given in the eleven days prior to termination of the grand jury during which the government had made up its mind to pursue the civil remedy has been fully disclosed to the defendants. As to the remaining testimony the instant opinion held that it was properly taken before the grand jury and that defendants become entitled to it only when they show good cause. Such good cause was shown where a witness had died without making his grand jury testimony available to the defendants.

[Grand Jury Testimony]

Hartshorne, Judge [In full text]: In seeking to implement the opinion of our highest Court in this very case, U. S. v. Procter & Gamble, et al. [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 69,046], 356 U. S. 677 (1957), this Court held, in its opinion filed herein on June 9, 1959 [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,385], 174 F. Supp. 233 (D. C. N. J.):

> "The critical question thus is, when this case first became only 'a civil case.' From that time on, our highest court has said that using the Grand Jury to elicit evidence in that case * * * would require that any advantage thus obtained improperly by the Government be wiped out, by giving the opposing party the use of so much of the Grand Jury transcript as was thus obtained by a criminal procedure in a purely civil case."

Following this defendants ascertained that while, according to the written instructions given those in charge of the Grand Jury proceedings herein, same were originally to be conducted both for criminal and civil purposes thereafter, as stated by this Court, "on November 14, 1952, the then Attorney General decided not to ask for the return of an indictment by the Grand Jury upon the basis of the evidence previously taken before that body." U. S. v. Procter & Gamble, et al. [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,458], 175 F. Supp. 198 (D. C. N. J.). Accordingly, defendants asked for, and have received, the transcript of the proceedings of the Grand Jury on and after that date until the termination of such proceedings on November 25, 1952.

However, our highest Court, in its above decision, which reversed the order for complete discovery of the Grand Jury proceedings herein by another branch of this Court, held (1) that such discovery would lie only where the plaintiff Government had used the criminal process of a Grand Jury in a purely civil proceeding; (2) as to particular Grand Jury testimony, that "a much more particularized, more discreet showing of need is necessary to establish 'good cause'" for its discovery in order to overcome the "indispensable secrecy of Grand Jury proceedings"; and (3) that the "delay and substantial costs" caused defendants by taking depositions "fall short of proof that without the transcript a defense would be greatly prejudiced or that without reference to it an injustice would be done." Procter & Gamble, supra, p. 682.

[Particularized Good Cause]

Thus, so far as defendants may desire any additional transcript of such Grand Jury proceedings, they must show additional particularized good cause. In certain aspects this has apparently been done. Defendants have moved to be shown the transcript of the testimony of one Reilly, a witness since deceased, whose testimony is therefore unavailable to them on deposition. Barring the fact that this witness has made available to defendants a really complete memorandum of all his Grand Jury testimony, which, if subject to question, must be decided impartially, his Grand Jury testimony should therefore be made available to the defendants who desire it, in order that they be placed on a substantial parity with plaintiff.

Not content with the above aid obtained from this Court, defendants further move that (1) the entire Grand Jury transcript should be suppressed from use by plaintiff Government, not only per se, but as to any leads therefrom which the Government may have obtained; (2) all the testimony before the Grand Jury should be turned over to it; and (3) all such testimony should be impounded, including any leads which plaintiff Government might have obtained therefrom, permitting disclosure only on special cause shown.

[Balancing the Equities]

In deciding if any of this additional relief is to be granted to the defendants, the prime requisite is to determine, bearing in mind the normal secrecy of Grand Jury proceedings, what will do justice to both parties—to the defendants, on the one hand, and, on the other, to the plaintiff Government, representing the public in carrying out the Congressional mandate of enforcing the antitrust acts. The fact is that over seven years ago a Grand Jury sat for a year and a half in this matter and heard some thirty witnesses, who produced literally hundreds of thousands of documents. Such evidence obviously constitutes the essential basis of the case of the plaintiff Government. Either the suppression of all this information and the leads obtained by the Government therefrom, or the impounding of all that information and those leads from the Government, will practically put an end to the Government's case, and will make it impossible for the Department of Justice to attempt to carry out the Congressional will in that regard. The only way conceivable to this Court by which such impounding could fail to prevent the Government from carrying out its duty under Section 4 of the Sherman Act, would be to have plaintiff Government again seek, on deposition, to obtain these same thirty witnesses and these same hundreds of thousands of documents. Since the Government called its first Grand Jury witness upon the basis of a lead obtained other than through the Grand Jury, it is possible that it could take the deposition of such witness and thereafter, step by step pursue this procedure to the bitter end. But this procedure would obviously take much longer than the year and a half it took the Grand Jury over seven years ago. At each step the Government would have to prove, under the proposed impoundment procedure, that its leads as to such step did not come from its Grand Jury information but from other sources. Then, after all this, the utmost that could be expected would be that the Government would be in exactly the same position as it is now. Surely another remedy should be sought rather than any such impracticable technique. That another just remedy is available has been indicated by the Supreme Court itself in Procter & Gamble, supra, in holding that disclosure to the defendants, as above indicated, would meet the needs of justice, either partially, on the showing of "particularized * * * good cause" or "wholesale" to the extent that "the criminal procedure is subverted." Thereby the plaintiff, without preventing it from doing its official duty, will have been deprived of any undue advantage it has gained by taking this limited amount of evidence for a purely civil purpose before the Grand Jury rather than in public, 15 U. S. C. par. 30, and be compelled to place the defendants on a substantial equality with it.

Surely this is a wiser method of placing the parties on an equal basis—by making the evidence in question available to both sides—rather than by making the evidence basic to the cause unavailable to either side by its suppression or impounding, and thereby defeating the national policy as to the enforcement of the antitrust laws. There are, moreover, additional reasons why either suppression or impounding is not an appropriate remedy.

Suppression

Suppression is generally confined as a remedy to punish the Government's violation of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, of such basic importance to the public in safeguarding it from unreasonable searches and seizures, or its equivalent in wire tapping. Silverthorne Lumber Company v. U. S., 251 U. S. 385 (1920); Nardone v. U. S., 308 U. S. 338 (1939); U. S. v. Wallace Company [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,414], 336 U. S. 793 (1949); U. S. v. Coplon, 185 F. 2d 627, 636, cert. den. 342 U. S. 920; U. S. v. Goldstein, 120 F. 2d 485, 488, affirmed 316 U. S. 114, 120; Rogers v. U. S., 97 F. 2d 691 (1 Cir. 1938); Schenck v. Ward, 24 F. Supp. 776 (D. C. Mass. 1938); Ex Parte Jackson, 263 F. 110 (D. C. Mont. 1920).

As is stated in Wallace, supra:

> "The Silverthorne exclusionary rule, as explained in that case and others, is designed to safeguard the privacy of people, and to prevent seizure of their papers and property, except in compliance with valid judicial process. As tersely stated in the Silverthorne case, the rule's purpose is to prevent the 4th Amendment from being reduced to 'a form of words'."

But here there was neither a "search and seizure", a violation of the Fourth Amendment, nor a wire tapping. Everything that was done by the Government was done under judicial process, the very subpoenas used in these Grand Jury proceedings having been carefully delimited by Judge Forman, sitting in general charge of the Grand Jury. Hence these subpoenas, under Oklahoma Press Publishing Company v. Walling, 327 U. S. 186 (1946), do not constitute even "a constructive search and seizure" making the Fourth Amendment applicable. Moreover, in Wallace, supra, where the Grand Jury itself was held invalid, our highest Court held that the plaintiff Government could use, in a civil suit, as here, the documents previously produced before this illegally constituted Grand Jury. If such evidence, though used before an illegally constituted Grand Jury, is later usable in a civil suit, a fortiori it should be available in this civil suit when used before a legally constituted Grand Jury.

Again, suppression is a peculiarly appropriate remedy in an unlawful search and seizure case, where disclosure of such evidence to defendants in a criminal case would do them no good at all. Here, on the other hand, the remedy of disclosure to the defendants, if due at all, would aid them in this civil suit by placing the parties on the relative equality which civil procedure requires. Thus the defendants' search and seizure argument does not suffice to require a change in the remedy already given them, to put them on a substantial equality with plaintiff.

[Suppression of Depositions]

Nor is the defendants' argument by analogy as to the suppression of depositions any more convincing. Of course, since a deposition may itself be used as substantive evidence in a trial, it is necessary that such deposition be taken on notice to the adversary, giving him the right to be heard and to cross-examine thereon. Thus, if such rights are not given, such deposition may be suppressed to prevent its use as such evidence at the trial. F. R. C. P. 32. However, the testimony of a witness before a Grand Jury can never be used as substantive evidence at the trial. It is there usable only to affect the credibility of a witness. The above analogy is thus a false one. In addition, the suppression sought here—to prevent the Government from any access whatever not only to that evidence but to any leads obtained therefrom—is far different and more stringent than the suppression of a deposition from use at the trial as substantive evidence, as referred to in the above Rule. This distinction is alluded to in Palmer v. Fisher, 228 F. 2d 603 (7 Cir. 1955), cert. den. 351 U. S. 956 (1956), where the Court held that the deposition would be suppressed from use as substantive evidence at the trial, but would not be destroyed, since it might thereafter become usable to impeach a trial witness, just as would testimony before a Grand Jury.

In short, the reasons advanced by the defendants for granting the additional relief requested, of suppression of the Grand Jury testimony and all leads obtained by the Government therefrom, would seem unsound, and such suppression, if it occurred, would here render it practically impossible for the plaintiff Government to carry out the Congressional will of effectuating the policy of the antitrust acts. To order such suppression thus would not seem to be the exercise of sound discretion on the part of the trial court, particularly in the light of the fact that the defendants have already received the aid of the Court in placing them on a substantial equality with the plaintiff Government, in accordance with the opinion of our highest Court in this very case.

Impounding

As to the impounding of all the Grand Jury testimony, much the same reasons apply, since the result of such impounding would be substantially the same as its suppression. Thereby plaintiff Government's case would have been stripped bare of its evidence, and this after over seven years of work, including the production of a large number of witnesses and literally hundreds of thousands of documents, and its compliance with the Congressional mandate of the antitrust laws would thereby be prevented.

Of course, that is not to say that the suggestion as to impounding made in the Procter & Gamble concurring opinion by a single Justice, might not be a proper exercise of discretion by the trial judge, were plaintiff Government to have wilfully flouted the law from the beginning by using the Grand Jury for purely civil purposes. The possibility that that practice of the Government had been followed in this case doubtless had great weight in the making of the above suggestion. But such are not the facts in this cause as now developed. Thus the prime reason for the impounding suggestion has now been found nonexistent. Moreover, the second reason advanced—because of the finding of a "no true bill" by the Grand Jury—does not accord with the opinion of the Court itself in Procter & Gamble, supra, which says:

> "The fact that a criminal case failed does not mean that the evidence obtained could not be used in a civil case." p. 684

Indeed, there are certain additional reasons why impounding such evidence from the use of the Department of Justice would not be a wise exercise of discretion in this cause.

[Government's Right to Transcript Copy]

(a) Plaintiff Government is now rightfully entitled to at least a stenographic copy of the transcript of the Grand Jury evidence, as distinguished from its deliberations and the vote of any juror. The Grand Jury proceedings here have been presently proven to have been started for a criminal as well as a civil purpose, and to have continued in that way until within a week or so from the discharge of the Grand Jury in this case. Thus, previous to that brief terminal period, now cured by disclosure of same to the defendants, we have a situation where "what seemed at the beginning to be a case with a criminal cast apparently took on a different character as the events and transactions were disclosed. The fact that a criminal case failed does not mean that the evidence obtained could not be used in a civil case." Procter & Gamble, p. 684. Such is admittedly the present reason for the holding of this transcript by the Department of Justice.

(b) Not only does this action by the attorneys for the Department of Justice thus accord with this decision by our highest Court in this very case, but it also accords with the very reason why Congress authorized the making of a stenographic transcript of Grand Jury evidence. Under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure—and plaintiff was here pursuing criminal procedure with this Grand Jury—"* * * a stenographer may be present while the Grand Jury is in session * * *". F. R. Cr. P. 6(d). However, this had not always been the law, the Federal courts having split on the authority of a stenographer to be present during Grand Jury sessions.[1] Since, admittedly, it would help the prosecuting officer in the preparation of his case for trial to have the stenographic report of the testimony of the witnesses given before the Grand Jury, see Latham, Congress accordingly enacted a statute to that effect, 48 Stat. 58, 18 U. S. C. 556, which amended Section 1025 of the Revised Statutes by providing for the taking of testimony before the Grand Jury by "stenographers employed in a clerical capacity to assist the District Attorney or other counsel for the Government", approved May 18, 1933. That the history of this legislation is to the same effect see Sen. Rep. 64, 73rd Cong. 1st Sess., to which is appended on explanatory letter from the then Attorney General to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, alluding to the District Attorney's need for this stenographic assistance. In addition, in the notes to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, appearing in Sen. Doc. No. 175, 79th Cong. 2d Sess., it is shown that Rule F. R. Cr. P. 6(d) is intended to cover the above statute. See also U. S. v. Weathers, 21 F. Supp. 763 (N. D. Ga. 1937). Since the Government attorney in charge of the Grand Jury has a stenographer to take this evidence to assist him in the preparation of his case for trial, the Department of Justice here clearly has the right to retain at least a copy of this transcript for that very purpose, quite regardless of whether the original transcript should, or should not, be lodged with the Clerk of the Court, since the Grand Jury itself is an arm of the Court. Cobbledick v. U. S., 1940 [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,011], 309 U. S. 323, 327.

(c) Further, it is specifically provided by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure that "disclosure of matters occurring before the Grand Jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the Government for use in the performance of their duties" F. R. Cr. P. 6(e). These duties of the Government attorneys include not only pressing indictments found by a Grand Jury, but ascertaining from the evidence presented to a Grand Jury whether criminal violations of the Sherman Act have occurred and are therefore apt to occur in the future, which should therefore be enjoined. 15 U. S. C. A. par. 4.

[Civil Injunctions under the Sherman Act]

Note that the Sherman Act is primarily a criminal statute, its first three sections declaring certain acts illegal and prescribing punishment therefor. Furthermore, while Section 4 prescribes an equitable remedy, it does not open wide the door of a court of equity to enjoin all manner of contracts, combinations in the form of trusts, or otherwise, or conspiracies or monopolies in restraint of trade. It specifically invests the Federal courts with jurisdiction "to prevent and restrain violations of Sections 1-7 of this Title." Thus no injunction will lie save to prevent probable criminal violations of the Act. U. S. v. Swift, 188 F. 92, 96 (N. D. Ill. 1911); Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Company v. U. S., 226 U. S. 20, 52 (1912); In re Petroleum Industry Investigation [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,774], 152 F. Supp. 646 (E. D. Va. 1957). Hence in a Grand Jury inquiry under the Sherman Act the prime question always must be either whether criminal violations of such Act have occurred or are apt to occur in the immediate future. Since this inquiry is therefore as to criminal violations, if the use of the Grand Jury is proper at all, the above "duties" of "the attorneys for the Government", as provided by the above Rule, refer to their duties in determining whether criminal violations have occurred or are apt to recur—an inquiry into criminal matters. Accordingly, under the above Rule, the disclosure of matters occurring before the Grand Jury which is to be made to the attorneys for the Government for use in the performance of their duties covers matters bearing on criminal violations, whether in the end such evidence as to such criminal violations is used as a basis for an indictment for such violations or as a basis for an injunction to prevent such violations from recurring in the future. In either event, the attorneys for the Government are entitled to such disclosure, and such disclosure to them for such purpose is no violation of the normal Grand Jury secrecy.

To this effect, see U. S. v. U. S. District Court [1956 Trade Cases ¶ 68,540], 238 F. 2d 713 (4 Cir. 1956), cert. den. 77 S. C. 382, and In re Petroleum Industry Investigation, supra. In the first of these cases the Circuit Court reversed the District Court order which directed that, if the Grand Jury found no indictment, its transcript was to be returned by the U. S. Attorney to the Court Clerk. Thus this case held that the transcript could be used by the attorneys in charge of the Grand Jury for either civil or criminal purposes, provided it was rightfully called in the beginning for criminal purposes. To the same effect is the Petroleum Industry case, where the Court said:

> "Akin is the anticipated use by the Government of the documents, or the knowledge derived from them, in a civil action should the grand jury not indict. A civil suit predicated on antitrust or similar legislation, when brought by the Government, is in fact and in law a prosecution. Its aim is not compensation but correction. The obligation of the Justice Department to invoke civil remedies in an appropriate situation is just as bounden as its duty to institute requisite criminal proceedings. Consequently, if books and papers coming to the knowledge of the Government's attorneys in a grand jury investigation develop a demand, and an adequacy of proof, for resort to civil litigation in the public interest, it is certainly proper, indeed incumbent upon them, to use for that purpose the information in their hands."

Defendants argue that F. R. Cr. P. 6(e), referring to the right of the U. S. Attorneys to have disclosure of the Grand Jury transcript "in the performance of their duties" only refers to their duties in criminal proceedings, because of the reference of Rule 1 to "criminal proceedings." But this would seem an unduly restrictive construction of Rule 6(e). For instance, both Procter & Gamble and Wallace have held that the U. S. Attorneys could use this transcript in the conduct of this civil suit. In Procter & Gamble the Court expressly said:

> "The fact that a criminal case failed does not mean that the evidence obtained could not be used in a civil case."

Furthermore, even as to evidence taken for a civil case only, which should thus have been taken publicly and not before a Grand Jury, Procter & Gamble recognized that the "attorneys for the Government" should still "use" this evidence "in the performance of their duties," only they should share its use with defendants to create civil equality in that regard. In fact, Wallace held that they could do so, even though the Grand Jury, of whose proceedings the transcript was made, was illegal. As Procter & Gamble, supra, and Wallace, supra, show, Rule 6(e) is not intended to be so narrowly construed.

[Cases Distinguished]

Indeed, this situation under the Sherman Act, where civil injunction proceedings are dependent upon past and probable future criminal violations, may well constitute an important difference between the separate civil and criminal proceedings which may be taken by the Government in other situations, such as failure to live up to the tax laws. There, for instance, a criminal violation leading to an indictment is one thing. But the mere failure to pay the tax due, giving rise to a civil liability by suit or a jeopardy assessment, is an entirely different matter, in nowise dependent upon whether or not there has been a criminal violation. Due to this difference, the case of In re April 1956 Term Grand Jury, 239 F. 2d 263 (7 Cir. 1956), upon which the defendants much rely, involving such a tax situation, is not helpful to them. In that case there was the strongest evidence indicating that the Grand Jury in question had been called to seek evidence, not for the purpose of indicting those subject to a tax investigation, but to turn this evidence over to the Internal Revenue agents for them to pursue their entirely separate civil remedy against such parties. In that case there was, therefore, not only a disclosure to these third party agents by those in charge of the Grand Jury, contrary to the provisions of the above court rules, but these agents were real outsiders insofar as the criminal investigation by the Grand Jury was concerned. This disclosure to third parties, if it occurred for the above purpose, thus constituted a violation of Grand Jury secrecy, calling for a remedy to be applied by the Court against the Government. But such an unlawful violation of Grand Jury secrecy has not occurred in the case at bar. This, of course, is quite outside of the fact that in this case our highest Court has already held that in this Sherman Act situation, even if there had been a subversion of the Grand Jury by using it for a purely civil purpose, the appropriate remedy was not to impound this basic evidence from the plaintiff Government, but to equalize the position of the parties by turning over so much of such testimony as was a subversion to the other side as well.

Nor do the authorities otherwise relied on by the defendants aid them. This Court has already shown the inapplicability of In re April 1956 Term Grand Jury, supra. As to the other cases on which the defendants rely, U. S. v. Byoir [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,324], 58 F. Supp. 273 (N. D. Tex. 1945), aff'd 147 F. 2d 336 (5 Cir. 1945); Application of Bendix Aviation Corporation, 58 F. Supp. 953 (D. C. S. D. N. Y. 1945); U. S. v. Crolich, 101 F. Supp. 782 (S. C. Ala. 1952); In re Bullock, 103 F. Supp. 639 (D. C. D. C. 1952), not a single one, save Bendix, involves the impounding of Grand Jury evidence from the Government, and Bendix involves an impounding, not against the Government, such as defendants seek, but for the benefit of the Government. Each of the other cases involves not the impounding of evidence, but the disclosure of evidence. In Byoir, the U. S. Attorney in the Texas District disclosed the Grand Jury evidence taken there to the U. S. Attorney in the Illinois District, resulting in Byoir's indictment there. Byoir, because of this discovery to others than those in charge of the Grand Jury, a situation not existing here, was similarly granted discovery of such evidence. In Crolich, the U. S. Attorney in charge of the Grand Jury proceedings, involving corrupt election practices, asked the Court to turn over the Grand Jury transcript to the local County officials, not Federal officials, which the Court refused to do. In Bullock, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia asked the Court to turn over to them the Federal Grand Jury minutes covering the alleged derelictions in duty on the part of Police Inspector Bullock, and on the part of some third parties. Insofar as these other individuals were concerned, the Court refused to disclose the transcript to these Commissioners, third parties as far as the Grand Jury was concerned. But it did turn over the transcript so far as it affected the Police Inspector, on the theory that the Commissioner's responsibility for his doing his duty was good cause to breach the normal Grand Jury secrecy. Obviously, none of these authorities, dealing with disclosure of Grand Jury transcripts or the Court's refusal so to disclose, supports the impoundment sought in the case at bar. Nor does Bendix support the defendants. There a Grand Jury was called in the Southern District of New York to consider whether Bendix had violated the Sherman Act. No indictment having been returned, a similar civil action was instituted in the New Jersey District. When the defendant sought the return of its papers submitted to the Grand Jury, the New York court directed that they be not redelivered to the defendant, in order to "permit the Department of Justice to make prompt application to the District Court in New Jersey for an order impounding the papers which are the subject of the petition." This stay was later effectuated by agreement of the parties and order thereon, so as to safeguard to the Government its use of these papers on the trial of the civil cause in the New Jersey District. This is the equivalent of what plaintiff Government seeks to do here in holding the Grand Jury transcript.

Disclosure

We come now to the defendants' motion, made alternatively, to grant full disclosure of the Grand Jury testimony in lieu of suppression of such testimony.

Defendants argue (1) that they have shown prima facie that the Government has abused the Grand Jury process and that this likely occurred at the outset of the Grand Jury proceedings and therefore they are entitled to full disclosure; (2) that even if the abuse did not occur until November 14, 1952, they should be granted full disclosure as the Grand Jury proceedings are an entity, and to give meaning to the testimony subsequent to November 14, 1952 it is necessary to see the prior testimony; (3) that under the Supreme Court's opinion in this case [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 69,046], 356 U. S. 677 (1958) they are entitled to full disclosure whenever an abuse is discovered.

As to the first contention, the simplest answer is that the Government has clearly answered any such inference by its answer to Special Interrogatory No. 1 of July 1, 1959, dated July 20, 1959, by stating that November 14, 1952 was the date when the Attorney General decided not to seek an indictment. Furthermore, the letter of the Attorney General to Walker Smith, set forth in this Court's opinion of June 9, 1959 in the instant case [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,385], 174 F. Supp. 233, must be taken to mean what it says, barring evidence to the contrary, of which none has yet been shown.

Since no clear evidence has been introduced by the defendants to rebut the statements described above, this argument must therefore fall. In any event, if it is later shown that the Government's decision to use the Grand Jury for solely civil purposes occurred earlier than presently believed, then, in accordance with this Court's opinions filed herein, as above, defendants will be entitled to receive the Grand Jury transcript from that day on.

[Interpretation of Prior Supreme Court Case]

As to defendants' second argument that the disclosure to them of all the rest of the Grand Jury testimony would make clearer to them the meaning of the testimony subsequent to that of November 14, 1952, this is clearly insubstantial. As the Supreme Court has said, they can obtain this aid by deposition. The situation is not one showing "a particularized need", sufficient to lift the secrecy of Grand Jury proceedings, Procter & Gamble, p. 682.

The defendants finally contend that once the Government has been proven to have misused the Grand Jury to take evidence in a solely civil case, as it did here for the last week or so out of the Grand Jury sessions for well over a year, there should be a disclosure to them, not simply of the testimony during the period of this misuse, but of the entire period. They argue that such is the meaning of the final sentence in Procter & Gamble, p. 684:

> "It is only when the criminal procedure is subverted that 'good cause' for wholesale discovery and production of a Grand Jury transcript would be warranted."

However, the whole Court, including the dissenting Justices, apparently agree that if the Grand Jury proceedings had been instituted for a solely civil purpose, then, since the testimony should have been taken publicly and not privately, according to the statutory requirement, the entire Grand Jury transcript should be disclosed to the defendants.

> "The Court recognizes that had the Government's grand jury investigation been instituted solely in aid of a civil suit —that is without any thought of obtaining an indictment—the appellees would then have been entitled to see the entire grand jury transcript." Dissenting opinion, p. 689 (Italics this Court's).

On the other hand, if "the criminal procedure is subverted" at all, then wholesale, not entire, discovery of the transcript would be warranted. This allusion to wholesale discovery, because of the subversion of the criminal procedure, is contradistinguished by the Court in the majority opinion from its immediately preceding allusion to discovery for particularized cause shown. In short, Procter & Gamble holds that (a) if the Government's use of the Grand Jury has been completely wrong from the beginning, the "entire Grand Jury transcript" is discoverable to the defendants without the showing of other cause; (b) but if there is a subversion by the partial unlawful use of the Grand Jury for a purely civil purpose, then that portion of the transcript is to be discovered wholesale, without the showing of other particularized cause. Finally, (c) if the testimony is properly taken before the Grand Jury, then, before the defendants are entitled to any disclosure, they must show particularized good cause. As to the defendants' motion for full disclosure of the Grand Jury testimony, this Court therefore adheres to its opinions previously referred to herein.

[Motion Denied]

The motions of the defendants for suppression, for impounding, and for full disclosure, of the testimony before the Grand Jury here are therefore denied under the present proofs, save as already disclosed, and as indicated as to the deceased witness.

An order may be entered accordingly.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Counterclaim to Civil Damage Action—Entry of Judgment on One of Several Claims—Appealability—"No Just Reason for Delay"—Certification of Trial Judge.—A summary judgment granting a counterclaim for liquor bought and sold was entered before the final disposition of a civil damage action brought under the antitrust laws. The court found that there was "no just reason for delay" because the judgment (1) settled the counterclaim in its entirety, (2) concluded an issue which was completely separable from that raised in the complaint, and (3) would not impede the trial of the principal issue, since there was a stay of the enforcement of the judgment. Thus, entry of summary judgment on the counterclaim would simplify the issues and facilitate the conduct of the trial. Enforcement of the judgment was stayed, however, until judgment was entered on the issues raised by the complaint.

Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9015.12.

For the defendant: Wilson & McIlvaine (by K. F. Montgomery, G. E. Hale, and Peter A. Dammann), Chicago, Ill., for National Distillers and Chemical Corp., and Thomas C. McConnell and Francis J. McConnell, Chicago, Ill., for Gold Seal Liquors, Inc.

Memorandum on Motion of National Distillers and Chemical Corporation on its Motion for Summary Judgment on the Counterclaim

[Counterclaim—Motion for Judgment]

EDWIN A. ROBSON, District Judge [In full text]: Defendant National Distillers and Chemical Corporation has filed a counterclaim which after allowing a credit is for $192,966.22, and represents the balance due from plaintiff to defendant for liquor purchased. Invoices for the purchases are appended, and disclose none to have been for beer. Defendant has moved for summary judgment on the counterclaim (which was amended to allow a credit on the sum owed).

[Defenses to Counterclaim]

Plaintiff's answer to the counterclaim predicates a defense on the ground that a far greater sum is owed to plaintiff because of the defendant's violation of the antitrust acts; that no recovery may be had by defendant of plaintiff for the sums owed because the transactions arose out of defendant's acts in violation of the said statutes, and that a portion of the money sued for is based upon goods sold to the plaintiff more than 30 days after it first received credit and therefore not collectible under the laws of Illinois. It makes no defense, however, as to the accuracy of the amount claimed as owing, or denial of the existence of the debt.

["No Just Reason for Delay"]

Rule 54(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides for partial judgment thus:

> "When more than one claim for relief is presented in an action, . . . [or] as a . . . counterclaim, . . . the court may direct the entry of a final judgment upon one or more but less than all of the claims only upon an express determination that there is no just reason for delay and upon an express direction for the entry of judgment."

The Court is of the opinion that the decision in Kelly v. Kosuga [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,283], 358 U. S. 516, is determinative here of the right of defendant to a judgment upon its counterclaim, holding as it does that the affirmative defense of the buyer should be stricken, which defense to a suit for the unpaid balance due in respect to a lawful sale for a fair consideration, was to the effect that the sale was made pursuant to and as an indivisable part of an agreement which violated the Sherman Antitrust Act. The Court there said: (pp. 518, 520, 521)

> "As a defense to an action based on contract, the plea of illegality based on violation of the Sherman Act has not met with much favor in this Court. This has been notably the case where the plea has been made by a purchaser in an action to recover from him the agreed price of goods sold."
> "If the defense of illegality is to be allowed as a collateral method of enforcement of the antitrust laws, as the breadth of the petitioner's argument suggests, it must be said that his theory creates a very strange class of private attorneys general. . . . Past the point where the judgment of the Court would itself be enforcing the precise conduct made unlawful by the Act, the courts are to be guided by the overriding general policy, as Mr. Justice Holmes put it, 'of preventing people from getting other people's property for nothing when they purport to be buying it.'"
> "Supplying a sanction for the violation of the Act, not in terms provided and capricious in its operation, . . . is avoided by treating the defense as so confined."

[Separate Claim]

The Court is of the opinion that the counterclaim is a completely separate claim in this instance for goods bought and sold. The charges of the complaint pertaining to the alleged violations of the antitrust acts in the relationship between National Distillers and Chemical Corporation, and Gold Seal Liquors, Inc., which gave rise to alleged illegal preference to Gold Seal Liquors, Inc. to the great detriment of plaintiff, do not go to the fact that plaintiff bought and received, and is therefore liable to pay for the products sold to it by defendant, National Distillers and Chemical Corporation.

The Court believes the granting of this judgment on the counterclaim is not violative of the principle enunciated in Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc. v. Amana Refrigeration, Inc. [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,488] (No. 12669 decided October 20, 1959 by C. A. 7), wherein the Court of Appeals found an abuse of discretion in the granting of a certification that there was no just reason for delay in the entry of a final judgment on one of the three parts of the counterclaim. The established principle is to preclude piece-meal appeals and avoid delay in the trial of the principal claim or the remaining portions of the counterclaim. The Court found the judgment there did not in any way either simplify or facilitate the conduct of the future litigation. Such partial judgment should not be entered unless there is hardship or unfairness which would justify discretionary departure from the normal rule as to the time of the appeal.

[Grounds for Granting the Motion]

The granting of this summary judgment on the counterclaim settles the counterclaim in its entirety, and concludes an issue which is completely separable from that raised in the complaint. It is a simplification of the issues and does facilitate the conduct of the trial of the complaint. Nor will the entry of the judgment impede the trial of the principal issue since there will be a stay of the enforcement of the judgment. There is no just reason for a delay in the entry of this summary judgment. The only real defense raised by plaintiff to the counterclaim is that the Illinois statute makes a portion of the amount sought under the counterclaim uncollectible, being based upon goods sold more than 30 days after it first received credit. However, that statute (Chap. 43, Sec. 122) is expressly applicable to persons having a retailer's license, whereas plaintiff alleges in its complaint that it is a licensed wholesale distributor. There is a further provision in the same statute pertaining to the sale of beer on credit, but the invoices appended to the pleadings reveal that beer sales were not involved here.

[Stay of Enforcement]

The Court, however, directs a stay of the enforcement of the judgment upon the counterclaim, until judgment is entered upon the issues raised by the complaint. The stay is pursuant to Rule 62(h) which provides that where the court has ordered a final judgment on some, but not all, of the claims presented in the action, it may stay enforcement of that judgment until the entering of a subsequent judgment and may prescribe such conditions as are necessary to secure the benefit thereof to the party in whose favor the judgment is entered.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Damage Action—Pretrial Procedures—Dismissal of Complaint.—A complaint which made the following allegation failed to state any cause of action against one defendant since it failed to allege any act of the defendant on which any liability or claim may be predicated: "That the defendants and each of them jointly and severally, each with the others or some of the others herein mentioned, . . . did commit certain acts and did enter into certain arrangements, proposals and negotiations which were in direct violation of law, including the establishment and carrying out of certain acts which were in direct violation of antitrust laws . . ." However, the plaintiff was permitted to serve an amended complaint which alleges some claim against this defendant.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.440.

For the plaintiff: Jacob Rassner, New York, N. Y.

For the defendants: Sullivan & Cromwell for Robert Garrett & Sons; Lundgren, Lincoln & McDaniel for El Paso Natural Gas Co.; and Richard Brill for Republic Steel Corp.; all of New York, N. Y.

[Motion to Dismiss]

LEVET, District Judge [In full text]: This is a motion by the defendant Robert Garrett & Sons made pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to dismiss the complaint herein on the ground that it fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted against such defendant.

[Charges]

This action, which if we judge by the addendum clause of the complaint, is for breach of contract and other wrongful acts of the defendants.

[References to Defendant]

The only references in the complaint to the defendant Robert Garrett & Sons are contained in Paragraph Eleventh, Twelfth, Forty-first, Forty-third and Forty-fourth. These paragraphs read as follows:

"ELEVENTH: That at all the times hereinafter mentioned, the defendant, ROBERT GARRETT, was domiciled in and a resident of the State of Maryland, and a resident of the State of New York where he also maintained an office at the address of the defendant ROBERT GARRETT & SONS in the Borough of Manhattan, City and State of New York." (Italics added.)

"TWELFTH: That at all the times hereinafter mentioned, the defendant ROBERT GARRETT & SONS was a partnership duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Maryland, with offices and principal place of business in the City of Baltimore, State of Maryland, and in the Borough of Manhattan, City and State of New York." (Italic added.)

"FOURTH-FIRST: That the defendants REPUBLIC STEEL CORPORATION, EL PASO NATURAL GAS COMPANY, AMERICAN STEEL & TUBE CORPORATION, GATHMANN ENGINEERING CORPORATION, GATHMANN RESEARCH INC., PAUL KAYSER, MARK H. GATHMANN, EMIL A. GATHMANN, ROBERT GARRETT, ROBERT GARRETT & SONS, HARRISON GARRETT, JOSEPH OLIVER, RICHARD M. TAYLOR, ARTHUR BENEKAMPER, jointly and severally, fraudulently, unlawfully, illegally, wilfully and with the intent of preventing the plaintiff from obtaining the benefits of his services, individually and collectively, one with all or some of the others of the defendants herein mentioned, conspired to negotiate deals, agreements, purchase and sale orders, and otherwise acted wrongfully and unlawfully, with the result that the benefits of the plaintiff's services were obtained and utilized by the defendants individually and collectively, and the plaintiff's services not paid for nor was the plaintiff compensated in anywise for performing under the terms of the contract or otherwise." (Italics added.)

"FORTY-THIRD: That the defendants and each of them jointly and severally, each with the others or some of the others herein mentioned, in their efforts to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining payment for his services did commit certain acts and did enter into certain arrangements, proposals and negotiations which were in direct violation of law, including the establishment and carrying out of certain acts which were in direct violation of antitrust laws of the United States, commonly known as the Clayton-Sherman Acts." (Italics added.)

"FORTY-FOURTH: That the defendants and each of them jointly and severally, each acting in concert with all or some of the said defendants herein named, have by subterfuge, creation of dummy corporations, transfer of assets and otherwise, improperly, unlawfully and illegally prevented the plaintiff from collecting for the value of his services the money due him under the contract aforementioned and/or any value for his services and/or collecting the monies due him pursuant to the provisions of the judgment heretofore mentioned in paragraph THIRTY-SEVENTH." (Italics added.)

Obviously, Paragraphs ELEVENTH and TWELFTH do not allege any liability.

[Holding]

It is patent that there is no allegation of any act made against Robert Garrett & Sons on which any liability or claim may be predicated. Therefore, insofar as said defendant is concerned, the complaint must be dismissed with leave, however, to the plaintiff, if he sees fit, to serve an amended complaint which alleges some claim against said defendant Robert Garrett & Sons.

Settle order on notice.

Ohio Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Injunctive Relief—Dissolution of Temporary Injunction—Remedy for Defendant—Effect of Unconstitutionality of Nonsigner Clause.—While an Ohio trial court properly vacated a temporary injunction against a nonsigner after the nonsigner provision of the Fair Trade Act had been declared unconstitutional, it erred in failing to accord the defendant wholesaler the opportunity to present evidence at a hearing upon the issue of whether the injunction should or should not have been granted, as a determination of this issue would be a prerequisite to defendant's recovery in an independent action for damages on the injunction bond.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3350.

For the appellees: Farber, Cochrane, Green & Schrader; and Edward A. McNeill.

For the appellants: Eliot L. Kaplan and Harland M. Britz.

[Fair Trade—Dissolution of Injunction]

Fess, Judge [In full text]: These appeals come to this court on questions of law from the following similar orders entered by the Common Pleas Court in each of the three cases:

"This day this cause came on to be considered by the court upon its own motion and it appearing to the court that at the time of the issuance of the temporary order herein, the Ohio Fair Trade Act, Section 133.05 [sic], et seq. Ohio Revised Code (originally enacted as Section 6402-2, et seq., Ohio Revised [sic] Code, effective July 9, 1936) was, by decisions and judgments of courts of record of this state, including the Court of Appeals of Lake County, Ohio, in Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. Bargain Fair, Inc., et al., No. 568, constitutional in all respects and that, consequently, the temporary order entered herein on November 18, 1957, was proper in view of the evidence submitted and the authorities cited to the court and should have been granted; that by decision and judgment entered by the Supreme Court of Ohio on January 22, 1958, in Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. Bargain Fair, Inc., et al., 167 Ohio St., 182, the nonsigner provisions of said act were declared unconstitutional; and it further appearing to the court that only the nonsigner provisions of said act are in issue herein, the defendants being nonsigners, the court is of the opinion and finds that the temporary order entered herein should be vacated, the injunction bond cancelled and the surety discharged, and this cause dismissed at plaintiff's costs with no final record. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the temporary order entered herein on November 18, 1957, be, and it hereby is, vacated; that the injunction bond filed herein by the plaintiff be, and it hereby is, cancelled and the surety discharged; and that this cause be, and it hereby is, dismissed at plaintiff's costs; no final record. To all of which the defendants except."

[Temporary Injunction]

In November 1957, temporary injunctions were granted ex parte enjoining the defendants from selling at retail any of the products of the several plaintiffs at prices which are less than the minimum retail resale price stipulated by the plaintiffs pursuant to agreements alleged in the petitions. The agreements alleged in the petition relate to contracts between the several plaintiffs and retailers (not necessarily the defendants) made pursuant to the provisions of Section 1333.06, Revised Code.

Injunction bonds in the sum of $1,000 each were furnished to secure the payment

> "to the defendant of all damages he may sustain by reason of the injunction in this action, if it be finally decided that the said injunction ought not to have been granted."

In cases Nos. 5133 and 5134, on November 26, 1957, motions to dissolve the injunctions were filed without supporting affidavits as contemplated by the provisions of Section 2727.14, Revised Code.

The motions to dissolve the injunctions and also motions to show cause for contempt in seven similar cases came on for hearing on December 13, 1957. (Pending the appeals, four of the seven cases were settled and the appeals dismissed.) This hearing was only upon arguments of counsel and was continued from time to time until April 1, 1958.

[Nonsigner Clause Unconstitutional]

In the meantime, on January 22, 1958, the Supreme Court of Ohio, in Union Carbide & Carbon Corp. v. Bargain Fair, Inc. [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 68,920], 167 Ohio St., 182, 147 N. E. (2d), 481, held that the nonsigner provisions of the Fair Trade Act were unconstitutional.

At the hearing on April 1st, counsel for the defendant asserted that, incident to the vacation of the temporary injunction, a finding be made that the order should not have been granted. Again, this hearing was confined to arguments of counsel. Toward the conclusion of the hearing, the court announced that it would dissolve the temporary restraining orders, dismiss the plaintiffs' cases and discharge the bonds and the sureties thereon. At the conclusion of the hearing, counsel for defendants stated that defendants in their claims for damages might be prejudiced by the fact that the order was made on the court's own motion rather than upon the plaintiffs' motion. On July 23, 1958, the cases came on for further hearing upon the settlement of the journal entries. Counsel for defendants objected to that part of the entries submitted by the plaintiffs in effect stating that the temporary restraining order should have been granted in view of the evidence submitted to the court, and stated:

> "If the court is inclined to make that kind of a determination, then it ought to be on the basis of evidence which is submitted not only for the plaintiffs, but also evidence which the defendants would like to submit and, therefore, there ought to be a hearing before the court makes that kind of a finding in the journal entry. Then the defendant ought to be entitled to cross-examine the witnesses who are proposing to have presented the evidence upon which the court is making the finding, and the defendants ought to be entitled to submit their evidence as to whether or not this temporary restraining order should or should not have been granted.
> "On this question of evidence as to whether it should or should not have been granted, I think it is well to remind the court that all of these restraining orders were granted ex parte without notice and without hearing, so that there was no evidence ever introduced by the defendants.
> "Now, I think I ought to say, too, that if the court intends to file or approve the plaintiffs' entry, I would like to make several requests. One is I would like to have a hearing at which we could make up a record so that when and if we went to the Court of Appeals, the whole record of what transpired in connection with all matters on the proposed plaintiffs' entry would be supported or not supported by evidence."

After the court indicated that the entries submitted by plaintiffs with several minor modifications would be approved, counsel for defendants further stated:

> "As modified after hearing thereon, the defendants request that this cause be set down for a further hearing for the purpose of giving the defendant an opportunity to introduce evidence in support of their contention that the temporary restraining order should not have been granted.
> "And I assume that—are you, or not, going to grant a hearing for that purpose?
>
> "The Court: I don't think I have any authority; the case is closed; the cause is dismissed."

[Defendant's Remedies]

Upon the dissolution of a temporary injunction, the defendant has alternative remedies of proceeding by way of a cross-petition in the injunction action or by the filing of an independent action for damages sustained, if it is finally decided that the injunction should not have been granted. A plaintiff, having invoked the jurisdiction of a court of equity by a proceeding in injunction, the court may determine all issues arising in the case, including one on a cross-petition by the defendant for damages by reason of the injunction, or leave the parties to an action at law upon the injunction bond. Gray v. Gordon, 12 Ohio App., 428, citing Roberts v. Dust, 4 Ohio St., 503, and Commercial Tribune Building Co. v. Rapid Electrotype Co., 13 C. C. (N. S.), 559, 23 C. D., 475. As a prerequisite to recovery, it must have been decided that the injunction ought not to have been granted. Krug v. Bishop, 44 Ohio St., 221, 6 N. E., 252; Columbus, Hocking Valley & Toledo Ry. Co. v. Burke, 54 Ohio St., 98, 43 N. E., 282. Cf. Section 2727.07, Revised Code. But with respect to an independent action for damages on the bond it has been held that the dismissal of the petition for injunction and the dissolution thereof are conclusive evidence that the injunction ought not to have been granted, and that in absence of fraud or collusion, the defendants are concluded by the judgment in the injunction proceeding and can not re-open the questions which were the subject matter of the injunction proceeding. Berkey Farmers' Mutual Telephone Co. v. Sylvania Home Telephone Co., 97 Ohio St., 67, 119 N. E., 140. Cf. Gray v. Gordon, supra, and 29 Ohio Jurisprudence (2d), 465.

[Jurisdiction of Court]

It seems clear that the court in the case in which the temporary injunction is issued has jurisdiction, upon its dissolution, in his discretion, to determine whether or not the injunction was properly granted. In the absence of a claim for damages upon the bond, it would appear to be the better practice to dissolve the injunction without prejudice to any claim for damages, and to refrain from cancelling the bond. The procedure incident to seeking dissolution of a temporary injunction is prescribed by Section 2727.14, Revised Code, reading as follows:

"When an injunction has been granted before trial, a party may apply to the court in which the action is pending, or a judge thereof, to vacate or modify such injunction. The party applying for such vacation or modification shall give to the adverse party such notice of the time and place at which the motion will be heard as the court or judge finds reasonable. The application may be made upon the petition and affidavits on which the injunction was granted, or upon affidavits on the part of the party enjoined, with or without answer.

"When, on the part of the defendant, the application is made upon affidavits, but not otherwise, the plaintiff may oppose it by affidavits or other evidence, in addition to the evidence on which the injunction was granted."

The record upon these appeals discloses that affidavits were not filed in support of or contra the motion to dissolve the temporary injunction. Although the statute does not so provide in specific terms, it seems to be apparent that when the question whether the injunction should or should not have been granted is raised, the decision thereon cannot be made without the reception of evidence upon request being made therefor.

[Hearing Necessary]

It is conceivable that in support of his application to dissolve the injunction, defendant might show that as a matter of fact he did not violate the provisions of the Fair Trade Act. Therefore, without deciding the question as to whether the subsequent declaration that the act was unconstitutional would support a decision that the injunction should or should not have been granted prior to the declaration of unconstitutionality, we find that the court erred in failing to accord the appellant an opportunity to present evidence at a hearing upon such issue and that the orders should be reversed and the cases be remanded for further proceedings.

Orders reversed.

[2] The referred to section of the Clayton Act, to wit: 15 U. S. C. § 15, reads as follows: "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

erty; that as a result of said conspiracy in restraint of trade plaintiff was directly injured in his business as follows, cancellation of leases for series of lectures in various auditoriums, made to endure false and illegal arrests, exposed to abuse of judicial process, subjected to unlawful search and seizure, frequently libeled, slandered and defamed, suffered destruction of personal property, and other wrongs.

[Service of Process]

The Marshal's return indicates service of summons and complaint as follows:

Marilyn Ferguson, personally, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, J. Alex. Zehner, personally, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Allegheny County Medical Association by service on its President, David Katz, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Gilbert Cloonan, personally, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, American Medical Association by service on Dr. Francis P. Boland, Scranton, Pennsylvania.

No service of any sort was made on any of the other defendants.

[Venue Motions]

Defendants Marilyn Ferguson, J. Alex. Zehner, Gilbert Cloonan, Allegheny County Medical Association, and American Medical Association have filed motions to dismiss for improper venue.[3]

Plaintiff, Adolph Hohensee, filed an affidavit of bias and prejudice against Honorable John W. Murphy, Chief Judge of this Court, whereupon the case was transferred to the writer of this Memorandum and Order.

In support of their motions to dismiss, defendants Marilyn Ferguson and J. Alex Zehner filed affidavits under Rule 43(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure setting forth that they reside in Allegheny County, Western District of Pennsylvania; that they do not reside in, have no agent for purpose of serving process or other purpose, are not engaged in business and have not been served with process in the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

Defendant Allegheny County Medical Society filed affidavit under Rule 43(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure setting forth that it is a corporation organized under the Nonprofit Corporation Law of Pennsylvania; that its only place of business is within the County of Allegheny in the Western District; that it has no place of business within the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

Defendant American Medical Association filed affidavit under Rule 43(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure setting forth, inter alia, that it is organized as an Illinois corporation under the "General Not for Profit Corporation Act" of that State; that it does not engage in business in Pennsylvania, and has no officer or agent authorized to receive process of service in Pennsylvania; that Dr. Francis P. Boland on whom service was made on behalf of said Association, while a member is not an officer or agent authorized to receive service of process.

[No Venue]

In the light of the unanswered affidavits in support of the Ferguson and Zehner motions, it is apparent that there is no venue jurisdiction in this District as to said defendants under the provisions of 15 U. S. C. § 15.

In the light of the unanswered affidavits in support of the Allegheny County Medical Society and the American Medical Association motions, it is apparent that there is no venue jurisdiction in this District under the provisions of 15 U. S. C. § 22.[4] See also Hohensee v. Akron Beacon Journal Publishing Company et al., 1959, D. C. N. D. Ohio, 171 F. Supp. 90. And in addition thereto, in so far as American Medical Association is concerned, the service on Dr. Francis P. Boland was an improper service, completely abortive, and must be set aside.

While no affidavit was filed on behalf of Gilbert Cloonan, the record shows that he

[3] Motion to dismiss was also filed by Board of Managers of Soldiers and Sailors Memorial Hall of Allegheny County. This motion is disregarded for the reason that the Marshal's return does not indicate any service of summons and complaint on this movant.

[4] 15 U. S. C. § 22 provides:
"Any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found."

was served in the Western District of Pennsylvania, and plaintiff has not contended that the said Cloonan was a resident of, or had a place of business, or was found in the Middle District of Pennsylvania.

Normally this might present the problem of whether to dismiss as to Ferguson, Zehner, Cloonan, and Allegheny County Medical Association because of improper venue or to transfer to the Western District of Pennsylvania. However, fully determinative of any such questions, for the reasons stated by this Court in Hohensee v. Goon Squad et al., (March 19, 1959) [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,313] 171 F. Supp. 562, the complaint must, in any event, be dismissed as to all parties defendant on the ground that plaintiff has failed to state a claim on which relief can be granted.

Order

NOW, to wit: November 11, 1959, in accordance with Memorandum filed this date, It is Ordered and Decreed that service of process on American Medical Association be and the same is hereby set aside.

It is further Ordered and Decreed that the complaint as to all parties defendant be and the same is hereby dismissed for the reason that it fails to state a claim on which relief can be granted.

In the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania. Civil Action No. 6016. Dated November 11, 1959.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Damage Action—Pretrial Procedures—Motion to Dismiss.—A complaint alleging that federal judicial and penal officials conspired to destroy and impoverish the plaintiff by wrongfully convicting, doping, drugging, and plotting to murder plaintiff's husband, all in violation of the Clayton Act, was dismissed for failure to state a cause of action. The reasons for granting the motions to dismiss are found in Hohensee v. Goon Squad, et al. [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,313]. Frederick V. Follmer, District Judge [In full text]: The plaintiffs in this action[1] are Mildred Hohensee, Richard Roe No. 1 and Richard Roe No. 2. The defendants are listed as follows: Albert L. Watson; American Medical Association its officers and members, John Doe No. 1 through No. 4; J. Julius Levy; Stephen Teller; George Clark, and John Doe No. 1 through No. 3.

The complaint alleges that the action is brought under 15 U. S. C. § 15[2] and in it the plaintiffs seek treble damages in the sum of Ten Million Dollars. The complaint further alleges "The grounds upon which the jurisdiction of this Court depends is that this is an action to protect trade and commerce against restraints and monopolies."

[1] This is one of a group of six cases filed in this Court by Adolph Hohensee or Mildred Hohensee, his wife, as follows: No. 5860 on February 25, 1957; No. 5869 on March 4, 1957; No. 5897 on April 10, 1957; No. 5949 on May 17, 1957; No. 5972 on June 24, 1957, and No. 6016 on July 30, 1957. They all stem from, and have a direct relation to, the conviction, sentence and imprisonment in and by this Court of the said Adolph Hohensee of misbranding of drugs in interstate commerce. See United States of America v. El Rancho Adolphus Products, Inc., et al., 1956, D. C. M. D. Pa., 140 F. Supp. 645, aff. 243 F. 2d 367.

C. § 15, reads as follows: "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee."

The complaint is captioned "Conspiracy To Murder Adolphus Hohensee and Waiver of Murder Responsibility."

[Allegations]

The complaint further alleges that at all times mentioned in the complaint plaintiffs were engaged in the business of lecturing and selling products in interstate commerce. The complaint further alleges that the conspirators named as defendants in order to destroy and impoverish plaintiff, Mildred Hohensee, have done the unlawful acts therein complained of, namely, doping and drugging Adolphus Hohensee, husband of plaintiff Mildred Hohensee, while serving a sentence in Federal Penitentiary,[3] plotting to murder the said Adolphus Hohensee with narcotics; that the conspirators caused the wrongful conviction of said Adolphus Hohensee, resulting in a sentence of one year and one day in a Federal Penitentiary, for sending pure, wholesome and unadulterated food items such as whole wheat from Scranton, Pennsylvania, to Denver, Colorado; that as a result of said conspiracy in restraint of trade, plaintiff was directly injured and damaged in her business, profession, or otherwise, as follows: cancellation of leases for lectures in various auditoriums, was slandered and defamed, suffered destruction of personal property, suffered physical pain and mental anguish and monetary loss resulting from the physical and mental torture and wrongful confinement of her innocent husband, and other wrongs and injuries done to plaintiff.

American Medical Association was not served with process.

[Grounds for Motions]

Defendants Albert L. Watson, J. Julius Levy, Stephen Teller and George Clark have filed motions to dismiss on the grounds: (1) lack of jurisdiction of the subject matter; (2) lack of jurisdiction of the persons, and (3) failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted.

[Scandalous Matter]

Defendant Clark also filed motion to strike the complaint on the grounds: (1) allegations of complaint are impertinent and scandalous; (2) allegations of complaint are so absurd and preposterous that they constitute an affront to the dignity of this Court and represent a gross abuse of a plaintiff's privilege to bring suit in a court of law.

Plaintiff, Mildred Hohensee, filed an affidavit of bias and prejudice against Honorable John W. Murphy, Chief Judge of this Court, whereupon the case was transferred to the writer of this Memorandum and Order.

[Motions Granted]

For the reasons stated by this Court in Hohensee v. Goon Squad, et al., (March 19, 1959) [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,313] 171 F. Supp. 562, the motions to dismiss must be granted on the ground that plaintiffs have failed to state a claim on which relief can be granted.[4]

I further conclude that the complaint should be stricken from the record as scandalous.[5]

Motions to dismiss the complaint and to strike it from the record are granted.

A large number of motions were filed by plaintiffs. In the light of the above mentioned Memorandum, most of the motions, in any event, would be moot.[6]

All motions filed by plaintiffs are denied.

[3] The facts of the case referred to in which Judge Watson was the sentencing judge and J. Julius Levy and Stephen A. Teller were the United States Attorney and Assistant United States Attorney in charge of the prosecution, respectively, are fully set forth in United States of America v. El Rancho Adolphus Products, Inc., et al., 1956, D. C. M. D. Pa., 140 F. Supp. 645.

FREDERICK V. FOLLMER, District Judge [In full text]: This complaint[1] alleges that the action is brought under 15 U. S. > "The ground upon which the jurisdiction of this court depends is that this is an action to protect trade and commerce against restraints and monopolies."

The complaint also alleges that at all times mentioned in the complaint plaintiff was engaged in the business of lecturing and selling products in interstate commerce; that defendants entered into a conspiracy in restraint of trade and commerce between the several states consisting of libel, slander and other illegal acts; that as a result of said conspiracy in restraint of trade, plaintiff was directly injured and damaged in his business as follows: cancellations of leases for series of lectures, exposed to abuse of judicial process, frequently libeled, slandered and defamed, suffered destruction of personal property, and other wrongs or injuries done to plaintiff.

[Grounds for Dismissal]

Defendants have filed motion to dismiss on the following grounds:

New York Fair Trade (Feld-Crawford) Act

Fair Trade—Enforcement of Fair Trade Prices—Contempt—Motion for Examination of Defendant.—A motion to examine a defendant before proceeding with a contempt action was granted in order to permit plaintiff to attempt to tie defendant to sales which violated a fair trade injunction. Although the defendant had sublet the premises on which the offending sales were made, and the sublessee corporation had in turn sublet to another corporation, the plaintiff alleged, and it was not denied, that the defendant's president was a director of the subleasing company. Since the contempt action would turn on whether the defendant "participated in or controlled" the company that made the sales, and since the relevant facts concerning any such relationship were within the peculiar knowledge of the defendant, a preliminary examination was in order.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3380.34.

[Fair Trade Action]

LEVY, Justice [In full text]: The plaintiff duly obtained a final judgment permanently enjoining the defendant "and each and all of its officers, agents, servants and employees and each and every person and instrumentality affiliated with, or subsidiary to, acting in concert with, or subject to the control of the defendant" from "directly, or indirectly advertising, offering for sale or selling within the State of New York" any of the plaintiff's trade marked drug or cosmetic products at less than the prices established therefor by the plaintiff pursuant to statute (General Business Law, sections 369-a et seq). Thereafter, the plaintiff secured an order requiring the defendant to show cause why it should not be punished for contempt for violating the judgment by selling plaintiff's fair-traded products below their established retail sales prices. The application thereon has not yet come before the court for argument.

The plaintiff's allegations of contempt are denied by the defendant. It appears that the defendant sublet a part of its premises to Soljac Realty Corporation, which in turn sublet to Shelbac Sales Corporation, the entity which, it is asserted by the defendant, owns and operates the drug business at the defendant's premises, and that it is Shelbac—with which the defendant has no connection whatever—that is responsible for the cut-price sales alleged in the moving papers. The plaintiff alleges (and it is not denied) that the defendant's president is an organizer and director of Soljac, but that is as far as the plaintiff's proof goes at the present time.

The plaintiff has now moved before me to examine the defendant, pursuant to section 293 of the Civil Practice Act, preliminary to proceeding with the contempt application. The plaintiff seeks information, by way of this proposed examination, to tie in the defendant with the alleged sales, and thereby—to use the language of section 293—"to carry the judgment into effect." The contempt proceedings will turn, of course, upon whether or not the defendant participated in or controlled the actions of the concern that sold the product below the fair-trade price. Obviously, the relevant facts concerning such relationship, if any, are within the peculiar knowledge of the defendant.

The defendant contends that the instant application should be denied as unnecessarily duplicative, since the hearing of the issues on the contempt motion will most likely be referred to an official referee, and the examination can then be had at the same time that the proof is presented. The three cases cited by the defendant in support of its contention are clearly distinguishable. Greer v. Greer, 147 N. Y. S. 2d 724* and Weiss v. Weiss (58 N. Y. S. 2d 396), were matrimonial controversies, and, moreover, references had already been ordered there, during the course of which proceedings the referee in each case would have the opportunity, in effect, to take the defendant's deposition before him. The case at bar, on the other hand, involves a commercial controversy, and also no hearing or reference has been ordered in the contempt proceeding and there is no assurance that one will be. In Bissell Carpet Sweeper Company v. Mann (N. Y. L. J., December 24, 1957, Supreme Court, N. Y. County, Special Term, Part I, Markewich, J.), also cited by the defendant, the court denied the motion for the post-judgment examination of the defendant because the evidence sought was not essential in proving the contempt itself but went only to the wilfulness of the contempt and the nature of the fine to be imposed—which is not the issue here at this time (cf. Buckley v. Buckley, 206 Misc. 981, 982-983; Kirshner v. Kirshner, 7 App. Div. 2d 202; but see Hurwitz v. Hurwitz, 3 App. Div. 2d 744).

The disposition of a motion of this character rests in the sound discretion of the court. In my view, a sufficient showing has been made that the examination will aid in the enforcement of the judgment and permit the plaintiff effectively to prepare for the contempt proceedings (see Scheffer v. Scheffer, 183 Misc., 344). It may be that the motion to punish should not have been initiated until after the desired proof had ben procured by the plaintiff; but, in view of the fact that the sales complained of were made in the same premises, it is not surprising that the plaintiff believed that it was the defendant, directly or indirectly, who made the sales. It may be that the facts obtained by the plaintiff on the examination—if they sufficiently support the defendant's denials—will result in the withdrawal of the contempt application.

Accordingly, the motion is granted, and the defendant, by an officer, director or employee having knowledge of the facts, is directed to appear and submit to examination, pursuant to section 293 of the Civil Practice Act, at Special Term, Part II, of this court on November 30, 1959, at 10 A. M., at which time pertinent books and records are to be produced for use pursuant to section 296 of the Civil Practice Act.

[¶ 69,564] Allied Properties v. Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control of the State of California.

In the Supreme Court of the State of California. In Bank. S. F. 20236. Filed November 30, 1959.

California Alcoholic Beverages Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Mandatory Fair Trading of Liquor Under California Beverages Act—Constitutionality—Alleged Delegation of Legislative Power.—Constitutionality of the California Alcoholic Beverage Fair Trade Act and Rule 99 of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Department, which provided that all retail sales of distilled spirits and wines must be made pursuant to fair trade contracts filed with the Department, was upheld against charges that they constituted improper exercise of the police power and an unlawful delegation of legislative power. There was no improper exercise of the police power, for the reasons that a state has particularly wide powers with respect to the manufacture of, and traffic in, alcoholic beverages; that the object sought to be attained, the prevention of intemperance, is a proper legislative purpose; and that statutes regulating prices and restricting freedom to bargain bear a reasonable and substantial relation to such an object. The classification made by the legislature in regulating retail prices without regulating wholesale prices was reasonable since the legislature could properly conclude that competition among the large number of retailers, who sell directly to the consumers, was necessary to prevent selling practices tending to increase sales and consumption of alcoholic beverages. There was no unlawful delegation of legislative power, as urged, since the acts of private parties entering into such contracts were the facts in contemplation of which the legislature acted. The fact that the Alcoholic Beverage Fair Trade Act differed from the General Fair Trade Act in that it required, rather than permitted, producers and wholesalers to set retail prices did not warrant a different conclusion.

Reversing decision of the California District Court of Appeal, 1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,401.

For the petitioner-respondent: Steinhart, Goldberg, Feigenbaum & Ladar, San Francisco, Calif.

For the defendant-appellant: Stanley Mosk, Attorney General, and Charles A. Barrett, Deputy, San Francisco, Calif.

Gibson, Chief Justice [In full text]: Allied Properties was accused of violating sections 55.5, 55.6 and 55.65 of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act and rule 99 of the State Board of Equalization by advertising and offering to sell at retail distilled spirits and wines at prices less than the minimum resale prices provided for by fair trade contracts filed with the board.[1] (Subsequently the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control became the constitutional successor of the board with regard to liquor control (Const., art. XX, § 22, as amended in 1954), and it has been substituted as the defendant herein. For convenience we shall refer to the statutes as they appeared before codification, and we shall use the word "department" in referring to the administrative body in charge of liquor control.) Allied's off-sale general license was suspended for 15 days, and in mandamus proceedings to review the suspension order the superior court determined that the provisions of the act and the rule cited above were invalid. This appeal followed. The facts are not disputed, and the sole question raised is whether the provisions are constitutional.

[Applicable Statutes and Regulation]

Section 55.5 (Stats. 1937, ch. 758, p. 2173, now Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 24750-24753) authorizes fair trade contracts prohibiting the buyer from reselling, except at the price stipulated by the seller, alcoholic beverages which bear the trade-mark or name of the producer and are in open competition with others of the same general class. The section further provides that wilfully advertising, offering to sell, or selling, at less than the price stipulated in such contracts, whether or not the actor is a party to the contract, is unfair competition and actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby. The statute expressly excludes from its operation any agreement between producers, between wholesalers, or between retailers as to sale or resale prices.[2]

Section 55.6 (Stats. 1947, ch. 657, p. 1698, now Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 24754-24757) provides that all retail sales of distilled spirits shall be made pursuant to fair trade contracts entered into under section 55.5 and prohibits the violation of such contracts. The section also provides that all manufacturers and wholesalers of distilled spirits shall file and maintain with the department a list of the prices at which their product will be sold to retailers and that all their sales to retailers shall be in compliance with those lists.

Section 55.65 (Stats. 1949, ch. 574, p. 1064, now Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 24850-24881), sets forth numerous provisions applicable to the sales of wine. It includes provisions like those governing the sales of distilled spirits except that the prices at which retailers are required to sell to consumers are to be determined either by fair trade contracts or by resale price lists filed by the manufacturer or wholesaler with the department.[3]

[1] The Alcoholic Beverage Control Act (Stats. 1935, ch. 330, p. 1123, as amended; 2 Deering's Gen. Laws, 1944, Act 3796) is now contained in Division 9 of the Business & Professions Code. The codification did not alter the substantive law in any respect material to this case, and no relevant changes have been made in rule 99, which is now a rule of the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control.

[2] The provisions of this section correspond exactly with those of the general Fair Trade Act enacted in 1931. (Stats. 1931, ch. 278, p. 583, now Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 16900-16905.)

[3] No violation of the provision for price lists is involved here.

Rule 99 provides in part that no manufacturer or wholesaler shall sell distilled spirits except pursuant to a fair trade contract as provided for by section 55.5 of the act, that copies of such fair trade contracts shall be filed with the department, and that no licensee shall advertise or offer for sale alcoholic beverages at retail at a price less than the minimum resale price provided for by a fair trade contract filed with the department pursuant to this rule. (Cal. Admin. Code, tit. 4, § 99, subds. (a), (b), (f).)

Under section 22 of article XX of the Constitution the department has power in its discretion to revoke any liquor license if it determines for good cause that the continuance of such license will be contrary to public welfare or morals. The power to revoke includes the lesser power to suspend. (Reynolds v. State Board of Equalization, 29 Cal. 2d 137, 140.) In the exercise of its discretion the department can properly consider substantial violations of statutory provisions concerning alcoholic beverages or of rules of the department as good cause for suspension of licenses, and in the present case there is no contention that, if the statutes and rules violated are valid, the suspension constitutes an abuse of discretion. Moreover, with respect to wine, it is provided by statute that the department can suspend licenses in the event of a prohibited sale and can, upon a third violation, revoke them. (Alcoholic Beverage Control Act, § 55.65, subd. (n), now Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24880.) [4] Further, a rule of the department provides that a violation of its rules and regulations by a licensee will be deemed contrary to public welfare and morals and grounds for suspension or revocation of a license. (Cal. Admin. Code, tit. 4, § 1.) Although no criminal prosecution is involved here, it should be noted that the act contains a general provision, applicable to prohibited sales of alcoholic beverages, that violations for which another penalty is not specifically provided in the act constitute misdemeanors punishable by a fine, a jail term, or both. (Alcoholic Beverage Control Act, § 65, now Bus. & Prof. Code, § 25617.)

In passing upon the fair trade provisions we must be guided by the well-settled principles that the presumption is in favor of constitutionality and that the invalidity of an act of the Legislature must be clear before the statute can be declared unconstitutional. It is not our province to weigh the desirability of the social or economic policy underlying the statute or to question its wisdom; they are purely legislative matters.

[Police Power]

Where, as here, it is urged that a statute does not constitute a proper exercise of the police power, the inquiry of the court is limited to determining whether the object of the statute is one for which that power may legitimately be invoked and, if so, whether the statute bears a reasonable and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained. (Wholesale T. Dealers v. National etc. Co., 11 Cal. 2d 634, 643.) Acting under this rule, the courts have upheld statutes regulating prices and restricting the freedom to bargain. (Wholesale T. Dealers v. National etc. Co. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,191] 11 Cal. 2d 634, 651-656; Max Factor & Co. v. Kunsman, 5 Cal. 2d 446, 459-462; Nebbia v. New York, 291 U. S. 502, 529 et seq.) A state has particularly wide powers with respect to the manufacture of and traffic in alcoholic beverages and may provide for their prohibition or impose such conditions and regulations as it may deem proper. (Ziffrin, Inc. v. Reeves, 308 U. S. 132, 138-139; Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 91.) The same broad powers are recognized in section 22 of article XX of the California Constitution.[5] (Sandelin v. Collins, 1 Cal. 2d 147, 153.)

[4] There was no comparable provision with respect to distilled spirits in January 1953, when the accusation was filed, but there is now a general suspension and revocation provision which is applicable to prohibited sales of distilled spirits. (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 24200, subd. (b).)

[5] Section 22 of Article XX of the California Constitution reads in part: "The State of California, subject to the Internal Revenue Laws of the United States, shall have the exclusive right and power to license and regulate the manufacture, sale, purchase, possession and transportation of intoxicating liquor within the State, and subject to the laws of the United States regulating commerce between foreign nations and among the states shall have the exclusive right and power to regulate the importation into and exportation from the State, of intoxicating liquor. . . . The Legislature may authorize, subject to reasonable restrictions, the sale in retail stores of liquor contained in the original packages, where such liquor is not to be consumed on the premises where sold. . . ."

Many states have adopted price regulating measures intended to prevent retail price cutting and bargain sales of alcoholic beverages and the evils considered to follow from those practices, namely, excessive purchase and use of liquor and disruption of orderly marketing conditions. Where the constitutionality of such measures has been challenged, most courts have upheld them. (Gipson v. Morley [Ark.], 233 S. W. 2d 79, 83; Schwartz v. Kelly [Conn.], 99 A. 2d 89, 91; Reeves v. Simons [Ky.], 160 S. W. 2d 149, 151; Supreme Malt Prod. Co. v. Alcoholic Beverages Con. Com'n [Mass.], 133 N. E. 2d 775, 778; Dundalk Liquor Co. v. Tawes [Md.], 92 A. 2d 560, 561; Butler Oak Tavern v. Div. of Alcoholic Bev. Con. [N. J.], 120 A. 2d 24, 30; Gaine v. Burnett [N. J.], 4 A. 2d 37, 39; Pompei Winery v. Board of Liquor Control [Ohio], 149 N. E. 2d 733, 748. But cf. Scarborough v. Webb's Cut Rate Drug Co. [Fla.], 8 So. 2d 913, 921; Schwegmann Bros. v. Louisiana Board, etc. [La.], 43 So. 2d 248, 259.)

The Alcoholic Beverage Control Act states that it was enacted

> "for the protection of the safety, welfare, health, peace, and morals of the people of the State, to eliminate the evils of unlicensed and unlawful manufacture, selling, and disposing of alcoholic beverages, and to promote temperance in the use and consumption of alcoholic beverages." (Alcoholic Beverage Control Act, § 1, now Bus. & Prof. Code, § 23001.)

The fact that the act provides for fair trade contracts indicates that its purposes include those of the general Fair Trade Act (Stats. 1931, ch. 278, p. 583, now Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 16900-16905), particularly the prevention of price cutting in retail sales. (Max Factor & Co. v. Kunsman, 5 Cal. 2d 446, 455; see Wholesale T. Dealers v. National etc. Co. [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,191], 11 Cal. 2d 634, 655.) The Max Factor and Wholesale T. Dealers cases held that the Legislature may take measures against price cutting, and there can be no doubt that the prevention of intemperance is a proper legislative objective.

The means provided in a statute must be accepted as being reasonably designed to accomplish its objective unless it is unquestionable that they are improper. (Wholesale T. Dealers v. National etc. Co. [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,191], 11 Cal. 2d 634, 646; Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 490.) The legislative purpose of preventing price cutting and price wars among retailers is, of course, effectively attained under the fair trade provisions of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act by having each producer or wholesaler establish the retail price of his own brand, and it was held in the Max Factor case (5 Cal. 2d at p. 455) that the Legislature could reasonably proceed on the theory that the public will be adequately protected against excessive prices by the ordinary play of competition between manufacturers.

The statutory provisions also operate to remove some factors which may lead to intemperance because the elimination at the retail level of price cutting, bargain sales, and advertising of low prices tends to reduce excessive purchases of alcoholic beverages. It is true, as Allied points out, that there is nothing in the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act to prevent producers and wholesalers from setting low prices that may induce a large consumption of such beverages. It was not the purpose of the legislation, however, to reduce intemperance by establishing high prices generally but only by preventing the increase of consumption of alcoholic beverages resulting from retail price cutting and bargain sales, and the Legislature may take reasonable measures to eliminate some of the causes of an evil without attacking all of them. (Railway Express v. New York, 336 U. S. 106, 110.) The classification made by the Legislature in regulating retail prices without regulating wholesale prices is reasonable since the Legislature could properly conclude that competition among the relatively few producers and wholesalers would not result in disorderly marketing conditions, but that price stabilization with respect to the far larger number of retailers, who sell directly to the consumers, was necessary to prevent selling practices tending to increase sales and consumption of alcoholic beverages.

[Legislative Powers Not Delegated]

Allied contends that the fair trade provisions of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act unlawfully delegate legislative power insofar as they provide that each producer and wholesaler must set the price at which retailers must sell his product. The question of unlawful delegation under the general Fair Trade Act was decided in Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Skaggs, etc. Drug Stores [1955

TRADE CASES ¶ 68,234], 45 Cal. 2d 881, where prices set by a fair trade contract were held to be binding on a retailer who had not signed the contract. We there stated:

> "Here the acts of private parties in entering into contracts for the sale of commodities constitute the facts in contemplation of which the Legislature acted, and upon the existence of which the provisions of the enactment were to be applicable. The private contracts are no more legislative in character than are other acts or conduct of private parties undertaken as a prerequisite to the application of a statute. The consequence that the statute has become applicable, and conduct in violation thereof has become actionable, is in no way due to the exercise of any assumed legislative power on the part of the contracting parties. [Citation.] We conclude that there is no delegation of the legislative function in violation of constitutional prohibitions." (45 Cal. 2d at p. 888.)

Whether the same conclusion applies to the provisions involved here depends upon whether the function performed by the persons who assertedly exercise delegated legislative powers is the same under the general Fair Trade Act and the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act. Under both statutes the function of such a person is to set the price of his own product on the basis of his personal interest, as affected by free competition in the market, and the result in each case is that all retailers, whether or not they have signed fair trade contracts, are bound by the prices set.

Although there are additional features in sections 55.6 and 55.65 of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act that are not contained in the general Fair Trade Act, they do not warrant a different conclusion from the one reached in the Scovill case [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,234] (45 Cal. 2d 881, 888), namely, that there was no delegation of legislative power. One of the new features is that the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act requires, rather than permits, producers and wholesalers to set retail prices. This fact, however, does not render the function of a producer or wholesaler legislative in character but, to the contrary, decreases his discretion since he is not free to determine whether fair trading should occur. While mandatory fair trading means that retailers cannot obtain merchandise free from price restrictions, this is due to the determination of the Legislature, not the action of the producers and wholesalers.

A second difference is that, in addition to the civil remedies common to both statutes, the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act provides for administrative and criminal sanctions, but this aspect of the act does not involve any delegation of power, the sanctions being prescribed by the Legislature, not by the producers or wholesalers. The Legislature, of course, has power to provide for administrative sanctions with respect to a licensee who violates a regulation deemed to be in the public interest. We need not determine whether the criminal sanctions are proper since such penalties were not imposed in this case, and the provision authorizing them is severable.

The general Fair Trade Act, although designed in part to reduce cutthroat competition, is primarily intended to protect the property rights of producers and wholesalers (Max Factor & Co. v. Kunsman, 5 Cal. 2d 446, 462), whereas the primary purpose of the fair trade provisions of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act is to promote orderly marketing conditions and temperance. This difference in primary purpose, however, has no significant bearing on the question of delegation of legislative power because it does not change the functions of the persons to whom a delegation is assertedly made. The producers and wholesalers of alcoholic beverages are not called upon to set the retail prices for their products on the basis of what will promote temperance and orderly marketing conditions, but, as we have seen, it is contemplated that, in setting prices, they will seek to promote their own business interests in the light of competition, which was also the case under the general Fair Trade Act, and that they will thus indirectly carry out the purposes of the Legislature. Here, as in the Scovill case, the determinations to be made by the producers and wholesalers are not legislative in character but merely "the facts in contemplation of which the Legislature acted, and upon the existence of which the provisions of the enactment were to be applicable." (Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Skaggs etc. Drug Stores, 45 Cal. 2d at p. 888.)

Upon the same reasoning as was used in the Scovill case, the Supreme Court of Connecticut decided that provisions which were substantially similar to those before us did not constitute an unlawful delegation of legislative power. (Schwartz v. Kelly [Conn.], 99 A. 2d 89, 93.) A similar statute was held invalid in Scarborough v. Webb's Cut Rate Drug Co. [Fla.], 8 So. 2d 913, 921, on the ground, among others, that it provided for an improper delegation of power, but the case is not persuasive because it contains no reasoning in support of this conclusion.

State Board v. Thrift-D-Lux Cleaners, 40 Cal. 2d 436, relied on by Allied, is distinguishable from the present case. The court there declared unconstitutional a statute which delegated to the State Board of Dry Cleaners the power to fix minimum price schedules. The principal ground of the decision was that the price-fixing provision could not be upheld as a proper exercise of the police power, but, as we have seen, the statutes involved here come within that power. The court also relied on the ground that there was a delegation of legislative power without ascertainable standards to an administrative board composed mainly of members of the industry who would participate in fixing prices to be charged by their competitors. The Thrift-D-Lux case does not hold that all types of price fixing are legislative in character, but that there was a delegation of legislative power under the special facts present in that case. On the other hand it was held in Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Skaggs etc. Drug Stores, supra [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,234], 45 Cal. 2d 881, 887-888, that there was no delegation of legislative power where manufacturers, acting in their private capacity under the general Fair Trade Act, fixed the prices for which their own products were to be sold at retail by persons who were not their competitors. The distinguishing factor is that the dry cleaners' board was directed to fix uniform minimum prices for the services of all dry cleaners in limited areas on the basis of what it believed was required by public health and safety, whereas under the general Fair Trade Act each manufacturer is to fix retail prices for his own products in accord with his personal interest. The functions of the producers and wholesalers under the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act, as we have seen, are the same as those of manufacturers under the general Fair Trade Act, and the controlling decision is Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Skaggs etc. Drug Stores rather than State Board v. Thrift-D-Lux Cleaners.

The judgment is reversed.

Dissenting Opinions

McComb, Justice: I dissent. I would affirm the judgment for the reasons expressed by Mr. Justice Hanson in his dissenting opinion when the case was before the District Court of Appeal [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,401], 170 A. C. A. 459, 338 P. 2d 1013, 1023.

Peters, Justice: I dissent.

In determining the sole question of law which is presented in this case the majority opinion holds that certain sections of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act (specifically §§ 24750 through 24757 of the Business and Professions Code) constitute a valid and constitutional exercise of the police power. This determination is based upon the propositions that (a) the statutory provisions comprise a Fair Trade Act applicable to alcoholic beverages, and (b) because the established law of this State hold Fair Trade Acts to be constitutional, this Act is likewise constitutional. This reasoning is based upon the fallacious assumption that the provisions of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act do, in fact, comprise a Fair Trade Act. I am of the opinion that the rules laid down in the Fair Trade cases (Max Factor & Co. v. Kunsman, 5 Cal. 2d 446; Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Skaggs etc. Drug Stores, 45 Cal. 2d 881) are inapplicable herein, and that this case must be determined in accordance with the rules set forth in State Board v. Thrift-D-Lux Cleaners, 40 Cal. 2d 436.[1]

[1] While this dissent is not intended as an attack upon the rules of the Factor and Scovill cases, it should be noted that the modern trend is to hold Fair Trade Acts to be an unconstitutional exercise of the police power. When this Court first held the California Fair Trade Act to be valid, it was joining the majority of jurisdictions in a determination made desirable, if not necessary, by reason of the then existing "great depression." This Court, together with the majority of states, held that the respective legislatures had a right to reverse their previously propounded economic theories in favor of a policy necessary to the times. Thus legislation was upheld which was otherwise inimicable to the Federal Anti-trust laws and to our own Cartwright Act (see Max Factor & Co. v. Kunsman, supra, at p. 455). In recent years,

There are basic distinctions between Fair Trade Acts and the provisions of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act. These demonstrate that the constitutionality of one may not be predicated upon the other. Such distinctions are many and varied, and go to the very essence of the statutes. Reference to but four will serve to illustrate the point.

Purpose: Fair Trade Acts were designed to prevent the unsalutory effect of price war on the economy as it existed in a period of depression and low prices (1931). To accomplish this purpose they frankly and openly seek > "to protect trade-mark owners, distributors and the public against injurious and uneconomic practices in the distribution of articles of standard quality under a distinguished trade-mark, brand or name" (Max Factor & Co. v. Kunsman, supra, at p. 454).

In other words, the prime purpose of the Fair Trade Acts was to promote trade. In order to attain this objective the legislation fostered a system which would provide a floor to prices, and thus insure a profit. The fact that such price regulation also provided protection for the manufacturer's property right in his trade-marked articles was only incidental to the main purpose. On the other hand, the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act provides a system of setting minimum prices for the basic purpose of reducing trade in spirituous liquors. Under the heading of "Purposes" the Act states that it is "an exercise of the police powers of the State . . . to eliminate the evils of unlicensed and unlawful manufacture, selling, and disposing of alcoholic beverages, and to promote temperance in the use and consumption" thereof (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 23001). While it may be a price regulating statute, and appears to protect the distiller's property right in his trade-marked goods, these matters are incidental to the purpose, which is anti-pathetical to the purpose of the Fair Trade Act. One act seeks to encourage sales, the other seeks to discourage them.

Nature of the Contract: Both the Fair Trade and the Alcoholic Beverage Control Acts are based upon the existence of a contract between producer and retailer, whereby the latter agrees not to sell at less than the price determined by the former. Here the similarity ends. The Fair Trade Acts are voluntary or consentual, in that neither party is required to enter into such a contract.[2] The Alcoholic Beverage Act is mandatory in that no spirits may be sold in California at retail except pursuant to such a contract (Bus. & Prof. Code § 24755).

The Penalty: The penalties for a breach of the Fair Trade Acts are civil, only, giving to the injured party the right to damages or an injunction. The penalty for the breach of the price fixing regulations of the Alcoholic Beverage Act are both civil (Bus. & Prof. Code § 24752) and penal, and the department may suspend or revoke licenses, or institute criminal action (see majority opinion).

The Field Covered: The Fair Trade Acts do not prevent a dealer who is dissatisfied with the prices set by a manufacturer from engaging in competition therewith. If he is unable to find a supplier of a competing article who will enter into a contract at a lower retail price, he may still deal in competing articles which are not fair-traded. Under the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act the retailer has no such alternative. He must deal exclusively in goods the price of many states which had originally been included in the majority, have concluded that in times of high prices Fair Trade Acts are not a legitimate exercise of police power, and have overruled their previous decisions. In this manner at least one case which was cited and relied on in previous California decisions is no longer the law of the jurisdiction which first propounded it. Thus Borden & Co. v. Schreuer [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,641], 182 Ore. 34, cited in Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Skaggs, supra, at p. 886, was overruled by Gen. El. Co. v. Wahle (1956) [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,333], 207 Ore. 302. Cases from jurisdictions other than Oregon which have reversed their previously announced rule solely on the basis of changed economic conditions are: Union Carbide & C. Co. v. Bargain Fair Inc. (1958) [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,920], 167 Oh. St. 182; Skaggs Drug Center v. Gen. El. Co. (1957) [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,823], 63 N. Mex. 215; Tichenor Antiseptic Co. v. Schwegmann Bros. (1956) [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,400], 231 La. 51; Olin Mathieson Chem. Corp. v. Francis (1956) [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,463], 134 Colo. 160; Gen. El. Co. v. A. Dandy Appl. Co. (1958) [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,027], 103 S. E. 2d 310 (W. Va.).

[2] The fact that once such a contract is executed other retailers coming into possession of the goods are bound by its terms, does not destroy the voluntary nature, for the conditions of the voluntary contract are deemed to follow the goods. A retailer who obtains goods directly from a producer, without contract, is not bound by any Fair Trade Act provisions.

which has been set by the distiller, or he must go out of business (Bus. & Prof. Code § 24755).

It is not contended that the foregoing distinctions, of themselves, invalidate the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act. They are intended only to illustrate that there is a wide divergence between purpose, nature, penalty and coverage of the two acts. Because of such variance the Alcoholic Beverage Act must be analyzed individually, and its constitutionality determined without reference to the superficially similar (but basically dissimilar) Fair Trade Acts.

It is to be noted that the Act itself, as quoted above, states that it is an exercise of the police power. No one can doubt that the subject matter (alcoholic beverages) is a proper field for the exercise of that power, even to the extent of legislating away the entire right to deal in intoxicating liquors. Nor can it be doubted that the expressed purpose of the Act is entirely proper, and within the legislative function. I also agree with the majority opinion in its holding that the judiciary has neither the right nor the duty to question the wisdom of the legislative purpose. But at this point the majority opinion leaps a gap which I am unable to negotiate. After announcing that the courts may, and have a duty to, determine "whether the statute bears a reasonable and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained" (majority opinion, pp. 5-6 [76,262]),[3] the opinion merely discusses the authority to legislate. At no point does the opinion analyze the various provisions of this statute as they may be related to "the object sought to be attained." When so analyzed the provisions of the Act which are here under attack must be found to have no reasonable relation to the expressed purpose. This being true, they admittedly fail to comprise a legitimate exercise of the police power.

As shown above, the stated purpose of the Act is to "promote temperance in the use and consumption" of alcoholic beverages. But the sections here involved are restricted solely to a price fixing scheme. The only reason assigned (by both respondent and the majority) for the inclusion of these provisions is an assumed legislative purpose (not expressed in the Act) to prevent "price wars" which would lead to unbridled purchases. While the provisions of sections 24750 et seq. may prevent "price wars" in the retail sale of any specific trademarked brand, they do not prevent, or attempt to prevent, "price wars" between competing brands.[4] Neither do these provisions attempt to prevent "dumping" of excess stocks at pre-established low prices. In other words, the Act protects the distiller in keeping his prices high, only if he wants them high. He may, under the Act, set any price he may desire, high or low. He may enter into a price war with all of his competing distillers, so long as he files his wholesale price with the Department and enters into a contract with the retailer. No attempt is made to regulate the wholesale price. The distiller may determine the same so long as he files. Such method of "control" of retail prices may promote one of the purposes of a Fair Trade Act, that is to protect the owner of a trade-mark, but it bears no relationship to the promotion of temperance.

Another example of how the legislative provisions fail to accomplish their stated purpose is to be found in the language of section 24750. That section imposes the price fixing scheme upon all alcoholic beverage "which bears . . . the trade-mark, brand or name of the producer or owner . . . and which is in fair and open competition with alcoholic beverages of the same general class produced by others." (Italics added.) By adding the italics clause, the legislature has exempted any liquor which, although it be labeled with the owner's name, brand or trade-mark, is not in "fair and open competition." The majority has refused to take judicial notice of what goes on under this escape clause, and, for the purposes of this dissent, I will agree to that limited determination. But recourse to judicial notice is unnecessary in order to realize that trade in liquor is not confined to placing distilled liquor in bottles bearing the advertised labels of a well known distillery, and then shipping the same across a state line. Unlabeled barrels are also accepted by freight carriers, and we have no laws which prohibit their entry into California. Retailers are not prohibited from owning brands and trade-marks, nor are they restrained from bottling on their own behalf. Thus the State may be (and were it not for the restrictions of judicial notice we might say, "is") legally flooded with "off-brands" which are not "in fair and open competition" with other advertised brands, and which may be (are?) sold at very low prices. This may be accomplished under the Act by either retailer, wholesaler or distributor. It would seem that the public might be just as intemperate in the use and consumption of off-brands as it might on any of the better advertised brands.

[3] Since the majority opinion cites authority for this proposition it is not necessary to lengthen this dissent with further citation.

[4] The legislature was apparently so disinterested in the ultimate retail price of liquor that requirement of filing price lists with the Board was confined to wholesale prices (Bus. & Prof. Code § 24756). Ostensibly the Department is not required to know the established retail price, which is left to the whim of the distiller, but which binds the retailer to both civil and penal sanctions.

To assume, as does the majority opinion, that the price regulating provisions may "operate to remove some factors which may led to intemperance" without removing all such factors, is but begging the question. We have not been shown how, or in what manner, these sections can possibly accomplish any result other than increasing the value of a distiller's property right in and to its advertised trade-mark, while allowing him to enter into any and all manner of price wars with his unadvertised brands (or his same product bottled under another name). To hold otherwise is to close our eyes to facts of which we are entitled to take judicial notice; that is that the nationally published statistics show that in spite of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act the consumption of liquor in California is on the increase, and the per capita consumption exceeds that of most other states.

For these reasons, it is clear that the price control features of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act bear no reasonable relation to the stated purpose of the Act. While this is a sufficient reason to hold those provisions to be an unjustified exercise of the police power, there is yet another, and perhaps more compelling reason to hold them invalid.

The price control provisions of the Act give to the distiller the exclusive right and obligation of setting the retail price at which his product shall be sold in California (Bus. & Prof. Code § 24750 as affected by § 24755). Nothing in the code gives the Department, or any other official arm of the government, any voice or control in the establishment of such price. The price may be high or low, and need not bear any relationship to supply or demand, or to temperance. In fact, the Department is not even to be advised of the retail price established, since only the wholesale price is required to be posted with that body. The result of this unique piece of legislation is a delegation of the legislative function of establishing price (in order to promote temperance), not to the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, but to private persons and to the very persons whose activities the Act proposes to curtail. That such a delegation of legislative authority is contrary to section 1 of Article III and section 1 of Article IV of the California Constitution has long been established.[5] Although the limitation on delegation of authority has been interpreted to authorize legislative delegation to various administrative and civil boards, under certain situations and subject to specific safeguards (Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593), the attempt to delegate such authority to members of the public has never been condoned. In the case of State Board v. Thrift-D-Lux Cleaners, 40 Cal. 2d 436, this Court had before it for consideration a statute which provided for the creation of a State Board of Dry Cleaners consisting of seven members; one from the general public; two owners of retail plants; two owners of wholesale plants; and two owners of shops. That act further provided that the Board so established might set minimum price schedules for cleaning, dying and pressing services on petition of seventy-five percent of the trade within any specific area, and further provided for injunctive relief for breach of such price schedules when established. This Court held the statute unconstitutional on the ground, among others, that it was an attempt "to confer legislative authority upon those who are directly interested in the operation of the regulatory rule . . ." (State Board v. Thrift-D-Lux Cleaners, supra, at p. 448). In that case, the persons to whom the legislative authority was conveyed at least had the color of an administrative board, but were held not to be such because of the requirement that the membership be composed of six members of the trade out of a total of seven. In the instant case, there is not even a disguised attempt to delegate to an administrative body. Such a board is created by the Act, but the price fixing authority is given directly to the distiller. Clearly such attempted legislation comes within the rule of the Thrift-D-Lux case.

Moreover, the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act sets neither guide nor standard to aid those permitted to fix prices. Even if the legislative authority were delegated to the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control, without such provision for standards, the price fixing portions of the statute would be unconstitutional (Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, supra; Dominguez Land Corp. v. Daugherty, 196 Cal. 468; Agnew v. City of Culver City, 147 Cal. App. 2d 144, at pp. 153-4; In re Petersen, 51 Cal. 2d 177, at p. 184; State Board v. Thrift-D-Lux Cleaners, supra, 40 Cal. 2d 436).

In the Tarpey case it is said, at page 600, that > "the legislature may, without violating any rule or principle of the constitution, confer upon an administrative officer a large measure of discretion, provided the exercise thereof is controlled and guided by rules prescribed therefor." (Italics added.)

In the Dominguez Land case the court was considering the propriety of a statute delegating authority to the Commissioner of Corporations. At page 484 it said,

> "A familiar illustration is where the legislature enacts a law prescribing that the rates to be charged by a public utility shall be 'reasonable,' and creates a commission with power to investigate and fix the rates. If, however, no standard by which the officer is to be governed be prescribed by the lawmakers, then there is an attempt to entrust a mere administrative officer with the plenary power of the legislature."

Since the act under scrutiny herein offers no guide of any kind to the persons given the obligation of setting prices, the price fixing portion of the statute is invalid. These features thereof are severable, and hence need not require invalidation of the entire Act. The price fixing provisions come squarely within the following language (quoted from Carter v. Coal Co., 298 U. S. 238, 311) relied upon in the Thrift-D-Lux case, supra (p. 448):

> "a statute which attempts to confer such power undertakes an intolerable and unconstitutional interference with personal liberty and private property. The delegation is so clearly arbitrary, and so clearly a denial of rights safeguarded by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, that it is unnecessary to do more than refer to decisions of this court which foreclose the question."

In my opinion, the judgment should be affirmed.

On Order to Show Cause in Criminal Contempt.

Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act

Price Discrimination—Brokerage Fees—Indirect Discounts in Lieu of Commission—Contempt for Violation of Federal Trade Commission Cease and Desist Order.—The fact that a sea food company bought and sold for its own account, rather than as a broker, when it gave a buyer an indirect grant of a discount in lieu of a commission or brokerage was no defense to a charge of criminal contempt for violating a court-enforced Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting it from giving or granting such discount to a buyer for the buyer's own account. The cease and desist order was not restricted to the company's brokerage activities, so, in effect, it prohibited the giving of such discount in connection with sales on its own account as well as in connection with sales as a broker.

See Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3520.390; FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8801.090.

Price Discrimination—Brokerage Fees—Evidence as to Nature of Allowance.—The facts surrounding an entire sales transaction can establish that a discount was granted in lieu of a commission or brokerage, even though sales documents make no mention of a commission or brokerage or any compensation or allowance in lieu thereof. When a sea food company subject to a court-enforced Federal Trade Commission order prohibiting it from paying brokerage to a buyer for its own account purchased salmon for $15 per case less "5% brokerage" and then sold it to a buyer for $14.50 per case, it gave the buyer an indirect grant of a discount in lieu of a commission or brokerage, and, consequently, violated the cease and desist order. In effect, the company passed along to the buyer fifty cents of the seventy-five-cent discount it had received in lieu of brokerage.

However, three references in invoices to a price "less 5% brokerage" were held to be insufficient to establish a violation of the order when the seller asserted that the references were the clerical errors of a bookkeeper, and that these discounts were the 5% "functional" or "interpacker" discounts customarily allowed to a primary dealer or distributor, such as the buyer.

If so-called "interpacker" discount serves the same purpose as a brokerage discount, has the same effect, and enjoys no economic justification which entitles it to be distinguished, it ought to be regarded as an allowance in lieu of a commission or brokerage —but not otherwise.

Statement of Proceedings

HAMLEY, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This is a criminal contempt proceeding instituted by this court pursuant to 18 U. S. C. A. § 401(3).[1] The respondent is Whitney & Company, a Washington corporation. This company engages in the business of packing, selling, and distributing canned salmon and other seafood products.

On March 25, 1946, in proceedings before the Federal Trade Commission,[2] an order was entered requiring Whitney to forthwith cease and desist from:

> "Paying or granting, directly or indirectly, to any buyer, anything of value as a commission or brokerage, or any compensation, allowance or discount in lieu thereof, upon purchases made for such buyer's own account."[3]

The cease and desist order was affirmed by this court. Federal Trade Commission v. Whitney & Company, et al., 9 Cir. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,948], 192 F. 2d 746. Thereafter, and on April 1, 1955, this court entered a decree commanding Whitney to comply with and obey the above-quoted Commission order [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,035].

[3] This order was intended to invoke and enforce section 2(c) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 13(c). Section 2(c) reads as follows:
"It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to pay or grant, or to receive or accept, anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, except for services rendered in connection with the sale or purchase of goods, wares, or merchandise, either to the other party to such transaction or to an agent, representative, or other intermediary therein where such intermediary is acting in fact for or in behalf, or is subject to the direct or indirect control, of any party to such transaction other than the person by whom such compensation is so granted or paid."

On May 22, 1959, the Federal Trade Commission filed a memorandum placing certain facts before this court concerning Whitney's asserted disobedience of the decree of April 1, 1955. On the same day we issued an order requiring the company to show cause why it should not be found guilty of criminal contempt and be punished therefor.

Certified copies of the show cause order and of the memorandum of the Federal Trade Commission were served upon the company by the United States Marshal. The company filed a timely response and a supporting memorandum. A memorandum in reply was filed by the Commission and the matter was argued orally before the court on October 12, 1959.

The described contempt proceedings bring into question two unrelated transactions entered into by Whitney subsequent to our decree of April 1, 1955. These transactions are separately discussed in the next two sections of this opinion.

[Sale to Nakat Packing Corporation]

In June 1956 Whitney undertook to act as broker for American Packing Co., of Seattle, in connection with the sale of 810 cases of canned salmon. Whitney advised American that Whitney would undertake to sell this salmon for the account of American at a price to the consuming trade of fifteen dollars per case less usual trade discounts for cash, swell, and label allowances and for a 5% brokerage commission to Whitney. This would result in a net to American of $14.25 per case, less cash, swell, and label allowances. In so advising American, Whitney intended that if it was unable to sell the salmon for the account of American at that price, Whitney would purchase the 810 cases for its own account.

Whitney was of the opinion that it could sell this salmon to Nakat Packing Corporation, of Seattle, or other purchasers in the consuming trade for fifteen dollars per case and endeavored to do so. Nakat, however, was unwilling to pay fifteen dollars per case for this salmon.[4]

Thereafter, Whitney, in its own name and for its own account for resale, purchased these 810 cases of salmon from American. No brokerage services were performed by Whitney in connection with this purchase for its own account. The 810 cases were sold to Whitney by American in two lots, a separate invoice being issued by American for each lot.

On each of these invoices the price of fifteen dollars per case was shown, subject to discounts for cash, swell, and label allowances, and "Less 5% Brokerage." Similarly, the two documents entitled "Account of Sale," issued by Whitney to American covering these two lots, show a price of fifteen dollars a case, with like discounts, "Less 5% Commission."

After purchasing this canned salmon, Whitney, acting in its own name and for its own account, sold the 810 cases to Nakat for $14.50 per case less usual trade discounts for cash, swell, and label allowances.

Whitney asserts that the documents referred to above erroneously reflect that the disposition of the 810 cases was to be handled as a brokerage transaction, but that the transaction as finally consummated was not of that nature.

It is true that Whitney did not act as a broker in acquiring or disposing of the salmon, since it bought and sold for its own account.[5] But the cease and desist order in question is not restricted to Whitney's brokerage activities. If, though Whitney sells for its own account, it grants anything of value as a purported commission or brokerage, or grants any compensation, allowance, or discount in lieu thereof in connection with a sale to one buying for his own account, the order is violated.[6]

[4] A document entitled "Report of Sale No. 408," issued by Whitney on July 5, 1956, records that Whitney sold the 810 cases to Nakat "For Account of American Packing Company," at a price of fifteen dollars per case less usual discounts for cash, swell, and label allowances, and "Less Brokerage 5%." However, the transaction as so recorded was never consummated.

[5] As a matter of fact, the only document which purports to record the disposition of the salmon as a brokerage transaction is the "Report of Sale No. 408," referred to above. The invoices described above, while mentioning a 5% "brokerage," did not purport to record brokerage transactions because they noted outright sales by American to Whitney for the latter's own account. The document entitled "Account of Sale," described above, while mentioning a 5% "commission," did not purport to record brokerage transactions because no buyer other than Whitney was named.

[6] We speak of a "purported" commission or brokerage, since the "commission or brokerage" referred to in the cease and desist order and in section 2(c) of the act would not be a bona fide commission or brokerage. The person who receives such "commission or brokerage" is buying for his own account and renders no brokerage service.

Whitney sold the 810 cases to Nakat for $14.50 per case, less the usual discounts for cash, swell, and label allowances. The documents recording this sale make no mention of a commission or brokerage or any compensation, allowance, or discount in lieu thereof. But the lack of such a notation on these documents is not conclusive. The facts surrounding the entire transaction may establish, despite lack of corroboration in the selling documents, that a discount was granted in lieu of a purported commission or brokerage.

An examination of the surrounding circumstances reveals that this was the case. When Nakat declined to pay fifteen dollars per case, Whitney's plan to act as a broker in the transaction failed. It could not reduce the price to Nakat by giving Nakat part of Whitney's seventy-five-cent brokerage per case, as that would have been a direct grant of a discount in lieu of commission or brokerage. This was forbidden by the cease and desist order.

But in thereafter buying the salmon from American for fifteen dollars less "5% brokerage," and selling it to Nakat for $14.50 a case, Whitney gave Nakat an indirect grant of a discount in lieu of a commission or brokerage. In effect, Whitney passed along to Nakat fifty cents of the seventy-five-cent discount Whitney had received from American in lieu of purported brokerage.

The course followed by Whitney was a transparent attempt to circumvent the cease and desist order here in question. If persons subject to such orders were enabled to escape their effect by following such a course, these orders would be largely ineffective and unenforceable. It was to preclude subterfuges of this kind that the order here in question expressly forbade indirect as well as direct discounts in lieu of a commission or brokerage to persons buying for their own account.

[Sale to Ivar Wendt]

On September 19, 1956, Whitney sold to Ivar Wendt, of Seattle, Washington, 8,000 cases of canned salmon. Wendt serves as a primary broker and also as a primary dealer in canned salmon.

The salmon was to be delivered and paid for in 1,600 case lots. Under the terms of the purchase contract Whitney sold the salmon to Wendt at a price of $9.50 per case, less "Regular—5%, 1½%, 1/10%." The 1½% and 1/10% discounts were the usual discounts for cash, swell, and label allowances. The "Regular—5%" discount is not further explained in this instrument. The invoice concerning the first 1,600 cases delivered under this contract notes the same price and usual discounts, "Less 5%." Invoices covering three subsequent lots of 1,600 cases each, however, use the notation "Less 5% Brokerage."

Whitney asserts that the references in these invoices to the discount as "brokerage" were the clerical errors of a bookkeeper. According to Whitney, these discounts were the customary 5% "functional" or "interpacker" discounts allowed to a primary dealer or distributor. Wendt was such a primary dealer and distributor in connection with this transaction, Whitney states.

Whitney also states that Wendt bought the 8,000 cases of salmon as a primary dealer or distributor for his own account and for resale to wholesale outlets and food chains in competition with other primary dealers and distributors. The salmon was thereafter sold by Wendt through field brokers to outlets of this kind.

None of the documents refers to the 5% discount to Wendt as an "interpacker" discount. On the contrary, it was three times noted as "brokerage." But even if the documents had referred to the allowance as an interpacker discount, this would not have been conclusive as to its true character. On the other hand, there is some reason to believe on this record that interpacker discounts are customary under circumstances such as this, and that this particular discount was intended as such.

Assuming this to be the case, we are unable to determine on this record whether such a discount should nevertheless be held to come within the purview of the cease and desist order. If it serves the same purpose, has the same effect, and enjoys no economic justification which entitles it to be distinguished, a so-called "interpacker" discount ought to be regarded as an allowance in lieu of a commission or brokerage—but not otherwise.

It is therefore our view that since the evidence is inconclusive on this branch of the case, a violation of the cease and desist order in connection with the Wendt transaction has not been proved.[7]

Findings of Fact

The court finds beyond a reasonable doubt that Whitney & Company is guilty of criminal contempt of this court in that, by buying 810 cases of canned salmon from American Packing Co. and selling the same to Nakat Packing Corporation in the manner and under the circumstances described above, Whitney & Company disobeyed the decree of this court entered herein on April 1, 1955, commanding Whitney & Company to comply with and obey the cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission entered on March 25, 1946, in its Docket No. 5279.

The court further finds that it has not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt that Whitney & Company is guilty of criminal contempt of this court with regard to the sale of 8,000 cases of canned salmon to Ivar Wendt in the manner and under the circumstances described above.

Order

It is Ordered by the court that:

1. In so far as the order to show cause charges criminal contempt in connection with the sale of 8,000 cases of canned salmon to Ivar Wendt, it is hereby discharged and dismissed with prejudice.

2. Whitney & Company is hereby adjudged guilty of criminal contempt of this court with regard to its purchase of 810 cases of canned salmon from American Packing Company, and its sale thereof to Nakat Packing Corporation.

3. Whitney & Company, by an authorized officer or attorney, shall appear before this court on the 18th day of January, 1960, at 9:30 a. m., for a hearing to determine the nature and extent of the punishment to be imposed, unless Whitney & Company in writing waives such appearance.

4. A certified copy of the foregoing opinion and findings of fact and of this order be served upon Whitney & Company, at its principal place of business, by the United States Marshal in Seattle, and that due return of such service be made.

Clayton Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Antitrust Law Violations As Defenses—Where Alleged Violation of Antitrust Laws Is Collateral to Right Sued Upon—Consent Decrees As Evidence—Requirements Clauses in Franchise Contracts.—In a suit for a declaratory judgment the lower court properly required the defendant to recognize the validity of certain franchise agreements entered into with plaintiff dealers although these agreements contained requirements provisions. The fact that the defendant entered into a consent order to cease and desist making or continuing in effect any contract violative of Section 3 of the Clayton Act was not a defense. While noting that all exclusive dealing contracts were not violative of Section 3, the court followed Kelly v. Kosuga [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,283] in holding that such a contract would be enforced unless "the judgment of the court would be the vehicle by which the unlawful conduct is carried out". In thus severing the requirements provision and giving effect to the remainder of the franchise

[Declaratory Judgment]

DUFFY, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This is a suit for a declaratory judgment to require defendant, Culligan, Inc., (hereinafted called "Culligan") to recognize the validity of certain dealership franchise agreements entered into between Culligan and the respective plaintiffs.

[Franchise Agreements]

In the period 1945 to 1947, five of the plaintiffs entered into franchise agreements with Culligan, which were substantially identical except for names, territory, termination date and number of service units to be purchased. These contracts are known as "First Post War Contracts." The respective expiration dates are: December 4 and December 21, 1960; November 20, 1970; June 25, 1972 and October 1, 1972.

In 1954 and 1956, respectively, the other two plaintiffs entered into franchise agreements with Culligan which were substantially identical with each other except as to items similar to those noted in the preceding paragraph. These contracts are known as "Second Buff Contracts." The expiration dates are June 1, 1964 and January 26, 1966.

[Requirements Provisions]

Each of the First Post War Contracts contained an undertaking by Culligan to sell, and by the respective plaintiffs to purchase, all of the plaintiff's requirements of water softening units, equipment, parts and materials. In the Second Buff Contracts there was the undertaking by the dealers to purchase specified equipment and materials including Culligan's water conditioning minerals and service tanks and other parts, although equipment and material not specified could be purchased from other dealers.

In each of the First Post War Contracts, the dealer undertook "to use his best endeavors in the sale and promotion" of water conditioning services and Culligan's products. In the Second Buff Contracts, the dealer promised "to diligently and loyally promote and foster" the increase of the use and acceptance of Culligan soft water service.

In both types of contract, the dealer agreed that he would provide capital to establish offices, sales rooms and service plants acceptable to Culligan, and that he would maintain sufficient stock and equipment, and would maintain in serviceable and clean condition all service units in accordance with Culligan standards. He also agreed to cooperate with Culligan in formulating sales promotion plans.

In the First Post War Contracts, Culligan granted to each plaintiff a designated territory within which each plaintiff had the exclusive right to distribute Culligan's water conditioning products. In the Second Buff Agreements each plaintiff was given the right to operate exclusively in a designated territory under the Culligan plan which is a comprehensive soft water service plan.

[Severability Clauses]

Both types of contract contained severability clauses. The First Post War Agreement contained the following: "If any provision of this agreement is held to be invalid or unenforcible, this contract shall, as to such provisions, be considered divisible, and the balance of the agreement shall be valid and binding." The Second Buff Agreement provides: "Any provision of this Agreement prohibited by law shall be ineffective to the extent of such prohibition without in any way invalidating or affecting the remaining provisions of this Agreement."

Each plaintiff expended substantial sums of money in developing territories granted to him or it by Culligan. Extensive advertising was undertaken, through media such as newspapers, billboards, radio and television. This advertising was done under the name of "Culligan Soft Water Service," and often the names of the dealers were not mentioned.

[Consent Decree]

On October 31, 1956, the Federal Trade Commission filed a complaint against Culligan charging a violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A. § 14), by requiring its dealers not to purchase or deal in water softening products made by competitors of Culligan. Later, Culligan agreed to a consent order which became effective May 23, 1957. Culligan agreed to desist from making any contract or continuing in effect any existing contract for the sale of its products on condition the purchaser shall not use, deal in, or sell similar or related products supplied by any competitor.

The order also provided:

> "* * * nothing in this order shall prohibit respondent from entering into an agreement with its dealers prohibiting them from using or selling for use, in the Culligan plan, parts, equipment or material which would adversely affect respondent's water conditioning service unit."

By letter of July 9, 1957, Culligan notified its dealers including plaintiffs, that the consent order "* * * by its nature invalidated all Culligan franchises." Later, Culligan submitted a new form of franchise agreement to its dealers, including plaintiffs, which terminated any pre-existing franchise, and granted the dealer a non-exclusive territory. Fifty-seven dealers, including plaintiffs, declined to execute the new agreement, although a large majority did so. By letter of December 29, 1958, Culligan wrote to each plaintiff purporting to cancel plaintiff's existing franchise agreement on the sole ground that plaintiff had failed to execute the new form of franchise. Culligan informed plaintiffs it would no longer sell its product to them, and demanded they discontinue the use of the name "Culligan" in their business. There was no claim that any plaintiff had breached his or its franchise agreement.

[Court Rulings]

Culligan argues that the contracts sought to be enforced are invalid and unenforceable because they contain provisions which are in violation of section 3 of the Clayton Act. Defendant insists the illegal provisions invalidate the entire contract. The District Court held otherwise, and entered a declaratory judgment in favor of plaintiffs. The Court also issued an injunction restraining Culligan from interfering with the rights of plaintiffs in their franchise agreements.

The District Court concluded that the consent order effective May 23, 1957 did not affect the rights of plaintiffs under their franchise agreements and did not excuse Culligan from performing its contractual obligations under such agreements. The Court was of the view that the severability clauses were valid and effective, and that the agreements were valid in all respects other than the requirements clause.

Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. A. § 14, provides, in part:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to * * * make a * * * contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, * * * on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the * * * purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor * * * of the * * * seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce."

In arguing that the respective franchise agreements are unenforceable, Culligan has cited a number of court decisions where price-fixing provisions of contracts have been considered. In United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., Inc. [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,031], 310 U. S. 150, the Court held price-fixing agreements to be in violation of the Sherman Act and to be illegal per se. In United States v. Line Material Company [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,225], 333 U. S. 287, the Court said, page 307: "In the absence of patent or other statutory authorization, a contract to fix or maintain prices in interstate commerce has long been recognized as illegal per se under the Sherman Act." In that case the Court also stated, page 308: "It is equally well settled that the possession of a valid patent or patents does not give the patentee any exemption from the provisions of the Sherman Act beyond the limits of the patent monopoly." At a later date the Court held illegal an agreement to hold down prices by limiting maximum prices. Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Seagram & Sons, Inc. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,737], 340 U. S. 211. Again, in United States v. McKesson & Robbins, Inc. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,368], 351 U. S. 305, 309, 310, the Court emphasized that price fixing is conclusively presumed to be unreasonable.

The Supreme Court has adopted a different approach in considering exclusive dealing provisions or requirement contracts which are prohibited by Section 3 of the Clayton Act. The Court has emphasized the importance of the part of that statute which provides exclusive dealing agreements are illegal "where the effect of such * * * contract * * * may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." 15 U. S. C. A. § 14.

In the earlier cases, the Court applied the "Rule of Reason" of the Sherman Act,[1] to Section 3 of the Clayton Act.[2] However, in International Salt Co. v. United States [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,635], 332 U. S. 392 (1947) the Court moved away from the "Rule of Reason" in determining the legality of exclusive dealing provisions. Any lurking suspicion that the "Rule of Reason" was applicable to Section 3 Clayton Act violations was dispelled by the decision in Standard Oil Company of California and Standard Stations, Inc. v. United States [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,432], 337 U. S. 293 (1949). The Court stated, at page 314: "We conclude, therefore, that the qualifying clause of § 3 is satisfied by proof that competition has been foreclosed in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected."

[Price Fixing—Exclusive Dealing]

It is clear that there is a substantial distinction between the standard to be used in determining the illegality of a price-fixing provision and the standard to be used in passing on the claimed illegality of an exclusive dealing provision. Absent a patent or fair trade agreement, a price-fixing agreement is per se illegal. There is no necessity to go outside the contract containing such provision. It is presumptively illegal regardless of the position of the parties in the appropriate market.

Exclusive dealing provisions, on the other hand, are not in and of themselves illegal. It must be determined whether or not the volume of business affected is "insignificant or insubstantial." International Salt Co. v. United States [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,635], 332 U. S. 392, 396. Thus, an exclusive dealing provision might be legal at the time the contract was executed, but due to the growth of the business of the parties and the volume of the business they affect, the provision might become illegal. Also, it was pointed out in the Standard Stations case, 337 U. S. at 306: "Requirements contracts, on the other hand, may well be of economic advantage to buyers as well as to sellers, and thus indirectly of advantage to the consuming public."

The case of Kelly v. Kosuga (1959) [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,283], 358 U. S. 516, is enlightening and is the most recent expression we have from the Supreme Court bearing upon the issues we are here considering. In Kelly, plaintiff and his associate, in 1955, had 1,000 cars of onions which they could not dispose of through regular channels. They met with a group of mid-western onion growers, and threatened to deliver their onions on the futures exchange which would have resulted in depressed prices. Defendant, a grower, agreed to buy 287 of the 600 cars of onions which plaintiff had stored in the Chicago area. In consideration thereof, plaintiff and his associate agreed not to deliver onions on the futures market for the balance of the current trading season. Defendant and other buyers also agreed not to deliver any of the purchased onions on the futures market during that season. These facts were pleaded as a defense to an action for payment of the price of 50 cars of onions.

In upholding the right of the plaintiff to recover, the Supreme Court recognized the validity of the defense offered but only in a very limited situation where the judgment of the court would be the vehicle by which the unlawful conduct is carried out. In a paper "Recent Antitrust Developments," [3] Professor Milton Handler, in commenting on the Kelly case, said: "Presumably, unless the Court becomes an accessory after the fact by enforcing the precise conduct made unlawful by the statute, the agreement between the parties will be upheld and payment of the purchase price ordered." We agree with this conclusion.

[Legal Part of Contract Enforceable]

We interpret the current view of the Supreme Court to be that a defense based on violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act is valid if the contract at issue is intrinsically illegal; that is—if the Court, by its judgment, would be enforcing the specific conduct prohibited by the Act. But such is not the case in the franchise agreements we are considering in the case at bar. We note again that all exclusive dealing contracts are not violative of Section 3 of the Clayton Act. Furthermore, plaintiffs are not asking the Court to enforce the exclusive dealing provision of the agreements. As stated in Kelly v. Kosuga, supra, page 521, the contract need not be condemned "* * * though it furnished the occasion for a restrictive agreement of the sort here in question."

Culligan strongly argues that to sever the requirement provisions from the franchise agreements would, in each case, leave a void instrument totally lacking in mutuality and failing in consideration. Culligan also insists that plaintiffs are in pari delicto.

[Mutuality]

Relying upon their franchises, the plaintiffs invested large sums of money in their businesses which were conducted under the Culligan name. In the early years of operation they uniformly operated at a loss. Several of the plaintiffs have commitments to advertise Culligan products for considerable periods in the future. The years of effort and expenditure of funds by plaintiffs have borne fruit, and in recent years, the plaintiffs usually have been operating at a profit. Their businesses under the Culligan name have become well established. Such good faith conduct by plaintiffs might, in itself, be grounds for holding there was no lack of mutuality in the contracts we are considering. Molitor v. Chicago Title & Trust Co., 325 Ill. App. 124, 59 N. E. 2d 695, 698.

The First Post War Agreements required that each dealer purchase a specified number of service units per year for the first five years of the contract. These purchases have long since been made. In the Second Buff Contracts, the dealer was required to purchase a specified number of water softening units. Thus, Samuels promised to purchase 250 units each year for ten years, and Geiger agreed to purchase 50 units per year for the first five years and 25 units per year for the second five-year period. No claim is made that the dealers under the Second Buff Contracts have not fully carried out their commitments.

We hold that under the circumstances of this case, the dealer franchise agreements, after the excision of the requirements provision, are not void for want of mutuality or failure of consideration.

[In Pari Delicto]

We next consider Culligan's argument that plaintiffs are in pari delicto, and thus the law should leave the parties where it finds them and afford no relief. Each of the plaintiffs did sign the franchise agreement tendered by Culligan. It is without dispute that no plaintiff would have been recognized by Culligan as a Culligan dealer had not the franchise agreement been signed. It was the requirements provision in that contract that was illegal under Section 3 of the Clayton Act. Culligan seeks to use this illegal provision as an excuse for avoiding its own contractual obligations.

In enacting the Clayton Act, Congress had in mind the protection of dealers. The House Report[4] stated the legislation was designed to prevent an unfair trade practice which was "* * * unfair to the local dealer and to the community * * *." (Emphasis supplied.)

Courts are reluctant to invoke the doctrine of in pari delicto where to do so would manifestly work an injustice. Allgair v. Glenmore Distilleries Co. (S. D. N. Y.) [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,659], 91 F. Supp. 93.

Corbin, in his treatise on contracts (6 Corbin, Contracts, § 1540 (1951)) states:

"If a bargain is illegal, not because a performance promised under it is an illegal performance, but only because the party promising it is forbidden by statute or ordinance to do so, the prohibition is aimed at that party only and he is the only wrong doer. * * * The other party, being himself subject to no prohibition or penalty, may even be one of the class of persons for whose protection the prohibitory statute was enacted.

"In these cases the refusal of all remedy against a party to the illegal bargain would penalize the very persons for whose benefit the making of such a bargain is prohibited or declared illegal. In such cases, in order to attain the purposes of the law, the courts have frequently enforced the bargain by one or more of the usual remedies, in favor of a party for whose benefit the law was intended and against a party toward whom the prohibition or penalty was directed. * * * There is no reason why, in a case otherwise proper, a decree for specific performance should not be granted."

We hold the case at bar is not one in which the defense of in pari delicto may be used to deny relief to the plaintiffs.

[Effect of Consent Decree]

Defendant strongly objects to the conclusion of law of the District Court that Culligan cannot interpose the consent decree as a defense in this action since Culligan voluntarily agreed to the consent order. We think this contention is well taken. Culligan agreed to the order some six months after the filing of the complaint by the Federal Trade Commission. Consent judgments are ordinarily enforceable in the same manner as other judgments. A consent judgment operates as a res judicata. However, this erroneous conclusion is a harmless error. It was not necessary to the decision of the District Court. We have given no weight to this conclusion in reaching our decision herein.

Culligan complains of the equitable relief granted in the decree of the District Court. The Court restrained Culligan from "refusing to sell Culligan products to any plaintiff because said plaintiff has declined to accept and execute any other form of agreement as a substitute for its franchise agreement, or because said plaintiff has instituted this action for declaratory judgment."

We think the decree framed by the District Court preserves to plaintiffs their most important asset, the good will represented by their business names. The protection of good will has, in the eyes of the Chancellor, always been of great importance. We hold the equitable relief granted by the District Court was justified by the facts in this case.

Defendant has discussed other points in its briefs. We have considered same and find them to be without merit.

The judgment of the District Court is

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. No. 12694. Dated December 23, 1959.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division. PERRY, District Judge.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts and Labor-Management Relations Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Damage Action—Necessary Averments—Agreement—Plasterers.—A trial court properly granted a directed verdict dismissing plaintiffs' claim for treble damages due to defendants' alleged boycott. The evidence, viewed in a light most favorable to the plaintiffs, failed to show any combination, agreement, or conspiracy to deprive the plaintiffs of union plasterers. Rather, it was the refusal of a single union to furnish such help, and it was held not to be a violation of the Sherman Act for laborers in combination to refuse to work.

[Treble Damage Action—Boycott]

CASTLE, Circuit Judge [In full text]: Plaintiffs-appellants, Arthur R. Weir and Quikbrik Company of Chicago, Inc., brought suit in the District Court to recover for damages alleged to have been suffered by plaintiffs to business and property by reason of a boycott. Defendants-appellees are Chicago Plastering Institute Inc.,[1] Journeymen Plasterers Protective and Benevolent Society, OP & CFIA, Local Union No. 5,[2] Employing Plasterers Contractors Association of Chicago,[3] Byron W. Dalton,[4] J. W. Farr & Co.[5] and J. Woodcock[5];

Plaintiffs predicate liability of defendants for treble damages under 15 U. S. C. A. § 15 on conduct alleged to constitute a violation of the antitrust provisions of 15 U. S. C. A. § 1. In addition Plaintiffs claim a "secondary boycott" by defendants Dalton and Local No. 5 in violation of, and entitling them to damages under, 29 U. S. C. A. § 187.

The district court at the conclusion of plaintiffs' evidence granted the motions of all defendants for a directed verdict and entered judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appealed and contend that the court erred in not submitting the case to the jury. Subsidiary contentions made by plaintiffs include claims that the court erred (1) in rulings on the admission of evidence and on offers of proof, (2) in refusing to hear oral argument, (3) in failing to certify to the Attorney General that the constitutionality of an Act of Congress affecting the public interest had been put in issue by defendants' pleadings, (4) in failing to make findings of fact, and (5) that the District Court's executive committee erred in reassigning the case to the trial judge.

[Issue]

The main contested issue is whether there was evidence which when viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, together with all reasonable inferences that might be drawn therefrom, would, as a matter of law, sustain a verdict for plaintiffs.

It would serve no purpose to attempt to summarize all of the evidence. In so far as it is pertinent to establishing the existence of a boycott in violation of either the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. A. § 1) or the Labor-Management Relations Act (29 U. S. C. A. § 187), and viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, accepting plaintiffs' version or that most favorable to plaintiffs where there is difference or conflict in the testimony, the record establishes the following facts.

[Evidence]

The Institute is a not-for-profit membership corporation the officers and directors of which are representative officers of labor unions, plastering contractors and persons engaged in the plastering business. Its purpose, to promote the use of plaster products, is stated in its charter as follows:

> "The advancement of plaster construction over inferior substitutes, by (1) education of the public, and (2) by sponsoring legislation calculated to preserve the health and safety of the public by the use of plaster construction, and (3) discourage attempts to pass legislation derogatory to plaster construction, and (4) to do those things which are necessary and proper to promote and enhance the plastering industry."

Institute provides retirement pensions, compensation for illness and injuries, and death benefits for those employed in the plastering industry.

The Association is an incorporated not-for-profit, trade association. Its members are approximately 36 Chicago plastering contractors. Local Union No. 5 is an unincorporated trade union composed of approximately 1200 journeymen and apprentice plasterers who engage in their trade as employees of plastering contractors. The Constitution and By-Laws of Local No. 5, provide:

---

[1] Herein referred to as Institute.
[2] Herein referred to as Local No. 5.
[3] Herein referred to as Association.
[4] President of Institute and president of Local No. 5, sued individually and as representative of the membership of Local No. 5.
[5] A plastering contractor.

"Sec. 96. Any person or firm desiring to become plastering contractors and employ members of Local No. 5 must qualify according to the following rules: They must be examined by our Examining Board and prove that they know the fundamentals of plastering. They must show sufficient bank account or credit to meet their material bills and pay-rolls, and they must also furnish a surety bond not less than Ten Thousand Dollars ($10,000) to insure the payments of our members at all times. Any member of Local No. 5 desiring to become a plastering contractor must make application in writing and appear before the Examining Board for a hearing. He must also be a member of Local No. 5 in good standing for a period of five years. This does not necessarily apply to honorably discharged men from the armed services. A thirty (30) days notice must be posted for all applicants who are to be examined as Contractors."

A collective bargaining agreement between Local No. 5 and the contractor members of the Association contains provisions under which each makes financial contributions to Institute for the following purposes:

"(a) Educating the public of the superiority of plaster construction over inferior substitutes.

"(b) Sponsoring legislation that is calculated to preserve the health and safety of the public by the use of plaster construction.

"(c) To do those things which are necessary and proper to promote and enhance the plastering industry.

"(d) To provide health and hospital insurance and other benefits for the aforesaid employees."

The Association agrees to assess and collect from its members, and to contribute, a sum equal to 6% of employee's wages (later changed to 16 cents per hour per man employed). Local No. 5 agrees to contribute a sum not to exceed ½ cent per hour for each hour each of its members are employed by contractor members of the Association.

Early in 1952 plaintiff Weir entered into an agreement with American Cement Products Company of Detroit, Michigan under which he became an authorized applicator of its product known as Quikbrik. Quikbrik, as a process, may be described as a method whereby an imitation brick surface may be applied to the interior or exterior surface of a building. A lath-like frame is first affixed to the surface. A coating of cement is then applied. While the cement is still soft the product Quikbrik, a mixture of crushed building material similar to ground brick, is pressed into the cement. When the mixture is partially dried the "joints are struck", that is, by means of a rack and a cutting tool, grooves are formed which show the underlying cement and cause the finished surface to have the appearance of a brick wall.

Weir called on defendant Dalton, President of Local No. 5, and showed him samples of and literature concerning Quikbrik. Dalton was impressed with the product. Weir advised that he wanted to become a plastering contractor and hire union plasterers, members of Local No. 5. Dalton promised full cooperation and telephoned the lathers' union requesting that it cooperate with Weir. Dalton told Weir that "he could hire at that time union help". Weir thought his conversation with Dalton constituted approval of Weir as a plastering contractor by Local Union No. 5. Weir proceeded to purchase contracting equipment and obtained a Quikbrik job. Weir telephoned Albert J. Forst, then business agent of Local No. 5, and told him he wanted a plasterer to work on a job, stating that Dalton said it was O. K. Weir told Forst that his work was cleared through the union. Forst was unable to reach Dalton by telephone to verify Weir's statement. Forst sent a plasterer, member of Local No. 5, to Weir to work on the job he then had. The job was completed in about a week.

At a second interview with Dalton, Weir discussed the matter as to whether or not the "striking of the joints" was to be performed by union plasterers or by ordinary union labor. Dalton insisted that this operation be performed by union plasterers.

Weir organized or caused to be organized the plaintiff Quikbrik Company of Chicago, Inc., and subscribed to 75% of its capital stock.

Upon obtaining two additional contracts for Quikbrik jobs Weir telephoned John Boland, a business agent for Local No. 5, to secure union plasterers. At Weir's request Boland called at Weir's home on a Saturday where he was told that Weir had two jobs to do and wanted union plasterers. Boland said he would have to check with Dalton. Weir suggested that he telephone Dalton as he needed the men for Monday morning. After making the telephone call Boland told Weir "I am sorry you did not make an impression on Dalton. I can do nothing for you. You are through." Weir proceeded to perform the work with non-union plasterers.

Weir never did appear before Local No. 5's examining board and obtain approval of himself or the corporation as a plastering contractor eligible to employ its members as required by Sec. 96 of the Union's Constitution and By-Laws. The corporate plaintiff, Quikbrik Company of Chicago proceeded to do twelve or more Quikbrik jobs between July and October 1952.

In February of 1953 plaintiff Weir obtained a distributor's franchise from American Cement Products Company giving him the right to appoint dealer-applicators within a territory consisting of portions of Illinois, Wisconsin and Indiana. Weir solicited and obtained contracts from seven Chicago plastering contractors. Each such dealer was required to purchase an initial order of Quikbrik and to rent various tools at a total cost of $1350.

In April of 1953 one of these Chicago Plastering contractors, defendant J. Woodcock, who was not a member of the Association, told Weir he had turned down an offer of a Quikbrik job, stating

> "You know I can't do it. Dalton is mad at you and I can not proceed. I can not do any more Quikbrik jobs until you get straightened out with Dalton. Go down to the Union hall and make a date to go before their executive board. Maybe that will straighten it out."

Weir called at the union hall where Forst told him that "Dalton is handling that whole deal of yours". Weir tried to reach Dalton by telephone many times and called at his office but Dalton refused to talk to him. Some of the Chicago plastering contractor dealer-applicators of Quikbrik did not reorder after their initial order. American Cement Products Company cancelled its contracts with plaintiff Weir in January of 1954. Following a meeting with Dalton, Sands, manager of American Cement Products had written Dalton in December of 1953 that "we have completely washed our hands of Art Weir as a distributor."

The Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. A. § 1) declares illegal:

> "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations * * *"

A contract, combination or conspiracy is an essential element of a violation.

[No Evidence of Agreement]

The record clearly establishes that plaintiffs were unable to secure union plasterers. Whether this was because of Dalton's displeasure with Weir because of the latter's desire to use other than union plasterers for that phase of Quikbrik application described as "striking the joints", Weir's subsequent employment of non-union help, or for some other reason, it is equally apparent that the record is barren of any evidence of a combination, agreement or conspiracy among the defendants either to boycott the product Quikbrik, boycott Weir as a distributor, or boycott Weir or Chicago Quikbrik Company, Inc., as dealer-applicators. Nor, in our opinion, could the jury have properly reached a conclusion that such a conspiracy existed by any reasonable inference from the facts proven. There is a total absence of proof that any restraint of any kind existed as to the flow of Quikbrik materials in interstate commerce or as to its use. Plastering contractors, members of Association, performed Quikbrik jobs with union plasterers and plaintiffs performed Quikbrik jobs with non-union help without interference from Local No. 5 or from any of the defendants. Dalton's or Local No. 5's refusal to furnish union plasterers to plaintiffs was not shown to have been pursuant to any combination, agreement or conspiracy with any of the other defendants. The requirements of Sec. 96 of the Constitution and By-Laws of Local No. 5 were not shown to have been the result of any agreement or conspiracy with the Association, the Institute or the plastering contractor defendants. Sec. 96 is not, as plaintiffs infer, a part of the collective bargaining agreement between Local No. 5 and the Association. And neither the requirements of Sec. 96 nor any refusal of Dalton or Local No. 5 to furnish union plasterers to plaintiffs constituted a violation of 15 U. S. C. A. § 1. In Hunt v. Crumboch [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,385] 325 U. S. 821, 824 it is pointed out that:

> "It is not a violation of the Sherman Act for laborers in combination to refuse to work. They can sell or not sell their labor as they please, and upon such terms and conditions as they choose, without infringing the Antitrust laws. Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U. S. 469, 502-503. A worker is privileged under congressional enactments, acting either alone or in concert with his fellow workers, to associate or to decline to associate with other workers, to accept, refuse to accept, or to terminate a relationship of employment, and his labor is not to be treated as "a commodity or article of commerce." Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, 731; Norris-LaGuardia Act, 47 Stat. 70; see also American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Council, 257 U. S. 184, 209."

There being no evidence of concert with others in either connection, the doctrine of Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3 [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,386], 325 U. S. 797 has no application. That points of contact or relationships for promotion of mutual interests existed among the defendants on other matters, such as support of Institute, does not on the facts here proven give rise to any reasonable inference that plaintiffs' difficulties with Dalton or Local No. 5 were the result of agreement or concert of action between the Local and its president and any one or more of the other defendants.

Plaintiffs claim a violation of that portion of 29 U. S. C. A. § 187 which makes it unlawful for any labor organization:

"* * * to engage in, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer to engage in, a strike or a concerted refusal in the course of their employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services, where an object thereof is—

(1) forcing or requiring any * * * employer or other person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person * * *".

In this connection plaintiffs contend that Local No. 5 engaged in a concerted refusal to furnish labor to Weir with the object of compelling him to cease doing business with his supplier of Quikbrik materials and that after Weir became a distributor Local No. 5 engaged in a refusal to supply labor to contractor-dealers of Weir for the purpose of forcing Weir out of business. An examination of the record discloses no evidence that Dalton or Local No. 5 were in any manner opposed to Quikbrik or the supplier, American Cement Products Company. None of the defendants regarded Quikbrik as an inferior substitute for plaster or opposed its use. Plastering contractor members of the Association performed Quikbrik jobs with union labor without interference. The refusal to furnish union plasterers to Weir was not a secondary boycott. We find no merit in plaintiffs' contentions with respect to a violation of 29 U. S. C. A. § 187.

It is our conclusion that the evidence when viewed most favorably to plaintiffs, together with all reasonable inferences that might be drawn therefrom, would not warrant a jury finding that the conduct of defendants or any of them constituted a violation of either the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. A. § 1) or the Labor-Management Relations Act (29 U. S. C. A. § 187).

We have considered but find no merit in plaintiffs' claims of error in rulings on admission of evidence and offers of proof. Nor was the trial court's refusal to hear oral argument on the motions for a directed verdict reversible error. Cf. Federal Communications Commission v. WJR, 337 U. S. 265.

The failure to make findings of fact was not error. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure do not support plaintiffs' complaint of absence of findings. Findings of fact are not required on the granting of a motion for directed verdict.

The defendants' pleadings did not raise a question as to the constitutionality of 29 U. S. C. A. § 187 on its face and therefore certification to the Attorney General was not required. Cf. Keyes v. Madsen, D. C., 179 F. 2d 40. In any event it does not appear that plaintiffs were in any way prejudiced by failure of such certification.

Plaintiffs contend that it was error for the District Court's Executive Committee to make the reassignment of the case to the trial judge who heard it. A case involving similar issues had been heard previously by that judge and the rules of the district court authorized reassignment of a related cause. In any event no prejudice to plaintiff was shown.

The plaintiff has discussed other points in his brief. We have considered them and find them to be without merit.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Damage Action—Pretrial Procedures—Dismissal of Action—Factual Issues.—In a treble damage action, a complaint which charged a lessor of radio and television sets to hospital patients with violating the Sherman Act by entering into contracts with three hospitals whereby only such lessor could deal with patients in their hospitals was improperly dismissed for failure to state a cause of action. The court regarded as factual issues such questions as whether the hospitals were charitable institutions having an unrestricted right to make exclusive contracts, whether plaintiff engaged in interstate commerce, whether the contracts restrained trade and whether the plaintiff was injured by these acts or was entitled to any relief. Before the complaint may be dismissed in this way it must appear beyond doubt that the plaintiff could prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to any relief.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.440.

For the appellee: William W. Cochrane, Jr. (Norman P. Gordon, on brief), Kansas City, Mo.

Before Sanborn, Van Oosterhout and Matthes, Circuit Judges.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge [In full text]: This is an appeal from an order of the District Court dismissing the amended complaint of the plaintiff (appellant) upon the ground that it failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted.

The question for decision is whether it appears to a certainty that the plaintiff would be entitled to no relief under any state of facts which could be proved in support of his claim. Lada v. Wilkie, 8 Cir., 250 F. 2d 211, 212-213 and cases cited; Conley v. Gibson, 355 U. S. 41, 45-48.

The amended complaint alleged: That the action is based on 15 U. S. C. § 15, which gives to any person "injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws" the right to sue therefor in a district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, regardless of the amount in controversy, and to recover treble damages; that the plaintiff is a resident of the State of Missouri, and maintains a place of business in Kansas City, Kansas; that the defendant (appellee) is a Colorado corporation having a place of business in Kansas City, Missouri; that the plaintiff is and has been engaged in the business of renting, leasing and servicing television and radio receiving sets to persons receiving medical care in hospitals and infirmaries in Kansas City, Missouri, and Wyandotte and Johnson Counties, Kansas; that the defendant is engaged in the same line of business in the same general area; that prior to November 20, 1958, the defendant made a contract with St. Luke's Hospital in Kansas City, Missouri, whereby the defendant and the hospital undertook to agree that none of the patients in the hospital would be permitted to lease a television or radio receiving set except from defendant, and that the hospital would not allow any such sets upon its premises except those owned by the defendant or by the individual patients; that the defendant also, before November 20, 1958, entered into similar contracts with Bethany Hospital and Kansas University Medical Center, both of which are located in Wyandotte County, Kansas; that the contracts were, and are, an unreasonable restraint of trade within the meaning of the antitrust laws of the United States in that they tend to create and do create a monopoly wherein and whereby the defendant is enabled to exclude the plaintiff and others from renting television and radio receiving sets to patients who are receiving hospital care; that plaintiff's television and radio receiving sets move in interstate commerce in fulfilling rental contracts with hospital patients in Missouri; that more than 75% of plaintiff's rental business, at the time of the acts complained of, was transacted with patients confined in Missouri hospitals, and that such business moved in interstate commerce from Kansas to Missouri; that defendant, prior to November 20, 1958, entered into a conspiracy with others to monopolize the business of renting television and radio receiving sets to members of the public confined in St. Luke's Hospital, Bethany Hospital, and Kansas University Medical Center, and thereby unduly and unreasonably to restrain trade or commerce in the distribution and rental of such instruments to all such members of the general public, in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States; that the defendant, in furtherance of its design and purpose, caused St. Luke's Hospital to notify the plaintiff of its contract with the defendant and to cease renting television or radio sets to patients; that Bethany Hospital and Kansas University Medical Center have each refused to permit plaintiff to contract with patients for the rental of such sets; that the acts of the defendant and its contracts with the hospitals are in restraint of trade and constitute a monopoly and an attempt to monopolize, depriving plaintiff of a substantial part of his market for his television and radio receiving sets, rendering his business unprofitable, and depriving him of profits, to his damage in the total sum of $25,000.

The amended complaint, in Count One, prays for treble damages, and, in Count Two, for injunctive relief to prevent the defendant from carrying out, or continuing in force, the contracts already made with St. Luke's Hospital, Bethany Hospital, and Kansas University Medical Center, and from entering into or carrying out any other contracts or conspiracies intended to monopolize the rental market for television or radio receiving sets or to exclude the plaintiff therefrom.

The defendant, in its motion to dismiss the amended complaint, asserted:

> "1. The complaint fails to state a claim against defendant upon which relief can be granted.
> "2. The complaint fails to allege facts showing involvement of interstate commerce or any effect thereon.
> "3. The complaint fails to allege facts showing either restraint of trade in interstate commerce or injury to the public."

The District Court, in sustaining the motion, said:

> "It is the opinion of the court that the court must sustain said motion for two reasons. First, that the hospitals mentioned in the complaint have a right to make such contracts as they desire for the supplying of materials to the institutions or the patients located therein. Second, that the allegations of the complaint do not constitute a restraint of trade within the meaning of the statute."

We are of the opinion that the District Court erred in attempting to dispose of this litigation by dismissing plaintiff's amended complaint.

Whether the hospitals referred to in the amended complaint are charitable institutions having an unrestricted right to enter into exclusive contracts with the defendant, whether the plaintiff in the carrying on of its business is engaged in interstate commerce, whether the contracts complained of are in restraint of trade or commerce within the meaning of the antitrust laws of the United States, and whether the plaintiff has been injured by the acts of the defendant or is entitled to any relief, we regard as factual issues.

The attitude of this Court toward attempts to terminate litigation, believed to be without merit, by dismissing a complaint for insufficiency of statement has been adequately stated in Publicity Building Realty Corp. v. Hannegan, 8 Cir., 139 F. 2d 583, 586-587, and restated in Lada v. Wilkie, supra, pages 212-213 of 250 F. 2d. No matter how reasonably it may be surmised or predicted that a plaintiff will be unable to establish on a trial the claim stated in his complaint or to obtain any relief, he is, nevertheless, entitled to make the attempt unless it appears beyond doubt that he can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to any relief. Conley v. Gibson, supra, pages 45-48 of 355 U. S.

As this Court said in Lada v. Wilkie, supra, page 215 of 250 F. 2d:

"The plaintiffs' claim may, at a trial on the merits, prove to be groundless, but, as was said by Mr. Justice Brandeis in Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., 303 U. S. 41, 51-52, 58 S. Ct. 459, 464, 82 L. Ed. 638, 'Lawsuits also often prove to have been groundless; but no way has been discovered of relieving a defendant from the necessity of a trial to establish the fact.'"

The order appealed from is reversed and the case is remanded with directions to reinstate the plaintiff's amended complaint and to try the case on the merits.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, Western Division. No. 5778 Civil. Filed November 19, 1959.

Case No. 904 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Monopolies—Modification of Consent Decree—Acquisition of Stock or Assets—Conglomerate Integration.—A manufacturer of glass fiber products was denied modification of a consent decree to permit it to acquire the business and assets of a group of companies that manufacture plastic construction panels containing fiber glass mats. The decree, which prohibited defendants from acquiring ownership interest in any glass fiber manufacturer, covers the proposed acquisition. Even though a competitor, not limited by a decree, has done what defendant wishes to do, "nothing less than a clear showing of grievous wrong evoked by new and unforeseen conditions should lead us to change what was decreed . . . with the consent of all concerned" (U. S. v. Swift & Co., 286 U. S. 106). Change in the industry is continuous and desirable, and conditions have not changed sufficiently to justify the modification. To modify the decree for this one purpose would "go to the very heart of the prohibitions." If the applicant wishes to enter the new field, let him do so without treading on the decree.

KLOEB, Judge [In full text]: On June 23, 1949, an entry of final judgment was filed in the above numbered case [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,442]. The complaint in the case stated a cause against the defendants under Section 2 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Act, as amended.

The entry of final judgment reads in part as follows:

"The Plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its amended complaint herein on July 16, 1948; the defendants Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation, Owens-Illinois Glass Company, and Corning Glass Works, having appeared and filed their consolidated answer to the amended complaint denying the violation of law charged therein; and the plaintiff and said defendants by their attorneys having severally consented to the entry of this Final Judgment without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein and without admission of any party defendant in respect of any such issue;

"Now, Therefore, before any testimony has been taken herein, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and upon consent as aforesaid of all the parties hereto, it is hereby Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed as follows:

"* * *

"II.

"* * *

"(N) 'Glass fiber products' means articles which are manufactured by or for producers of glass fibers and which are made from or contain glass fibers in the usual commercial forms, including glass wool, glass textiles, and glass fiber mat.

"* * *

"XI.

"Each of the defendants Owens-Illinois and Corning, so long as it owns or controls any shares of stock or other financial interest in Owens-Corning, and defendant Owens-Corning, is hereby enjoined and restrained from acquiring, directly or indirectly, any ownership interest, by purchase or acquisition of assets or of securities or otherwise, in any person engaged in whole or in part in the manufacture, sale or distribution of glass fibers or glass fiber products in the United States, or from leasing, or from acquiring any control over, any such person.

"* * *

"XVI.

"Jurisdiction is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this judgment to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this judgment or for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, and for the purpose of the enforcement of compliance therewith and the punishment of violations thereof."

On September 21, 1959, ten years and three months after the entry of the final judgment, defendant Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corporation filed its application pursuant to the above article XVI for an order construing or modifying article XI of the judgment, in furtherance of a proposed acquisition by applicant of the business and assets of a number of companies collectively referred to as "Alsynite".

The application recites that the proposed acquisition is sought in order to enable applicant to commence the manufacture of plastic construction panels which are reinforced with glass fiber mat, and in order to commence the manufacture of these panels applicant proposes to acquire the assets and business of Alsynite, which is one of six of the leading manufacturers of plastic construction panels. The fiber glass mat used as the basis or reinforcement of the plastic construction panels is manufactured by applicant and, from the record, applicant appears to be the chief manufacturer of fiber glass mat that is furnished to approximately sixty companies that are engaged in the manufacture of plastic construction panels, which are a rigid, structurally stable, building material made by subjecting plastic, containing glass fiber mat as a reinforcing agent, simultaneously to heat and pressure to form a dense, tough slab of predetermined shape and size. These panels are in competition, in the construction market, with steel, aluminum, plywood and glass. They have the advantage of being translucent.

In furtherance of the consent judgment entered on June 23, 1949, applicant herein licensed Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company and Johns-Manville Corporation to use its patents and, subsequent thereto, the Johns-Manville Corporation acquired Glass Fibers Company from the Libbey-Owens-Ford Glass Company and is now engaged in the manufacture of fiber glass mats which it supplies to its subsidiary, Corrulux, for the manufacture of plastic construction panels. Its offering of fiber glass mats to any of the sixty manufacturers of such panels is exceedingly limited. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company is not now engaged in the manufacture of fiber glass roving or mats. It thus appears that applicant is looked to by the trade for substantially all of their supply of fiber glass mats and, through the acquisition of Alsynite, applicant desires to enter the field of processing and manufacturing these plastic contruction panels.

Applicant takes the position, and properly so, that the only questions for determination under its application are, first, whether the judgment as written covers the proposed acquisition, and, second, if it does so cover, whether the judgment should be modified so as not to prohibit by its terms such acquisition of Alsynite in view of changes of circumstances that are alleged to have occurred since 1949. It is the position of applicant that the judgment should be construed as not including plastic construction panels within the definition of glass fiber products, but as including only those products which were glass fiber products at the time the judgment was entered.

It is conceded that at the time the judgment was entered the glass fiber industry was then in its infancy, and that, while there are thousands of uses that have developed for glass fiber products, many of these uses have been developed since 1949, and included in these new uses is the employment of glass fiber mats in the manufacture of plastic construction panels.

Applicant desires the acquisition of Alsynite because it will provide applicant with manufacturing facilities and know-how respecting plastic construction panels and will enable applicant to intensify its marketing efforts for such panels because the Alsynite distribution system will provide applicant with access to ultimate customers for such panels. It is frankly conceded that it is the acquisition of the customers of Alsynite that is the prime consideration in desiring to purchase Alsynite in its entirety.

On October 5, 1959, the Government filed its memorandum in opposition to the application filed herein. It opposes the application on the grounds that, first, the proposal is prohibited by the clear language of articles XI and II(N) of the final judgment, and second, modification of the final judgment is not warranted on the basis of the facts set forth in the application, and third, the proposal, if consummated, would be contrary to the public interest and the spirit of the antitrust laws and would raise serious questions under Section 7 of the Clayton Act.

In its memorandum, the Government takes the position that the plastic construction panels are a "glass fiber product" within the meaning of article II(N) and that, therefore, the proposal of applicant comes squarely within article XI of the final judgment and is prohibited by it. With this position we agree and, in view of the provisions of these articles, we are of the opinion that the proposed acquisition does come within the prohibition of the final judgment and is forbidden by it.

On the question of the proposed modification of the final judgment, the Government takes the position, as heretofore stated, that such modification is not warranted on the basis of the facts set forth in the application.

On October 20, applicant filed a memorandum in reply to the memorandum of the Government and, after the filing of numerous affidavits and letters which were later admitted in evidence, the application was set for hearing and was heard on October 22, 1959. On that date, a number of witnesses were offered by the Government and a number of exhibits were offered by both parties and admitted by the Court.

We come, therefore, to the question of whether or not, under the state of the record, modification of the final judgment would be warranted on the ground that the manufacture of plastic construction panels through the use of fiber glass mats is a new use not contemplated at the time of the entry of the final judgment; that to forbid the acquisition of Alsynite would work a hardship upon applicant in view of the fact that at least one of applicant's competitors, to wit, the Johns-Manville Corporation, is free to proceed with the manufacture of the plastic construction panels through the acquisition of Glass Fibers Company, unfettered by the restrictions of a consent judgment such as binds the applicant; that applicant is, therefore, placed at a competitive disadvantage with the Johns-Manville Corporation and perhaps others, including Pittsburgh Plate Glass, that may in the future desire to enter the field of the manufacture of plastic construction panels. Applicant concedes that it intends to enter this field of activity whether the acquisition of Alsynite is permitted or not, and that to set up facilities for the manufacture of the plastic construction panels would not be an intricate or expensive procedure, but that the know-how and customers of Alsynite would be of great benefit to applicant when it does enter the field.

We find the case of United States v. Swift & Co., et al. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,005], 286 U. S. 106, to be very helpful in our search for guiding precedents.

In this case, which was a Sherman Act case brought by the Government against the leading meat packers in the country, a consent decree was entered on February 27, 1920, and, on April 12, 1930, approximately ten years and two months after the entry of the decree, two of the defendants, Swift & Co. and Armour & Co., and their subsidiaries, filed a petition to modify the consent decree and to adapt its restraints to the needs of a new day. On January 31, 1931, the decree was modified by a lower Court and such modification became the subject of appeal.

Mr. Justice Cardozo delivered the opinion of the Court on May 2, 1932, and, on page 115, we find the following:

> "Power to modify existing, we are brought to the question whether enough has been shown to justify its exercise.
> "The defendants, controlled by experienced business men, renounced the privilege of trading in groceries, whether in concert or independently, and did this with their eyes open. * * *", and, on page 119, we find the following:

"There is need to keep in mind steadily the limits of inquiry proper to the case before us. We are not framing a decree. We are asking ourselves whether anything has happened that will justify us now in changing a decree. The injunction, whether right or wrong, is not subject to impeachment in its application to the conditions that existed at its making. We are not at liberty to reverse under the guise of readjusting. Life is never static, and the passing of a decade has brought changes to the grocery business as it has to every other. The inquiry for us is whether the changes are so important that dangers, once substantial, have become attenuated to a shadow. No doubt the defendants will be better off if the injunction is relaxed, but they are not suffering hardship so extreme and unexpected as to justify us in saying that they are the victims of oppression. Nothing less than a clear showing of grievous wrong evoked by new and unforeseen conditions should lead us to change what was decreed after years of litigation with the consent of all concerned."

The decree modifying the injunction was accordingly reversed.

We are of the opinion that, in view of the tight requirements laid down in the Swift and Company case, and in view of the record that is before us under this application, this Court would not be warranted in decreeing a modification of the judgment so as to permit the acquisition of Alsynite. Despite the fact that applicant stresses that it would limit the effects of a modification to the particular new use of the glass fiber product that is in mind here, we feel that this could not be done in view of the fact that it is conceded that thousands of new uses have not only been introduced in very recent years but that undoubtedly it is anticipated and hoped for that many new uses will be employed in the years to come. A modification that would relinquish the requirements of the decree for this one purpose would, therefore, go to the very heart of the prohibitions that were consented to in the final judgment and would, in effect, virtually nullify a great portion of it.

We believe that, if applicant desires to enter the field of manufacture of plastic construction panels, it would be better to do so without treading upon or attempting to modify the restrictions of the consent judgment. The application is denied. An order may be drawn accordingly.

[¶ 69,570] United States of America v. Vulcanized Rubber and Plastics Company.

In the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. Civil Action No. 26184. Filed December 3, 1959.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Violation of Cease and Desist Order—Civil Penalty Suit—Interpretation of FTC Order Found Proper.—Civil penalties in the amount of $30,000 have been imposed against a company for violation of a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order prohibiting the company from representing that combs manufactured with a synthetic are "'rubber' or 'hard rubber' or are made of 'rubber' or 'hard rubber' unless such combs are in fact made of vulcanized hard rubber." The Commission in subsequently construing its order, prohibited the use of the legend "rubber-resin", even though the materials of which the combs were then made were rubber and resin. The company's contention that the terms "rubber" and "hard rubber" when applied to combs, have acquired a secondary meaning broad enough to include plastics and containing a minuscule portion of synthetic rubber, even though vulcanization had no part in its manufacture, was properly rejected by the Commission on appropriate evidence. The cease and desist order did not exceed the bounds of the complaint and the Commission's interpretation of the order was proper.

Opinion

[FTC Action—Misrepresentation of Combs]

EGAN, District Judge [In full text]: This matter was certified to the Attorney General by the Federal Trade Commission pursuant to Section 16 of the Federal Trade Commission Act as amended (15 U. S. C. § 56) for the purpose of recovering civil penalties as provided in Section 5(1) of the said Act as amended (15 U. S. C. § 45(1), Supp. V, 1952), in the amount of $30,000 from the defendant, Vulcanized Rubber and Plastics Company, a Maine corporation, whose general offices and factory are located at Morrisville, Bucks County, Pennsylvania.

[Imposition of Fines]

The penalties are claimed to be due because it is alleged that defendant, a manufacturer of combs for use in human hair, violated a cease and desist order issued by the Commission. Six separate violations are charged for which a penalty of $5,000 each has been imposed by the Commission.

[Jurisdiction]

Under Section 28 U. S. C. 1345, the several District Courts of the United States are vested with original jurisdiction of all civil action suits or proceedings commenced by the United States, including suits for the recovery or enforcement of any fine, penalty or forfeiture incurred under any Act of Congress; and under 28 U. S. C. 1395(a), which provides that any civil proceeding for the recovery of pecuniary fines, penalties and forfeitures may be prosecuted in the district where a defendant is found.

[Combs Labeled as "Rubber"]

The Commission's complaint in 1954 was directed against the labeling of defendant's combs as "rubber" and "hard rubber".

The Commission's order issued in 1957 after extensive hearings[1] and was to the effect that defendant

> "cease and desist from representing * * * that (defendant's) combs are 'rubber' or 'hard rubber' or are made of 'rubber' or 'hard rubber' unless such combs are in fact made of vulcanized hard rubber."

Pursuant to the order of the Commission, the defendant terminated any branding or advertising of its product as "rubber" or "hard rubber." Thereafter it labeled the combs "rubber-resin" and so advised the Commission in a compliance affidavit.

[Labeling Combs as "Rubber-Resin" Disapproved]

About six months after the Commission's order issued, the Commission wrote to defendant construing its order to mean that the use of the legend "rubber-resin" was also prohibited within the meaning of its order, even though the materials of which the combs were then made were rubber and resin.

[Petition for Review]

A timely petition for review of this construction by the Commission was filed by defendant in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The Court of Appeals, noting that "this interpretation may be changed or it may never be enforced," held that "there is no controversy calling for judicial review of the interpretation at the present time." Accordingly, the petition for review was dismissed. No petition for certiorari was filed.

Thereafter the dispute between the parties persisted. The Commission continued to insist upon its disapproval of the use of the legend "rubber-resin" and defendant continued to contend for its right to use it.

[Civil Penalty Suit]

The Commission issued no new complaint and held no further or additional hearings but commenced this suit to recover penalties.

[1] The lengthy record consists of 3720 pages with approximately 200 exhibits, both documentary and physical. A total of 19 expert witnesses were called, 11 by the Commission and 8 by the defendant.

Defendant filed an answer wherein it admitted all the material allegations of fact charged in the complaint. Both sides moved for summary judgment.

[Scope of FTC Order To Be Determined]

The precise issue before the Court is whether the use of the legend "rubber-resin," which defendant is now using upon the combs of its manufacture, is prohibited by an order directing it to cease representing that its combs are "rubber" or "hard rubber" or are made of rubber or hard rubber manufactured by the vulcanized hard rubber process. To a large extent, the answer depends on whether this is a new issue not heretofore litigated.

[Methods Used for Comb Manufacture]

For many years defendant has been engaged in the manufacture of combs for use in human hair. Until 1950 it made all such combs by the sulphur vulcanized method. Under this process rubber and sulphur are vulcanized under heat, the result of the process being a distinct and definite product known in the industry as "hard rubber." Oliver-Sherwood Co. v. Patterson-Ballagh Corp., 95 F. 2d 70, 77 (9th Cir. 1938).

Late in 1950 defendant commenced making the combs from a patented product manufactured by the United States Rubber Company under patents owned by it and sold by it under its trade name "Kralastic." The patented product is made up of 13% rubber, 85% resin and 2% coloring and other ingredients.

[Litigation Issue]

Defendant indicates that the issue litigated before the Commission concerns itself with combs made by the sulphur vulcanized method and not to the new method which defendant adopted in late 1950; that therefore there was no adjudication and that the defendant is not in violation of the Commission's order.

[Hearing Examiner's Finding]

It is difficult to see how the defendant can maintain this position in view of the following finding of the Hearing Examiner which was adopted by the Commission:

> "The gist of this proceeding is whether or not the representations of respondent in its advertising and labeling or branding of combs that are made of Kralastic D as 'Hard Rubber' or 'Rubber' are false, misleading and deceptive. It is found that they are false, misleading and deceptive as these combs are not made or composed of rubber or hard rubber but are made or composed in large part of materials other than rubber or hard rubber and do not contain any sulphur and are not made by the vulcanization process but are admittedly made by the injection mold or extrusion process."

The newer method used by defendant is faster and cheaper.

[First Defense]

The defendant stated, for a first defense, in its answer filed with the Commission:

> "10. The respondent's combs are made or composed of a synthetic rubber which is as equally embraced within the meaning of the terms 'rubber' and 'hard rubber' as 'tree rubber.' The synthetic rubber used in respondent's combs possesses qualities and properties which render it as equally suited for use in combs as 'tree rubber': * * *."

[Second Defense]

Defendant also stated, for its second defense, in part, as follows:

> "12. The purchasing public understands the terms 'rubber' and 'hard rubber' to include synthetic rubber as well as 'tree rubber' and the public is not misled by the use of such terms to describe combs made of synthetic rubber. The purchasing public does not distinguish between or prefer 'hard rubber' combs made of 'tree rubber' to 'hard rubber' combs made of synthetic rubber. * * *"

[Secondary Meaning for "Rubber" Presented]

At the hearings before the Hearing Examiner, defendant conceded that it was not using vulcanized rubber in the manufacture of its combs. Rather it contended that the terms "rubber" and "hard rubber," when applied to combs, had acquired a secondary meaning broad enough to include plastics and containing a minuscule portion of synthetic rubber even though vulcanization had no part in its manufacture.

[Rejection of Defenses Proper]

On a full and complete record, the Hearing Examiner, as well as the Commission, rejected defendant's novel defense. We think properly so.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Scope of FTC Order Questioned]

After the defendant lost its case before the Commission, it started to brand its combs "rubber-resin" and indicated that they were made of "rubber-resin." Defendant now takes the position that its combs marked "rubber-resin" are, in fact, made of such substances and that there is no misrepresentation or intention to represent to the purchasers thereof that the same are, in fact, made of "rubber" or "hard rubber;" that the issuance of such a cease and desist order is a condition precedent to an action for the civil penalty provided for in the Federal Trade Commission Act; that this requires a proceeding de novo and that this action is fatally defective by reason thereof.

[Trade Name Controversy]

If this were a simple problem in semantics, there might be some merit to defendant's contention. But it is not. It is a substantive controversy as to trade terms which have gained a special meaning by their use and acceptance in the comb making industry over a period of years. By the device of giving them a secondary meaning, which was rejected by the Commission on appropriate evidence, defendant would have us frustrate the Commission's order which defendant says is not broad enough to bar its present maneuver. With this we cannot agree.

No question has been raised as to the application of the maximum penalty to each breach of the Commission's order and we do not discuss it.

[Inapplicability of Estoppel and Laches Defenses]

Defendant insinuates that the Commission has been guilty of laches and is estopped from proceeding because it was informed in February 1951 by one of the Commission's staff that the Commission would not issue a complaint against it because of the use of the new process. These defenses are not available to the defendant and the Commission properly so found. The equitable defenses of estoppel and laches do not apply against the Government in a suit by it in the public interest. F. T. C. v. Algoma Lumber Co., et al., 291 U. S. 67, 80; F. T. C. v. Bunte Bros. Inc. [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,098], 312 U. S. 349, 352; Utah Power & Light Co. v. U. S., 243 U. S. 389, 409. The same rule applies to the hearings of a public agency when it is acting in its administrative or judicial capacity. Wallace Corp. v. N. L. R. B., 323 U. S. 248, 253; P. Lorillard Co. v. F. T. C., 186 F. 2d 52, 55-56.

[FTC Order Appropriate]

In the case before us, we find that the Commission's order does not go beyond the bounds of the complaint and that its interpretation of its order is a proper one. See Masland Duraleather Co. et al. v. F. T. C., 34 F. 2d 733, 736 (3rd Cir. 1929); Arrow Metal Products Corporation, et al. v. F. T. C. [1957 Trade Cases ¶ 68,847], 249 F. 2d 83 (3rd Cir. 1957); Jacob Siegel v. F. T. C., 150 F. 2d 751 (3rd Cir. 1944); Marietta Mfg. Co. v. F. T. C., 50 F. 2d 641 (7th Cir. 1931).

[Cited Cases Inapplicable]

We have examined Milk and Ice Cream Can Institute v. F. T. C. [1946-1947 Trade Cases ¶ 57,429], 152 F. 2d 478 (7th Cir. 1946) and Arrow Metal Products Corporation v. F. T. C., supra, on which defendant so heavily relies and find them inapplicable. The former was a proceeding against an unincorporated trade association, the members of which manufactured practically all of the milk and ice cream cans sold and distributed in the United States. The cans were shipped f. o. b. their various plants and an adjustment was made in freight rates so that the delivered price was the same to all purchasers regardless of who sold and the distance shipped. It did not involve the use of trade names or the names of manufactured products. The latter case really supports the position of the plaintiff. There the Commission found that the use of the term "porcenamel" to describe appellant's awning products carried with it a representation that the awning products were coated with porcelain enamel, when they were actually coated with an organic plastic resin. The Commission entered a cease and desist order and approved the Hearing Examiner's findings. As indicated, this was approved by the District Court and by our Court of Appeals.

[Summary Judgment]

Summary judgment will be entered for the plaintiff. Counsel will submit an appropriate Order.

[Requests for Admission]

CASHIN, District Judge [In full text]: Defendants, Longines-Wittnauer Watch Co., Inc. and Wittnauer et Cie, S. A., object to plaintiff's request for admission of genuineness of documents dated November 24, 1959. Presumably the objection is on the ground that the request is "improper". (Rule 36, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure). The plaintiff had previously served a request concerning the same documents in issue now. The moving defendants, in response to the request, served a sworn statement setting forth reasons why they could not truthfully admit or deny the genuineness of the documents. Subsequently, the plaintiff took depositions which, it contends, give sufficient information for the moving defendants to admit the genuineness of the documents.

[Objections]

Defendants apparently base their objections on the following grounds:—

1. Only one request for admission concerning the genuineness of any particular document is authorized by the rules;

2. My prior opinion of October 26, 1959 has put the plaintiff irrevocably to its proof; and

3. There is still not sufficient information for the moving defendants either to admit or deny the genuineness of the documents truthfully.

[Second Request Proper]

Both sides concede that there is no case law concerning the first basis for objection. Plaintiff, however, contends that Professor Moore in the 2nd Edition of his treatise on

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Federal Practice, Volume 4, § 36.05, supports the service of successive requests. It is also argued that because the use of written interrogatories or of oral depositions does not preclude a subsequent use of the other form of discovery, subsequent requests for admissions are also authorized.

I do not believe that either of these arguments controls the present question. As I read Professor Moore, he is speaking of successive requests concerning different facts or documents. Successive use of interrogatories and oral depositions, at least insofar as parties are concerned, is specifically provided for in Rule 33. Nevertheless, because these two arguments are not controlling, I am still not impelled to hold in favor of the defendants. We have long since abandoned the theory of a trial as a contest of tactics between counsel. (Cf. Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495 (1947).) To interpret Rule 36 in accordance with the moving defendants' contention would be to return to that theory. This is an antitrust suit which must be tried, to a great extent, on documents. Perhaps plaintiff was somewhat premature in serving its first request.[1] Unequivocal answers by defendants would tend to expedite the trial of the action. The mere fact that they have already denied sufficient knowledge will not preclude present answers if the circumstances so warrant.

[Prior Opinion]

Defendants' second argument is equally without merit. In their "Statement of Objections to Notice of Request for Admission" defendants quoted that portion of my Opinion of October 26, 1959 [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,516], which reads as follows:—

> "On the basis of information presently before the court, except for certain oversights which defendants Longines and Wittnauer have agreed to correct, all documents, whose authenticity is reasonably susceptible of knowledge on the part of Longines and Wittnauer, have been admitted.
> "Thus, the government must prepare for trial by the ordinary methods, and must prove the authenticity of the documents it intends to rely upon under the usual rules of evidence."

From this quotation defendants conclude that answers to the present request are not warranted. However, it is clear that the ruling that the Government must prepare for trial by the ordinary methods was grounded "On the basis of information presently before the court * * *." There is now further information before the court which indicates that further answers might well materially aid the expeditious disposition of the lawsuit. Accordingly, the second basis of objections by defendants is without merit.

[Sufficient Information]

The third ground of objection urged by defendants can also be overruled. The operation of requests for admissions and answers thereto is essentially extra-judicial. Therefore, it is not incumbent upon the court to rule, pre-trial, whether the parties served with the request have sufficient information upon which to base an unequivocal answer. Rather, the parties upon whom the request is served must either affirm or deny unequivocally, or deny knowledge or information upon which to base an unequivocal answer at the peril of incurring the sanction provided by Rule 37(c). (See my Opinion in this case dated November 19, 1959 [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,550]).

I do not intend by this Opinion to hold that a party, even in a protracted case, can serve numerous successive requests where the serving party had or should have had enough information to serve one request which would resolve all factual issues which could be the subject of admission. I merely hold that in the instant case the defendants have not shown that the plaintiff did have or should have had enough information to serve an all-inclusive request for admissions in the first instance. I do not now state what conditions must be present before a subsequent request for admissions on the same facts or documents which were the subject of a previous request might be so onerous or burdensome as to warrant its striking.

[Objections Overruled]

The defendants' objections are overruled in their entirety.

It is so ordered.

---

[1] I do not mean to imply by this statement a holding that the plaintiff was premature. As pointed out in my prior Opinion of October 26, 1959 I will not consider the propriety of any answer given by defendants but will reserve such question until after the trial of the action.

In the Pennsylvania Court of Common Pleas for Philadelphia County. No. 3343. In Equity. Certified December 4, 1959.

Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade—Noncontracting Dealer—Application of Fair Trade Law to Retailer Where No Mention of It in Sales Contract.—A retail gasoline dealer was permanently enjoined from selling plaintiff's gasoline below the fair trade price. Although the sales contract between the parties made no mention of the Fair Trade Act and it expressly provided for modification only by agreement of the parties, it was subject to the subsequent application of the Act which was in existence when the contract was entered into.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3258.40.

Fair Trade—Enforcement Action—Defenses—Antitrust Violation By the Enforcing Party.—In a fair trade enforcement action a gasoline retailer did not succeed in establishing the defense that the plaintiff gasoline producer engaged in a price fixing conspiracy. Parallel pricing among competitive gasoline producers and their simultaneous invocation of the benefits of the Fair Trade Act did not establish a conspiracy in restraint of trade. Similarly, arguments and evidence of other alleged inequitable conduct of the plaintiff were not sufficient to nullify the right to enforce its fair trade prices.

See Fair Trade, Vol. 1, ¶ 3428.40.

Fair Trade—Commodities Which May Be Fair Traded—Gasoline.—In a fair trade enforcement action an argument of the defendant gasoline retailer that gasoline sold by him was not within the purview of the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts was rejected. The tank which provided a continuous flow of gasoline to the pump when needed, where the pump bore the label of the producer or distributor, was considered a container within the meaning of the McGuire Act.

Statement of the Pleadings

GLEESON, Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff is the owner of the trademarks and brands, "Sinclair H-C" and "Sinclair Power X" Gasoline, under which its gasolines are sold in competition with other gasolines within the Commonwealth. Defendant is a retail dealer in Sinclair Gasolines who maintains a service station in Philadelphia pursuant to various written agreements between the parties. Plaintiff seeks to restrain defendant from selling gasoline under plaintiff's trademarks and brands at prices below those stipulated in a Fair Trade Agreement executed by plaintiff and another of its retail dealers pursuant to the provisions of the Act of June 5, 1935, P. L. 266, as amended, 73 P. S. 7-11, commonly known as the Fair Trade Act.

Defendant, by way of defense, argues mainly that plaintiff is not entitled to relief because its gasolines are not sold in free and open competition with gasolines of the same general class produced by others and also raises certain other defenses.

The parties have agreed that the hearing and application for preliminary injunction should be considered as the final hearing on the merits of the controversy.

Findings of Fact

1. Plaintiff, Sinclair Refining Company, is a corporation organized and existing under the law of the State of Maine and is transacting business within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

2. Defendant, Russell Gentzsch, is an individual who maintains and operates a gasoline service station at the northeast corner of Windrim and Wyoming Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa., where he sells gasolines produced by plaintiff.

3. Plaintiff's gasolines are marketed and sold under the trademarks, brands and names, "Sinclair H-C Gasoline" and "Sinclair Power X Gasoline", within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

4. The pumps from which Sinclair gasolines are dispensed by Sinclair dealers, including defendant, bear these trademarks, brands and names.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

5. Plaintiff has expended and is expending large sums of money in advertising and promoting the sale of its gasolines under its trademarks, brands and names, Sinclair H-C Gasoline and Sinclair Power X Gasoline, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and nationally, and has established a valuable and unique reputation and good will for its gasolines under their respective trademarks, brands and names. (In 1958 plaintiff expended approximately $225,000 for advertising its gasolines in the Philadelphia area.)

6. On October 18, 1957 plaintiff and defendant executed a refined oil sales agreement (Form 731-D) whereby plaintiff agreed to sell and defendant agreed to buy certain quantities of plaintiff's gasolines during each yearly period the agreement should be in effect.

7. Pursuant to the provisions of the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act, plaintiff entered into a Fair Trade Agreement with one of its retail dealers in Philadelphia, Pa., on October 30, 1958, whereby the dealer agreed not to resell Sinclair H-C Gasoline and Sinclair Power X Gasoline at less than the applicable Dealer Minimum Resale Prices stipulated by plaintiff. Since October 30, 1958, plaintiff has entered into similar Fair Trade Agreements with many of its retail dealers in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, including approximately 112 out of 145 dealers in the City of Philadelphia.

8. On October 31, 1958, plaintiff gave written notice to defendant of the existence of its Fair Trade Agreements with other retailers and of the Dealer Minimum Resale Prices stipulated thereunder for Sinclair H-C Gasoline and Sinclair Power X Gasoline. The prices so stipulated continued without change up to the time of trial.

9. On January 13, 1959, plaintiff, by registered mail, notified defendant to cease selling plaintiff's gasolines at prices below the Fair Trade prices and defendant received this notice on January 17, 1959.

10. Notwithstanding the registered mail notice, defendant has advertised, offered for sale and sold plaintiff's gasolines at prices less than the stipulated Fair Trade prices, and continues to do so.

11. By means of personal visits, warning letters and Court proceedings, plaintiff has been enforcing its Fair Trade prices among its dealers.

12. Richfield Oil Corporation of New York is a wholly owned subsidiary of the plaintiff, and distributes and markets under its own brand names regular and premium gasoline within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

13. All of the gasoline sold in the Philadelphia area by the Richfield retail service stations under the Richfield brand names are produced by the plaintiff.

14. The California Oil Company distributes and markets under its own brand names regular and premium gasolines within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

15. All of the gasoline sold in the Philadelphia area by retail service stations under the California Oil Company's brand names are produced by the plaintiff.

16. In 1958 plaintiff produced gasoline for Tidewater Oil Company, and Tidewater Oil Company distributed and marketed said gasoline within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania under its own brand names. However, since 1958 plaintiff has produced no gasoline for Tidewater Oil Company.

17. By virtue of their contracts with plaintiff three retail dealers in Pennsylvania have or had the right to cancel their agreements with plaintiff if plaintiff elected to establish a minimum resale price for its gasolines. The defendant has no such right.

18. Plaintiff has not permitted any of its dealers to sell under its minimum dealer resale prices since plaintiff instituted them in October, 1958. However, by the use of certain leasing agreements plaintiff pays more of a rental fee to some of its dealers for the use of their properties than it pays to its other dealers.

19. Plaintiff fixed minimum resale prices for its gasolines under the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act for the first time in August, 1956.

20. Other oil companies for the first time fixed minimum resale prices under the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act at or about the same time.

21. Plaintiff discontinued establishing minimum dealer resale prices in March, 1957.

22. Other oil companies who were then fixing minimum dealer resale prices discontinued fixing such prices at or about the same time.

23. On or about October 30, 1958, plaintiff began to fix minimum dealer resale prices again.

24. At or about the same time the other oil companies whose testimony was adduced which had discontinued fixing minimum dealer resale prices began to fix minimum dealer resale prices again.

25. Immediately prior to the fixing of the minimum dealer resale prices in October, 1958 by the plaintiff and other oil companies, the prices at which the different brands of gasoline were sold varied.

26. Since October, 1958 the minimum dealer resale prices fixed by the plaintiff and other oil companies in the Philadelphia area are identical regardless of brand name.

27. Upon the institution of this action defendant immediately offered to terminate all existing agreements between plaintiff and defendant wherein and whereby the defendant was obliged to buy and resell plaintiff's gasolines at defendant's retail service station but plaintiff refused to accept such offer.

28. Plaintiff's gasolines are marketed and sold in fair and open competition within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania with gasolines of the same general class produced by others.

Discussion

The question presented in this case has been passed upon at least twice recently in the Common Pleas Courts of this county and as we read the adjudications they are contrary to each other. Sinclair Refining Company v. Yanni, C. P. 1, July 30, 1959; Sinclair Refining Company v. Waxler, C. P. 6, April 21, 1959.

In the case at bar the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby plaintiff sold to the defendant gasoline in bulk and the defendant (a gasoline station operator) in turn sold it at retail to the motorist. The contract made no provision for compliance with the Fair Trade Act of the Commonwealth. Thereafter while the contract was in force the plaintiff invoked the Fair Trade Act of the Commonwealth (by executing Fair Trade contracts with other gasoline station operators) and requested the defendant to comply with it. The defendant refused. The question before us therefore is, can the plaintiff require compliance by the defendant under the foregoing circumstances. We decide that the plaintiff can.

[Subject to Fair Trade Act]

Even though the contract by the plaintiff and defendant mentions nothing about the Fair Trade Act and provides by its terms that it can be ". . . altered, amended or modified only in writing signed by defendant and by a representative of plaintiff authorized to sign this agreement . . .", nevertheless the contract is not beyond the purview of the statute law of this Commonwealth. The statute law in question had been in effect for some years before the contract had ever been executed. The plaintiff did not provide in the contract that it would never invoke the Fair Trade Act; the contract was silent on the whole subject of Fair Trade. The contract was made under and subject to existing law. The statutorily declared public policy of the Commonwealth in effect at the time of the contract was in favor of Fair Trade. The contracting parties did not waive the application of the Fair Trade Act.

It is our view that the case at bar is governed by the case of Olin Mathieson Chemical Corporation v. L. & H. Stores, Inc. [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 68,981], 392 Pa. 225.

[Defense of Antitrust Violation]

If the plaintiff engaged in a price fixing conspiracy with the competitive gasoline producers, the plaintiff could not invoke the benefit of the Fair Trade Act. Act of June 5, 1935, P. L. 266, § 1, as amended, 73 P. S. 7. At the trial defendant made an effort to establish such price fixing conspiracy but it is our view that the effort did not succeed. Parallel pricing among competitive gasoline producers was established. It was likewise established that most competitive gasoline producers invoked the benefit of Fair Trade at the same time. We are speaking, of course, of parallel pricing and invocation of Fair Trade as it relates to the conduct of competitive gasoline producers in the Philadelphia area. But parallel pricing in and of itself does not establish a conspiracy in restraint of trade. See: Theatre Enterprises, Inc. v. Paramount Film Distributing Corp. [1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,640], 346 U. S. 537. Nor does simultaneous invocation of the benefits of the Fair Trade Act of the Commonwealth. Sales of gasoline from the gas pump to the automobile tank of the motorist appears to this court to be a truly competitive business in a large metropolitan area like Philadelphia. It is understandable that the gasoline producers who put the gas in the pump watch each other's prices very carefully. No one of them wants to be priced out of the market. We disagree with defendant's argument that gasoline sold to the motorist under the circumstances set forth in the case at bar is not within the purview of the Miller-Tydings and McGuire Acts. In the case of United States v. Socony Mobil Oil Company, Inc. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶68,679], 150 F. Supp. 202, 203-204, Judge Sweeney said:

> "The government contends that gasoline stored in a tank, which is buried underground at the filling station and from which a pipe conveys the stored gasoline to a pump which has a label designating the brand or name of the producer or distributor, is not a container bearing a trade-mark within the meaning of the McGuire Act. In short it alleges that the tank which contains the gasoline prior to being pumped is not a container. I cannot follow this reasoning and find as a matter of fact and law that such a tank which provides a continuous flow of gasoline to the pump when needed where the pump bears the label of the producer or distributor is a container within the meaning of the McGuire Act."

[Defense of Other Inequitable Conduct]

Defendant makes two arguments, supported by the evidence, to the following effect: (1) That after its current invocation of the Fair Trade Act the plaintiff permitted one dealer who did not wish to comply to rescind his contract with the plaintiff. In addition, two other dealers, by virtue of their contracts with plaintiff, have the right to cancel their contracts if plaintiff fair trades its gasolines. Hence it is inequitable to require the defendant to honor his contract. (2) That plaintiff by the use of certain leasing agreements which it executes with its dealers does not, in fact, charge the same tank wagon price to all its dealers. These leasing agreements allow for differentials in the wholesale price of gasoline paid by the retail gasoline dealers to the plaintiff. Continuing this practice is inequitable.

We do not consider these arguments or the evidence which supports them to be of sufficient weight to nullify the plaintiff's right to have its gasoline sold to the public (the motorist) at a fair trade price.

Conclusions of Law

1. The Court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter.

2. Plaintiff's gasolines are marketed and sold in fair and open competition within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the Philadelphia area with gasolines of the same general class produced by others.

3. Plaintiff has entered into Fair Trade contracts under the provisions of the Act of Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania of June 5, 1935, P. L. 266, as amended, 73 P. S. 7-11, which contracts are valid, effective and binding.

4. Plaintiff has given notice to defendant of the existence of its Fair Trade Agreements and of the dealer minimum resale prices stipulated thereunder and accordingly, under the Act of Assembly, defendant is legally obligated not to sell plaintiff's gasolines at prices less than the dealer minimum resale prices stipulated by plaintiff.

5. By wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale and selling plaintiff's gasolines at prices less than the dealer minimum resale prices stipulated by plaintiff, defendant has engaged in unfair competition.

6. The sales by defendant of plaintiff's gasolines at less than the dealer minimum resale prices stipulated by plaintiff have caused and are causing irreparable damage to plaintiff by impairing and tending to destroy the value of its good will, its brands and names.

7. Plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law.

8. Plaintiff is entitled to a permanent injunction restraining defendant from advertising, offering for sale, and selling plaintiff's gasolines at prices less than the dealer minimum resale prices stipulated by plaintiff when any such gasoline is dispensed from a gasoline dispensing pump bearing the trademark, brand or name of plaintiff.

Decree Nisi

And Now, this 30th day of September, A. D., 1959, a final hearing having been held,

It is Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed, that the defendant, Russell Gentzsch, be and he hereby is perpetually enjoined and restrained from advertising, offering for sale and/or selling, either personally or by his agents, servants or employes any gasoline supplied by plaintiff Sinclair Refining Company at prices less than the minimum retail prices now or hereafter established for such gasolines by plaintiff pursuant to contract with any retailer in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania when any such gasoline is delivered from a gasoline dispensing pump bearing the trademark, brand or name of Sinclair Refining Company directly into the fuel supply tank of a motor vehicle.

[Direction to Prothonotary]

The Prothonotary is directed to enter this decree nisi and to give notice thereof to the parties or their counsel of record, and unless exceptions are filed within twenty (20) days thereafter, the decree nisi shall become the final decree as of course.

Adjudication

Reimel, Judge [In full text]: This is an action in equity instituted by plaintiff corporation, which markets and sells gasolines under trademarks, brands and names, to restrain defendant from violating the Dealer Minimum Resale Prices of plaintiff's products. Defendant filed an answer which denies that plaintiff's gasolines are in fair and open competition within the commonwealth with gasolines manufactured, refined and sold by others or that gasoline is a unique or special commodity of merchandise that would come under the Fair Trade Laws. Defendant further contends that there is no other competitive dealer in the immediate vicinity of defendant's place of business whose own business would be destroyed and thereby give defendant an ultimate monopoly nor has any competitive dealer complained to defendant concerning the prices charged by defendant for plaintiff's products. A hearing was subsequently held to determine the issues. Upon consideration of the pleadings and the evidence offered in support thereof, the Court makes the following:

Findings of Fact

1. Plaintiff, Sinclair Refining Company, is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Maine and is transacting business within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

2. Defendant, Pasquale Fiumara, is an individual who maintains and operates a gasoline service station at 6008 Haverford Avenue, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, where he sells gasolines produced by plaintiff.

3. Plaintiff's gasolines are marketed and sold under the trade-marks, brands and names, "Sinclair H-C Gasoline" and "Sinclair Power X Gasoline", within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The pumps from which Sinclair gasolines are dispensed by Sinclair dealers, including defendant, bear these trade-marks, brands and names.

4. Plaintiff's gasolines are marketed and sold in fair and open competition within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania with gasolines of the same general class produced by others.

5. Plaintiff has expended and is expending large sums of money in advertising and promoting the sale of its gasolines under its trade-marks, brands and names, Sinclair H-C Gasoline and Sinclair Power X Gasoline, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and nationally, and has established a valuable and unique reputation and good will for these gasolines under their respective trade-marks, brands and names.

6. Pursuant to the provisions of the Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act, plaintiff entered into a Fair Trade Agreement with one of its retail dealers in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on October 30, 1958, whereby the dealer agreed not to resell Sinclair H-C Gasoline and Sinclair Power-X Gasoline at less than the applicable Dealer Minimum Resale Prices stipulated by plaintiff. Since October 30, 1958, plaintiff has entered into similar Fair Trade Agreements with many of its retail dealers in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, including approximately 112 out of 145 dealers in the City of Philadelphia.

7. On October 31, 1958, plaintiff gave written notice to defendant of the existence of its Fair Trade Agreements with other retailers and of the Dealer Minimum Resale Prices stipulated thereunder for Sinclair H-C Gasoline and Sinclair Power-X Gasoline. The prices so stipulated have continued without change up to the present time.

8. On January 13, 1959, plaintiff, by registered mail, notified defendant to cease selling plaintiff's gasolines at prices below the Fair Trade prices and defendant received this notice on January 15, 1959.

9. Notwithstanding the registered mail notice, defendant has advertised, offered for sale and sold plaintiff's gasolines at prices less than the stipulated Fair Trade prices, and continued to do so until this Court entered a preliminary injunction in this case on February 9, 1959.

10. By means of personal visits, warning letters and Court proceedings, plaintiff has been vigorously and uniformly enforcing its Fair Trade prices among its dealers.

11. The sales by defendant of plaintiff's gasolines at less than the Fair Trade prices caused irreparable damage to plaintiff by impairing and tending to destroy the value of its good will, its brands and its names.

12. Plaintiff's requests for Findings of Fact Nos. 1-11, inclusive are affirmed.

13. Defendant's requests for Findings of Fact Nos. 1-11, inclusive are refused.

Discussion

The Act of June 5, 1935, P. L. 266, as amended, 73 PS Section 7 et seq., commonly known as the Fair Trade Act, was held to be a valid exercise of the police power and constitutionally applicable to a vendor of a trade-marked commodity who has not signed a minimum retail price maintenance agreement with the manufacturer: Burche Co. v. General Electric Co. [1955 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,078], 382 Pa. 370. The purpose of the Act is to prevent the cutting by any dealer of the established price of any commodity identified by the trade-mark, brand or name of the producer: Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp. v. L. & H. Stores, Inc. [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,981], 392 Pa. 225. The Fair Trade Act provides protection for the public as well as the producer of trade-marked products: Bristol-Myers Co. v. Lit Brothers, Inc. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,227], 336 Pa. 81; Casco Products Corp. v. Hess Brothers, Inc. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,738], 184 Pa. Superior Ct. 47.

On October 30, 1958, the Sinclair Refining Company, which markets and sells gasolines under the trade-mark and brand names of "Sinclair H-C Gasoline" and of "Sinclair Power X Gasoline", entered into a Fair Trade Agreement with a retail dealer in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, whereby the dealer agreed to sell plaintiff's products only at stipulated prices. Since October 30, 1958, plaintiff has entered into similar Fair Trade Agreements with approximately 112 of 145 dealers in Philadelphia. On October 31, 1958, defendant, who had been selling plaintiff's products in Philadelphia and who did not sign such a contract, was informed by the plaintiff that he was nevertheless bound by the terms of the contract. Defendant ignored this notice and advertised, offered for sale and sold plaintiff's products at prices less than the stipulated Fair Trade prices. Plaintiff notified defendant to discontinue said practices. Since this notice was also ignored by defendant, plaintiff instituted this action to restrain such violations by defendant. After hearing, a preliminary injunction was granted and subsequently a final hearing was held.

The evidence reveals prohibited conduct by the defendant. Gasoline is a commodity within the scope of the Fair Trade Act: Sinclair Refining Co. v. Swartz, C. C. P. No. 5, Philadelphia County, September Term, 1956, No. 3216. Moreover, the procedures utilized by plaintiff to establish its dealerships are such that plaintiff's products are in fair and open competition and within the protection of the Fair Trade Acts. Defendant's last two contentions are without merit: Olin Mathieson Chemical Corp. v. L. & H. Stores, Inc. [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,981], 392 Pa. 225.

Accordingly, plaintiff's request for an injunction is granted.

Conclusions of Law

1. Plaintiff has entered into Fair Trade contracts under the provisions of the Act of Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania of June 5, 1935, P. L. 266, as amended, which contracts are valid, effective and binding.

2. Plaintiff has given notice to defendant of the existence of its Fair Trade Agreements and of the Dealer Minimum Resale Prices stipulated thereunder and accordingly, under the provisions of the Act of Assembly, defendant is legally obligated not to sell plaintiff's gasolines at prices less than the Dealer Minimum Resale Prices stipulated by plaintiff.

3. By wilfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale and selling plaintiff's gasolines at prices less than the Dealer Minimum Resale Prices stipulated by plaintiff, defendant has engaged in unfair competition.

4. Plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law.

5. Plaintiff is entitled to a permanent injunction restraining defendant from advertising, offering for sale, and selling plaintiff's gasolines at prices less than the Dealer Minimum Resale Prices stipulated by plaintiff when any such gasoline is delivered from a gasoline dispensing pump bearing the trade-mark, brand or name of plaintiff directly into the fuel supply tank of a motor vehicle.

6. Plaintiff's requests for Conclusions of Law Nos. 1-5, inclusive are affirmed.

7. Defendant's requests for Conclusions of Law Nos. 1-17, inclusive are refused.

Decree Nisi

And Now, to wit, this 7th day of October, 1959, it is Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed that

1. Defendant, Pasquale Fiumara, be and is hereby perpetually Enjoined and Restrained from advertising, offering for sale and/or selling, either personally or by his agents, servants or employees any gasoline supplied by plaintiff, Sinclair Refining Company, at prices less than the minimum retail prices now or hereafter established for such gasolines by plaintiff pursuant to contract with any retailer within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania when any such gasoline is delivered from a gasoline dispensing pump bearing the trade-mark, brand or name of Sinclair Refining Company directly into the fuel supply tank of a motor vehicle.

2. Costs shall be paid by defendant.

The Prothonotary is directed to give notice to the parties hereto or to their respective counsel of the filing of this Decree Nisi and that unless exceptions thereto are filed within twenty (20) days from the date hereof, this Decree shall become final.

KLEIN, Justice [In full text]: This is a motion to punish the defendant for contempt for violating the injunction in a consent judgment. Defendant emphatically denies the violation or the sale stated in the affidavit of an employee of the plaintiff. This affidavit of the employee as to the sale is but a stereotype form containing little information as to the sale, and insufficient information to place the burden on defendant to refute the allegations by affidavits or otherwise (*General Electric Company v. The plaintiff, the owner of a retail pharmacy in the vicinity of a similar business operated by the defendant, moves for a temporary injunction pending trial. Affidavits in support of the motion are submitted to indicate purchases of drug articles at various times in the defendant store at prices below the fair trade selling price. The opposing affidavits indicate similar activity being carried on in the plaintiff store. It is well settled that under such circumstances, the court must deny the relief requested by the plaintiff (Fordes v. Lythe, 137 N. Y. S. 2d 422; Frasca v. Wilson, 2 App. Div. 2d 762). Upon issuance of our writ, he was released from custody of the sheriff under bail of $1,000, which was fixed by this court. We now consider whether to discharge the writ or make it permanent.

[Original Injunction]

Since May, 1951, Mr. Harold W. Hinson has been owner and operator of a large grocery business located at 8239 Wornall Road, Kansas City, Missouri, commonly known as "The Henhouse". The evidence clearly shows that he has been at all times engaged in interstate commerce. Apparently in May, 1951, and prior thereto there had been some labor troubles at his place of business. He filed a petition in the Jackson County Circuit Court asking for an injunction and restraining order against Ray Thomas, president, Howard P. Root, business agent, and Carl Nothnagle, assistant business agent of Local Union No. 576, Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butchers Workmen, an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor. Therein it was alleged that the defendants, in combination with others whose names were unknown, had entered into an unlawful combination to control and limit the trade in articles and things which were regularly bought and sold by the plaintiff, and had boycotted and were threatening to boycott any person buying from or selling products to plaintiff, all in violation of Sections 8301 and 8303, R. S. Mo., 1949 (now Secs. 416.010 and 416.030, V. A. M. S.). Therein it was asserted that another purpose of defendants was to coerce plaintiff's employees into becoming members of defendants' union, and to compel and coerce the plaintiff to discharge all his butchers and meat cutters who were not members of said union; that defendants interfered with and prevented the regular purchase of merchandise by plaintiff and by his customers, prevented and interfered with regular and orderly deliveries of merchandise, all in derogation of the laws of Missouri, and particularly of Section 2, Article I, Missouri Constitution, and that defendants had placed a picket line in front of plaintiff's place of business; that these pickets stopped vehicles carrying merchandise; that they prevented Brink's Inc. from picking up and carrying plaintiff's cash receipts to a bank and place of safekeeping; that said pickets shouted threatening remarks to customers who crossed the picket lines and subjected them to violent remarks and epithets; that defendants secretly and at night, scattered roofing nails in the drive and open area in front of plaintiff's place of business, causing damage to automobiles and the tires of plaintiff and his customers, and that defendants unlawfully and feloniously broke into and forced an entrance into plaintiff's place of business in the nighttime.

There was served upon defendants a notice and order to show cause why the injunction prayed for should not be granted. On the return day evidence was heard and in May, 1951, an injunction styled "Order for Temporary Injunction" was granted and issued. In May, 1951, motion was filed to dissolve the restraining order. It was overruled. In 1959, counsel representing the labor union filed a motion to modify the restraining order, limiting it to restraint of force and violence. This motion was overruled. No further action was taken prior to the issuance of citation for contempt. Petitioner's basic position is that the court was without jurisdiction to issue the 1951 injunction because the Federal Government has preempted the field. Jurisdiction is a question that may be raised at any time. A judgment entered without jurisdiction is void and may be attacked collaterally. 21 C. J. S. page 177. But where, as here, the court has general jurisdiction of the subject matter and the person, the onus rests on petitioner to show lack of jurisdiction. This may appear from the record itself or it may be shown in any other way that is both proper and convincing.

The record does not contain a transcript of the evidence heard in 1951. The trial court, however, made written findings of fact, which were filed with and made a part of the order for the injunction. These findings of fact recited in part: that defendants established a picket line at plaintiff's place of business from 8:00 a. m. to 4:30 p. m. except on Sundays; that union truck drivers would not deliver merchandise to plaintiff's place of business nor would Brink's, Inc. cross the picket line to pick up cash receipts for deposit in the bank; that about 3:00 a. m. on May 4, 1951, while plaintiff was in the yard of his residence next door to the business and while he had his shotgun and revolver on his person, he saw defendants Root and Nothnagle drive into the parking lot at The Henhouse; that defendant Root got out of the automobile, went to plaintiff's processing house, had a bottle of gasoline in his hand and entered the processing house; that thereupon plaintiff yelled to defendant Root to come out or he would kill him, and Root did come out with his hands held above his head, and left the place of business; that both defendants Root and Nothnagle admitted they were at the processing house on said date; that they had a bottle of gasoline, and that they were shot at two or three times. The court stated that while the picketing itself may have been peaceful, the acts of coercion, compulsion, force, duress and violence to compel plaintiff to employ union meat cutters and butchers are unlawful and these defendants cannot commit an unlawful act in connection with lawful picketing, and that defendants should not be permitted to threaten with coercion, force, violence or injury any citizen for the sake of compelling him to buy his peace. The injunction itself specifically enjoined defendants from (a) committing damage or injury to plaintiff's building; (b) from all manner of coercion, compulsion, force, violence and duress to compel plaintiff to employ only members of Local Union No. 576, as meat cutters and butchers; (c) from establishing, placing or maintaining any picket line or lines in and about plaintiff's store which would affect, destroy, injure, impede, hinder or interfere with the regular receipt or delivery of goods, merchandise and receipts to and from plaintiff's store or place of business in the usual and ordinary course of business. In the findings of fact this statement is made: "Temporary injunction is granted until the further order of this court".

This injunction, denominated "temporary", was never dissolved and was never formally declared to be permanent. Apparently, there were no serious difficulties, or at least any which brought the parties into court from May, 1951 until June, 1959, when picketing was resumed by one Clifton Stufflebeam, who had been an employee of The Henhouse until a few days before he began picketing. Some time during the years between 1951 and 1959, two of the original defendants, namely Ray Thomas, president, and Howard P. Root, business agent, died. The defendant Ralph E. Angle succeeded Thomas as president of the local union, and one Ted Wolff succeeded Root as business agent.

[Contempt]

On June 25, 1959, Mr. Hinson filed his amended petition, praying that an order issue requiring Angle, Wolff and Stufflebeam to show cause why they should not be held in contempt of the 1951 injunction. Stufflebeam was never actually brought in as a defendant or if he was, the issues as to him were disposed of in the circuit court. The trial court granted the order to show cause and Angle and Wolff, as defendants, were served with notice, and in July, 1959, the court heard evidence. We have a transcript of that testimony. On October 2, 1959, the court entered its order and judgment, finding defendant Angle (and Wolff) guilty of contempt and fixed the punishment of each at a fine of $1,000 and imprisonment in the county jail for a term of 30 days. A commitment thereunder was duly issued to the Sheriff of Jackson County, who took the defendant and Wolff into custody. Resultant thereto is the present proceeding.

In its order and judgment the court found: (1) That these defendants, although not parties at the time the original injunction was issued, nevertheless, had full knowledge of its existence and of the fact that said temporary injunction directed > "that there should be no picketing of plaintiff's premises which would affect or interfere with the regular receipt and delivery of goods, merchandise and receipts to and from plaintiff's store or place of business in the usual and ordinary course of business", and that said defendants (2)

> "openly, actively and in concert, confederation and conspiracy with each other and with divers other persons to interfere with, obstruct, divide, defeat and violate the injunction order of this court theretofore made by actively participating in picketing of the store of the said plaintiff herein and by conspiring to so picket, intending and actually affecting, hindering and interfering with, obstructing and defiantly attempting to defeat the order of the court", and (3) defendants are guilty of contempt.

The evidence adduced at the 1959 hearing shows, we think, (a) that defendants actively participated in the picketing, sometimes in conjunction with Stufflebeam, and sometimes relieving him on the picket line when he went to meals; that defendants mostly sat in their automobile and "waved delivery trucks on by"; (b) that defendants furnished or caused to be furnished to Clifton Stufflebeam a union umbrella with the wording "Unfair", written thereon, which he carried while walking the picket line; (c) that on one occasion the defendants and Stufflebeam and two or three other persons congregated on the sidewalk or driveway in front of plaintiff's place of business; that plaintiff called the police and then advised defendants that they were not permitted to "mass picket". Thereupon defendants got in their cars and left. To summarize, as we read the 1959 record, we find no proof of violence or threats of violence, nor did the trial court declare that it found any.

[Jurisdiction]

It is petitioner's contention that first, the court was without jurisdiction to enter the original injunction for the reason that under the National Labor Relations Act, Congress has pre-empted the field, leaving to the state courts only the authority to restrain violence and keep the peace, and that in this case there was no evidence of force and violence. Generally speaking, and subject to at least two limitations, we think this statement of the law is correct. Graybar Electric Co. v. Automotive Union, 287 S. W. 2d 794; Garner v. Teamsters Union, 346 U. S. 485, 74 S. Ct. 161; Guss v. Utah Labor Board, 353 U. S. 1, 77 S. Ct. 598. But from the findings of fact and the injunction decree as detailed supra, we are of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to support the court's order enjoining violence and threats of violence. The parties agree that a state court does have authority to restrain acts of violence. There can be no question but that this is the law.

Counsel for Mr. Hinson, movant below, contend that a state court has authority to enjoin all picketing where the evidence shows the picketing is enmeshed with force and violence, and calls to our attention the case of Milk Wagon Drivers Union, etc. v. Meadowmoor Dairies, 312 U. S. 287, 61 S. Ct. 552. In that case the evidence showed a long series of occurrences involving force and violence. There was proof of more than 50 instances of window-smashing, explosive bombs placed in the store, stench bombs dropped on five stores, three trucks wrecked, one set afire, another driven into the river, severe beatings of truck drivers, and shootings. The Supreme Court of Illinois ordered an injunction not only restraining force and violence but forbidding all picketing. The Supreme Court of the United States approved on the theory that these grave incidents of violence were so closely intermingled with the picketing that the court was justified in concluding that the only way it could stop the violence and maintain the peace would be to not only enjoin acts of violence, but to stop the picketing, also. It is true that passage of the National Labor Relations Act in 1947, came after this decision. However, the rule and reason of it has not been, so far as we have been able to learn, overturned. We believe there was sufficient evidence in 1951 of violence and threatened violence to justify and authorize the state circuit court to enjoin acts and threats of force and violence. To that extent we find the injunction to be valid. However, we find no substantial evidence of violence or threatened violence in 1959, and therefore no violation in this respect of the injunction. Hence there could be no contempt on that ground.

[No Violence]

We do not believe that the violence, or force, or threats thereof, as such appears to have existed in 1951, establishes a pattern of violence so intermingled with the picketing, as to lead to the reasonable conclusion that the only way to stop such violence and preserve the peace would be to stop all picketing. We cannot conclude that resumption of picketing seven years later and by different defendants would likely cause violence to recur so as to bring this case within the rule declared in the Meadowmoor case. Under the facts here, the case is more nearly akin to Youngdahl v. Rainfair, Inc., 78 S. Ct. 206, 355 U. S. 131, where the Supreme Court struck down an Arkansas injunction against both violence and picketing, limiting it to violence alone.

In Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co [1948-1949 Trade Cases ¶ 62,391], 336 U. S. 490, 69 S. Ct. 684, a 1949 decision, which involved the Missouri statute against restraint of trade (now 416.010 and 416.030, V. A. M. S.) it was stated on page 691:

> "* * * * it is plain that the basic issue is whether Missouri or a labor union has paramount constitutional power to regulate and govern the manner in which certain trade practices shall be carried on in Kansas City, Missouri. Missouri has by statute regulated trade one way. The appellant union members have adopted a program to regulate it another way. * * *. We hold that the state's power to govern in this field is paramount, and that nothing in the Constitutional guaranties of speech or press compels a state to apply or not to apply its antitrade restraint law to groups of workers, businessmen or others".

The court approved the judgment of the Missouri court issuing an order restraining defendants from picketing plaintiff's plant.

[No Restraint of Trade]

However, in the Giboney case the purpose of the union was to force and coerce all wholesale ice dealers to refuse sales to independent ice peddlers and sell only to those who were union members. To hold that coercing all ice dealers in Kansas City to sell to one group and refuse sale to other groups, is in restraint of trade and contrary to the declared policy of Missouri is quite different from holding that picketing to require one grocery store to employ union labor is likewise in restraint of trade and such declared policy. We cannot apply the Giboney ruling to our case.

In its findings of fact and order, the court did not set forth or find the existence of forceful or violent acts, either so numerous or to such an extent as would justify application of the rule as laid down in the Meadowmoor case, nor is there any statement by the court that it found violence in such a degree as to require restraint of even peaceful picketing in order to stop violence and preserve the peace. To the contrary, the findings and order indicate that the court considered that it had power to enjoin peaceful picketing and such was its basis for entering its temporary injunction. It seems to follow that on this point the injunction can be held to be valid only insofar as it restrains force and violence. Such conclusion is, we think, in accord with both the Meadowmoor and Youngdahl cases.

Based upon their pronouncements, it might be said that in 1951 and for many years thereafter, many courts, including numerous State Supreme Courts, inclined to the view that under many circumstances even peaceful picketing might be restrained, not only if necessary to prevent violence, but if the purpose was unlawful under the state statutes and precedents. However, the Supreme Court of the United States has declared otherwise and as late as April 20, 1959, in San Diego Building Trades Council, etc. v. Garmon, 359 U. S. 236, 79 S. Ct. 773.

[Holding]

We must, therefore, and do hold (a) the 1951 injunction is valid only insofar as it restrains force and violence; (b) petitioner, under the evidence, is not in violation of the injunction as so restricted; and (c) petitioner is not guilty of contempt.

The Writ of Habeas Corpus is made permanent. Defendant is discharged from custody and his bail bond is released.

Automobile Dealer Franchise Act

Suit for Damages Under Automobile Dealer Franchise Act—Construction of Act.—The Automobile Dealer Franchise Act, which created a right of action where none existed at common law, is what is known as a "statute of creation." For this reason, its limitations as to the conditions of recovery and the remedy are to be treated as "limitations of the right."

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9070.

Suit for Damages Under Automobile Dealer Franchise Act—Elements of Violation—Coercion or Intimidation.—There was no coercion or intimidation of an auto dealer when the desire to terminate the agency originated with the dealer, and it voluntarily terminated the agency after the manufacturer's representatives had tried, unsuccessfully, to find a buyer.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9070.60.

Suit for Damages Under Automobile Dealer Franchise Act—Applicability to Past Activities—Time Limitation of Action.—An automobile dealer could not recover damages under the Automobile Dealer Franchise Act where there was no promise or representation made or consequent loss or damage incurred subsequent to the effective date of the Act, August 8, 1956. Since the cause of action accrued more than three years before the date of this suit, it was also barred by the statute of limitations in the statute.

YANKWICH, District Judge [In full text except for omissions indicated by asterisks]: In this case we are to determine whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover under a Complaint seeking damages for fraud, either actual or constructive, or deceit,[1] or, in the alternative, on the theory of promissory estoppel,[2] or under the federal Automobile Dealers Act.[3]

At the request of the parties the Court has agreed to try the separate "issue" of liability first.[4] So the question of damages is not at present before the Court.

As is evident, two [of] the remaining causes of action are brought under State law, the third under Federal law. While the same amount of damages is sought under all the remaining claims, treble damages are also asked under the Clayton Act,[5] as well as costs and attorneys fees.

I

Fraud and Coercion

In essence, the proof in the case was directed to an attempt to show that the defendant, who will be referred to as "Chrysler", made certain promises and undertakings to the plaintiff, who will be referred to as "Pinney", with relation to the termination of a dealership at El Centro, California, which were false and fraudulent under California law and constituted coercion and intimidation or threats of coercion or intimidation under the federal statute.[6] Before considering the facts it is well to set down certain fundamental principles which govern the quantum of proof in cases of this character.

Pinney is a California corporation, Chrysler a Delaware corporation. Two of the claims being based on diversity of citizenship are governed by State law.[7] And under California law there is a presumption of fair dealing which is tantamount to the presumption of innocence in criminal cases.[8] However, the statutory definitions of fraud and deceit are very broad. The relevant sections are printed in the margin.[9] Because of the broad scope of these provisions which have been in the California Codes

"§ 1572. Actual fraud

"ACTUAL FRAUD, WHAT. Actual fraud, within the meaning of this Chapter, consists of any of the following acts, committed by a party to the contract, or with his connivance with intent to deceive another party thereto, or to induce him to enter into the contract:

"1. The suggestion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true;

"2. The positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true;

"3. The suppression of that which is true, by one having knowledge or belief of the fact;

"4. A promise made without any intention of performing it; or

"5. Any other act fitted to deceive." (California Civil Code, § 1572)

Constructive fraud is defined:

"§ 1573. Constructive fraud

"CONSTRUCTIVE FRAUD. Constructive fraud consists:

"1. In any breach of duty which, without an actually fraudulent intent, gains an advantage to the person in fault, or any one claiming under him, by misleading another to his prejudice, or to the prejudice of any one claiming under him; or,

"2. In any such act or omission as the law specifically declares to be fraudulent, without respect to actual fraud." (California Civil Code, § 1573) since their enactment in 1872, the courts have laid down the rule that the evidence in proof of fraud must be clear and convincing.[10] This is also the general and the federal rule.[11] And whether we are dealing with actual or constructive fraud there must be a false representation or promise as to a material fact, knowledge of its falsity when made, or lack of reasonable ground to believe in its truth, intent to deceive, or suppression, and reliance with resulting damages.[12]

II

The Basic Issues in the Case

We are of the view that there is no clear and convincing evidence of fraud or deceit, actual or constructive, which would warrant a judgment in favor of Pinney on the question of liability.

A. Pinney's Contentions

The chief basis for the claim of fraud, as alleged in the Complaint, is that Pinney, beginning in 1954 and continuing a long time thereafter, informed Chrysler, through its district and regional managers, that they desired to sell the Agency Agreement, entered into August 20, 1952, whereby Pinney became the Dodge direct dealer for Dodge automobiles and trucks and Plymouth automobiles for the El Centro territory. The Complaint also averred that Pinney stated that, in the event a buyer could not be secured, they would be compelled to terminate the agency, as their President desired to enter law school. In response to these statements it was alleged that Chrysler agreed to secure a buyer within a reasonable time and, in the event the buyer was not secured, Pinney would be immediately notified so that they could terminate the agency.

In the light of these allegations the main problems presented by the proof, are, as correctly stated by counsel for Pinney:

(1) Whether Chrysler, through any duly authorized representative, promised or represented to Pinney that if they would continue their operations, Chrysler would produce a satisfactory buyer for their dealership within a reasonable time;

(2) Whether Pinney reasonably relied on such promises or representations to their detriment;

(3) Whether Chrysler, through its representatives either (a) made such promises or representations without intention of performing or fulfilling them or knowing them to be untrue or having no basis for believing them to be true, or (b) suppressed material facts which suppression was likely to mislead Pinney, or (c) misled or took advantage of Pinney in breach of a duty imposed by the relationship of the parties.

In essence, Pinney asserts that Chrysler, through its district and regional managers, Jack A. Wixom and Harold Erskine Wyatt, agreed, in consideration of Pinney's continuing in business, to secure a buyer for the dealership.

IV

Conclusions and Inferences on the Facts

So the upshot of the matter is this: At most Chrysler's district and regional managers agreed to recommend the acceptance of a satisfactory buyer by Chrysler when one was found. They sought such buyers, as did Pinney. In their answers to interrogatories, Chrysler listed at least eight prospective buyers, in addition to the "Burton-Battenfield-Measures" group who were "contracted" for the dealership "either on Chrysler's own initiative or by reference from Pinney & Topliff". (Answer to Plaintiff's Interrogatory No. 8) When a "promising" one was found, they recommended to the Chrysler main office approval of the transfer of the dealership with the waiver of the requirement as to single dealership. As was their right, Chrysler did not consent to the waiver. So the deal fell through, because the prospective buyers would not accept a single dealership. Thereafter, Pinney, by letter dated October 8, 1956, voluntarily terminated the dealership under the ninety-day clause in the Contract of August 20, 1952. This they had a right to do.

It is to be noted that prior to this date meetings of the directors and shareholders of the plaintiff corporation were held on September 19, 1956, at which Resolutions were adopted to dissolve the corporation. The directors' Resolution also authorized the immediate payment of $10,000 in corporate funds to Charles A. Pinney, Jr. on account of his distributive share of the assets, in accordance with an agreement of the same date entered into by him and Topliff. Under this agreement Topliff was to draw from the corporate funds $500 a month during the liquidation. As Pinney owned 75 per cent of the stock and the company was solvent and had assets, under other circumstances the advance to Pinney would be an unimportant event. But the circumstances under which it was made, and the fact that even while in law school Pinney, as President, drew a salary of $900 a month, lend support to the conclusion that the determination to liquidate the business, in some manner, was not brought about by any unfulfilled promises of Chrysler's but by the conditions which confronted the Pinney corporation. Although the meeting was held after the abandonment of the "Burton-Battenfield-Measures" deal, the minutes do not reflect any statement by anyone attributing the desire to dissolve to any alleged failure on the part of Chrysler to assist in the disposal of the agency as a going business. So, in answer to the questions propounded at the beginning of the opinion, I find:

(1) Chrysler did not promise or represent to Pinney that if they would continue operations they would procure a buyer within a reasonable or definite time, or at all. Whatever promises were made as to assistance in disposition of the dealership were intended to be performed and were actually performed by Chrysler's agents;

(2) Pinney did not rely on any such representations. To the contrary, they continued efforts to conduct the business in the absence of its President. They attempted to reorganize their management and they themselves interested persons who might purchase the business. So there was no such change of position to their detriment as is necessary to warrant a finding of constructive fraud[16] or to give rise to a promissory estoppel, even if the representations had been made.[17] However, I am also of the view that:

(3) Chrysler did not (a) make any promises or representations without intention of performing them or knowing them to be untrue or having no basis for believing them to be true, (b) or suppress any material facts which suppression was likely to mislead or (c) misled or took advantage of Pinney in breach of a duty imposed by the relationship of the parties.[18]

In sum, I find that there was no actual or constructive fraud or deceit committed by Chrysler, as these terms are understood in California law. I am also of the view that the claims under State law are barred by the three-year statute of limitations.[19] And that Pinney has not shown any concealment on the part of Chrysler which excused delay in discovery, or any acts by Chrysler "lulling" them into a sense of security, which excused the failure to act.[20]

V

The Claim Under the Automobile Dealers Act

What has just been said disposes also of the asserted claim under what is known as the Automobile Dealers Act.[21] This act, which creates a right of action where none existed at common law, is what is known as a "statute of creation". For this reason, the limitations as to the conditions of recovery, and the remedy are to be treated as "limitations of the right".[22]

The object of the statute was to give a right of action to automobile dealers when the automobile company fails to act in good faith

"in performing or complying with any of the terms or provisions of the franchise, or in terminating, cancelling, or not renewing the franchise with said dealer." [22]

However, the term "good faith" merely means the duty to act

"in a fair and equitable manner towards each other so as to guarantee the one party freedom from coercion, intimidation, or threats of coercion or intimidation from the other party." [24]

The right of recovery depends upon the existence of such acts.[25]

[No Coercion]

I find that there was no coercion, intimidation or threat of coercion or intimidation in the case on the part of Chrysler. As amply appears from the discussion of the facts which precede, the desire to terminate the agency, either by sale or otherwise, originated with Pinney who were dissatisfied with the arrangement first in 1954 and whose President and controlling stockholder, in 1955, determined to go to law school, an act in which he was not encouraged by the representatives of Chrysler, who, on the contrary, advised against it. The final notice of termination was given by Pinney on October 8, 1956.

At no time did Pinney tell any of the district or regional managers of Chrysler that if a buyer was not secured at a definite time they would terminate the dealership or liquidate. So, even assuming that an automobile company might "force" a termination by a dealer under circumstances which would warrant a court in concluding that, although the termination was, in appearances, a voluntary one on the part of the dealer, in reality, it was coerced by the automobile company, this is not the situation before us. Chrysler's representatives tried to assist in disposing of the business. After Pinney's President was admitted to law school he decided to remain there, sought to reorganize the management of the business and chose to run it at a loss rather than return to its management. He, no doubt, believed that he could run it in absentia. For he drew a salary while at law school. The termination was Pinney's voluntary act, not forced by any coercion or intimidation by Chrysler.

[Applicability to Past Acts—Statute of Limitations]

Consequently, the conditions for the application of this salutary statute do not exist in this case. In addition to this, there is absent another condition for the application of the Act: There was no promise or representation made or consequent loss or damage incurred subsequent to the effective date of the Act. And the statute restricts recovery to the damages sustained by the dealer by reason of the failure of the automobile manufacturer to act in good faith "from and after August 8, 1956".[26] For the same reason, the claim is also barred by the three-year limitation in the statute.[27]

To conclude: Pinney is seeking to recover, in tort, for a voluntary act on their own part which ultimately resulted in the liquidation of their automobile agency. The Civil Code of California declares: "He who consents to an act is not wronged by it." [28] This is a codification of the maxim volenti non fit injuria, which is a basic tenet of our jurisprudence. It precludes the maintenance of an action for a wrong by one who has " 'consented to the act which has occasioned his loss' ".[29] Its application to the facts in this case would, of itself, call for denial of recovery.[30] However, the prior discussion sets forth other grounds, legal and factual, for the conclusion that there is no legal liability on the part of Chrysler for any of the acts complained of.[31]

Judgment will, therefore, be for the defendant on the issue of liability, that it is not liable to the plaintiff under any of the remaining causes of action, 1, 2 or 4.[32] The Third cause of action has already been dismissed and judgment of dismissal ordered entered. Findings and Judgment, in

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Damage Action—Pretrial Procedures—Separate Trials—Right to Jury Trial.—In a private antitrust suit, a separate trial was ordered for the purpose of determining whether the action was barred by the statute of limitations and whether a general release executed by the plaintiffs was valid. It was held that if the statute of limitations or the release were found to bar or cut down the scope of the action, the arduous and expensive preparations for the main trial would be avoided, and that even if they were not found to have such an effect, a preliminary trial of these issues would prejudice neither party. The court also held that any question of fact involved in these issues should be resolved by a jury. The basis for this award of a jury trial was that the court had discretion as a court of equity to submit any questions of fact to a jury.

For the defendants: Shapiro, Rosenfeld, Stalberg & Cook and Harold E. Kohn, both of Philadelphia, Pa.

Memorandum Opinion and Order

[Treble Damage Action—Separate Trial]

Harold K. Wood, District Judge [In full text]: The issues presently before the Court are (1) whether the defendants' request for a separate trial on certain issues, preliminary to the trial of the main case, should be granted, and (2) if a separate trial is ordered, whether factual questions presented therein should be determined by the Court or by a jury.

This is a private antitrust suit. Plaintiffs complain that defendants have conspired to restrain trade in and monopolize the distribution and sale of fresh fruits and vegetables in the Philadelphia area, and that as a result, the defendants have destroyed plaintiffs' wholesale fruit and vegetable business.

Defendants deny plaintiffs' allegations. In addition, defendants contend (1) that the statute of limitations bars recovery based upon anything occurring before September, 1954, and (2) that a general release executed by plaintiffs on March 28, 1958 bars recovery based upon any liability which defendants theretofore might have had to plaintiffs.

Plaintiffs' reply that the statute of limitations should not be applied in this case in the way defendants contend, and that the release is invalid.

[Release]

The validity of the release is at present the major issue in this case.

Plaintiffs attack the validity of the release on two grounds. First, plaintiffs allege that the release was obtained by fraud. According to plaintiffs, the defendants orally promised to give plaintiffs $500,000 worth of business per year if plaintiffs would execute the release, but defendants never intended to carry out that promise, and have consistently refused to carry it out. Due to this fraud, plaintiffs argue that the release may be avoided. Second, plaintiffs allege that the release was obtained as "part and parcel of the conspiracy," and that the release is void on this ground alone.

The defendants demand that the question of the validity of the release be tried separately, in advance of the main case, and by the Court without a jury. The plaintiffs do not want a separate trial; but if one is granted, they demand a trial by jury of the factual questions therein. Plaintiffs resist the separate trial, arguing that the evidence necessary to prove the release invalid is the same as the evidence necessary to prove their case in general. This argument is based solely on the second ground of attack on the validity of the release. In other words, plaintiffs say, that in order to prove the release was obtained as "part and parcel of the conspiracy," they would have to prove the conspiracy, which is the very backbone of their main case.

[Separate Trial Granted]

We think that a separate trial of these issues would serve the convenience of all parties to this suit and also the convenience of the Court.

Clearly the evidence necessary to determine the issue of fraud is different from the evidence necessary to determine the issues in the main case. With regard to the evidence necessary to determine the issue of whether the release was obtained as "part and parcel of the conspiracy," plaintiffs will not be limited in their presentation of evidence to support this argument. However, we observe preliminarily that if it is determined that the release was not obtained by fraud, then we think its validity will have been established. We do not understand how proof of the allegation that the release is "part and parcel of the conspiracy" could detract from its validity. Nevertheless, as we pointed out above, plaintiffs will be free to develop this argument at the separate trial.

Rule 42(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure gives us discretion to order a separate trial of any issue in a case "in furtherance of convenience or to avoid prejudice." If the release, or the statute of limitations, or both, are found to bar or to cut down the scope of plaintiffs' action, the arduous and expensive preparations necessary for trying the main case will have been avoided. On the other hand, if the separate trial does not cut down or bar plaintiffs' case, none of the parties will have been prejudiced by having had these issues determined in advance of the main case.

[Jury Trial Granted]

The attorneys have prepared excellent briefs for our guidance in deciding whether or not factual questions as to whether there was fraud in obtaining this release should be decided by the Court or a jury. After considering the arguments of counsel, we have concluded that these questions should be determined by a jury.

The attorneys have directed their arguments on this point to the question of whether or not the plaintiffs have a constitutional guarantee of a trial by jury on the question of procurement of a release by fraud. Rule 38 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides: "The right of trial by jury as declared by the 7th Amendment to the Constitution * * * shall be preserved to the parties inviolate." The legal question to be decided, therefore, is whether the issue of fraud involved here is an issue which was traditionally triable by a jury at the time of the 7th Amendment. The authorities are not in agreement on the answer to this question. The cases are collected in Volume 43 A. L. R. 2d at page 786 et seq. We observe briefly that the trend is toward granting a jury trial on this kind of issue.[1] However, we do not rest our decision to grant a jury trial in this case on the plaintiffs' constitutional rights.

We base our decision to award a jury trial in this case on our discretion as a Court of equity to submit any questions of fact to a jury.[2] There is no principle of law, nor any constitutional guarantee, which requires us to try an issue without a jury.[3] We base the exercise of our discretion in this matter on our belief that the questions of fact to be determined in the separate trial are best answered by a jury. In other words, answering them may involve the resolving of conflicting testimony. The facts to be established or disaffirmed are uncomplicated and few in number.

[1] The Third Circuit has, to some extent, taken the position that the issue of fraud in the procurement of a contract is an issue for the jury. See Ettelson v. [2] " * * A court of equity has power to frame issues and to submit them to a jury * * *. The court may send any portion of the issues of fact to a jury, submitting such issues as it desires to be advised on * * *. Whether or not a court of equity will exercise its power to submit issues in a particular case is a matter of discretion." 30 Corpus Juris Secundum, Section 495. "While issues of fact may be submitted to a jury in response to a motion or demand by a party to the cause * * * the court may direct a submission of its own motion." Id. Section 498.

Order

Now, therefore, this 14th day of December, 1959, it is ordered that a jury be empaneled to serve on February 15, 1960. On that date, a separate trial will be held in which the parties may present evidence and arguments on the following questions: (1) The effect of the statute of limitations on the plaintiffs' action; (2) whether the release is void because it was obtained as "part and parcel of the conspiracy"; (3) whether the release is voidable because it was procured by fraud. With regard to the third question, the jury will determine (a) whether or not the defendants orally promised to give plaintiffs $500,000 worth of business a year in exchange for the release; (b) whether the defendants at the time of making the alleged promise intended to carry it out; and (c) whether the plaintiffs reasonably relied upon the alleged promise in signing the release.

All discovery necessary for preparation of trial on these issues shall be completed before February 8, 1960.

In so ruling the court held that the information need not allege that the person subpoenaed failed to obey it without good cause since this question of good cause was a matter of defense. It was also held that such an information need not allege that it was filed pursuant to the direction of the grand jury and on the order of the Court of General Sessions where there were certified copies of the direction and order attached to the information.

[Demurrer to Information]

GASSMAN, P. J. [In full text]: The defendant demurs to the information on the ground that (1) the facts stated in the information do not constitute a crime, and (2) that the information is defective "in that it does not set forth the jurisdiction of the court." The information charges the defendant with a violation of section 343 of the General Business Law in that he failed to obey the command of a subpoena issued by the attorney general in the course of an anti-trust investigation conducted by the attorney general under the "Donnelly Act" (sections 340-347, General Business Law). It is the defendant's contention that in view of the fact that section 343 provides that "if a person subpoenaed to attend such inquiry fails to obey the command of the subpoena without good cause, * * * he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor" (emphasis supplied) that the information should have contained an allegation to the effect that the defendant's failure to obey the subpoena was without good cause. We hold that the question of whether the failure to obey a subpoena was "with good cause" is a matter of defense (People v. Rehn, 10 Misc. 2d 482) and that the information does not have to contain such an allegation. Defendant's second contention is based on the fact that the information does not allege that is was filed pursuant to the direction of the grand jury and the order of the Court of General Sessions. Section 742 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that all criminal actions in this court must be prosecuted by information made by the district attorney, (1) on returns filed pursuant to section 221 of the code, or (2) filed by the district attorney by direction of a grand jury approved, upon order, by the court for which the grand jury was drawn. The papers before us indicate that there is attached to the information a certified copy of the grand jury's direction as well as a certified copy of the order of the Court of General Sessions approving the direction. The information need not allege the facts respecting the direction nor the order approving it, any more than it need allege that the information was filed pursuant to a magistrate's return. The demurrer is therefore disallowed.

[Motion to Dismiss—Appellate Jurisdiction]

PER CURIAM [In full text]: The amended complaint against six defendants alleges a conspiracy to violate the anti-trust laws and damage caused thereby to the plaintiff in the operation of the Erlanger Theatre in Philadelphia. It prays for a judgment against all the defendants in the amount of $1,050,000 to be trebled in accordance with the Clayton Act, 15 U. S. C. § 15, together with costs and an attorney's fee, and for an injunction. As against three of the defendants, the appellees, the action was dismissed for lack of personal jurisdiction. The action remained pending against the others. The judgment of dismissal contained a direction, such as is provided for by amended Rule 54(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, that there was no just reason for delay and that judgment be entered in favor of the three defendants. Thereupon plaintiff filed timely notice of appeal. Amended Rule 54(b) expressly deals with multiple claims; consequently the weight of authority has held that in situations involving multiple parties but only a single claim, a 54(b) certificate is ineffective to make appealable a judgment dismissing the action against some parties but leaving it pending against others.[1] Some decisions in the Second Circuit appear to have taken a contrary view. Lopinsky v. Hertz Drive-Ur-Self Systems, Inc., 194 F. 2d 422 (1951), Colonial Airlines v. Janas, 202 F. 2d 914 (1953), Rao v. Port of New York Authority, 222 F. 2d 362 (1955), and United Artists Corp. v. Masterpiece Productions, Inc., 221 F. 2d 213 (1955). On further consideration we have concluded that the Fifth, the Eighth, the Ninth and, as we read its opinions, the Seventh Circuit have been correct in thinking that amended Rule 54(b) does not allow a finding of finality in the case here presented where a single claim against multiple parties is dismissed as against some but not all. In consequence we must dismiss the appeals for want of appellate jurisdiction.

Appeals dismissed.

Automobile Dealer Franchise Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suits for Damages Under Automobile Dealer Franchise Act—Persons Liable—Definition of "Manufacturer"—Domestic Distributor "Acting for" and "Under Control of" Foreign Manufacturer.—A domestic retail dealer in foreign automobiles, in an action charging a "bad faith" termination of its franchise in violation of the Automobile Dealer's Day in Court Act of 1956, was permitted to introduce what evidence it could to demonstrate that a domestic distributor was "controlled by" and "acted for" a foreign manufacturer, and was, therefore, a "manufacturer" within the meaning of the Act. The manufacturer, an English corporation, had no ownership interest in the domestic distributor. However, the Act's definition of "manufacturer" must be read in connection with (1) the fact that Congress, in enacting the statute, was directing itself to the basic evil of the disparity in bargaining power between manufacturers and dealers, and (2) the reflection that, so long as the economic conditions giving rise to the manufacturers' inordinate bargaining power could be maintained with respect to intermediary distributors, that power could itself be used to compel the "middle man" to pass on the manufacturer's terms to the retailer. The essence of the Act was to break that "chain of domination," whether it was "forged of one link or of many." Hence, an instrumentality employed by a manufacturer to bring about the condition of subservience aimed at in the Act "is itself a part of the manufacturer" and is bound by the Act's requirement of good faith in terminating dealer franchises.

[Motion for summary judgment]

CLARKE, District Judge [In full text]: This suit is brought by a dealer in Triumph motor cars for failure to renew his franchise contrary to the provisions of the Automobile Dealer's Day in Court Act of 1956, 15 U. S. C. A. secs. 1221-1225. Defendant has moved for summary judgment on the grounds that it is not a "manufacturer" as contemplated by the terms of the Act.

In substance, the affidavits and pleadings before the court show that defendant is a California corporation engaged in the distribution of Standard-Triumph Motor Cars in the State of California and in certain other western states. The stock ownership of the corporation is in the hands of Walter G. Danielson, Dorothy Deen, and Paul Bernhardt, citizens of the State of California. The manufacturer of Standard-Triumph motor cars, an English corporation, has no ownership interest whatever in the defendant distributing company. Defendant contends that its arrangement with the Standard-Triumph Motor Co. of Coventry, England, is precisely the sort of franchise agreement which would give the defendant a cause of action under the Day in Court Act in appropriate circumstances against the English manufacturer. It follows from this, according to the defendant, that its own franchising arrangements with the ultimate retail dealers in Standard-Triumph motor cars are exempt from the coverage of the Act in question, which in pertinent part reads:

> "(a) The term "automobile manufacturer" shall mean any . . . form of business enterprise engaged in the manufacturing or assembling of passenger cars . . . including any . . . corporation which acts for and is under the control of such manufacturer . . . in connection with the distribution of said automotive vehicles." (emphasis supplied.)

If this section were reasonably read to require only ownership control in order for an automobile distributor to be charged with manufacturer's liability under the Act, the granting of defendant's motion would be a matter of course. Plaintiff contends, however, that the agency and control intended by the statute are de facto subordination to the wishes and interests of the automobile manufacturer, whether expressed in a written contractual form, or in a course of dealing. This being a case of first impression on the question of law at hand, the court has had recourse to the legislative history of the statute, and to the learned commentary of Prof. Friedrich Kessler in "Automobile Dealer Franchises", 66 Yale L. J. 1135, for which grateful acknowledgment is hereby given.

[Purposes of Automobile Dealer Franchise Act]

Without going into the details of the history of franchise bargaining in the automobile industry, it may be said that Congress has recognized that the bargaining power of the manufacturer vis-a-vis the dealer is so great that the terms of any franchise agreement can be dictated virtually in their entirety by the manufacturer;[1] the resulting "contract of adhesion" could be designed to include exculpatory clauses immunizing the manufacturer from suits based upon bad faith termination of the agency relationship,[2] or it could be framed so vaguely as to be unenforceable in the courts because of indefiniteness of terms.[3] In short, any recognized legal device which would obviate dealer's suits upon the franchise against the grantor of the franchise could be exacted by the latter. The history of the devices used to effectuate this single end of immunization of the manufacturer from dealers' suits is an interesting commentary on the evolution of the law of contract;[4] suffice it to say here, however, that Congress in enacting the legislation at hand was directing itself to the basic evil—the disparity in bargaining power between the parties to the franchise arrangement—in requiring that the termination of franchises, whether by non-renewal or otherwise, be done only in good faith for sufficient reasons.[5] The dealer was to be given his day in court on an allegation of bad faith termination regardless of the legal import of the words used in the "contract" which he had signed. The extreme vagueness of the concept of good faith or bad faith used by the legislature in the provision at hand is testimony to the fact that the intention was to control the dealer-manufacturer relationship in its essential premises (by allowing the trial court wide discretion in giving specific formulation to the immensely vague term "good faith") and to disregard the traditional legal implications of words which purported to, but in fact could not, signify the mutual intentions of the parties.

It is our opinion that the Act's definition of "manufacturer" must be read with the above analysis in mind; and with the obvious reflection that a simple device to perpetuate the bargaining domination enjoyed by manufacturers without the risk of legal recourse as contemplated by the Act would be to multiply the intermediary agencies through which the will of the manufacturer is expressed. So long as the economic conditions giving rise to the inordinate bargaining power could be maintained with respect to subordinate and intermediary distributors, the power to exact any terms could itself be used to compel the middle man to pass on the terms and conditions desired by the manufacturer to the ultimate retailer. And the essence of the Act, as we read it, was to provide that this chain of domination, whether forged of one link or of many, was to be broken. When the instrumentality used to exact onerous conditions of continuing in the automobile retailing business is "acting for" the manufacturer in the sense that he is employed by the manufacturer willingly or unwillingly to bring about the condition of subservience aimed at in the Act, we are of the view that the instrumentality is itself a part of the manufacturer bound by the Act's requirement of good faith. We are mindful of course that holding intermediary parties liable under the pseudo-respondeat superior doctrine which we believe the Act's definition of manufacturer imports is apt in some cases to impose a very considerable hardship upon the defendant party. It is not for us to criticize the policy of the Day in Court Act for so completely redressing the balance between franchiser and franchisee, if such is the case; neither can we suggest better legal devices to insure that economic responsibility is coupled with economic power than that of counterbalancing the power which may be exerted by manufacturers upon distributors with an equal and opposite judicial force in favor of dealers against distributors, and thence, by necessity to manufacturers. It is apparent that as soon as the purpose of exploiting the distributor—to wit, to relay the exploitation on to the dealer—is thwarted by the operation of the Day in Court Act, the unfortunate squeeze upon the distributor will cease, and his function will be confined to whatever legitimate purposes are served by the concentration of merchandising authority in a separate enterprise from the manufacturer.

[Denial of Motion]

With the above understanding of the Day in Court Act we believe it is necessary to deny defendant's motion for summary judgment, and to permit the plaintiff to introduce what evidence he can to demonstrate that Cal Sales, Inc., is dominated by and acts for Standard-Triumph of Coventry, England, and that the non-renewal of the franchise agreement was in bad faith. Due consideration will be given by the court to defendant's allegation that the arrangement with Barney Motor Sales was meant by the parties to be a tentative one, as is recited in the instrument alleged in this suit. But this recital will not be conclusive against a showing by convincing evidence that the commitment of the parties was understood as a long term arrangement terminable only for good cause. In short, we are convinced that the Day in Court Act instructs us to view the recitations of parties to franchise agreements with a grain of salt, and to measure such recitals against the operative facts in the particular situation, including the degree of reliance evinced by both parties on the proposition that the arrangement at hand is to be a lasting one.

It Is Therefore Now Ordered that defendant's motion for summary judgment is denied.

It Is Further Ordered that the Clerk shall this day serve copies of this Opinion and Order by United States mail upon the attorneys for the parties appearing in this cause.

United States of America and The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company; The Denver and Rio Grande Western Railroad Company; The Pennsylvania Railroad Company; Reading Company; Southern Pacific Company; and Toledo, Peoria & Western Railroad Company.

In the United States District Court for the District of Delaware. Civil Action No. 2144. Dated December 14, 1959.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts and Administrative Procedure Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Common Carriers Under Antitrust Laws—Antitrust Legality of Railroads' Alleged "Below Cost" Rates—Antitrust Immunity Conferred by Interstate Commerce Act—Doctrine of "Primary Jurisdiction."—A steamship company's action charging railroads with violating Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act by concertedly reducing their rates "below cost" for the purpose of monopolizing the transportation of canned goods from Pacific coast origins to Atlantic coast destinations, and for the further purpose of driving the steamship company from the business, was dismissed on the ground that, under the doctrine of "primary jurisdiction," the antitrust charges should first be addressed to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The company contended that the power to enforce Sherman Act standards had not been delegated to the Commission. However, the test of referral is not whether some parts of the case are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts, but whether some parts of the case are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the agency. Here, the railroads were "operating pursuant to § 5(a) [of the Interstate Commerce Act] antitrust exemption agreements." That section supersedes the Sherman Act to the extent that concerted rate agreements—otherwise illegal under the antitrust laws—are immunized from Sherman Act proscriptions if approved by the Commission. Since that section is administered by the Commission, it was incumbent upon the court to seek the observations of the Commission with respect to the extent and scope of the exemption. While such an exemption does not "sterilize" all forms of conspiratorial action, an orderly administration of that immunization provision requires, at the minimum, primary construction by the Commission.

Before Biggs, Circuit Judge, and Wright and Rodney, District Judges.

Wright, District Judge [In full text]: This injunction action initiated by plaintiff, Luckenbach Steamship Company, Inc. (Luckenbach) against the United States and certain railroads, seeks: "(1) to enjoin, set aside, annul, suspend or rescind the action and order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, an agency of said defendant [United States], denying plaintiff's petition for suspension * * * of certain railroad rates published to become effective October 23, 1959", and "(2) to direct the said defendant [United States] through its agency the Commission, to suspend the operation of said rates;" and to direct the defendant railroads, "parties to such rates, to refrain from doing and/or continuing the actions and things herein complained of, designed (1) to monopolize the transportation of canned goods from Pacific coast origins to Atlantic coast destinations and (2) to drive plaintiff from the business." [1]

On October 22, 1959 the District Court issued a temporary restraining order staying the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission (Commission) denying plaintiff's petition for suspension and ordering the Commission to suspend the proposed rail rate. Thereafter, a three-judge statutory court was convened pursuant to 28 U. S. C. A. §§ 2325 and 2284.

Jurisdiction is alleged under the provisions of 28 U. S. C. A. §§ 1336-1337, 1398, 2284 and 2321-2325; Section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U. S. C. A. § 1009); Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. A. §§ 1, 2, 3); and Sections 12 and 16 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. A. §§ 22, 26).

The matters now before the court are plaintiff's motion for an interlocutory injunction and defendants' motion to dismiss the complaint and dissolve the temporary restraining order.

The essential allegations of plaintiff's complaint and amendment thereof to which defendants' dismissal motion is addressed may be summarized as follows: [2]

Luckenbach, the only general cargo carrier in the intercoastal trade, is the low cost carrier of canned goods. Its rate on this traffic, without which it cannot exist, fully covers cost plus a return. The proposed rail rate is below cost. Apart from its effect on Luckenbach, it will substantially reduce present railroad revenues now being earned on the large volume of canned goods moving by rail. The reduced rail rate will either deprive Luckenbach of its backbone traffic or force its rate to a point below cost, and drive the more efficient carrier out of the trade, exposing the public to later rail rate increases. The railroads have expressly limited the rate reduction to a term of one year at the end of which the present rate will automatically be restored. The Commission ordered an investigation, thus placing upon the railroads the burden of sustaining it. But the investigation could be, and in the light of the injury to Luckenbach, probably would be nullified by the failure to suspend the rate. For if, upon conclusion of the investigation, the Commission should find that the rate was unlawful, the elimination of Luckenbach from the trade might make permanent and irremediable the interim violation of the National Transportation Policy and the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. The Commission's failure to suspend was inconsistent with its order of investigation. This was compounded by its silence as to its reasons.

Plaintiff asserts that the immediate consequences in permitting the proposed rail rate to become effective would be: "(1) to violate and frustrate the mandate of the National Transportation Policy, 49 U. S. C. preceding § 1; (2) to violate the Sherman Anti-Trust Act under the doctrine of Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. R. [1944-1945 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,344], 324 U. S. 439 (1945); and (3) to subject Luckenbach, a major water carrier under the Commission's jurisdiction, to immediate, incalculable and irreparable injury." [3]

The defendants have moved for dismissal on the ground that this court is without jurisdiction to review a Commission decision not to suspend the operation of new rate tariffs.

Plaintiff urges that Section 10(e) of the Administrative Procedure Act [4] plainly confers jurisdiction on the court to review the Commission's failure to suspend as it is authorized to do under Section 15(7) of the Interstate Commerce Act,[5] the material portion of which reads as follows:

"(7) Whenever there shall be filed with the Commission any schedule stating a new individual or joint rate, fare, or charge, or any new individual or joint classification, or any new individual or joint regulation or practice affecting any rate, fare, or charge, the Commission shall have, and it is given, authority, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, at once, and if it so orders without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier or carriers, but upon reasonable notice, to enter upon a hearing concerning the lawfulness of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice; and pending such hearing and the decision thereon the Commission, upon filing with such schedule and delivering to the carrier or carriers affected thereby a statement in writing of its reasons for such suspension, may from time to time suspend the operation of such schedule and defer the use of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, but not for a longer period then seven months beyond the time when it would otherwise go into effect; * * *."

Section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act[6] provides in part:

"Except so far as (1) statutes preclude judicial review or (2) agency action is by law committed to agency discretion * * * (c) Every agency action made reviewable by statute and every final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in any court shall be subject to judicial review * * *."

The wording of the Administrative Procedure Act apparently makes no change in the law of reviewability. Section 10 is so worded that it is obvious that the introductory clause modifies each of the subsections. Thus agency action is left unreviewable if the statute precludes review or to the extent agency action is by law committed to agency discretion. These two reasons were the only ones precluding review of administrative action by the court before the Administrative Procedure Act was enacted and the wording of the Act has brought about no change.[7]

Whatever the scope of review of subsection (e)[8] is when read alone, the scope of review is certainly narrowed by that portion of the introductory clause, "Except so far as * * * (2) agency action is by law committed to agency discretion." Thus, although subsection (e) provides that the reviewing court shall set aside agency action[9] found to be "arbitrary [or] capricious", it may not set aside arbitrary or capricious action so far as agency action is by law committed to agency discretion. So far as the action is by law committed to agency discretion it is not reviewable—even for arbitrariness or abuse of discretion. Whether or not agency action is reviewable, for a limited purpose or otherwise, depends upon what is committed by the statutes and common law to agency discretion.[10]

The Supreme Court in discussing the legislative history of the Act and how extensively, if at all, Section 10 changed the prior law on judicial review said:[11]

"* * * No easy answer is found in our decisions on the subject. Each statute in question must be examined individually; its purpose and history as well as its text are to be considered in deciding whether the courts were intended to provide relief for those aggrieved by administrative action. Mere failure to provide for judicial intervention is not conclusive; neither is the presence of language which appears to bar it."

Section 15(7) of the present Transportation Act[12] authorizing the Commission to suspend rates, pending a hearing to determine the lawfulness of the filed rate was added to the original Interstate Commerce Act of February 4, 1887 by Act of June 18, 1910.[13]

Prior to the passage of the amendment several bills in equity had been filed in Federal courts seeking injunctive relief

[8] Subsection (e) [5 U. S. C. A. § 1009] in part reads as follows: "Scope of review (e) So far as necessary to decision and where presented the reviewing court shall decide all relevant questions of law, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions, and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of any agency action. It shall (A) compel agency action unlawfully withheld or unreasonably delayed; and (B) hold unlawful and set aside agency action, findings, and conclusions found to be (1) arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law; * * *."

[9] Agency action is defined in the Administrative Procedure Act as including: "the whole or part of every agency rule, order, license, sanction, relief, or the equivalent or denial thereof, or failure to act." See 5 U. S. C. A. § 1001(g).

against the carriers to preclude the collection of the newly published rates, pending a full hearing before the Commission. Some courts held that a court of equity had the power to enjoin the collection of the new rates [14] and others held to the contrary.[15]

The reviewability of action of the Commission under the amendment in refusing to suspend rates pending hearing seems to have been raised for the first time in M. C. Kiser Co. v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co.[16] There the court stated:

> "* * * The point here involved is whether this remedy is exclusive or not —whether it ousts the United States courts of their general equity jurisdiction on that particular subject. The court is inclined to think the intention of Congress was to make the remedy provided by the amendment exclusive. * * *"

Since then, a span of approximately forty-three years, whenever the reviewability of denial of a rate suspension by the Commission has been the issue, the courts have refused review.[17] Not always have the reasons for unreviewability been the same,[18] but in every case review has been denied. The background against which the amendment was adopted and the wording of the amendment indicates Congress did not intend to bestow upon the court authority to review the denial of a suspension order. Prior to the amendment, the right to promulgate rates in the first instance rested with the carrier. The Interstate Commerce Act does not deprive the carrier of this initiative which was theirs at common law.[19] The Act generally contemplates the filing of new tariffs with the Commission prior to a hearing. The grant or denial of a suspension order is an interlocutory step preceding a hearing and decision as to the lawfulness of the proposed rate. It may be made pending a hearing on the merits and without the introduction of testimony.[20] The Act does provide that if a suspension order is granted reasons must be stated, but if denied no reason whatever need be stated.[21] Since the Act contemplates Commission action without a hearing the basis for decision, whether written reasons are required or not, is the expertise of the Commission in the field of transportation. The Act clearly contemplates no hearing by the Commission before decision and requires no reason be given if it denies suspension. Review in this posture would, in effect, supersede agency functioning. The court is constrained, therefore, to hold that the denial of a suspension of a rate by the Commission is by law committed to agency discretion and therefore not reviewable.

There remains for disposition plaintiff's antitrust claim. Defendants' conduct cited as evidencing Sherman Act §§ 1 and 2 violations is set forth below: [22]

> "The railroads know, from Luckenbach's filed reports, the financial condition of the company and the fact that canned goods are vital to Luckenbach's business. Having already diverted a major part of this traffic to themselves by a previous rate cut, they now propose a further cut which will confront Luckenbach with two alternatives, both ruinous—to cut its rates below cost or to see all its canned goods traffic taken by the railroads. In either case Luckenbach cannot long remain in business, a result which the railroads have professed a determination to bring about. The proposed reduced rate terminates at the end of the year, when the present rate automatically again becomes effective. The reduced rate is below cost and will substantially reduce the revenue from the 62 percent of the canned goods traffic the railroads are carrying at the higher present rate."

Judicial cognizance of the above action is predicated upon two factors:[23]

(1) The independent applicability of the Sherman Act provision to regulate railroads remains unimpaired, for the I. C. C. has not been delegated power to enforce Sherman standards; and

(2) The provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, authorizing the Commission to relieve carriers from antitrust responsibility for collective rate-making procedures, does not immunize the so-called predatory practices alleged.

Conceding plaintiff's proffer for the purpose of discussion it does not resolve the fundamental issue presented, namely, the applicability of the primary jurisdiction doctrine.[24] Plaintiff misconceives the modern import of the concept.[25] The recent decisional law, in conjunction with the legal literature strongly urges where an administrative board, particularly knowledgeable in a specialized area, has been established, preliminary resort to the body should be had if some phase of the matter in litigation is within its exclusive jurisdiction.[26]

As observed by Mr. Justice Frankfurter in Far East Conference v. United States: [27]

"* * * Uniformity and consistency in the regulation of business entrusted to a particular agency are secured, and the limited functions of review by the judiciary are more rationally exercised, by preliminary resort for ascertaining and interpreting the circumstances underlying legal issues to agencies that are better equipped than courts by specialization, by insight gained through experience, and by more flexible procedure."

The requirement of preliminary resort to administrative boards is imperative to achieve maximum effectiveness from our judicial process. To bypass an agency peculiarly adapted in a particular field would be a complete economic and judicial waste. An integrated system necessitates that agency action precede court review where machinery has been created for this procedure. Especially is this true in the area of national transportation and other fully regulated industries.[28]

Application of the foregoing principles to the allegations of the complaint conclusively demonstrates the antitrust charges should be initially considered by the Commission. That the precise facts forming the basis of plaintiff's antitrust action are cognizable by the Commission is amply supported by plaintiff's showing before the Commission in the suspension proceeding. There, in an application designated "Protest and Petition for Suspension" at pages 9-10 plaintiff stated:[29]

"IV. Violation of the Antitrust Laws

"The proposed reduction is thus designed to eliminate the competition of Luckenbach—and is well calculated to that effect. When such a purpose is effected through collective rate-making procedures and action—otherwise exempt—they violate sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act."

[24] "The doctrine of primary jurisdiction, or exclusive primary jurisdiction, or primary decision, or preliminary resort, or prior resort, is not a doctrine that governs judicial review of administrative action. In this important respect, it is altogether different from the doctrines of exhaustion and of ripeness, which govern the timing of judicial review of administrative action. The doctrine of primary jurisdiction determines whether the court or the agency should make the initial decision.

"The doctrine of primary jurisdiction does not necessarily allocate power between courts and agencies, for it governs only the question whether court or agency will initially decide a particular issue, not the question whether court or agency will finally decide the issue. * * *" 3 Davis, Administrative Law Treatise, § 19.01, pp. 1-3 (1958).

R. C. A.* 358 U. S. 334, 348 (1959).

[29] Document styled "Protest and Petition for Suspension" attached to the complaint.

The National Transportation Policy required to be considered by the Commission provides in part:[30]

> "'It is hereby declared to be the national transportation policy of the Congress to provide for fair and impartial regulation of all modes of transportation subject to the provisions of this Act, * * *
> "'to encourage the establishment and maintenance of reasonable charges for transportation services, without unjust discriminations, undue preferences or advantages, or unfair or destructive competition practices; * * *
> * * *
> "'All of the provisions of this Act * * * shall be administered and enforced with a view to carrying out the above declaration of policy.'"

Plaintiff's assertion that the railroads' predatory practices violate, inter alia, the aforementioned provision, additionally forms the basis for its charge that defendants wrongfully attempt to monopolize "a part of the trade or commerce among the several States".[31]

Plaintiff seeks not only antitrust relief against defendant railroads but also against the Commission for it is the final action of the Commission in permitting the rates to become effective that is injurious to plaintiff.[32] Thus, if the rates be finally declared contrary to the National Transportation policy, then the purported conspiratorial action will have been thwarted.

Paramount in this determination inviting the Commission to initially rule on the instant claims is the fact that defendant railroads are operating pursuant to § 5(a) antitrust exemption agreements.[33] Section 5(a) supersedes the Sherman Act to the extent that the Approved agreement is immunized from Sherman Act proscriptions;[34]

[31] Complaint, allegation 19.

[32] Plaintiff's Reply Brief at page 3 states:

"Insofar as relief is sought the Interstate Commerce Commission on anti-trust grounds, the basis for jurisdiction in this panel is clear. Commission action is the sine qua non for effectuating the anti-trust violation. The Commission's imprimatur is an essential prerequisite to the proposed reduction by which the roads seek plaintiff's destruction. Fully informed that its action will have this effect, the Commission has, nevertheless, persisted in its position. When, as here, an agency of the government permits its sanctions to be used to consummate a violation of the anti-trust laws, it is not beyond the judicial reach."

And on pages 86-87 of the Transcript of the Oral Argument the following colloquy between court and counsel for plaintiff appears:

"JUDGE WRIGHT: Suppose you just wanted to restrain the Railroads from exercising the right given them by the Commission, I. C. C. law, to make these rates effective, would that not have been a one-judge matter which would come up under the Clayton Act, anti-trust laws?

"MR. KIRKPATRICK: If our relief were sought solely against the Railroads, then I would have thought that a one-judge court could have heard the matter.

"JUDGE WRIGHT: It is your position, under the anti-trust theory, that you are entitled to any relief at all against the I. C. C.?

"MR. KIRKPATRICK: Yes, sir, very definitely.

"JUDGE BIGGS: Do you assert that the I. C. C. is in an illegal combination with the Railroads?

"MR. KIRKPATRICK: Our theory is that the action of the I. C. C. here is really the last link in the chain by which this anti-trust violation will be consummated. Here is the point: As I understand it, the rate, which the Railroads propose, cannot be made effective except by a filing with the Commission and Commission action permitting it to become effective. Unless that is done the rate cannot be charged. When the rate is filed with the Commission, the Commission permits it to become effective, then that becomes the only legal rate. It acquires statutory force, and it is the only rate which the carriers can lawfully collect or the shippers can properly pay. Consequently, Commission action is really the last step in this whole thing. If the rate did not go into effect by virtue of Commission processes, then we would not be hurt and not not be before your Honors this afternoon."

Chief Judge Biggs and I construe the broad allegations of the complaint, together with counsel for plaintiff's aforementioned remarks as enunciating an antitrust cause of action against the Commission. We find it unnecessary in view of the final determination to pass on whether an agency of the United States can be made a party defendant in a private antitrust action.

[33] "The railroad defendants engage, together with virtually all other United States and some Canadian railroads, in collective ratemaking under agreements approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission under section 5a of the Interstate Commerce Act (49 U. S. C., 5b)." Complaint, allegation 6.

[34] 49 U. S. C. A. § 5(b) provides in relevant part:

[¶ 2] "Any carrier party to an agreement between or among two or more carriers relating to rates, fares, classifications, divisions, allowances, or charges (including charges between carriers and compensation paid or received for the use of facilities and equipment), or rules and regulations pertaining thereto, or procedures for the joint consideration, initiation or establishment thereof, may, under such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe, apply to the Commission for approval of the agreement, and the Commission shall by order approve any such agreement (if approval thereof is not prohibited by paragraph (4), (5), and since Section 5(a) is administered by the Commission it is incumbent upon the court to seek the observations of the Commission with respect to the extent and scope of the exemption. The exemption certainly does not sterilize all forms of conspiratorial action; however, to foster an orderly administration of the immunization provision requires, at the minimum, primary construction by the Commission.

Professor Davis in his Administrative Law Treatise suggests that under the circumstances presented, initial resort to the administrative agency is indicated:[35]

> "(1) On the question whether the doctrine applies to problems or relief which are beyond administrative jurisdiction, the theory seems reasonably clear. The test is not whether some parts of the case are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts; the test is whether some parts of the case are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the agency. Because of the purpose of the doctrine—to assure that the agency will not be by-passed on what is especially committed to it—and because resort to the courts is still open after the agency has acted, the doctrine applies even if the agency has no jurisdiction to grant the relief sought."

The principle enunciated by Professor Davis is eminently sound. Accordingly, plaintiff is required to address these antitrust charges in the first instance to the Commission.

The sole question remaining is whether to dismiss or retain jurisdiction of the antitrust charges. The preferred procedure is to dismiss. As observed by the Supreme Court:[36]

> "We believe that no purpose will here be served to hold the present action in abeyance in the District Court while the proceeding before the Board and subsequent judicial review or enforcement of its order are being pursued. A similar suit is easily initiated later, if appropriate. Business-like procedure counsels that the Government's complaint should now be dismissed, * * *."

Defendants have questioned the jurisdiction and propriety of the statutory three-judge court acting upon the antitrust claim. The antitrust cause and the action to review are so inextricably enmeshed that it would be unwarranted to truncate the litigation at this juncture. To refer the antitrust phase to the district court would require different reviewing tribunals to initially rule on the respective phases of this determination.[37]

Against this background, and in view of the ancillary nature of the antitrust charges, Chief Judge Biggs and I are in accord that the presently constituted court has jurisdiction in the premises.

The complaint will be dismissed. An order to such effect is filed concurrently with this opinion.

or (6) of this section) if it finds that, by reason of furtherance of the national transportation policy declared in this Act, the relief provided in paragraph (9) of this section should apply with respect to the making and carrying out of such agreement; otherwise the application shall be denied. The approval of the Commission shall be granted only upon such terms and conditions as the Commission may prescribe as necessary to enable it to grant its approval in accordance with the standard above set forth in this paragraph."

[¶ 9] "Parties to any agreement approved by the Commission under this section and other persons are, if the approval of such agreement is not prohibited by paragraph (4), (5), or (6) of this section, relieved from the operation of the antitrust laws with respect to the making of such agreement, and with respect to the carrying out of such agreement in conformity with its provisions and in conformity with the terms and conditions prescribed by the Commission."

[37] 28 U. S. C. A. § 1253 provides:

"Except as otherwise provided by law, any party may appeal to the Supreme Court from an order granting or denying, after notice and hearing, an interlocutory or permanent injunction in any civil action, suit or proceeding required by any Act of Congress to be heard and determined by a district court of three judges."

This section applies wherein either an interlocutory or permanent injunction is sought to restrain the enforcement, operation or execution, in whole or in part of any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission "other than for the payment of money or the collection of fines, penalties and forfeitures." 28 U. S. C. A. §§ 2321, 2325.

Appeal from the decision of the United States District Court for the District of Delaware sitting as a one judge court dismissing an antitrust claim as herein alleged would be pursuant to 28 U. S. C. A. § 1291 which states:

"The courts of appeal shall have jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions of the district courts of the United States, the District Court for the Territory of Alaska, the United States District Court for the District of the Canal Zone, and the District Court of the Virgin Islands, except where a direct review may be had in the Supreme Court."

[Concurring and Dissenting Opinion]

RODNEY, District Judge, concurring in part, dissenting in part [In full text]: I am in entire accord with most of the conclusions herein reached. I agree that, under existing provisions of law and procedure, where change of rate of transportation is considered by the carrier, it is the duty of the carrier, intending such change, to file the proposed new rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Upon a protest being filed, it becomes the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the lawfulness of the new rates. In doing this the Commission may, but need not, order a suspension of the new rates until final hearing. If suspension is ordered, reasons for the action by the Commission must be assigned. If no suspension of the new rates is ordered by the Commission, no order is signed and, under the weight of authority, no reasons need be assigned for such refusal.

The failure or refusal of the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend the operation of the new rates as in this case until final hearing is, I agree, an exercise of discretion vested in such Commission and since the discretion has been exercised then under the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U. S. C. § 1009(e)) it is excluded as to reviewability. So much for the relief sought against the Interstate Commerce Commission by injunction.

The complaint also states a claim against the defendant railroads and others acting in combination with them under the antitrust laws. The majority opinion finds that the doctrine of Primary Jurisdiction requires that this matter be first considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission and dismisses the plaintiff's claim as arising from the violation of the antitrust laws upon that basis. It is not the conclusion that the Primary Jurisdiction with reference to some features of the antitrust laws rests with the Interstate Commerce Commission to which I object for I do not reach that question. I question whether the special three-judge court should determine this matter or whether it should be determined by the district court as normally constituted, and with which this case was originally filed.

The three-judge court is somewhat of an anomaly. It is a federal district court consisting at times of three judges instead of one. It is of purely statutory origin and intended for distinct and limited purposes.

Starting as an expediting provision in 1903 with reference to certain antitrust cases and as insuring direct review by the Supreme Court (32 Stat. 823) the three-judge court has been made applicable to several situations. Among these were suits to annul, set aside or restrain orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission and matters concerning the constitutionality of the state statutes or administrative orders. In these latter instances the requirement of a three-judge court is inextricably and almost universally interwoven with the matter of injunction and the disinclination to allow the issuance or refusal of an injunction in certain cases to be determined by one judge. So it is that by 28 U. S. C. § 2325 any injunction restraining the enforcement operation or execution, in whole or in part, of any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission will be determined by a three-judge court under 28 U. S. C. § 2284.

It will be borne in mind that it is not every proceeding to review an order or action of the Interstate Commerce Commission that requires a three-judge court. While every action to enforce, annul or set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission is required by 28 U. S. C. § 2321 to be taken under the provision of Chapter 157 of Title 28, yet the bringing of such action does not operate of itself to require a three-judge court or to operate as a stay or suspend the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission and if no request is made for a stay or suspension of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission the case would remain in the district court as normally constituted.

It is only under Section 2325 the three-judge court comes into existence. If an interlocutory or permanent injunction restraining the enforcement of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission is requested, then and only then does the three-judge court come into existence.

In the present proceedings and insofar as the antitrust claim is concerned, no injunction against the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to the antitrust claim is suggested in the complaint nor mentioned in the relief sought. It is true that in the briefs the plaintiff seeks to consider the action of the Commission in refusing to suspend the proposed rates as constituting an effective step in the antitrust claim, but no injunction is considered in the complaint with reference to that claim.

Although neither the complaint in this case nor the prayers for relief mention the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to the antitrust claim, yet the majority of this Court considers that the Interstate Commerce Commission is claimed by the plaintiff with participating in some way in the antitrust violation. Whether the Commission be considered an active participant in the antitrust claim and therefore essentially as a defendant, or whether the nonaction of the Commission merely furnished the means by which the railroads may be charged with violation of the antitrust laws, then in neither case do I see any jurisdiction in a three-judge court since no injunctive relief is involved in any way.

I am of the opinion that the three-judge court as such has only such jurisdiction as is expressly given to it by statute and does not have jurisdiction to determine either the merits of the antitrust claim nor to dismiss the antitrust claim under the Primary Jurisdiction principle. I think that all questions as to the antitrust claim should be considered by the district court as normally constituted and as embracing the residuum of the claim of the plaintiff not cognizable by the three-judge court. A portion of the complaint not cognizable by a three-judge court may, I think, be segregated from that part coming within the jurisdiction of such three-judge court.[1]

Final Judgment

PAUL, District Judge [In full text]: Plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on April 3, 1957, defendants having appeared and filed their answers to said complaint, and the parties hereto, by their respective attorneys, having consented to the entry of this Final Judgment, and without said Judgment constituting evidence or an admission by any party hereto with respect to any issue herein,

Now, Therefore, upon consent of all parties hereto, it is hereby Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed as follows:

I

[Jurisdiction]

This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter hereof and of the parties hereto. The complaint states a claim against the defendants upon which relief may be granted under Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, as amended.

II

[Definitions]

As used in this Final Judgment:

(A) "Plate glass mirrors" shall mean mirrors made from polished plate glass, including such mirrors with or without polished edges, bevelled edges, surface engravings, decorations or other or further fabrication;

(B) "Person" shall mean any indvidual, partnership, firm, corporation, association or other business or legal entity;

(C) "Prediscount list prices" shall mean list prices used as a base for the application of a discount or discounts in the quotation of prices for plate glass mirrors.

III

[Applicability]

The provisions of this Final Judgment applicable to any defendant shall apply to each such defendant and to its officers, directors, agents, employees, subsidiaries, successors and assigns, and to all other persons in active concert or participation with any defendant who receive actual notice of this Final Judgment by personal service or otherwise.

IV

[Dissemination of Price Lists]

(A) Each of the defendants is ordered and directed to discontinue on and after April 15, 1960 any and all use of the following: List Prices of Plain Mirrors, April 1, 1950, Mirror Manufacturers Association; Plain Mirrors, List Prices, April 25, 1950, Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company; Official List Prices of Plain Mirror Plates, December 1, 1936, Copyrighted by Mirror Manufacturers Association and National Glass Distributors Association; and any other prediscount list prices used prior to or at the date of the entry of this Final Judgment, except prediscount list prices not used for the sale of plate glass mirrors to furniture or other manufacturers, distributors or jobbers. Nothing contained in this subsection (A) shall prohibit the defendants from issuing invoices on and after April 15, 1960, covering the pricing of plate glass mirrors on the basis of any discount from any of the aforementioned prediscount list prices for firm orders taken prior to said date.

(B) Each of the defendants is enjoined and restrained from requesting, assisting or facilitating the use by any other mirror manufacturer of any of the lists covered by subsection (A) of this Section IV.

(C) Each of the defendants is ordered and directed, on or before April 15, 1960, to notify in writing each of its furniture manufacturer customers that, in accordance with the terms of this Final Judgment, it is discontinuing the use of the prediscount list prices for plate glass mirrors then in effect, designating precisely in such notice the list or lists being discontinued.

(D) Each defendant is ordered and directed on or about April 15, 1960 to compile new prediscount list prices or other price lists, replacing those prediscount list prices covered by subsection (A) of this Section IV, such prediscount list prices or price lists to be independently determined by such defendant on the basis of its individual costs, profits and other lawful considerations. Copies of such prediscount list prices or price lists shall be promptly furnished to the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division.

For the purpose of determination by this Court of compliance with this subsection (D) by any defendant, in the event that plaintiff institutes any proceeding with respect to such compliance, the defendant shall initially introduce its evidence to show the manner of its compliance with this subsection (D).

V

[Price Fixing]

The defendants are jointly and severally enjoined and restrained from entering into, adhering to, participating in, maintaining, renewing or furthering any contract, combination, conspiracy, agreement, understanding, plan, program, or concerted course of action among themselves or with any other person engaged in the manufacture of plate glass mirrors or any association, organization or agency whose membership includes mirror manufacturers:

(A) To determine, fix, establish, adopt or maintain prices, price systems, discounts, or any other terms or conditions of sale for plate glass mirrors with respect to any sale to any other person;

(B) To use the same or similar prediscount list prices or any price lists for the sale of plate glass mirrors;

(C) To establish, print, publish, exchange, circulate or use any price lists (including any prediscount list prices) for plate glass mirrors or to establish, exchange or use any formulae or any other means of determining such price lists, price quotations, or any other terms or conditions of sale of plate glass mirrors.

VI

[Pricing Procedure]

(A) Each defendant is enjoined and restrained from using (except as permitted under subsection (A) of Section IV herein) as a basis for the sale of plate glass mirrors to furniture manufacturers any prediscount list prices which are compiled or which are disseminated by any person other than such defendant.

(B) Each defendant is ordered and directed, if it uses any prediscount list prices for the sale of plate glass mirrors to furniture manufacturers, to determine any such list prices independently and on the basis of its individual costs, profits and other lawful considerations.

VII

[Reporting Compliance]

Each of the defendants, nine months after the date of the entry of this Final Judgment, shall serve, by mailing a copy to the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, a report stating whether such defendant, since the discontinuance of the lists designated in subsection (A) of Section IV of this Final Judgment, has established or used any prediscount list prices or other price lists for the sale of plate glass mirrors to furniture and other manufacturers, distributors or jobbers, together with a copy of each such list and a statement as to the date when, and manner in which, each such list was established.

VIII

[Enforcement and Compliance]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment and for no other purpose, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, upon written request of the Attorney General, or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to any defendant made to its principal office, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege:

(A) Reasonable access, during the office hours of such defendant, to all books, ledgers, accounts, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of such defendant which relate to any matter contained in this Final Judgment;

(B) Subject to the reasonable convenience of such defendant and without restraint or interference from it, to interview officers and employees of such defendant who may have counsel present, regarding such matters;

(C) To require such defendant to submit reports in writing with respect to the matters contained in this Final Judgment.

No information obtained by the means provided in this Section VIII shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Executive Branch of the United States Government, except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment.

IX

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this Final Judgment to apply to the Court at any time for such further orders or directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this Final Judgment, for the modification or termination of any of the provisions thereof, and for the enforcement of compliance therewith and the punishment of violations thereof.

Case No. 1489 in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Sherman Antitrust Act—Consent Decree—Boycotts —Contracts to Refrain from Selling.—A corporation engaged in incentive planning was ordered by a consent decree to cancel all existing contracts that require its suppliers to refrain from selling to any incentive planner other than the corporation. The corporation was also prohibited from entering into any such contracts.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.533; and Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8421.

For the plaintiff: Robert A. Bicks, Acting Assistant Attorney General, Hugh K. Martin, United States Attorney, and George D. Reycraft, William D. Kilgore, Jr., Robert B. Hummel, Norman H. Seidler, Robert M. Dixon, and Stewart J. Miller, Attorneys, Dept. of Justice.

For the defendant: Shaman, Winer, Shulman & Ziegler; Dow, Lohnes & Albertson; and Hollabaugh & Jacobs.

Final Judgment

Lester L. Cecil, Circuit Judge, sitting by designation [In full text]: Plaintiff, United States of America, having filed its complaint herein on December 30, 1959, and defendant, The E. F. MacDonald Company, by its attorneys, having appeared and denied the substantive allegations thereof, and plaintiff and defendant having severally consented to the making and entry of this Final Judgment without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein without admission in respect to any issue:

Now, Therefore, before any testimony has been taken and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein and upon consent of the parties hereto, it is hereby

Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed as Follows:

I.

[Jurisdiction]

The Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter herein and the parties hereto. The complaint states a claim upon which relief may be granted against the defendant, The E. F. MacDonald Company, under Section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, as amended.

II.

[Definitions]

As used in this Final Judgment:

(a) "MacDonald" means the defendant, The E. F. MacDonald Company, an Ohio corporation;

(b) "Incentive planner" means a person, corporation or other concern engaged in devising, installing and administering incentive programs for business concerns, which programs, utilizing merchandise prizes as rewards, are generally designed and conducted for the purpose of increasing sales, production or achieving other desirable business objectives for the benefit of the subscribing company by stimulating and encouraging employees and/or distributors of the subscribing company to greater effort;

(c) "Supplier of merchandise for prizes" means a manufacturer, distributor, or any other person or concern which sells merchandise to incentive planners for use as rewards in incentive programs.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

III.

[Applicability]

The provisions of this Final Judgment shall apply to MacDonald, its domestic subsidiaries, successors and assigns, and to each of its officers, directors, agents and employees, and to all other persons in active concert or participation with MacDonald who shall have received actual notice of this Final Judgment by personal service or otherwise.

IV.

[Boycotts]

(A) MacDonald is ordered and directed to cancel and terminate, within sixty (60) days after entry of this Final Judgment, any provisions of all existing contracts, agreements or understandings between it and any suppliers of merchandise for prizes, whereby any of such suppliers has agreed to refrain from selling merchandise for prizes to any incentive planner other than MacDonald.

(B) MacDonald is enjoined and restrained from entering into, enforcing or claiming any rights under any contract, agreement or understanding with any supplier of merchandise for prizes, which has the purpose or effect of requiring said supplier to refrain from selling any merchandise for prizes to any other incentive planners.

(C) MacDonald is ordered and directed to give, within sixty (60) days after the entry of this Final Judgment, written notice of the terms of subsection (B) above to all suppliers from whom it has regularly purchased merchandise for prizes within the past year.

V.

[Enforcement and Compliance]

For the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment, duly authorized representatives of the Department of Justice shall, on written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, and on reasonable notice to MacDonald at its principal office, be permitted, subject to any legally recognized privilege, (a) reasonable access, during office hours, to all books, ledgers, correspondence, memoranda and other records and documents in the possession or under the control of MacDonald, relating to any of the matters contained in this Final Judgment, and (b) subject to the reasonable convenience of MacDonald, and without restraint or interference from it, to interview regarding any such matters officers and employees of MacDonald, who may have counsel present.

Upon the written request of the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, MacDonald shall submit such written reports with respect to any of the matters contained in this Final Judgment as from time to time may be necessary for the enforcement of this Final Judgment. No information obtained by the means provided in this Section V shall be divulged by any representative of the Department of Justice to any person other than a duly authorized representative of the Executive Branch of the plaintiff except in the course of legal proceedings to which the United States is a party for the purpose of securing compliance with this Final Judgment, or as otherwise required by law.

VI.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

Jurisdiction is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this Final Judgment to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this Final Judgment.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Civil Nos. 149-141 and 149-140. Filed December 29, 1959.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Subpoenas duces tecum.—A corporation which had alleged that it had suffered a substantial loss in sales as a result of antitrust law violations by an employers' association, contracting unions, and certain officers and agents, was ordered to produce copies of federal and state income tax returns and city business and tax returns, and cash books, check books, cancelled checks, and bank statements. However, the plaintiff's notice to produce "all of the documents . . . and all other writings made by each of the defendants . . ." was held to be patently impossible of compliance.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 1, ¶ 9013.975.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Pretrial Procedures—Depositions.—Defendants were entitled to priority of examination, in the absence of some special and good reason, when they had served their notices to take depositions prior to plaintiff. Plaintiff's notice calling for an examination of defendant organizations "by each of their officers and persons affiliated with said named defendants who have knowledge of the facts set forth in the pleadings herein" did not describe the persons with sufficient particularity.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 1, ¶ 9013.775.

For the plaintiff: Fellner & Rovins (Morris J. Fellner and Leonard W. Wagman, of counsel), New York, N. Y.

For the defendants: Schlesinger & Bloom (Emil Schlesinger and Max Bloom, of counsel), New York, N. Y., for Joint Board of Dress and Waistmakers' Union, Zimmerman, Minkoff, and Namenwirth; Morris P. Glushien, New York, N. Y., for International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union; and Phillips, Nizer, Benjamin, Krim & Ballon (Charles Ballon, Eugene Kline, and Raoul Gersten, of counsel), New York, N. Y., for The Popular Priced Dress Manufacturers' Group, Inc.

RYAN, Ch. J. [In full text]: Plaintiff moves (1) to vacate defendants' notices to take testimony; (2) to quash defendants' subpoenas duces tecum; (3) for an order granting plaintiff priority in the taking of depositions; and (4) "to appoint and designate a Federal Judge to supervise the taking of depositions and to establish a schedule therefor."

In addition, plaintiff moves to vacate and set aside defendants' notices to produce for use in connection with the taking of plaintiff's deposition books and records enumerated in the subpoena duces tecum. In turn, defendants move to vacate plaintiff's notice to take testimony; to set aside the notice to produce; and to stay the taking of any depositions by plaintiff until the completion of the taking of plaintiff's deposition by defendants.

In action No. 149-140, plaintiff seeks to recover treble damages for alleged violation of the Sherman Act and in action No. 149-141 to recover payments allegedly made in violation of Section 302 of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 (29 U. S. C. 186) and for an injunction to restrain future violations thereof. The rulings in this decision apply to both actions.

On October 7th and 14th, conferences were held at which counsel for all parties were present. At these conferences the problems of schedule, site and payment for the taking of all depositions were resolved. At the same time, plaintiff withdrew its objection to the subpoena duces tecum in the § 302 action and excepted to five demands in those in the antitrust action.

Plaintiff's Notice to Take Depositions

The plaintiff's notice calls for an examination of defendant organizations "by each of their officers and persons affiliated with said named defendants who have knowledge of the facts set forth in the pleadings herein." Such a description fails to comply with the requirements of Rule 30 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (Morrison Export Co. v. Goldstone, 12 F. R. D. 258 at 260; Shankman v. Northwest Airlines, 18 F. R. D. 436).

Accordingly, we order that the notice of the plaintiff is vacated as to all defendants except Messrs. Zimmerman, Minkoff and

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Namenwirth and Joint Board to the extent that it will be examined through these three individuals. Although not named in the body of the notice with the particularity required by Rule 30, they are expressly included in the caption on the face of the said notice.

Plaintiff's Notice to Produce

However, even as to those defendants, plaintiff's notice to produce must be vacated. That notice is as follows:

> "Please take further notice, upon the taking of the depositions of each of the defendants, their officers, agents and employees, each of the defendants will be required to produce at the times and places specified above, for use in connection therewith, all of the documents, books, papers, records, agreements, memoranda, correspondence and all other writings made by each of the defendants or on behalf of each of the defendants, their agents, servants, employees, representatives or designees."

Such a description is of no value in enabling the most willing of adversaries to comply with the notice. Indeed, this notice is patently impossible of compliance.

Priority

It is undisputed that all defendants had served their notices to take depositions prior to plaintiff. Therefore, defendants are entitled to priority of examination in accordance with the prevailing rule that, in the absence of some special and good reason, examinations should proceed in the order in which they are demanded (Commercio E Industria Continental S. A. v. Dresser Industries Inc., 19 F. R. D. 265). Plaintiff has failed to establish such a special reason as would incline us to depart from the normal rule of priority. The examination sought is not unreasonable.

Designation of a Federal Judge

We come now to plaintiff's application "to appoint and designate a Federal Judge to supervise the taking of depositions and to establish a schedule therefor." This application is opposed by certain of the defendants. Part of it has been rendered moot by reason of the cooperation of counsel in establishing a schedule. We see no reason why this flow of cooperation cannot be further tapped for the benefit of the actual taking of all depositions. As Members of the Bar of this Court, counsel for defendants are entitled to an opportunity to show their good faith by cooperating with their adversary for the orderly completion of this stage of the instant action.

Furthermore, the time of the Bench of this Court has been so completely mortgaged for the disposition of the large number of long and protracted cases filed in this District that an assignment of a Judge to supervise the taking of depositions in the case at bar would serve only to postpone such proceedings.

Accordingly, plaintiff's motion is denied with leave to apply for appointment of a master in the event that counsel cannot achieve the desired cooperation after the initiation of the taking of depositions.

Plaintiff's Exceptions to Subpoenae

The items demanded by defendants' subpoenae to which plaintiff has excepted are: (1) cash books showing disbursements made by plaintiff; (2) all check books, including check stubs, showing all deposits and withdrawals made by plaintiff; (3) all cancelled checks of plaintiff; (4) all bank statements of plaintiff; and (5) copies of all federal and state income tax returns and New York City general business and financial tax returns filed by plaintiff.

The first four items are clearly relevant on the issue of plaintiff's damages and the alleged illegality of the payments sought to be recovered. The cases cited by the defendants in support of the proposition that the tax returns are important on the question of damages, deal with loss of earnings or lost profits. Neither of these is involved in the Section 302 action and the defendant does not demand tax returns in that action.

As to Item 5 in the antitrust action, plaintiff alleges that it:

> "suffered a substantial loss in sales by reason of the fact that retailers were intimidated and coerced by the defendants, and by reason of all the unlawful conduct on the part of the defendants hereinbefore described, the plaintiff has suffered damages since February, 1958 in the amount of $200,000.00;".

This allegation provides defendants' demands for tax returns with sufficient materiality.

Accordingly, all of plaintiff's exceptions to the subpoenæ duces tecum are overruled and its motion to quash is denied. However, plaintiff shall not be required to produce tax returns for those years prior to 1956.

So ordered.

Appeal from the order of the Court of Common Pleas No. 4 of the County of Philadelphia as of March Term 1959 No. 611.

Pennsylvania Fair Trade Act

Fair Trade Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Allegations and Proof—Competition—Irreparable Harm.—A preliminary injunction, granted to a refiner of petroleum products against one of its dealers who had not signed a fair trade agreement, was dissolved because the refiner had not proved that its products were in fair and open competition and that it, a national distributor, had suffered irreparable harm through the actions of a single dealer. The refiner relied on an averment, denied by the dealer, that its gasoline was competitive. However, competition "may not necessarily exist merely because one says it does," and the trial court foreclosed the dealer from attempting to disprove the contention. Differences between color and advertising slogans of two brands of gasoline are not sufficient grounds to justify taking judicial notice that competition exists.

Opinion of the Court

Bok, Justice [In full text]: The court below, at plaintiff's behest, entered a preliminary injunction.

This confronts us with the familiar rule of review, that on appeal from the refusal, grant, or continuance of a preliminary injunction we will seek only apparent reasonable grounds for the action and will not consider the merits or the reasons unless it is plain that no grounds for it exist or that the rules of law relied on are palpably wrong or clearly inapplicable: Lindenfelser v. Lindenfelser, 385 Pa. 342 (1956), 123 A. 2d 626.

Plaintiff manufactures, refines, and sells petroleum products, including gasoline known as H-C and Power-X. It advertises widely and its product is known and used throughout the country.

Defendant is a dealer who owns and operates his gasoline service station in Philadelphia. He leased his property to plaintiff for a cent and three-quarters per gallon sold and plaintiff leased or licensed it back to him for a quarter cent. This is not a uniform rate, but varies with the locality of the station and its value to plaintiff.

Acting under what is commonly called the Fair Trade Act (June 5, 1935, P. L. 266; June 12, 1941, P. L. 128, No. 66; 73 P. S. §§ 7-11; Act of May 29, 1956, P. L. (1955) 1855; 73 P. S. §§ 7-26, pocket), plaintiff entered into agreements with 112 of its 146 retail dealers in the area, by which the dealers agreed not to sell plaintiff's gasoline at less than stated minimum prices. Defendant was not one of those that signed such an agreement, but Section 2 of the Act makes it unfair competition to sell at less than the price stipulated in any such contract, and this has been upheld: Burche Co. v. General Electric Co. [1955 Trade Cases ¶ 68,078], 382 Pa. 370 (1955), 115 A. 2d 361; Mathieson Chemical Corp. v. L. & H. Stores, Inc. [1958 Trade Cases ¶ 68,981], 392 Pa. 225 (1958), 139 A. 2d 897.

The purpose of the Act is to prevent predatory price-cutting and cutthroat competition, and to protect owners and public alike against unfair practices in the distribution of articles of standard quality under a distinguished brand or mark: Bristol-Myers v. Lit Brothers [1932-1939 Trade Cases ¶ 55,227], 336 Pa. 81 (1939), 6 A. 2d 843; Lentheric Inc. v. F. W. Woolworth Co. [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,033], 338 Pa. 523 (1940), 13 A. 2d 12.

We are told that gasoline has not yet been before our courts, and that appears to be so. There is no difficulty about accepting it within the protection of the Act, since Section 4 defines "commodity" as "any subject of commerce", and the subject of the Act is "any commodity".

The injunction issued by the court below enjoins defendant from selling plaintiff's gasoline at less than the minimum retail prices which formed the subject of plaintiff's dealer agreements and of which defendant had been duly notified. Defendant undersold, alleging that he couldn't stay in business otherwise, and this caused the instant suit.

We think the court's action ill-founded. It is a bit unrealistic to believe that a national gasoline distributor would suffer such irreparable harm as to warrant summary relief from one dealer's selling under the price level. At final hearing it may well be able to show larger harm.

More basic, however, is the notion of competition. In the closely related field of fair sales, the Act of July 1, 1937, P. L. 2672, 73 P. S. §§ 201-207 was held unconstitutional in Commonwealth v. Zasloff [1940-1943 Trade Cases ¶ 56,034], 338 Pa. 457 (1940), 13 A. 2d 67, Mr. Justice Stern saying: "If the Act confined itself to prohibiting sales below cost when intended to destroy competition, it would undoubtedly be valid . . .". The instant Fair Trade Act of 1935 refers to products which are "in fair and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced by others." Plaintiff's complaint avers that its gasoline is thus competitive in Pennsylvania, but the only evidence adduced in support is the bare statement by plaintiff's single witness: "We are in competition with the major companies in this market . . . [in Philadelphia]." Defendant's answer expressly denies this averment.

We incline to the view that competition may be a self-serving and conclusionary word and that it may not necessarily exist merely because one says it does. Defendant sought to offer evidence to show that it did not exist in fact, but was foreclosed. He also offered unsuccessfully to prove a modification of the price arrangement in plaintiff's telling him that he could sell at any price he wanted. Plaintiff suggests that from observation we could take judicial notice of competition, but it occurs to us that one company's gasoline may not differ in content or quality from that of another merely because they differ in color or advertising slogans, at least in the regular gasolines, which seem to be uniform in price. And observation might reveal only that one man keeps his station neater than the next.

Since competition is the nexus of the Act and has been asserted and denied, the need of proof is obvious.

There are substantial issues that should await development at a full hearing. The current injunction, whose imposition we regard as without basis, should be dissolved.

Decree reversed cum procedendo.

Mr. Justice Bell dissents.

[¶ 69,587] American Greetings Corporation v. United States of America.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. No. 13,893. Filed December 31, 1959.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio. Weick, District Judge.

Federal Trade Commission Act

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Violation of Cease and Desist Order—Civil Penalty Suit—Appeal.—A judgment imposing penalties of $10,600 on a manufacturer of greeting cards, which violated a cease and desist order when it removed competitors' greeting cards from mounts which bore their trade-marks or trade names and placed the competitors' cards on blank mounts, was affirmed. While the order did not make illegal the practice of remounting competitors' cards, which was common in the industry, it was illegal to remove trade-marked mounts, remount the cards on blank mounts, and display them in the same cabinet with a mount bearing the trade-mark of the manufacturer. However, the remounting of a competitors' card on a blank mount could not be considered a violation of the order where the competitors' previous mount was blank. The trial court assessed only a nominal penalty where the Commission's failure to speak out against the questioned practice, while fully cognizant of it for a period of approximately four years, might have led the manufacturer to believe that the Commission was not objecting to the practice. The penalty imposed was $200 on each of three counts; on another three counts, the penalties were $5,000, $2,500, and $2,500.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5075.12, and FTC Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8661, 8661.50.

Federal Trade Commission Enforcement and Procedure—Civil Penalties for Violation of FTC Order—Motions for New Trial Denied—Appeal.—A judgment imposing penalties of $10,600 against a manufacturer of greeting cards, previously denied a motion for a new trial, was affirmed. The motion was ostensibly on the ground that the judgment was contrary to the weight of the evidence, but the manufacturer's brief disclosed that it was not so much the weight of the evidence that was questioned, but rather the court's interpretation of the scope of the Federal Trade Commission order. It had been found that the manufacturer violated a cease and desist order when it removed competitors' greeting cards from mounts which bore their trade-marks or trade names and placed the competitors' cards on blank mounts. The manufacturer contended that such precise activity was not prohibited by the order, and that the Commission's investigation related to remounting of competitors' trade-marked cards in mounts which bore the manufacturer's trade name or to the stamping of the manufacturer's trade names over the competitors' trade names on the cards themselves. The court held that the Commission is not restricted to prohibiting the illegal practice in the precise form in which it was engaged, but it can go further and inhibit variations of the same practice which it considers necessary to achieve the desired result.

See Unfair Practices, Vol. 2, ¶ 5201.481.

For the appellant: Jones, Day, Cockley & Reavis, Cleveland, Ohio (argued by Robert W. Poore).

For the appellee: Russell E. Ake, Cleveland, Ohio; and Frank C. McAleer, Federal Trade Commission.

Before McAllister, Chief Judge; Simons, Circuit Judge; and Brooks, District Judge.

Affirming a judgment affixing penalties for violation of a cease and desist order in Dkt. 5982. For prior opinions of the U. S. District Court, Northern District of Ohio, see 1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,258, 69,289.

[Appeal]

Brooks, District Judge [In full text]: This is an appeal of a civil action brought under Section 5(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, Title 15, U. S. C. A. Section 45(1) in which penalties were awarded for violations of a cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission. It has been heard upon the record, the briefs and arguments of counsel, and the Court being duly advised:

[Affirmed]

Now, Therefore, It Is Ordered and Adjudged that the judgment of the District Court be and it is affirmed for the reasons contained in the opinion of the Court reported in [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,258] 168 F. Supp. 45, also memorandum opinion denying motion for new trial [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,289].

[¶ 69,588] Union Leader Corporation v. Newspapers of New England, Inc., et al.

In the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts. Civil Action No. 59-23-W. Dated December 28, 1959; amended by an Order of the Court dated January 4, 1960.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—"Unfair" Practices as Evidence of Intent to Monopolize—Group Boycotts—Using Labor Union's Aid in Boycotting Rival Newspaper—Paying Secret Commissions to Advertisers for Their Aid in Promoting Boycott.—A newspaper publisher's organization of a group boycott against a competing newspaper, and the publisher's unfair practices in organizing that boycott, constituted a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, conclusive evidence of the publisher's "exclusionary" intent, and proof of its attempt to monopolize in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. A representative of the publisher, calling upon a local merchant in the company of a representative of a printers' labor union, requested the merchant to advertise in its publication. The union representative asked the merchant to boycott the other newspaper. Those acts were, in effect, a joint appeal by the publisher and the union, to the merchant, to boycott the other paper.

Further, the publisher's payment of a sum of money weekly to each of eight individuals associated with local purchasers of newspaper advertising, in consideration of those individuals' services in inducing their own and other organizations to advertise exclusively in the publisher's newspaper and refrain from advertising in the competing newspaper, was an encouragement to a group boycott. Also, the failure to disclose to outsiders that those individuals were not disinterested fellow advertisers, as they purported to be, but were, instead, paid employees of the newspaper, was an unfair practice that was "not honestly industrial."

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.533, 2005.660; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2515.40, 2610.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Labor Unions Under Antitrust Laws—Exemptions—Union Activities Which Are Not Exempt—Combining With Non-labor Groups—Publisher's Use of Labor Union's Aid in Boycotting Rival Newspaper—Legality.—A joint appeal by representatives of a newspaper publisher and a labor union requesting a merchant to boycott a newspaper that competed with the publisher was not excusable merely because labor union representatives were among those participating in the boycott. In Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,386, the United States Supreme Court held that labor unions are not entitled to the antitrust exemptions of the Norris-LaGuardia and Clayton Acts when they aid and abet non-labor groups in creating monopolies.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2101.063, 2111.

Monopolies—Practices as Evidence of Unlawful Intent to Monopolize—Newspapers' Discrimination Among Their Advertisers—Departure from Publicly Announced Rates.—When an enterprise having substantial market power engages in a discrimination not justified by normal economic considerations, it is prima facie seeking to achieve control of the market by an objectionable method. Thus, where two newspapers were struggling for survival in a market where only one could succeed, and both publicly announced the advertising rates they would follow, a departure from those rates by the giving of secret discriminatory benefits to some advertisers constituted prima facie evidence that both newspapers had an "exclusionary" intent and had attempted to monopolize in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Every discrimination which is not based upon some explicable economic difference, such as an economy traceable to quantity purchases, is dictated by some ulterior motive. One of the newspapers allowed the largest local advertiser a rate 30 per cent lower than the rate it offered others; failed to inform all of its advertisers that they could, without extra charge, have one try at a color page; and failed to inform all of its advertisers that, if they advertised in a specific issue, they could have an additional reprint in a Christmas supplement without additional charge.

The competing newspaper sought to excuse its own giving of discriminatory benefits to some advertisers by contending that it was merely retaliating in self-defense. While the provocation was great, the total number of discriminations was not large, and the period of time of such discriminations was short, nevertheless, there were capricious and secret discriminations which belied the newspaper's public rate card. It could not be excused because comparable practices were engaged in by its competitor, nor could the discrimination be regarded merely as a "restraint of trade of doubtful validity" instead of an attempt to monopolize. That distinction was unacceptable because the paper had about 50 per cent of the market and knew that the market would not permit two contestants to survive. Thus, its resort to any unfair practice, and its failure to confine itself to the exercise of "skill, foresight, and industry," compelled the conclusion that it had an "exclusionary" intent and had attempted to monopolize in violation of Section 2.

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2515.40, 2610.280.

Monopolies—Exclusion of Competitor from Market Capable of Supporting Only One—Intent—"Predatory" or "Unfair" Practices as Evidence of Unlawful Intent to Monopolize.—A person does not necessarily have an unlawful intent to monopolize merely because he foresees that a market is only large enough to permit one successful enterprise, and intends that his shall be that one. However, two rival newspaper publishers, in their use of predatory and unfair practices, did show an unlawful intent to monopolize in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. There is no unlawful intent where a person utilizes only superior skill, foresight, and industry. But the antitrust cases condemn the intent to use, or the actual use of, unfair weapons. Thus, there is no sharp distinction between the existence of an intent to exclude and the use of unfair means. In a situation where it is inevitable that only one competitor can survive, the evidence which shows the use, or contemplated use, of unfair means is the very same evidence which shows the existence of an exclusionary intent.

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2515.40.

Monopolies—Offer to Buy Out Sole Competitor as Evidence of Attempt to Monopolize—Two Competing Newspapers in City Capable of Supporting Only One—Effect of Purchase on Competition.—A newspaper publisher's offer to buy all of the stock of its sole competitor, in a city capable of supporting only one such paper, was not evidence of an intent to monopolize. Such an offer would have been unlawful if the city had been capable of economically accommodating both, since the purchase would not have been a victory won by "skill, foresight, and industry." But where two roughly equal companies are competing for the single prize that is available, "skill, foresight, and industry," by themselves, will not give either the victory. In such a situation, the capacity to withstand losses is required. Since only one could successfully survive, the purchase of one by the other would not have substantially lessened competition, but would have only shortened the time in which competition could have continued. It made no difference whether the victory was won by paying a large price in one lump sum payment to take over the competitor, or by paying a large price in installments of monthly losses.

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2515.40, 2610.120.

Monopolies—Attempts to Monopolize—Practices as Evidence of Attempt to Monopolize—Newspaper's Reduction of Advertising Rates When It Was Already Losing Money—Profit Motive or Intent to Destroy Competitor.—Where two competitors are each struggling at a loss in a market that will permit only one to succeed, it is not unlawful for one of them to reduce its prices, at least in the absence of a showing that the reduction "results in such terrific losses that it is beyond reasonable hope that they can be recovered even in the long future." Thus, a newspaper's reduction of its advertising rates at a time when it was already losing money was not unlawful where the effect of that reduction was to diminish its losses rather than to increase them. Had the losses been so extravagant as to be unrecoverable, it might have been persuasively argued that the object of the reduction was not to capture the market for its possible profit value, but, rather, to inflict injury on a rival regardless of the expectation of ultimate profit.

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2515.40.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Monopolies—Lawful Monopolies—Monopoly Acquired "By Virtue of Superior Skill, Foresight, and Industry"—Absence of Antitrust Violations in Achieving Non-competitive Position—Publisher of City's Only Newspaper.—Two newspaper publishers, each of which published the only local daily newspaper in its own particular city, were not monopolizing or attempting to monopolize in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act merely because they had no competitors in their own cities. To be sure, each had what a layman would call a monopoly, but neither had violated the Sherman Act, since each had achieved its non-competitive position by methods "honestly industrial" or, as it is sometimes phrased, "by virtue of superior skill, foresight, and industry."

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2510.300.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Practices—Use of Lawfully Acquired Monopoly to Gain Unlawful Monopoly in Another Market—Newspaper Industry.—One who enjoys a lawful monopoly in one market is free to enter another market, but is prohibited from using, in that other market, what is technically called the "market power" (power to control prices or production) which he enjoys in the first market. However, a publisher of a city's only newspaper (a lawfully acquired monopoly) did not violate Section 2 of the Sherman Act by using its "monopoly city" printing plant and profits to publish a newspaper in a second market, a city in which another publisher had theretofore enjoyed a lawful monopoly as the publisher of that city's only newspaper. Where all that is involved is the use of money, and if the money is invested with relation to a reasonable expectation of ultimate profit or to promote some legitimate purpose, and not "primarily for the purpose of causing loss of business to another," the investment is not a restraint of trade or attempt to monopolize. Here, there were no combination contracts, between the publisher's "monopoly city" paper and its "competitive city" paper, covering advertising, circulation, news, or features. Both papers were published in the same plant but it did not appear that, as a result of that combined operation, the publisher was able to procure goods or services (newsprint, printers, etc.) for its "competitive city" paper at lower rates than its competitor in that city could procure them. Thus, there was no substantial use of the publisher's "monopoly city" market power in the "competitive city," and no evidence that the publisher's "competitive city" operations substantially increased its "monopoly city" market power.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.660; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Acquisition of Assets Under Sherman Act, Sections 1 and 2, and Clayton Act, Section 7—Combination of Newspaper Publishers to Buy One of Two Competing Papers—"Mutual Defense Association."—A number of publishing companies, each of which owned the only newspaper published in its own particular town in New England, did not violate Section 1 or 2 of the Sherman Act or Section 7 of the Clayton Act by purchasing the stock of a newspaper that was engaged in a "life-and-death" struggle with a rival paper. The acquisition was not rendered illegal by the fact that each of the investing publishers enjoyed a so-called monopoly position in its own home market. There was no "interlacing" of policies, practices, or operations among the acquiring publishers or with the acquired newspaper; none of them used their "home" market power in the "new" town; and none of them used the "new" town investment to increase its outside market power. Since the town was capable of supporting only one successful paper, it made no difference that the publishers acquired the newspaper with the awareness that the rival paper could probably be forced out of the market.

Further, it made no difference that the acquisition had the effect of precluding the rival newspaper from purchasing the "acquired" company, or that the publishers acted with the motive of thwarting the rival's tactics. Each of the publishers reasonably believed that the investment was commercially justified. Further, a contestant is not to be condemned for his anticipated pleasure in seeing the tactics of his opponent thwarted.

Finally, the court rejected the rival's claim that the publishers, each fearing that it might some day be the victim of a "similar distress," had formed a "mutual defense association" to exclude the rival from buying any newspaper in the area. There were no agreements among the publishers to join in similar ventures in the future, and the amount of the cash contributions did not warrant the conclusion of a conspiracy to act elsewhere.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.460; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2610.120; Acquisitions of Stock or Assets, Vol. 1, ¶ 4205.410, 4207.800.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Practice Enjoined—Newspaper's Rate Discriminations Among Its Advertisers—Termination of Practice After Commencement of Suit as Bar to Injunctive Relief.—A newspaper which departed from its publicly announced advertising rates by giving discriminatory benefits to some of its advertisers could not escape an adverse injunctive decree on the ground that its new management had ended the discrimination. Since the reform came after the commencement of the suit, the competitor who brought that action was entitled to assurance that the reform was not merely temporary.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9024.08.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Injunctive Relief—Practices Prohibited—Newspapers' Discriminations in Advertising Rates—Secret Payments to Advertisers' Employees for Their Services in Soliciting Advertising—Attempting to Monopolize.—Two newspaper publishers, each of which charged the other (by way of a complaint and counterclaim) with various antitrust violations, were found to have engaged in, and were each enjoined from continuing, the practices of (1) making any charge for advertising in its newspaper except in strict conformity with a publicly announced rate schedule setting forth every aspect of its rates, and (2) attempting, in any way, to monopolize the newspaper market in a specific New England town. Also, the plaintiff, on the defendant's counterclaim, was prohibited from paying officers or employees of advertisers for the services of those individuals as newspaper consultants or advertising solicitors, unless such person is shown to be qualified for such a position and is instructed to declare his employment with the plaintiff newspaper when soliciting advertising for that paper.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9024.40.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages and Injunctive Relief—Separate Trial on Issue of Damages.—A separate trial was ordered on the damage issues raised by an antitrust complaint and counterclaim involving the legality of various practices in the newspaper industry.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9013.565.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages and Injunctive Relief—Pretrial Procedures—Damages—Order Requiring Precise Statement of Claimed Damages After Trial of Liability Issues.—A trial court, after trying the liability issues raised by a newspaper publisher's antitrust complaint and a rival newspaper's antitrust counterclaim, ordered each of the papers to prepare a detailed schedule showing the precise damages it claimed to have suffered from the illegal practices which the court found the other had engaged in. Items of damages not clearly revealed by such schedules would be barred.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9011, 9013.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages and Injunctive Relief—Appeals—Appealability of Judgment Disposing of Claim for Injunctive Relief—"Certification" by Trial Court.—A trial court, having found that both the plaintiff and the counter claimant engaged in unlawful practices in attempting to monopolize the newspaper publication market in a New England town, and having enjoined the parties from the further commission of such practices, "certified" its judgment for appeal in accordance with 28 United States Code § 1292(b) on the ground that the order involved a controlling question of law as to which there was substantial ground for a difference of opinion, and that an immediate appeal might materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation. Thus, the court, while reserving the damage claims, determined that there was no just reason for delay in entering final judgment on the claim for injunctive relief.

Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Opinion

I.

Introduction

[Antitrust Complaint and Counterclaim]

WYZANSKI, District Judge [In full text]: 1. This is a suit in which the complaint and the counterclaim each allege violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act [15 U. S. C. §§ 1 and 2] and the complaint also alleges violations of § 7 of the Clayton Act, as amended, [15 U. S. C. § 18].

[Parties]

2. The complainant, Union Leader Corporation, (ULC), is the owner of both The Manchester Union Leader, a daily newspaper in Manchester, New Hampshire, and The Haverhill Journal, a daily newspaper in Haverhill, Massachusetts. William Loeb is the president, majority stockholder, and dominant figure in the corporation.

3. As amended, ULC's complaint claims it has been and is being caused injury in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and § 7 of the Clayton Act, as amended, by 10 corporations and 11 individuals. During the pre-trial or trial of this case 4 corporations and 4 individuals were dismissed as defendants. There now remain the following 6 corporate and 7 individual defendants:

(a) The Haverhill Gazette Co., the owner of The Haverhill Gazette, a daily newspaper published in Haverhill, Massachusetts.

(b) Lowell Sun Publishing Co., the owner of The Lowell Sun, a daily newspaper published in Lowell, Massachusetts.

(c) John H. Costello, president of that corporation.

(d) Frank A. Lawlor, general manager of that corporation.

(e) Eagle Tribune Publishing Co., the owner of The Lawrence Eagle-Tribune, a daily newspaper published in Lawrence, Massachusetts.

(f) Irving E. Rogers, president of that corporation.

(g) William F. Lucey, business manager of that corporation.

(h) Holyoke Transcript-Telegram Pub. Co., the owner of The Holyoke Transcript-Telegram, a daily newspaper published in Holyoke, Massachusetts.

(i) William Dwight, president of that corporation.

(j) Enterprise Publishing Co., the owner of The Brockton Enterprise & Times.

(k) Philip S. Weld, president of Essex County Newspapers Inc., which owns The Newburyport News and The Gloucester Times.

(l) Sidney R. Cook, comptroller of Republican Publishing Company, which with the Springfield Union Publishing Company publishes The Springfield Union and The Springfield Daily News.

(m) Newspapers of New England, Inc. (NNE), a holding corporation which owns the stock of The Haverhill Gazette Co. [see paragraph (a) above]. The directors of NNE are 6 of the above-named 7 individuals, Rogers, Lucey, Costello, Lawlor, Weld, and Cook (not Dwight) together with McClure, Fuller, and Howe who are no longer defendants herein. The said Lawlor, Lucey, and Weld are, respectively, president, treasurer, and clerk of NNE.

[Counterclaim]

4. Of defendants only The Haverhill Gazette Co. has filed a counterclaim. That corporation claims it has been and is being injured, in violation of § 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, by ULC.

[Separate Trial of Damage Issues]

5. Both ULC and the counterclaimant seek injunctive relief and damages. Pursuant to Rule 42(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, this Court ordered a separate trial of all issues other than issues of damages raised by the pleadings.

II.

Findings of Fact

A. Background of the Controversy

[Struggle Between Rival Newspapers]

6. Before a detailed statement of the facts in this case, it is appropriate broadly to sketch the background of the controversy before this Court.

7. Currently there is being waged in Haverhill, Massachusetts a life-and-death struggle between two rival daily newspapers. One is The Haverhill Gazette which, without apparent violation of law, had become in 1957, after more than a century of publication, the only daily local newspaper in Haverhill. The other is The Haverhill Journal, which entered the market in December 1957. This suit is an outgrowth of that bitter rivalry.

[City Capable of Supporting Only One Newspaper]

8. Haverhill is a city with a population of somewhat over 47,000, and its newspapers reach a surrounding area of an additional 5,000. On any one day not many more than 20,000 local daily newspapers have ever been sold in the total Haverhill area.

9. Undoubtedly it is possible to run at a profit in Haverhill two or more daily newspapers of limited news coverage and of inferior general quality. But the type of newspaper which The Haverhill Gazette has been for many years, which The Haverhill Journal has been since it began publication, and which is exemplified by other daily newspapers in Lawrence, Lowell, Holyoke, and most New England cities with a population of 20,000 to 100,000 could not succeed financially as a wholly independent enterprise unless either it had no rivals or had in the face of rivalry a circulation of over 15,000. This is the judgment of virtually all persons expert in the newspaper business. And this judgment is now amply supported by the last year's experience of both the Gazette and the Journal. In competition both have sustained stupendous losses. And while those losses might have been less had the rivals pursued less aggressive competitive tactics, there is every reason to believe that no matter what policies they had adopted the market could not have brought them both financial success unless one or both had reduced its quality or one or both had been operationally combined with a newspaper outside of Haverhill. In short, for what may be called the New England type of local newspaper familiar in middle-sized cities Haverhill is economically a one newspaper city. Put more technically, this means that using the joint measure of product and area we are dealing with a market so narrow that only one successful occupant is economically possible. The Haverhill market is not broad enough permanently to sustain the competition of two high grade local daily newspapers.

[Labor Union—Strike]

10. The long-time prosperity of The Haverhill Gazette was interrupted on November 20, 1957 by a strike of those of its printers who were members of Local 38 of the International Typographical Union. The Gazette managed to continue publication by employing substitutes. But, Haverhill being a community with many sympathizers with the union, the circulation promptly fell by about 50 per cent.

[Merchants—Seeking New Publisher]

11. Responding either to conviction or to pressure, some merchants who had advertised in the Gazette hesitated to continue to patronize a newspaper which was having a labor dispute. They desired another medium to reach the public. And they sought out William Loeb the president and dominant figure in The Union Leader Corporation, the company which published the prosperous Manchester Union Leader — a newspaper which enjoys in its home town a non-competitive position not shown to have been acquired by any violation of law.

12. Then followed the events which are described in the following findings. A strictly chronological order is abandoned in favor of a topical account of developments. Such topical presentation may make it easier to deal with the legal contentions of the parties. There are reviewed first, the relations between certain Haverhill merchants and the ULC; second, the relations between some union members and the ULC; third, advertising rates of the two newspapers; and fourth, the formation and functioning of Newspapers of New England, Inc.

B. Relations Between Certain Haverhill Merchants and ULC

[New Paper Supported by Local Merchants]

13. It has already been noted that when Local 38 of the ITU struck against The Haverhill Gazette Co. (HG Co.) certain advertisers in The Haverhill Gazette decided not to continue advertising in that paper. Some of these advertisers formed a group. Originally the group consisted of Sidney Katz and Eli Shoreman both from Elrich Shoes, Inc., Martin Bendetson, a director of Boston Furniture Company, Vincent W. Grad of Grad's Specialty Shop, Irving P. Karelis, a partner in Karelis Jewelers, and Jerome Fishbein then an employee of his father David Fishbein doing business as Hudson's Fur Shop, but since January 1, 1959 treasurer and director of Hudson's Apparel of Haverhill, Inc., the successor enterprise.

14. Katz arranged with Loeb that the group should go to Loeb's home in Beverly, Massachusetts on Saturday evening, November 30, 1957. The group asked Loeb to arrange for Union Leader Corporation to publish for Haverhill a free throwaway shopper which would carry paid advertisements of the group and others who wished to avoid patronizing the Gazette during the strike. Loeb reserved his decision. The next day he decided to publish such a shopper.

15. ULC published for Haverhill a throwaway shopper on Thursday, December 5, and Thursday, December 12, 1957. Both issues received a favorable response. On that basis Loeb decided to begin the publication of a daily called The Haverhill Journal, of which the first issue appeared Monday, December 16, 1959.

16. Meanwhile on December 8, 1957 there was held at Loeb's Beverly home a second meeting of the group of merchants. Then or later the original six participants were joined by Norris Bendetson, general manager and assistant treasurer of Boston Furniture Company as well as an owner of half the stock of Brest Buick Company, and by David M. Gordon, president of Haverhill Hardware and Plumbing Supply Co. All of the eight in the group were Haverhill residents, familiar with local conditions, but inexperienced in any aspect of the newspaper business except that they were all in responsible positions in retail enterprises that advertised in the daily press of Haverhill. In 1956 and 1957, that is before the strike, the concerns with which these eight were associated had placed with The Haverhill Gazette advertising for which they paid as indicated in the following table:

Boston Furniture Co.	$ 4,291.22	$ 3,838.96
Elrich Shoes, Inc.	734.10	952.18
Grad's Specialty Shop	6,406.49	6,101.44
Haverhill Hardware & Plumbing Supply Co.	11,325.75	11,677.79
Hudson's Fur Shop	4,205.00	4,433.81
Karelis Jewelers	7,691.63	5,438.16

The total advertising of these six companies was at least 5% of the total local newspaper advertising of Haverhill merchants.

17. The eight individuals met with Loeb at first three times a week. After a while, the meetings were reduced to once a week. Meetings continue to this day with that frequency.

[Solicitation of Advertising for New Paper]

18. Loeb discussed at these meetings advertising and general newspaper policy. From the outset the eight assured Loeb that they would support the Journal with their advertising. Katz, the moving spirit, admitted, what undoubtedly must have been generally realized by all his associates, that "as a practical matter, if you gave your advertising to the Journal, you would not be advertising in the Gazette". Moreover, the group, in Fishbein's words, "assured Mr. Loeb that we would aid in securing others to use the daily" Journal. Consistent with that assurance, the group did constantly solicit advertisers for the Journal. Moreover, as Martin Bendetson acknowledged, "the meetings studied records of advertising in different categories . . . clothing, radio, automobiles . . . the different people that advertise with the Journal and the different ones that advertise with the Gazette."

19. When Brest Buick Co. decided to place part of its advertising in the Gazette, Norris Bendetson, who owned half of the company's stock, told the group that this was going to be done. When another member of the group, Grad, failed to inform the group in advance that his store was going to advertise in the Gazette, members of the group were surprised and criticized Grad.

Indeed, Gordon testified in his deposition with respect to Grad's advertisement "We all felt he should not have put the ad in the Gazette."

20. At the group meetings there were also discussions of the desirability of the Journal having news items about labor, women, and veterans.

[Secret Payments to Local Merchants]

21. As long as the strike at the Gazette flourished, the ULC did not make any payments to the eight members of the group. But on May 22, 1958 Loeb "detected . . . slackening of enthusiasm" in the group. Thereupon he initiated a payment to each of the eight of $50 a week. These payments have continued up to the present. These payments were not publicly disclosed until depositions were taken in the case at bar. Those from whom the group solicited advertising for the Journal did not know or have reason to know that each member of the group was a paid consultant of the Journal. The payments have always been made on an individual basis—that is, even though the two Bendetson brothers are from one company and Katz and Shoreman are from the same company each receives the weekly stipend. Some but not all of the recipients keep these payments for themselves; others turn them over to their firms. Payments have no relation percentage-wise to the amounts paid for advertising by any firm. However, with the two exceptions of the one already-mentioned Grad advertisement and of $15 worth of advertising by Elrich Shoes, Inc., none of the six firms with which the eight members of the group are associated has advertised in the Gazette at any time since the Journal began publication. The Journal received in advertising during the period from December 5, 1957 to September 15, 1959 advertising in the following amounts:

Boston Furniture Company	$11,907.00
Elrich Shoes, Inc.	4,673.11
Grad's Specialty Shop	14,768.71
Haverhill Hardware & Plumbing Supply Co.	38,834.11
Hudson's Fur Shop	11,159.30
Karelis Jewelers	11,022.71

22. It is not clear whether when Loeb began making the $50 payments he wrote a letter or memorandum with respect to these payments. At the time depositions were taken before trial the members of the group testified in considerable detail about the existence of such memoranda and their subsequent destruction. On the first day of the trial in court Loeb testified that "I think I wrote them a rather informal letter that we would pay them $50 a week." But later in the trial Loeb and each member of the group denied that there ever was a letter or memorandum specifically referring to the $50 payments, and asserted that the destroyed documents were copies of a letter referring to other promised sums.

23. On this state of the evidence, this Court does not find that there were any documents covering the $50 payments, or that there were any written promises by any of the group, or that the ULC made it a written condition of the payments that they were in consideration of any obligation or action of any advertiser. However, the Court does find that the ULC made payment each week to each individual in consideration of his individual services in inducing the enterprise with which he was connected and such other enterprises as he could influence to advertise exclusively in the Journal and to refrain from advertising in the Gazette. In reaching this finding of fact, the Court has considered the whole tenor of the group meetings, the pledges of support the eight gave to the Journal, and the watchful attention the group gave to Gazette advertisements by their own enterprises and other enterprises. While there may not have been in a technical sense a series of unilateral oral contracts in which ULC offered to pay $50 each week to each of the eight who had in the previous week successfully induced his enterprise and other enterprises not to advertise in the Gazette, the $50 weekly payment was intended by Loeb to have, and did have, an effect indistinguishable from such a series of unilateral oral contracts.

[Promise of Future Payments]

24. In addition to providing the $50 weekly payments, Loeb on July 31, 1958 made to each of the eight merchants a written promise to give each a percentage of profits of the Journal under certain circumstances. But this agreement need not be detailed as it was superseded by the more formal agreement of December 15, 1958. Under that contract each of the eight was promised $5,000 a year for 10 years followed by $10,000 a year for the succeeding 10 years together with an overriding bonus of 3⅛% of the profits of the newspaper, the whole agreement "to be effective if and when the Haverhill Journal, under my [Loeb's] ownership or control, becomes the only newspaper published in Haverhill." In view of the effective date of these massive payments, the members of the group of eight knew it was to their "economic profit to do everything" they "could to see that Mr. Loeb did own the only paper in Haverhill." The purpose and the effect of the contract was to intensify the zeal of the eight members of the group both to support the Journal by securing advertising for it and to discourage advertising in the Gazette by their enterprises and other enterprises subject to their influence.

C. Relation Between Some Union Members and ULC

[Union's Aid to New Paper]

25. As has already been noted Local 38 of the International Typographical Union struck HG Co. on November 20, 1957. Representatives of the International and of the Local considered the possibility of either establishing or giving support to a new newspaper to rival the Gazette. Some of the striking printers approached a ULC employee in the hope of interesting Loeb in entering the Haverhill market. But Loeb did not confer with these printers. Nor was it in response to the printers' suggestion that ULC entered Haverhill. However, having decided to enter Haverhill, ULC cooperated with the strikers in various ways, of which only two seem worth reciting.

26. One way was that ULC paid some of the strikers to distribute ULC's shopper direct to householders. At the time they rendered these services the strikers were, within the contemplation of the National Labor Relations Act, employees of HG Co. And they, being printers, were not particularly qualified to act as distributors. It is fairly inferable that the purpose which ULC had in hiring these printers was to let the public know that the union was supporting ULC's new paper.

[Solicitation of Advertising for New Paper]

27. The other significant way that ULC sought the cooperation of the union was in the solicitation of advertising for the shoppers' edition of the Journal. Representatives of the union went with representatives of the Journal to call upon prospective advertisers. The union representatives asked merchants not to advertise in the Gazette, and simultaneously advertising solicitors of the ULC asked these merchants to advertise in the Journal.

D. Advertising Rates

[Discrimination by Both Papers]

28. There is in the record of this case a substantial amount of information with respect to the advertising rates charged by the Gazette and the Journal. To recite all of it would serve no useful purpose now, for here we are not concerned with the assessment of damages, if any, but with questions of equitable relief. A few broad strokes will cover the ground adequately.

29. When the strike began at its plant, the Gazette had in effect advertising rates which it had published September 1, 1957.

30. At the outset, the Journal publicly announced somewhat higher rates. For example, the Gazette had a basic local display rate of $1.40; the Journal began with a local display rate of $2.10 but in January of 1958 it retroactively changed the rate to $1.47 by application of credit to future bills.

31. Aggressively competitive, the Journal then introduced special rates for shoppers' nights, combination rates, free repeat advertising, and color advertising free of extra charge for one trial. Instead of making public announcement of the availability of these privileges, the Journal resorted to private concessions. For example, it allowed some but not all advertisers to have without extra charge a free trial of a color page. It gave to some but not to all advertisers who had paid for advertisements in the November 28, 1958 issue the privilege of having the same advertisement run free in a Christmas 1958 supplement. Most important, the Journal gave to the largest local advertiser in Haverhill, J. M. Fields, a special rate not expressly or impliedly made available to any other advertiser.

32. The Gazette likewise resorted to secret discriminatory practices. The clearest instances occurred from September through December 1958. Instead of revising rates publicly, the Gazette entered into separate agreements with local display advertisers.

Exhibit C-10 shows that the rates varied without any discernible rational basis. Also in November 1958 the Gazette reduced its classified advertising rates for some but not all automobile dealers. However, these discriminations between advertisers of the same class and volume were not continued after February 1, 1959. The Gazette then put into effect publicly the rates it thereafter charged. It would serve no useful purpose to recite the new rates, or their relationship to the older rates. It will be quite sufficient to say that the evidence shows that as a whole the new rates bear a rational relation to circulation and that there is not any basis for finding that there is some improper discrimination between different types of publicly announced rates in the February 1, 1959 schedule.

E. The Formation and Functioning of Newspapers of New England, Inc.

[Aid Sought by Established Paper]

33. When the ITU threatened to strike, J. Wesley Russ, then president of The Haverhill Gazette Co., (HG Co.) sent for William B. Parry, then associate manager of The New England Daily Newspaper Association. HG Co. is one of 80 New England daily newspapers which belong to that non-discriminatory Association, and, until it resigned in 1956, UCL also was a member. The chief function of the Association is to circulate news bulletins; but on occasion it gives advice on labor negotiations. There is no evidence that the Association has sought to establish or could establish common practices with respect to price, production, circulation, advertising, or like operational matters.

34. From the time Parry was called into the labor dispute he was in general touch with the Gazette's problems. Indeed in April 1958 Parry was asked by Russ whether money could be raised from other publishers to help the Gazette. Nothing came of this inquiry, nor of inquiries which Russ addressed to William Dwight, publisher of The Holyoke Transcript and president of The American Newspaper Publishers Association, nor of other inquiries put to various other persons in the industry. The publishers were long on advice but short on cash offers. And HG Co. had to rely on what it could borrow from local banks.

[New Paper's Offer to Buy Established Paper]

35. In the meanwhile brokers and principals inquired whether the Gazette was for sale. Among those inquiring was Manno, an agent for Loeb of the ULC, who first broached the subject in February 1958. Loeb himself, Manno, still acting for Loeb, and Cymrot, also acting for Loeb, made further approaches in the summer of 1958 by talking respectively with Russ, Ryan (HG Co.'s lawyer), and Shepherd (HG Co.'s comptroller). Finally, on October 21, 1958 Loeb made a written offer to pay $164,800 (that is, par) for HG Co.'s bonds, $308,500 (or $750 a share) for HG Co.'s 411 shares of Class A stock, and $510,000 (or $500 a share) for HG Co.'s 1020 shares of Class B stock, but payments were to be deferred in a way that made the present value of the offer nearer $500,000 than $1,000,000.

[Other Buyer Sought]

36. Not wanting to sell to Loeb, Russ promptly informed Parry and, in effect, said that the stockholders would be forced to sell to Loeb unless other financing was available. Parry explored the financial situation of HG Co. with its comptroller, Shepherd, who expressed the opinion that if the company could get $200,000 it "could perhaps succeed in getting into the black." Promptly Parry informed Lucey of The Lawrence Eagle Tribune and Lucey repeated the information to Lawlor of The Lowell Sun. As a consequence of these preliminary explorations Parry invited some New England publishers or their representatives to meet at the Lanam Club in Andover on October 31, 1958.

37. At this first meeting were Parry, Shepherd, Lucey, Lawlor, Bacigalupo, attorney for Eagle Tribune Publishing Co., Dwight of The Holyoke Transcript-Telegram, Weld of Essex County Newspapers Inc., and Wright of Milford Daily News Co. Either in inviting persons to the meeting or at the meeting Parry told of the Loeb offer and of HG Co.'s wish to borrow money on mortgages. Parry did not say much, if anything, about the history of the rivalry between the Journal and the Gazette, as every invitee knew the story and the principal dramatis personae. Lawlor expressed, what was perhaps not a unique opinion in the group, the view that Loeb was "an able publisher" and a "resourceful rogue".

38. This first meeting began with Shepherd's financial analysis of HG Co. and with talk about a secured loan to HG Co. However, the discussion of a loan was abandoned after the arrival of Ryan, who, as attorney for Mrs. Muriel Russ, HG Co's principal stockholder, stated that she would not favor HG Co.'s borrowing further sums but that she wanted to sell her HG Co. stock. At this point Parry, Shepherd, and Ryan withdrew from the meeting. Then Bacigalupo came from the meeting with a proposal that the group would pay $50,000 at once as a down payment. Ryan promptly rejected that offer, and the meeting broke up when "everything was completely up in the air."

39. Subsequently Ryan indicated "that if the offer from the group were to match approximately the offer from plaintiff . . . it would be satisfactory." Lucey estimated that any purchasing group would have to make a down payment of $400,000 to buy all the stock of HG Co. With this figure in mind, $60,000 each was tentatively pledged by the publishers of The Lawrence Eagle Tribune, The Lowell Sun, and The Burlington Free Press; $10,000 by the publisher of The Holyoke Transcript-Telegram, and $6,000 by Weld whose company published The Gloucester Times and The Newburyport News. Parry then prepared a list of about 50 publishers and the amounts he hoped each would subscribe to a joint venture to purchase HG Co. stock.

40. When Parry called these 50 prospects, he told them in substance, that he "was investigating the possibility of a group getting together and investing money to purchase The Haverhill Gazette; that the Gazette was for sale; . . . that the Gazette owners had an offer from Loeb, and they were not particularly interested in selling to Loeb, and it certainly would be as a last resort; . . . [he] probably discussed the possibilities . . . for experimental training, experimental purposes for training junior executives." Parry told most persons he called details of the finances of HG Co. or at least the names of other publishers who had examined HG Co.'s finances and had then decided to invest. Parry told some persons that "if Loeb succeeded in Haverhill, that then he and the union might get together and come into their territories."

41. Those who responded favorably to Parry's call assembled at a second meeting at the Lanam Club in Andover, this time probably on Monday, November 10, 1958. At the second meeting were all, except Bacigalupo, who had attended the first meeting: that is, Parry, Shepherd, Lucey, Lawlor, Dwight, Weld, Wright, and Ryan. Also present were John H. Costello, president of Lowell Sun Publishing Co., that company's attorneys Frank H. Goldman and Robert H. Goldman, Sidney R. Cook, the comptroller of the Republican Publishing Co. of Springfield, Massachusetts, James D. Ewing, publisher of The Keene (N. H.) Evening Sentinel, Charles A. Fuller, president of Enterprise Publishing Co. of Brockton, Massachusetts, Mrs. Margaret Hartford, vice president of Herald Publishing Co. which publishes The Portsmouth (N. H.) Herald, and Walter C. Paine, publisher of The Valley News of Lebanon (N. H.).

42. There was no chairman of this second meeting. Inasmuch as before the meeting began approximately $377,000 had been tentatively subscribed by those present. It was hardly necessary to retell the entire story of the Haverhill situation. In the open meeting Shepherd did review the financial, advertising, and circulation figures; there was discussion of the Loeb offer which by then had expired; there were varying estimates as to how long it would be before the Gazette would reach a break-even point, which some thought would happen when its circulation topped 15,000; there were loose estimates as to how long the Journal would be able to survive if the Gazette held out and increased in circulation; and there was scrutiny of the general financial prospects. Unquestionably the general atmosphere reflected the participants' unanimous opinion that in the Haverhill situation only one quality newspaper could make a profit, and also reflected the participants' unanimous hope that the Gazette would be that one quality newspaper which would be profitable. Also it is clear that in asides during the course of the meeting, and probably in casual talk across the conference table, some persons expressed strong distaste for what they regarded as the predatory, unfair, and unethical competitive methods of Loeb. Reference was certainly made to Loeb's relations with unions, to the timing of ULC's entry into Haverhill, to the throwaways published by ULC, to the Journal's advertising rates, and to the possibility "that if he was successful here he could use the same tactics in other places," as Parry observed.

43. It having become apparent that so large and loosely conducted a meeting could not make a firm contract, the group delegated the making of the contract to a committee of Costello, Cook, Fuller, Weld, and Irving E. Rogers, president of the company that published The Lawrence Eagle Tribune.

[Publishers' Formation of Holding Company]

44. That committee caused the organization of NNE as a Massachusetts corporation about December 10, 1958. Stock in that corporation was purchased at $25 per share by the following subscribers:

Name of Stockholder	No. of Shares
1. Bangor Publishing Company	250
2. Eagle Publishing Company	400

32. Claremont Publishing Company, Inc.	100
33. Muriel Russ	200

With the exception of Claremont Publishing Company, Inc. which bought its shares on December 16, 1958 and Muriel Russ who bought her shares on August 28, 1959, all of the stockholders bought their shares on December 10, 1958.

45. It will be noted that among those who became NNE shareholders were Lowell Sun Publishing Company which publishes the only daily newspaper in Lowell, Eagle-Tribune Publishing Company which publishes the only daily newspaper in Lawrence, Enterprise Publishing Company which publishes the only daily newspaper in Brockton, Sentinel Printing Company which publishes the only daily newspaper in Fitchburg, Eagle Publishing Company which publishes the only daily newspaper in Pittsfield, Holyoke Transcript-Telegram Publishing Co. Inc. which publishes the only daily newspaper in Holyoke, and Philip S. Weld who controls Essex County Newspapers Inc. which publishes the only daily newspapers in Newburyport and Gloucester. Among the other NNE subscribers are many other publishing companies each of which publishes in its own town the only local daily newspaper published there.

[Purchase of Established Paper]

46. After December 10, 1958 NNE bought all of the outstanding capital stock of HG Co. for $835,200 subject to unpaid and outstanding debentures of Haverhill Gazette Company amounting to $164,800.

47. After NNE became sole shareholder of HG Co., NNE made loans and received repayments of loans as shown in the following table:

48. At all relevant times in both NNE and HG Co. the president has been Lawlor, the treasurer Lucey, the clerk Weld, and the directors Lawlor, Lucey, Weld, Costello, McClure, Fuller, Rogers, Cook, and Howe. Neither the officers or directors have received compensation from either NNE or HG Co.

[Summary]

49. In summary of both what has been already recited and what appears in the record as a whole but has not been expressly recited, the following factual aspects of NNE's purchase of HG Co. shares deserve emphasis:

[First Offer]

(a) ULC or Loeb was the first to make an oral proposal and the first to make a firm written offer to buy the HG Co. shares.

[Invitation to Publishers]

(b) Those who became NNE shareholders were in effect invited by HG Co. to make a bid for its stock so that shareholders of HG Co. would not be forced to make a sale they did not want to make to Loeb.

[Purchasers' Motives—Commercial]

(c) Every NNE shareholder before investing either examined the financial prospects of HG Co. or relied upon the business judgment of newspaper experts who had so examined.

(d) Every NNE shareholder believed that an investment in NNE and thus in HG Co. was a commercially justified investment.

(e) The belief of NNE shareholders that the investment was commercially justified was a reasonable belief. HG Co. had been earning upwards of $100,000 a year; if it secured new funds and new management and if it was not faced with unfair competition it was as of December 1958 reasonable to believe that within a year HG Co. would reach a break-even point and that ultimately it would regain its earlier profitability.

(f) Every NNE shareholder in purchasing acted in part because he believed that the investment was commercially justified.

[Disapproval of "New" Publisher]

(g) Many NNE shareholders in purchasing acted in part because, individually, they did not approve of Loeb's tactics in Haverhill which they regarded as predatory, unfair, or unethical. In Lawlor's words, Loeb's "comeuppance" was not an unwelcome prospect.

[Sympathy with Established Paper]

(h) Some NNE shareholders in purchasing acted in part because, individually, they sympathized with the owners of HG Co. and feared lest, as Weld phrased it, they "might at some time be victims of a distress similar or akin to that experienced by the Gazette." But, in acting in Haverhill, each publisher acted strictly ad hoc. He did not make or receive, an express or implied, a legal or a moral, commitment with respect to any newspaper situation arising in the future whether the situation was caused by labor unions, competitors, or other circumstances.

[Acquisition—No Linking with "Hometown" Monopoly Power]

(i) No NNE shareholder either sought to accomplish, or did accomplish, any general unification of policy or operations between his business and the business of The Haverhill Gazette Co. or between his business and the business of any other NNE shareholder. Indeed the only operational connections between the business of The Haverhill Gazette and the business of any NNE shareholder are: first, that individuals may be trained at the Gazette as apprentices and thereafter may work for a shareholder in NNE; and second, that at meetings of directors or at meetings of shareholders there may be between NNE shareholders an interchange of information as to newspaper practices and policies. These types of relationship would not exist if the shareholders of NNE were all widows and orphans, or other persons who lacked an occupational connection with the newspaper industry. But while these types of relationship are related to the industry position of NNE shareholders, none of these relationships substantially enhances or affects what is technically known as "the market power" of any NNE shareholder. This may be illustrated by the example of the Lowell Sun Publishing Co. Whatever was its power to control prices and production before NNE was formed has not been appreciably augmented or affected by NNE. Before 1958 The Lowell Sun never had any market power in middle-sized cities other than Lowell such as Lawrence or Brockton or Gloucester, and it has acquired none now by investing in NNE. To be sure, it has acquired in Haverhill, and only in Haverhill, some power over prices and production which it did not have before 1958, but such power as it has over prices and production in Haverhill has not been operationally linked with its own power over prices and production in Lowell or with the power of, let us say, Weld in Gloucester. There is no linkage of subscriptions, advertisements, contracts, manufacturing processes, news gathering, or editorial policy. Nor is any such linkage contemplated.

[No Monopolization]

50. Thus factually the NNE combination does not operate as a restraint of trade, or a monopolization, or an attempt to monopolize the daily local newspaper market in Haverhill, or the daily local newspaper market in a group of New England cities taken as a whole.

III.

Conclusions of Law and Opinion

[Charges]

1. The complaint charges defendants with contracts and combinations in restraint of trade (in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act), attempts to monopolize and monopolization (in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act), and acquisition of stock which tends substantially to lessen competition and to create a monopoly (in violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act). The counterclaim charges plaintiff with participation in contracts and combinations in restraint of trade (in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act), and attempts to monopolize and monopolization (in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.)

2. It will be convenient to deal with these charges by considering chronologically developments in Haverhill and by ruling upon the lawfulness of the actions in the order in which they occurred.

["Legal Monopoly"]

3. Before December 1958 ULC published the only local daily newspaper in Manchester and HG Co. published the only local daily newspaper in Haverhill. Yet neither corporation was then monopolizing or attempting to monopolize in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. To be sure each had what a layman would call a monopoly, but neither had violated the Sherman Act for each had achieved its non-competitive position by methods "honestly industrial" or, as it is sometimes phrased, "by virtue of superior skill, foresight and industry." United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 2nd Cir. [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,342], 148 F. (2d) 416, 430; United States v. United Shoe Machinery Corp. D. Mass. [1953 Trade

CASES ¶ 67,436], 110 F. Supp. 295, 297, 341. Cf. United States v. Du Pont Co. [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,369], 351 U. S. 377, 391.

[Plaintiff's Conduct—Using Legal Monopoly in Second Market]

4. When ULC entered the Haverhill market it went from a market in which it enjoyed a monopoly into a competitive market. And the first problem which arises is whether it was free to use in the second market the profits it had made in the monopoly market and the printing plant it had established in that market.

5. The governing principle is that one who enjoys a lawful monopoly in one market is free to enter another market but is prohibited from using in that other market what is technically called the "market power" he enjoys in the first market. "Market power" means the power to control prices or production. The principle just stated may be illustrated by two cases: an owner of the only theatre (that is, the so-called monopoly theatre) in a city is permitted to own theatres in other cities where there is competition, but he is not free to make contracts offering in combination the exhibiting facilities of the non-competitive and the competitive theatres, United States v. Griffith [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,246], 334 U. S. 100, 106, 107-108; and an owner of a machinery patent (that is, the owner of a monopoly) is permitted to manufacture and supply both the machines covered by the patent and the materials they use, but he is not free to require licensees of his machines to use materials he supplies. International Salt Co. Inc. v. United States [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,635], 332 U. S. 392.

6. In accordance with the principle just stated, one who, like ULC, owns the only newspaper (that is, a so-called monopoly newspaper) in a city is not merely on that account prohibited from using its funds to start a newspaper in another city where there is competition. If all that is involved is the use of money, and if the money is invested with relation to a reasonable expectation of ultimate profit, or, let us say, to promote some political end, or to accomplish some other legitimate purpose and not "primarily for the purpose of causing loss of business to another" (Restatement, Torts § 709), the investment is not a tort and ordinarily is not a restraint of trade nor an attempt to monopolize.

[No Combination Contracts]

7. But when more than investment is involved, and there is between the monopoly newspaper and the competitive newspaper a combination of operations or contracts a fresh problem arises. In the case of ULC there is no evidence that between its Manchester newspapers and its Haverhill newspaper there were combination contracts covering advertising (cf. Indiana Farmer's Guide Co. v. Prairie Co. [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,064], 293 U. S. 268, 273), circulation, news, or features. But it does appear that the Manchester and Haverhill newspapers were printed in the same plant. However, it does not appear that as a result of such combined operations ULC was able to procure for its Haverhill Journal newsprint, or other supplies, or printers, or other services at rates lower than HG Co. was able to procure those goods and services for its Haverhill Gazette. There is, therefore, no basis for concluding that ULC used to any substantial extent its Manchester market power in Haverhill, or that by operating in Haverhill ULC substantially increased its Manchester market power.

[Predatory Practices]

8. Even though there was no substantial increase in ULC's market power by its mere use of its Manchester profits and its Manchester plant to publish in Haverhill the shoppers' throwaway and the daily Journal, it does not follow that ULC has not in other ways attempted to monopolize in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. In particular, we must consider whether ULC has come within that interpretation of § 2 which prohibits a person (a) who has an intent to exclude competition (b) from using not merely technical restraints of trade, but even predatory practices, unfair methods of competition, or business patterns not honestly industrial—in short, what may loosely be called unfair means. United States v. Griffith, United States v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., both supra.

[Unlawful "Intent"]

9. While the phrase "intent to exclude", or its equivalent "exclusionary intent", is reiterated in anti-trust cases, it is not easy to define its precise meaning. Contrary to what a layman might suppose, a person does not necessarily have an exclusionary intent merely because he foresees that a market is only large enough to permit one successful enterprise, and intends that his enterprise shall be that one and that all other enterprises shall fail. If the evidence shows that in laying his plans and executing them he contemplates and utilizes only superior skill, foresight, and industry, he has not an intent which is contrary to law. To prove that a person has that type of exclusionary intent which is condemned in anti-trust cases there must be evidence that the person who foresees a fight to the death intends to use or actually does use unfair weapons. Putting the same idea in another way, we may say that there is no sharp distinction between (a) the existence of an intent to exclude and (b) the use of unfair means. In a situation where it is inevitable that only one competitor can survive, the evidence which shows the use, or contemplated use, of unfair means is the very same evidence which shows the existence of an exclusionary intent.

[Unlawful Group Boycott—Labor Union]

10. In the case at bar there is in ULC's relations with the union some evidence of ULC's exclusionary intent and of its resort to forbidden restraints of trade. When union representatives and ULC representatives together called upon a merchant, and the union man asked the merchant to boycott the Gazette and the ULC man asked the merchant to advertise in the ULC shopper, this was in effect a joint appeal by the union and the ULC to boycott the Gazette. Such a group boycott organized by one of two competitors in a market was a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, was conclusive evidence of an intent to exclude competition unlawfully, and proved that ULC attempted to monopolize the market in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. Klor's Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc. [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,316], 359 U. S. 207; Lorain Journal v. United States [1950-1951 Trade Cases ¶ 62,957], 342 U. S. 143. Nor was resort to such a group boycott excusable merely because among those participating were union representatives. Cf. Allen Bradley Co. v. Local No. 3 [1944-1945 Trade Cases ¶ 57,386], 325 U. S. 797.

[Payment to Local Merchants Unlawful]

11. More extensive evidence of ULC's exclusionary intent and its resort to forbidden restraints of trade is to be found in ULC's relations with the eight merchants. All of these so-called consultants of ULC held responsible positions with advertisers. None of them had newspaper experience. They were in no sense a cross-section of informed Haverhill opinion. It stretches credulity to suppose that Loeb ever looked upon these eight as the best procurable advisers respecting the running of a newspaper in Haverhill. But whatever was the situation at the outset, later when, following the "slackening" of interest in the eight consultants, Loeb started to pay each of them $50 weekly, and to make the extravagant promises in the July 1958 letter and December 15, 1958 letter, Loeb was making payments and promises in consideration of each individual's services in inducing the enterprise with which he was connected and such other enterprises as he could influence to advertise exclusively in the Journal and to refrain from advertising in the Gazette.

12. This conduct of Loeb was an encouragement to a group boycott in which each one of the eight consultants acted as a watch-dog with respect to his seven fellows and other advertisers in Haverhill. As has already been noted, such a group boycott by one of two competitors in a narrow market was a restraint of trade in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, was conclusive evidence of ULC's exclusionary intent, and was proof of ULC's attempt to monopolize in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. Lorain Journal v. United States, supra.

13. Moreover, another path of reasoning leads to the same conclusion. ULC's payment to the eight for their solicitation of outsiders to advertise in the Journal without disclosing to those outsiders that the eight were not disinterested fellow advertisers as they purported to be, but were paid employees of the Journal, was an unfair practice not honestly industrial. It is misleading and immoral for a producer to pay a secret commission to an allegedly disinterested person for boosting the sale of a product which that person recommends under the purported guise of a friend or skilled neutral adviser. The use of such an unfair practice by one of two competitors in a narrow market was not honestly industrial, was evidence of ULC's exclusionary intent, and was proof of ULC's attempt to monopolize in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

[Plaintiff's Discriminatory Advertising Rates Unlawful]

14. Other examples of ULC's exclusionary intent and its use of unfair means are to be found in its discriminatory advertising rates. The most serious discrimination was the allowance to J. M. Fields, the largest local advertiser, of a rate 30 per cent lower than others have been offered. Less serious was the failure to inform every advertiser that it could without extra charge have one try at a color page, or that if it advertised in the November 28, 1958 issue of the Journal it could have without additional charge a reprint in a Christmas supplement in December. All these discriminatory rate practices demand condemnation. Every discrimination which is not based upon some explicable economic difference, such as economy traceable to quantity purchases, is ex hypothesi dictated by some ulterior motive. Where the party giving the discriminatory benefit is in a very narrow market and has in other aspects revealed a monopolistic intent it is necessary to conclude that the discrimination was given with an exclusionary intent, even though the beneficiary of the discrimination did not promise to reduce or eliminate such business as it was doing with a competitor of the donor of the discrimination. Where rate cards have been published, the very giving of a special unpublicized benefit literally means that the newspaper is not playing above board though it purports to do so. Its competitor and the public are both being told half truths. It cannot be claimed that to use against a competitor a rate which is omitted from a publicly announced rate schedule and which is not universally available to customers is to seek success solely by ability, foresight, and industry.

[Discrimination as Attempt to Monopolize]

15. In short, where two newspapers are struggling for survival in a market where only one can succeed, and both publicly announce the advertising rates they will follow, if either party departs from the publicly announced rate by giving secret discriminatory benefits to some advertisers, prima facie that party has evinced an exclusionary intent, has resorted to a practice not honestly industrial, and has attempted to monopolize in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. If there is anything to the contrary in United States v. Kansas City Star Co., W. D. Mo., 1954 Trade Cases ¶ 67,683 or Scott Publishing Co. v. Columbia Basin Pub. Inc. [1959 Trade Cases ¶ 69,589], W. D. Wash., Dec. 4, 1959, this Court respectfully declines to follow those authorities. For this Court takes the view that when an enterprise having substantial market power engages in a discrimination not justified by normal economic considerations it is prima facie seeking to achieve control of the market by a method at least as objectionable as those condemned in U. S. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., supra.

[Attempt to Buy Sole Competitor Not Unlawful]

16. Another set of activities which require scrutiny are Loeb's attempts to buy all the stock of HG Co. In view of Loeb's control, through ownership or otherwise, of all the ULC stock, Loeb's offers to purchase may be attributed to ULC. Thus we have in effect a situation where one of the only two competing newspapers in a city offers to buy out the stock of the other. If this were a city in which at least two newspapers could economically survive, the offer to purchase would be an attempt to monopolize. Cf. U. S. v. Aluminum Corp. [supra]. It would not be a victory won by skill, foresight, and industry. But the situation is different where a city can accommodate only one successful newspaper, and two roughly equally able companies are competing for the single prize that is available. Skill, foresight, and industry by themselves will not give either company the victory. In addition what is required is the capacity to withstand losses. There is nothing more noble, nor more reflective of superior ability, in winning the victory by paying a large price in installments of monthly losses than by paying a large price in one lump sum payment to take over the competitor. Under the very extraordinary circumstances of this case it would have been permissible for ULC or Loeb to pay a reasonable price for the stock of HG Co. because though it would have appeared to lessen competition it would not have done so substantially; it merely would have somewhat shortened the time within which competition could continue.

[Defendant's Illegal Discrimination—Intent to Monopolize]

17. Having discussed ULC's conduct, we now turn to defendants' conduct. The first matter to be reviewed is the activities of HG Co. during the fall of 1958 in departing from its publicly announced advertising rates by giving secret discriminatory benefits to some advertisers. Undoubtedly in giving these discriminatory benefits, HG Co. was acting only after it had been put in peril of insolvency in the equity sense as a result of ULC's attempt to monopolize. HG Co., therefore argues in the language of Justice Clark in Times-Picayune v. United States [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,494], 345 U. S. 594, 623 that ULC's conduct serves to "illuminate" HG Co.'s intent. HG Co. contends that it had no intent to monopolize; it merely was trying to survive in the face of an unlawful attack. The claim is that even if secret discrimination is prima facie a badge of an attempt to monopolize, here the prima facie case has been overcome when one recognizes the setting and the necessity of retaliation as self-defense.

18. The foregoing argument is not without appeal. Admittedly the provocation to retaliate was great, the total number of discriminations was not shown to be large, the period of the discrimination was short, and paragraph 16 of plaintiff's complaint does not point a finger with praiseworthy clarity at this evil practice. Yet there can be no question that there was discrimination, that it was capricious, that it was secret, that it belied the public rate card, and that it cannot be excused on the plea that the discriminatory offers made by HG Co. merely matched offers made by ULC. Such a practice was certainly not honestly industrial. (See conclusions 14 and 15, above.) Moreover, it is a practice which is not to be excused because comparable practices were indulged in by plaintiff. See Moore v. Mead Service Co., 10th Cir. [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,876], 190 F. (2d) 540, 541 approved in footnote 1 of Moore v. Mead's Fine Bread Co. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,906], 348 U. S. 115, 116. Cf. Kiefer-Stewart Co. v. Joseph E. Seagram & Sons [1950-1951 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,737], 340 U. S. 211. Nor, on the ground that the motive was to retaliate or defend against ULC's illegal conduct, can the practice be regarded as merely a restraint of trade of doubtful validity rather than as an attempt to monopolize. This distinction is unacceptable because having about fifty per cent of the market, and knowing that the market would not permit two contestants to survive, HG Co.'s resort to any unfair practice, and its failure to confine itself to exercise of skill, foresight, and industry, compels a conclusion that HG Co. had an exclusionary intent and had attempted to monopolize the market in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. (See conclusion 9, above.) Nor can HG Co. escape an adverse decree on the ground that on February 1, 1959 its new management ended the discrimination. This reform came after this suit was brought on January 13, 1959. Plaintiff is entitled to be sure that the reform is not merely temporary.

[Rate Reductions Not Unlawful]

19. The next question is whether it was indicative of an attempt to monopolize for HG Co. publicly to reduce its rates on February 1, 1959 at a time when it was losing money. Plaintiff's position seems to be either that no reduction was proper, or that the over-all reduction was too substantial, or that reduction in some categories was so much greater than in others that the rate reduction was discriminatory as between publicly announced classes of rates. Nothing in the record supports the last branch of this contention, that is, the suggestion that there was an invidious discrimination between two or more publicly announced rates. And as to the first branches of the contention, a sufficient answer is that it is not unlawful in a market which permits of only one successful competitor, but where two competitors are each struggling at a loss, for one of the competitors to reduce its prices, at least in the absence of a showing that such reduction results in such terrific losses that it is beyond reasonable hope that they can be recovered even in the long future. Had the losses been so extravagant as to be unrecoverable it might be persuasively argued that the object of the reduction was not to capture the market for its possible profit value to the one foreseeable successful competitor, but was rather to inflict injury on a rival regardless of the expectation of ultimate profit. But those are not the facts in the case at bar. Here the effect of the reduction of February 1, 1959 has not been to increase but to diminish HG Co.'s losses.

[Stock Acquisition—Sherman and Clayton Acts]

20. We now come to what is the most important issue in this case—the lawfulness of the defendants' action in organizing NNE and purchasing stock in it so that NNE could buy stock in, and make advances to, HG Co.

[Motives—Commercial Justification]

21. The findings of fact have explicitly recited (a) that each of those who invested in NNE "acted in part because he believed that . . . investment in NNE was . . . commercially justified", and "the belief . . . was a reasonable belief"; (b) that there is not between any newspaper owned by any NNE shareholder and the newspaper owned (indirectly) by NNE, or between any newspaper owned by any NNE shareholder and any newspaper owned by another NNE shareholder any "linkage of subscriptions, advertisements, contracts, manufacturing processes, news gathering or editorial policy. Nor is any such linkage contemplated"; and (c) none of the relationships which NNE created "substantially affects what is technically known as 'the market power' of any NNE shareholder."

[Effect on Competition]

22. The very principle which permitted ULC to use its funds and its Manchester plant to establish The Haverhill Journal (see conclusions 5 to 7 above) would seem to permit the NNE shareholders to use their funds to buy indirectly The Haverhill Gazette. Both ULC and the NNE investors had a commercial basis for their decisions. Both avoided substantial operational agreements between their Haverhill and their non-Haverhill enterprises. Neither ULC nor any NNE investor in any substantial way (a) used its non-Haverhill market power within Haverhill or (b) used its Haverhill investment to increase its market power outside of Haverhill. Thus the case at bar seems to be precisely the one envisaged by Professors Carl Kaysen and David F. Turner, in Anti-Trust Policy, An Economic and Legal Analysis, Harvard University Press, 1959 pp. 138-139

> "We would deem the following joint ventures to be presumptively lawful . . . (b) any case in which there is no close relation between the product of the venture and any of the products of the participants . . . Jointness creates no additional risk of market power spreading from one market to another, apart from the pooling of financial resources; and there would be no risk of interrelated price and output decisions as between the venture and the joint venturers."

[Desire to "Thwart" Competitor]

23. But plaintiff suggests that it makes a difference that many NNE shareholders acted because they did not approve of Loeb's tactics. There is no basis for concluding that this motive was primary in any shareholder's decision to subscribe to NNE. And it does not constitute a violation of § 1 or § 2 of the Sherman Act for a person to make a commercially justified investment in an enterprise in a way that does not substantially increase his market power if he has both a purpose to make money and a purpose to preclude another from capturing a market. As has already been explained in conclusion 9, the Sherman Act permits a person to have an intent to exclude another from the market if this intent is accomplished without resort to predatory or unfair practices. In a commercial competition, fairly fought, with the making of money a principal object, a contestant is not to be condemned for his anticipated pleasure in seeing the tactics of his opponent thwarted.

> "One who engages in a business does so for the purpose, broadly, of deriving personal satisfactions of some kind from his conduct. If he engages in the business in good faith, intending to remain in it indefinitely or until a more profitable course presents itself, he is not subject to liability even though one of the satisfactions which it is his purpose to derive in the causing of harm to the business of another."

Restatement, Torts, § 709, comment c. The law allows other joys in business life beside making money.

["Hometown" Monopolies Immaterial]

24. Plaintiff also suggests that it makes a difference that here we have an investment made by a combination of persons most of whom have in their home markets a so-called monopoly position. But, as the quotation from Professors Kaysen and Turner recited in conclusion 22 emphasizes, the question is not whether in some market somewhere each of a group of persons has a monopoly or other substantial market power, the question is whether they have in some way combined that market power. Here there is no evidence of interlacing of policies, practices or operations of NNE stockholders inter se or with HG Co. Each runs a wholly separate enterprise. Each is king in its own city. None has joined an imperial federation holding sway in New England.

["Mutual Defense Association"]

25. Finally plaintiff contends that defendants have formed a combination to exclude it and perhaps others from buying any local daily newspaper in any of the cities in which NNE has stockholders. The claim is that what we have here in an incipient mutual defense association. The argument is that those who solicited investment in NNE gave as one of the reasons for investment that "if Loeb succeeded in Haverhill . . . then he . . . might . . . come into their territories"; and that some of those who invested feared lest they "might at some time be victims of a distress similar or akin to that experienced by The Gazette". But the answer to the argument is that there is no express agreement and, as the findings indicate, there is no adequate basis for inferring an implied agreement, either that some or all of the NNE investors will join in similar ventures in the future if help is needed, or that they will join to preclude plaintiff from buying any New England newspaper except The Haverhill Gazette. There is no large capital to purchase newspapers or to serve as a defense fund. In the common pot there is hardly enough to carry on the Haverhill venture. There is at most a corporate shell NNE Inc., with no formidable weapons concealed behind the imposing facade of its name. If disaster strikes some NNE shareholder, there is no basis for predicting what will happen. Perhaps if there is a victim he will cite the Haverhill precedent. But a precedent is not a promise. Cash contributions to invest in Haverhill do not warrant a conclusion of a combination or conspiracy to act elsewhere.

[Acquisition Not Unlawful]

26. From what has been said it follows that the formation and organization of NNE, the subscription to the stock of NNE, the NNE purchase of HG Co. stock, and the advances by NNE to HG Co. (even though such actions were taken with an awareness that ULC could probably be forced out of the Haverhill market, with the motive of thwarting Loeb's tactics, and with the effect of precluding him from acquiring the stock of HG Co.) did not involve (a) a combination or contract in restraint of trade, nor (b) a monopolization or attempt to monopolize the Haverhill market, nor (c) a monopolization or attempt to monopolize some supposed regional market composed of local daily newspapers in a number of New England cities looked at as though they were in some sense a unity, nor (1) any acquisition which had the effect of substantially lessening competition or had the tendency to create a monopoly. The formation, organization, and functioning of NNE did not involve NNE or those who became officers or stockholders in any violation of § 1 or § 2 of the Sherman Act, or § 7 of the Clayton Act.

Partial Final Decree

[Practices Enjoined]

This cause having come on to be heard, and the Court having fully considered the evidence and the arguments, and having filed its Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Opinion, it is hereby:

Ordered, Adjudged, and Decreed that:

1. The complaint is dismissed on the merits againsts Newspapers of New England, Inc., Lowell Sun Publishing Co., Eagle Tribune Publishing Co., Enterprise Publishing Co., Essex County Newspapers Inc., Sentinel Printing Co., Eagle Publishing Co., Holyoke Transcript-Telegram Pub. Co., Inc., Republican Publishing Co., John H. Costello, Irving E. Rogers, J. Warren McClure, William F. Lucey, Frank A. Lawlor, Philip S. Weld, David W. Howe, Sidney R. Cook, William Dwight, Donald B. Miller, and George H. Goodbeer.

[Discriminatory Advertising Rates Enjoined —Both Papers]

2. The Haverhill Gazette Co. shall not make or collect any charge for advertising in The Haverhill Gazette except in strict conformity with a publicly announced rate schedule. The corporation shall be free to vary the schedule from time to time. But to be effective an advertising schedule shall set forth every aspect of the rates, including, for example, the classification of types of advertising and of advertisers, the basic charges, discounts for volume, discounts for prompt payment, discounts for repetitions of an advertisement, and all types of special benefit available. For the purposes of this paragraph a rate schedule shall be regarded as publicly announced when, alternatively, it is published in The Haverhill Gazette, or it is posted in a conspicuous place in the offices of The Haverhill Gazette Co. and is available upon demand by any person who indicates the possibility that he will advertise in or compete with The Haverhill Gazette Co.

3. Union Leader Corporation shall not make or collect any charge for advertising in The Haverhill Journal except in strict conformity with a publicly announced rate schedule. The corporation shall be free to vary the schedule from time to time. But to be effective an advertising schedule shall set forth every aspect of the rates, including, for example, the classification of types of advertising and of advertisers, the basic charges, discounts for volume, discounts for prompt payment, discounts for repetitions of an advertisement, and all types of special benefit available. For the purposes of this paragraph a rate schedule shall be regarded as publicly announced when, alternatively, it is published in The Haverhill Journal, or it is posted in a conspicuous place in the offices of The Haverhill Journal and is available upon demand by any person who indicates the possibility that he will advertise in or compete with The Haverhill Journal.

[Plaintiff's Use of Secret Advertising Solicitors Enjoined]

4. Union Leader Corporation shall not make to any person whose principal occupation is that of officer, director, partner, employee, or associate of an enterprise that does advertise in The Haverhill Journal any payment for that person's services as a newspaper consultant, or advertising solicitor, or their equivalent unless the person so paid is shown to be by experience and like qualifications a bona fide newspaper consultant, advertising solicitor, or their equivalent, and unless the Union Leader Corporation instructs that person to declare his employment by Union Leader Corporation when that person directly or indirectly solicits advertising for The Haverhill Journal.

5. Union Leader Corporation is ordered not to perform any contract it now has with Martin Bendetson, Norris Bendetson, Jerome Fishbein, David M. Gordon, Vincent W. Grad, Irving P. Karelis, Sidney Katz, and Eli Shoreman. Union Leader Corporation is directed not to retain as an officer William Loeb if hereafter he makes to any of the persons listed any payments similar to the payments of $50 weekly made to each of those persons since May 1958, or if hereafter he performs the contracts of December 15, 1958 which he made with each of those persons, or if hereafter he makes to any person whose principal occupation is that of officer, director, partner, employee, or associate of an enterprise that does advertise in The Haverhill Journal any payment for that person's services as a newspaper consultant, or advertising solicitor, or their equivalent. The phrasing of this paragraph is due solely to the facts that neither Loeb nor any of the other individuals named is a party to this case, and that therefore this Court must direct its order to Union Leader Corporation which is a party. There is no implied suggestion that Loeb and the others will not voluntarily abandon their relationship once the invalidity of their agreements has been judicially declared.

[Order for Detailed Statement of Claimed Damages—Both Parties]

6. Union Leader shall prepare as promptly as possible a detailed schedule (with appropriate references to the transcript of this case, the exhibits introduced, those records of its own affairs and of The Haverhill Gazette Co. which were examined before trial in this case, and other relevant sources) showing the precise damages which it claims it suffered from such discriminations in advertising charges as have been practiced by The Haverhill Gazette Co. If, in the light of the opinion in this case, any other types of damages are recoverable they may also be listed on the schedule. Items of damage not clearly revealed by the schedule shall be regarded as barred in the same manner as claims not made at a pre-trial are frequently barred.

7. The Haverhill Gazette Company shall prepare as promptly as possible a detailed schedule (with appropriate references to the transcript of this case, the exhibits introduced, those records of its own affairs and of Union Leader Corporation which were examined before trial in this case and other relevant sources) showing the precise damages which it claims it suffered from (a) the Union Leader Corporation's actions in inducing advertisers to boycott The Haverhill Gazette, (b) the illegal employment by Union Leader Corporation of Martin Bendetson, Norris Bendetson, Jerome Fishbein, David M. Gordon, Vincent W. Grad, Irving P. Karelis, Sidney Katz, and Eli Shoreman, and (c) such discriminations in advertising charges as have been practiced by Union Leader Corporation in the operation of The Haverhill Journal. If in the light of the opinion in this case, any other types of damages are recoverable they may also be listed on the schedule. Items of damage not clearly revealed by the schedule shall be regarded as barred in the same manner as claims not made at a pre-trial are frequently barred.

[Attempts to Monopolize Enjoined]

8. The Haverhill Gazette Company shall refrain from attempting in any way to monopolize the market in Haverhill for daily local newspapers of high quality.

9. Union Leader Corporation shall refrain from attempting in any way to monopolize the market in Haverhill for daily local newspapers of high quality.

[Certain Other Relief Denied]

10. Except for (1) the possible recovery of damages to be claimed by the schedules in paragraphs 6 and 7, (2) the trebling of such damages, and (3) attorneys' fees, all other relief sought by either the complaint or the counterclaim is denied.

["Certification" for Appeal]

11. Pursuant to Rule 54 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, this Court expressly determines that there is no just reason for delay in entering final judgments on the following claims:

(a) The claims against all defendants specified in paragraph 1 of this Order;

(b) all claims for injunctive and declaratory relief against The Haverhill Gazette Co.;

(c) all claims for injunctive and declaratory relief against Union Leader Corporation.

Pursuant to those determinations, this Court enters final judgments with respect to paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10, and 11 of this Order, but reserves the damage claims referred to in paragraphs 6 and 7. However, if an appellate court should regard these orders not as final but as interlocutory, and if the parties would not have the benefit of the appeals available under 28 U. S. C. § 1292(a)(1), this Court, in accordance with 28 U. S. C. § 1292(b), is of the opinion that the orders in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10, and 11 involve a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion and that an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation.

[Jurisdiction Retained]

12. Jurisdiction of this cause is retained for the purpose of enabling any party to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be appropriate for the correction, construction, or carrying out of this decree.

[Effective Date]

13. This decree shall take effect one week after its entry unless before then its enforcement is superseded by an appellate court.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts and Robinson-Patman Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Newspaper's Alleged Conspiracy to Drive Rival Out of Business—Cooperation and Aid of Printers' Union—Unlawful Intent Required in Absence of Actual Restraint or Monopolization.—While "intent" is immaterial or may be inferred where there is an actual restraint of trade or an actual monopoly, a specific intent to restrain or monopolize trade must accompany the acts complained of if no actual restraint or monopoly has resulted from those acts. Thus, there was no violation of Section 1 or 2 of the Sherman Act where an established newspaper, in an action charging a rival paper and a printers' union with conspiring to monopolize the market on behalf of the rival paper, failed to show an actual restraint or monopoly and, further, failed to show the requisite unlawful intent to restrain or monopolize the local newspaper business. The established paper relied upon a number of circumstances to establish the existence of a conspiracy and an unlawful intent on the part of the defendants, including the fact that (1) a strike or lockout was in progress at its paper, (2) the rival paper started daily publication at the beginning of the strike or lockout, (3) the rival paper came to terms with the union and contracted to pay higher wages at a time when it was losing money, and (4) the union urged local merchants not to advertise in the established paper, "cooperated" with the rival paper, assisted that paper financially, and later actually took over the publication of that paper. The rival paper and the union cooperated, however, "not with the common objective of eliminating [the established paper] from the field, but each with its own separate purpose."

Further, there were other circumstances that were inconsistent with any intent to monopolize, namely, the fact that (1) the rival paper attempted to "sell out" to the established paper, (2) the union periodically offered to resume negotiations with the established paper, (3) the union, in giving financial support to the rival paper, merely made up that paper's deficits over a period of nearly nine years, instead of financing immediate rate cuts by the rival paper that would have made it impossible for the established paper to compete, and (4) the union never offered to finance the outright purchase of the established paper.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.660; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2515.40, 2610.

Monopolies—Attempt to Monopolize—Practices as Evidence of Unlawful Purpose—Newspapers' Reduction of Advertising Rates to Larger Advertisers—Price Discrimination Under Robinson-Patman Act, Section 2(a)—Exclusive Dealing Under Clayton Act, Section 3.—A newspaper publisher, in its rivalry with a local established paper, did not use its advertising rates as a means of achieving a monopoly, did not engage in any price discrimination that injured competition in violation of Section 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act, and did not sell advertising or fix rates under an agreement that the purchaser would refrain from advertising in the established paper ("exclusive dealing" under Section 3 of the Clayton Act). The practices complained of included (1) sales below published rates; (2) combining sales in a daily paper with sales in a weekly advertising edition, (3) agreements giving the area's largest advertiser free advertising in that weekly advertising edition, and (4) "double billing" in connection with "national cooperative" advertising (issuing a second and larger bill which local advertisers used to secure more reimbursement from national manufacturers or distributors of the advertised product). However, none of the rates were unreasonably low as compared with the rates charged by the established paper. Further, after revising its initially unrealistic rates, the rival paper's only sales at lower rates were made to advertisers using more than the maximum space shown on the "rate card," and those reductions were "relatively the same based on inches used" (the use of more inches of advertising space reduces the rate per inch).

Almost all of those devices, including the giving of more favorable rates to larger advertisers, were also used by the established paper. In addition, the latter gave rebates to advertisers and paid commissions to local advertising agencies on display advertising. The court noted that it was mentioning the established paper's own practices "not because these practices would constitute a defense to [the rival's] practices if they constituted a violation of law, but merely to point up the fact that . . . whatever was done by either party in that struggle was done for the purpose of competing and not pursuant to a conspiracy to monopolize."

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2515.40, 2610.280; Price Discrimination, Vol. 1, ¶ 3506.660, 3508; Exclusive Dealing, Vol. 1, ¶ 4009.235.

Monopolies—Conspiracy to Monopolize—Newspaper's Entry into "Monopoly Newspaper's" Market—Knowledge That Success Might Drive Out Established Paper as Evidence of Unlawful Intent.—The establishment of a newspaper in an area where a "monopoly" paper is being published is not evidence of a conspiracy to violate the antitrust laws. A holding to that effect would thwart the very purpose of those laws and turn them into instruments for the protection of monopolies. Thus, a newspaper publisher did not violate the antitrust laws by starting a paper in an area where another paper was already established. It must have occurred to the new publisher that, if he was successful in establishing his paper in the area, the result might be that the established paper would be forced out of business. However, that is a natural, everyday occurrence. Thus, the new publisher's statement that the established publishers would end up by having to sell their paper to him "at 5 cents on the dollar" did not indicate a purpose to create a monopoly, but was simply his prediction as to the result of the competition between them.

See Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2515.40.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Monopolies—Conspiracy to Restrain and Monopolize Local Newspaper Business—Proof of Conspiracy—Absence of Direct Evidence—Circumstantial Evidence.—Direct evidence of a conspiracy is not needed to show a violation of Sections 1 or 2 of the Sherman Act. However, where the circumstances relied upon are not only consistent with the conspiracy theory, but are also consistent with other and lawful purposes, then there is no violation. Thus, there was no violation where a newspaper, in trying to prove that a rival paper and a printers' union had conspired to restrain and monopolize the local newspaper business, relied upon circumstances that were equally consistent with "proper, legal, independent purposes and intentions" on the part of the rival paper and the union.

See Combinations and Conspiracies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2005.355; Monopolies, Vol. 1, ¶ 2520.30.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Necessary Averments to State Cause of Action—Interstate Commerce—Newspaper Business.—A Washington newspaper publisher was engaged in interstate commerce because (1) it purchased newsprint from sources outside the state, (2) national and international news was gathered and disseminated, (3) national advertising was sold and published, and (4) the paper was distributed by mail and other means outside the state.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9009.350.

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Necessary Averments to State Cause of Action—Causal Relation Between Plaintiff's Injuries and Acts Complained of—Newspaper Rivalry.—A newspaper publisher, in a treble damage action charging a rival paper and a printers' union with conspiring to monopolize the local newspaper business on behalf of the rival paper, failed to show that any "slowing of its growth" was due to any conspiracy on the part of the defendants to drive it out of business and create a monopoly. Losses in advertising and circulation revenue were due to a strike or lockout occasioned by its wage dispute with the union and, also, to the competition afforded by the rival paper (which had suffered worse financial difficulties). At any rate, the plaintiff newspaper had been and continued to be the dominant paper in the area.

Opinion

[Treble Damage Action—"Fact" Case]

W. D. MURRAY, District Judge [In full text]: The action was commenced in 1955. Defendants, in addition to those presently remaining in the case, were brought in and subsequently dismissed. Extensive pre-trial discovery procedures were undertaken by both sides. The trial commenced before the Court, sitting without a jury, on September 8, 1959, and consumed two months. A record of over 7,300 typewritten pages was compiled and over 500 exhibits were marked in evidence. During the trial much of the evidence was received over objection on reserved rulings, and several questions of law were presented. However, in considering the case after all the evidence was in and after able arguments by counsel for all parties, the Court has concluded that the case involves essentially a determination of the factual issues presented, and when that determination has been made, as it has, the law questions pass out of the case. In making the determination the Court has considered all of the evidence, including that which was received on reserved rulings.

[Charge]

Plaintiff brought this action under Sections 15 and 26, Title 15, U. S. C. A., charging defendants with combining and conspiring together for the purpose of destroying and driving out of business the Tri-City Herald, a daily newspaper published by plaintiff in the Tri-City area of the State of Washington, in order to create a monopoly for the Columbia Basin News in the daily newspaper business in that area, in violation of the anti-trust laws, and specifically Sections 1, 2, 13, 14 of Title 15, U. S. C.

[Parties]

Scott Publishing Company, the plaintiff herein, is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, on September 17, 1947, and since November, 1947, has been and still is engaged in the business of publishing the Tri-City Herald, a daily evening newspaper at Kennewick, Washington, and distributing such newspaper throughout the Tri-City area, as that area will be hereinafter more specifically referred to and described.

[Interstate Commerce]

In the publication of the Tri-City Herald, Scott Publishing Company is engaged in interstate commerce. Newsprint is purchased from sources outside the State of Washington, national and international news is gathered and disseminated; national as well as local advertising is sold and published, and the Herald is distributed by mail and other means outside of the State of Washington.

[Background of Plaintiff]

The principal founders, officers and stockholders of Scott Publishing Company are Robert F. Philip, who has been president of the corporation since its formation, and Glenn C. Lee, who has been Secretary-Treasurer since the inception of the corporation. Glenn C. Lee has been publisher of the Tri-City Herald and Philip has assisted in its management. Lee and Philip, though experienced businessmen in other fields, had no experience in the newspaper publishing business prior to their entering that field in the Tri-City area.

The Tri-City area conissts of the cities of Kennewick and Richland in Benton County, Washington, and the City of Pasco in Franklin County, Washington, and the area surrounding those three cities. Formerly Pasco and Kennewick were small farming communities on the Columbia River, and Richland was non-existent, but with the end of World War II and the advent of atomic energy, the Hanford Atomic Works was constructed and Richland was established on government land with government owned houses and buildings to house the workers at the Atomic Energy plant. In the fall of 1947, McNary Dam was constructed on the Columbia River at a point some 14 miles from Kennewick and additional dams were planned for the development of the Columbia Basin. Public power was available in the area and irrigation projects were established, all of which led to a substantial growth of the area in population and economic activity. By 1947, there was a population of around 50,000 in the Tri-City area, and its future economic potential seemed very great.

In 1947, Lee and Philip, who were then in the import-export business, became aware of the Tri-City area and its potential for future development and learned that the Pasco Herald, a weekly newspaper, job printing shop and office supply business in Pasco, Washington, was for sale. At about the same time Lee and Philip became acquainted with one Hugh Scott, a man who had had some newspaper experience, and the three decided to form Scott Publishing Company, the plaintiff herein, and purchase the Pasco Herald, which they did, agreeing to pay the former owner a total of $80,000, plus the inventory. Scott Publishing Company took possession of the property on October 1, 1947. Scott ceased to be an officer and director of Scott Publishing Company in 1949.

Scott Publishing Company operated the job shop and office supply business and continued to publish the Pasco Herald as a weekly paper until November 13, 1947. The operation was a profitable one. The potential growth factors of the Tri-City area were such that Scott, Lee and Philip decided that a daily newspaper would be successful in the area, and within a matter of weeks after Scott Publishing Company took possession of the Pasco Herald, publication of a daily newspaper was planned, and on November 13, 1947, the first issue of a daily paper was published. Initially the paper was published 5 days a week, but in January, 1949, a Sunday issue was added, and ever since, the paper has been published six days a week, excluding Saturday. The name of the paper was changed from the Pasco Herald to the Tri-City Herald when daily publication commenced.

The conversion of the weekly Pasco Herald to the daily Tri-City Herald was almost an immediate success, but it raised serious problems for Scott Publishing Company. The expanded operation required more personnel of all kinds, the opening of additional offices in Kennewick and Richland, additional newsprint, which at the time was difficult to obtain. The plant and press were inadequate to handle the publication of a daily newspaper. Skilled mechanical workmen necessary for the expanded operation were not available locally and had to be recruited from all over the Pacific Northwest and even further afield. Distribution of the weekly Herald had been by mail from the single Pasco office and the conversion to a daily required the establishment of carrier organizations and offices in the three cities. And ever present was the need for sufficient capital to carry on the expanded operation.

Scott Publishing Company with great difficulty met and solved the problems. Personnel were recruited and trained, additional offices were opened, and in 1948, in the late summer, a larger press was obtained together with a building in Kennewick to house it and at that time the Tri-City Herald moved from Pasco to Kennewick. However the newsprint problem and the problem with respect to sufficient working capital remained.

[Background of Defendant Newspaper]

The defendant Howard W. Parish is a man who spent most of his life in the newspaper business, a substantial part of it in and around the Pacific Northwest. He has had experience in all phases of the newspaper business, but predominately in circulation and management. He formerly was publisher of the Seattle Star, a daily newspaper published in Seattle, Washington, until 1946, when it ceased publication. When the Seattle Star went out of business, Parish acquired a stock interest in The Craftsman Press, Inc., a large commercial printing establishment in Seattle and held the office of Secretary-Treasurer of that company.

Parish traveled throughout the State of Washington on business of The Craftsman Press, Inc., and became acquainted with the Tri-City area as a result of such travels. He acquired additional information concerning the Tri-City area by reading a report prepared by one Earl McCallum, an expert in the newspaper field with reference to the newspaper business in the Tri-City area. Furthermore, at some time prior to February, 1949, Scott Publishing Company had prepared a brochure advertising the Tri-City area and the Tri-City Herald which was to be used to attract national advertising. Because Scott Publishing Company was not equipped to print in color, and as the brochure was to be prepared in color, Scott Publishing Company had the printing done by The Craftsman Press, Inc., in Seattle, and Parish became familiar with the data contained in that brochure and likewise met Lee and Philip in connection with their newsprint problem and also in connection with the printing of the brochure in February, 1949. Parish also had acquired considerable information concerning the background of Lee and Philip and the Scott Publishing Company and the difficulties which they were encountering in the publication of the Tri-City Herald and particularly the financial problems with which they were faced.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

As a result of all this information Parish became interested in getting into the newspaper business in the Tri-City area. He acquired the financial backing of several substantial business men in Seattle and in April or May of 1949, he telephoned Philip and asked if Scott Publishing Company was interested in selling the Tri-City Herald. Philip informed him that they might be interested in selling if a price could be agreed upon. At that time the Scott Publishing Company was very much in need of additional working capital and Philip and Lee arranged a meeting with Parish at which they hoped to interest Parish in the purchase of stock in the Scott Publishing Company, or possibly sell him the Tri-City Herald.

At the meeting Parish informed Lee and Philip that he was not interested in purchasing a minority interest, but stated he was interested in purchasing the controlling interest or the entire property. Lee and Philip set the price at $410,000 for the entire company which Parish considered too high and he offered $250,000 and no agreement was reached.

As stated before, Parish was aware of the tremendous possibilities of the Tri-City area. He was also familiar with the background of Lee and Philip, their inexperience in the newspaper business in contrast to his own wide experience in that business. He was likewise familiar with the constant financial problems which Scott Publishing Company was continuously struggling with, whereas he felt that he, through his associates, had ample financial backing, and because of all of these factors which seemed to weigh so heavily in his favor and against Philip and Lee, he believed there was a golden opportunity for him in the newspaper business in the Tri-City area. At the meeting with Lee and Philip, when the purchase of the Tri-City Herald was discussed, Parish pointed out these things to Philip and Lee and stated that he would start a newspaper in the Tri-City area to compete with them and that they would end up by having to sell their newspaper to Parish at 5¢ on the dollar.

Thereafter, in August, 1949, the defendant Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., was incorporated. The original incorporaters were Parish, the defendant James M. Bryce, who is Parish's son-in-law, and John X. Johnson, one of the Seattle business men associated with Parish, and who subsequently furnished the principal financial support of the Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., in its early days, together with several other Seattle business men.

The Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., commenced publication of the Pasco News, a weekly newspaper at Pasco in August, 1949. The circulation of the Pasco News was on a free distribution basis. The publication of the Pasco News on a weekly basis continued until November, 1949, when publication was stepped up to bi-weekly, and at that time acquisition of the facilities to publish a daily newspaper was commenced. As a weekly newspaper the Pasco News competed with the Tri-City Herald for advertising within the Tri-City area and particularly in Pasco. However, at no time before Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., commenced publication of the daily Columbia Basin News, under the circumstances hereinafter set forth, had the Pasco News, either as a weekly or a bi-weekly, earned a profit.

[Printers' Union]

Prior to August, 1949, members of the Typographical Union in the Tri-City area had been under the jurisdiction of the local Typographical Union at Walla Walla, Washington, which is some 50 miles away from the Tri-City area. Because of this distance, members of the Typographical Union in the Tri-City area desired to form their own local and in August, 1949, the defendant Kennewick-Pasco Local 831 was chartered and affiliated with the International Typographical Union. At some time prior there had been a contract between the Typographical Union through the Walla Walla local with the predecessor of the Scott Publishing Company, but before Scott Publishing Company took over, that contract had expired and there was no contract concerning terms of employment between the Typographical Union and Scott Publishing Company.

[Wage Dispute with Plaintiff Newspaper]

After the formation and chartering of Local 831, and on December 2, 1949, Local 831 mailed notices to employers in the Tri-City area asking the commencement of collective bargaining negotiations. The employers notified were Scott Publishing Company, Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., Husk Printing Company and Meverden Printing Company, the latter two being commercial job printing shops. Lee, on behalf of the Scott Publishing Company, because of his personal feeling toward Parish, declined to join with the other employers in the area in meeting with the negotiating committee of Local 831. Nevertheless the other three employers in the area, after several meetings with the Scale Committee of Local 831, one of which was attended by one Art Schmidt, President of the Seattle Local of the International Typographical Union, and a Mr. Hudson of the Tacoma Local of the I. T. U., signed a contract fixing the scale for members of the I. T. U. at $90.00 a week for 38¾ hours work.

Originally the Union's demand was for $95.00 a week for 37½ hours work, which was the Seattle scale at that time, but this demand was compromised for the $90.00 figure and the 38¾ hours.

Thereafter Local 831 commenced negotiations with Scott Publishing Company. Not getting anywhere with the negotiations the Local Union requested assistance from the I. T. U. and special representatives of the President of the I. T. U., Whiting and Marvick, came into the area and participated in the negotiations. When the representatives of the I. T. U. appeared in the negotiations, Scott Publishing Company appealed to Pacific Northwest Newspaper Publishers Association for assistance in the negotiations and one D. S. Haines, Secretary of that Association joined in the negotiations on behalf of Scott Publishing Company.

The union people took the position that the only thing they could accept from Scott Publishing Company was the same contract which they had secured from the other employers in the area. Scott Publishing Company felt it could not pay the scale of $90.00 a week for 38¾ hours of work and likewise felt that certain provisions of the contract which had been signed by the other employers were illegal and therefore that it could not execute such a contract. At that time the wages paid by the Scott Publishing Company were $80.00 a week for 40 hours work. While the raise to $90.00 a week, which the Union demanded, was somewhat higher than was being paid in other comparable communities in the State of Washington, and the northwest, it was not an unreasonable demand for the Union to make upon Scott Publishing Company, particularly in view of the fact that the other employers in the area had agreed to such a wage. After having secured such a contract from the other employers, the Union could not in fairness to them have accepted anything less from Scott Publishing Company. There is no evidence that the other three employers did not enter such contract in good faith. As has been pointed out, Scott Publishing Company was given the opportunity to join with the other three employers in their negotiations with the Union, but had declined to do so, nor was there anything unreasonable in the Union's insistence upon a written contract with Scott Publishing Company, particularly in view of the fact that two employees of Scott Publishing Company, who had been active in the organization of Local 831, were discharged without apparent reason.

It likewise appears that in refusing to accept such contract Scott Publishing Company was acting in good faith. At the time of the negotiations the Tri-City area was in a depressed economic situation and it did not appear to Scott Publishing Company that it could afford to give the demanded increase without becoming bankrupt. Furthermore, Scott Publishing Company was advised by Mr. Haines that certain provisions of the contract demanded were illegal and subsequent litigation, many years later, concerning like provisions in other contracts, indicate at least that Mr. Haines was not unreasonable in his belief. At any rate the Court finds that both the Union representatives and the Scott Publishing Company negotiated in good faith on both sides but were unable to reach an agreement.

[Strike or Lockout]

When the negotiations broke down on March 3, 1950, a strike or lockout ensued. Whether the rupture of relations between the Scott Publishing Company and its employees is a strike or a lockout is not clear. The Local Union had taken a strike vote and had applied to the I. T. U. for strike sanction and had received the same. However, no date for a strike had been set and members of the Union on shift at the Scott Publishing Company, on the evening of March 3, 1950, on returning to work after lunch, found strangers performing their jobs. However, whether it was a strike or a lockout is immaterial in this case, because it is evident that whatever form it took there would have been a severance of relations between the employer and employees when they failed to reach an agreement.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Before the strike or lockout occurred, it had become apparent to Scott Publishing Company that no agreement could be reached with the Local Union, and Scott Publishing Company, with the assistance of Mr. Haines of the Publishers Association, arranged to recruit non-union employees to produce the Tri-City Herald under strike conditions. Likewise teletypesetter equipment was furnished by the Publishers Association which permitted production of the paper with fewer skilled employees. When the strike or lockout occurred, publication of the Tri-City Herald continued by these means.

The fact that it was almost certain there would be a strike or lockout involving the Tri-City Herald was common knowledge in the Tri-City area before it occurred. Parish, Bryce and their associates in the Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., were likewise aware of the strong possibility of labor trouble for Scott Publishing Company and the Tri-City Herald. As has been pointed out, Parish and Bryce and Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., moved into the Tri-City area with the intention of eventually publishing a daily newspaper in competition with the Tri-City Herald and as early as the preceding November, had acquired sufficient plant facilities and personnel for that purpose. Therefore, when it became apparent that a strike or lockout was imminent at the Tri-City Herald, all that remained to be done by Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., in order to start publication of a daily newspaper, was to complete arrangements that had already been started for features, comics and so forth for a daily newspaper. These arrangements were completed and on March 14, 1950, 11 days after the strike or lockout at the Tri-City Herald commenced, Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., commenced publication of the Columbia Basin News as a morning daily newspaper 5 days a week, and this was subsequently increased to 6 days.

["Pressure" Exerted by Union]

Almost immediately after the strike or lockout started at the Tri-City Herald, Local 831 commenced strike activities against the Tri-City Herald. Picket lines were established, attempts were made to induce both readers and advertisers of the Tri-City Herald to cease doing business with that paper, "Do Not Patronize" lists of merchants advertising in the Tri-City Herald were distributed, radio broadcasts were made; other unions in the area were induced to discourage their memberships from patronizing the Tri-City Herald—in short all the traditional means of exerting pressure against an employer involved in a labor dispute with organized labor was engaged in.

[Competitive Struggle]

With the appearance of the Columbia Basin News as a daily newspaper, a bitter competitive struggle commenced between the News and the Herald, and between the respective publishers, Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., represented by Parish and Bryce, and Scott Publishing Company, represented by Lee and Philip. The News, being in the position of the newcomer and seeking to gain a foothold in the field against a thoroughly established paper (at that time circulation of the Herald was in excess of 12,000, and it had substantial amounts of local and national advertising) was required to undertake very expensive programs to build circulation. Circulation is the lifeblood of a newspaper because it is circulation that attracts advertising and it is from advertising that the principal revenue of a newspaper is derived. Special reduced subscription rates were offered, free distribution of the News over wide areas was accomplished, contests were run, delivery routes beyond the trading area of the Tri-City area were established, all in an effort to build circulation, and all of which was very costly, but very necessary and normal in the establishment of a new newspaper in an area occupied by an established paper.

[Cooperation Between Union and Newspaper —Separate Purposes]

The publishers of the News were likewise happy to take every advantage possible of the situation existing between Local 831 and the Tri-City Herald. The Union on the one hand was interested in exerting economic pressure against Scott Publishing Company by causing a loss of business and revenue in any and every way it could in order to force Scott Publishing Company to meet its demands for what it deemed a fair labor agreement, and Columbia Basin

Publishers, Inc., was interested in gaining all the business of Scott Publishing Company it could in order to establish its newspaper, and the two cooperated, not with the common objective of eliminating Scott Publishing Company from the field, but each with its own separate purpose.

[Reduction of Advertising Rates]

In the field of advertising Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., at the beginning of the daily publication of the Columbia Basin News, established a rate card which proved to be unrealistic, and rates actually paid by advertisers during the year following commencement of the daily publication were generally below the rate indicated on the rate card. Because of the News' low circulation in the beginning relative to the circulation of the Tri-City Herald, it could not expect to charge and receive the same rates that the Herald received with its wider circulation. Again in the field of advertising the publishers of the Columbia Basin News were only too happy to take any advantage they could of the efforts of Local 831 to induce advertisers not to do business with the Tri-City Herald.

[Alleged Conspiracy—Circumstantial Evidence]

It is these circumstances outlined above upon which plaintiff relies to establish a conspiracy on the part of Parish, Bryce and the Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., to drive Scott Publishing Company and the Tri-City Herald out of the newspaper business in the Tri-City area and to establish a monopoly for the Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc. There is no direct evidence of such a conspiracy and, of course, direct evidence is not needed. However, all of the evidence in the case up to this point, it seems to the Court, is at least as consistent with a reasonable good-faith attempt on the part of Parish to establish a competing newspaper in the Tri-City area as it is with the idea of a conspiracy to drive the Tri-City Herald out of business.

[Right to Enter Market Held by Monopolist]

Parish saw and was attracted to the Tri-City area by the same rosy picture of the future of the area that attracted Lee and Philip. He likewise saw Lee and Philip as inexperienced novices in the newspaper business, unfinanced and overexpanded. He considered himself an expert in the business and believed he had sufficient financial backing to establish a competing newspaper. The evidence shows that the establishment of a newspaper against a monopoly newspaper in a given area is an expensive proposition under any circumstances. Parish realized this and believed he could establish such a paper at a cost of $500,000.00. To hold that the fact of one entering a business under these circumstances is evidence of a conspiracy to violate the anti-trust laws is to thwart the very purpose of those laws and turn them into instruments for the protection of monopolies. Of course, it must have occurred to Parish that in the event he were successful in establishing his newspaper in the area, the result might be that the Scott Publishing Company would be forced out of business, but that is a normal, natural, everyday occurrence when inexperienced, unfinanced people are forced to meet experienced, adequately financed competition. Parish's statements to Lee and Philip, at the time he attempted to buy the Tri-City Herald, rather than indicating a purpose to violate the anti-trust laws and create a monopoly for himself were rather simply a prediction of what Parish believed would be the result of Lee and Philip attempting to compete with him in the newspaper business.

[Circumstances Consistent with Lawful Purpose]

Plaintiff also relies on the circumstances of the Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., contracting with the Local to pay higher wages at a time when it was losing money, the strike or lockout against the Tri-City Herald, Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., going daily at that time, again when it was losing money, and the cooperation between Local 831 and Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., as being evidence of the conspiracy charged against Parish, Bryce and Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., and of the Local joining in that conspiracy. While all of these circumstances would be consistent with plaintiff's theory of conspiracy if it were proved, they are likewise just as consistent with proper, legal, independent purposes and intentions on the part of Parish, Bryce and Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., on the one hand and Local 831 on the other.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

There is no evidence that Parish or Bryce had anything to do with fixing the demands which Local 831 presented to publishers in the Tri-City area. Indeed, the evidence is that none of the Scale Committee or Officers of Local 831 were acquainted with Parish or Bryce at the time the demands were formulated. The demand for $95.00 for a 37½ hour week was fixed by the entire Union membership, and it was based upon the wages and hours then prevailing in Seattle. There is uncontradicted testimony, which the Court accepts, that normally and customarily in negotiations between typographical locals and employers in smaller communities the scale prevailing in metropolitan areas is interjected and discussed and bargained for by the local unions in the smaller communities, and is in some instances achieved. So, there was nothing unreasonable in the demands of Local 831.

Nor was there anything unreasonable or sinister in Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., coming to terms with the Union. In the first place, the demand presented for $95.00 for a 37½ hour week was not met, but there was a compromise of $90.00 for 38¾ hours, so to that extent negotiations did take place. Perhaps, if Scott Publishing Company had chosen to join with the other employers in the area, including Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., in negotiations with the Union, as it was invited to do, the presentation of such a united front by the employers would have resulted in further reducing the demands of the Union. Secondly, in view of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., and Parish's determination to get a daily newspaper started in the area, and their acceptance of the fact that they were bound to spend some considerable money in the process in any event, they no doubt considered it prudent in a business sense to come to terms with the Union in view of the highly unionized character of the area as shown by the evidence, and also in view of Parish's experience that newspapers usually fared badly in disputes with Unions.

The evidence shows that Parish used the strike or lockout at the Tri-City Herald as his signal to go into the daily publication of the Columbia Basin News. Again while this would be consistent with the purpose on the part of Parish to drive the Tri-City Herald out of business and to establish a monopoly in violation of the anti-trust laws, it is equally consistent with the purpose of starting a newspaper with the bona fide intention of competing. Parish, Bryce and Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., were in the area for the avowed purpose of starting a daily newspaper in competition with the Tri-City Herald. Though they were still losing money in their bi-weekly publication, when they saw their competitor with a strike or lockout on his hands, it was the most natural thing in the world to choose that time to go daily, and it is also completely consistent with a bona fide attempt to establish a competing business enterprise.

As for the cooperation which was established between Local 831 and Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., Parish and Bryce, that too was a perfectly natural result of the circumstances which existed at the time. Local 831 and its members understandably were delighted to have a fair newspaper started to compete with what they considered to be the unfair newspaper. Not only did it furnish employment for Local 831 members, but it furnished also an additional lever to be used in the Union's attempt to pry an agreement from the Tri-City Herald. The publishers of Columbia Basin News likewise welcomed any assistance they could obtain from Local 831 in their attempt to build circulation and advertising and to establish a daily newspaper. There was indeed cooperation between the two, but each acting for its own legal independent purpose.

[Defendant's Financial Difficulties]

After commencement of publication of the daily Columbia Basin News in March, 1950, and despite the assistance of labor unions in the area in furtherance of the strike or lockout against the Tri-City Herald, the losses of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., continued and increased. To some extent the losses were those normally to be expected in an attempt to establish a daily newspaper against existing competition. Not only was Columbia Basin News in competition circulation-wise with the Tri-City Herald, but because it was a morning daily newspaper, it encountered competition from metropolitan morning daily newspapers which were circulated in substantial numbers in the area, and this competition from the metropolitan papers was in part responsible for Columbia Basin News' high circulation costs. It likewise appears from the record that the losses to some extent were the result of haphazard management. Parish, the experienced newspaper man, continued to reside in Seattle and continued his employment with The Craftsman Press, attempting to manage the Columbia Basin News from a distance. Later, in August of 1950, when an attorney for I.T.U. and Unitypo came to the area in connection with a loan, he reported that the minute book of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., was in proper form for the first few months, but had not thereafter been kept up, that Parish had no financial statement which he could submit; that no inventory of the physical properties had ever been made; that the books were in a most confused state; that it appeared that little or nothing had been entered since June of that year and that Parish had then in August put a new auditor in charge to try to bring some order out of the chaos existing.

Parish and his associates discovered that the Tri-City area was not the soft touch competition-wise that they had anticipated. Furthermore, the substantial financial backing which Parish had anticipated from his Seattle businessmen associates failed to materialize. The record shows that after their original investment, which was soon expended, that one John X. Johnson, a businessman of Seattle, was the only associate who contributed financial support to the Columbia Basin News, and his contributions were relatively small, two or three thousand dollars at a time in order to meet payrolls and other expenses, and even Johnson, prior to his death in July, 1950, was becoming reluctant to invest any more money in the venture.

[Offer to Sell Out]

By May of 1950, Parish inserted an ad in "Editor & Publisher", a trade journal, in an attempt to sell the Columbia Basin News, but without success. Later that summer, Bryce contacted Glenn Lee of Scott Publishing Company in an endeavor to interest him in purchasing the Columbia Basin News, again without success, although Lee went so far as to make an appraisal of the Columbia Basin News' plant. There was a subsequent meeting between Lee and Bryce, arranged by Dudley Brown, a Seattle newspaper man, at which Bryce attempted to sell the Columbia Basin News to Lee, but that attempt likewise resulted in failure when Bryce insisted that a condition of the sale would be that the contract between Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., and the Local Union be honored.

These attempts to sell out are again not consistent with a purpose or intent to drive the Tri-City Herald out of business for the purpose of establishing a monopoly in the area.

[Union's Financial Aid]

The defendant International Typographical Union is a labor organization with its principal office at Indianapolis, Indiana, and having approximately 110,000 members in some 800 local unions throughout the United States and Canada, and as such is engaged in representing its members through local unions in their relationship with their employers. As part of its activities, it aids members engaged in a strike or lockout by granting funds to such members by way of special assistance and strike benefits. Funds are obtained through dues and assessments levied by the membership upon themselves.

The governing body of the I.T.U. is the Executive Council, consisting of the President, the first Vice-President, the second Vice-President, the third Vice-President and the Secretary-Treasurer. Such officers are elected by the membership every two years.

The defendants Woodruff Randolph, Don Hurd, Harold H. Clark, Charles M. Lyon and Joe Bailey were all members of the Executive Council during at least a part of the time here involved. The defendant Walter D. Marvick is a special representative of the President of the International Typographical Union in the State of Washington.

Faced frequently with the situation where its members became involved in a strike or lockout with the publisher of the only newspaper in a given area, the I.T.U. adopted the policy of either establishing a paper of its own to compete with the monopoly publisher, or rendering financial assistance where needed to a publisher whom the I.T.U. considered friendly to establish or maintain a competing newspaper. In furtherance of this policy in 1946, the I.T.U. formed the defendant Unitypo, Inc., as a corporation under the laws of the State of New York. The members of the Board of Directors of Unitypo, Inc., are the members of the Executive Council of the I.T.U., except for one, because of the requirements of the New York law that at least one director of a New York corporation be a resident of New York. The stock of Unitypo, Inc., is held by the members of the Executive Council of the I.T.U. in trust for the membership, again with the exception of the qualifying share held by the New York director. Funds for the operation of Unitypo, Inc., are supplied by I.T.U. from its so-called defense fund which in turn is raised by assessments on the members of I.T.U.

Since its inception, Unitypo, Inc., has started newspapers in various cities in the United States and Canada, where members of the I.T.U. became engaged in a strike or lockout with a monopoly publisher. It has likewise rendered encouragement and financial assistance to publishers considered friendly and who were competing with the publisher with whom I.T.U. was engaged in a strike or lockout. Where Unitypo, Inc., establishes a newspaper, it has been its policy to sell it to an independent publisher whenever the opportunity presents itself, and not to continue in the publishing business.

The defendant Howard Parish, from his experience in the newspaper business, was aware of the I.T.U. policy and Unitypo, Inc., and when the losses of the Columbia Basin News continued to mount and as financing became increasingly difficult to obtain, Parish obtained authority from the stockholders of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., to seek a loan of $25,000.00 from Unitypo, Inc. The resolution authorizing Parish on behalf of the Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., to apply to Unitypo, Inc., for a loan was passed on June 15, 1950, but nothing was done to carry out the resolution until after the death of John X. Johnson in July, 1950.

In August, 1950, Parish called Unitypo, Inc., at Indianapolis, Indiana, by telephone requesting financial assistance. Upon receipt of the request one Clarence R. Martin, an attorney for Unitypo, Inc., and I. T. U., was sent into the State of Washington to investigate the situation. When Martin arrived in Seattle in August the financial situation of Columbia Basin News was critical. Martin arranged for an immediate $10,000.00 loan in the following manner through the Seattle First National Bank: the bank agreed to lend the $10,000.00 upon receipt of a note and chattel mortgage upon the Columbia Basin News' plant, which was immediately endorsed by the bank and assigned to Unitypo, Inc., which then reimbursed the bank. The assignment to Unitypo, Inc., of the note and chattel mortgage was not recorded. The reason for this round about way of getting the money from Unitypo, Inc., to Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., and the secrecy which surrounded all transactions between Unitypo, Inc., and Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., was the prior experience of Unitypo, Inc., and I.T.U. around the country of having the newspaper they sought to aid encounter advertisers' resistance when it became known that the Union was supporting the paper.

The losses continued and the $10,000.00 was soon expended and it became necessary to seek another loan from Unitypo, Inc. At that time Unitypo, Inc., sent a man out to the Tri-City area to appraise the plant and equipment of Columbia Basin News and Unitypo, Inc., agreed to purchase the plant and equipment for $25,000.00, which included the prior $10,000.00 loan, and lease it back to Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., with an option to repurchase. This transaction was consummated on October 2, 1950. By November, 1950, Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., was again in need of money and sought an additional loan from Unitypo, Inc. On November 30, 1950, Unitypo, Inc., made an additional $25,000.00 loan, and took as security a pledge of all of the stock of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc. Losses continued and Unitypo, Inc., again in February, 1951, made an additional loan secured by the stock of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., and thereafter continued to make unsecured loans to Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., and by 1954, the indebtedness of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., to Unitypo, Inc., had reached almost one-half million dollars. At that time Unitypo, Inc., made demand for payment of the loans made in 1950 and 1951, for which the stock of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., had been pledged as security, or in the alternative that the stock be issued to Unitypo, Inc. This latter was done, but Unitypo, Inc., almost immediately transferred the stock to Parish and Bryce, who in turn redeposited the stock with Unitypo, Inc., endorsed in blank as security for the then outstanding loans. The stock still stands in the name of Parish and Bryce on the records of the corporation.

Still the losses continued and by December 31, 1958, the indebtedness of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., to Unitypo, Inc., had reached $1,178,000.00 In addition, in 1952, Unitypo, Inc., caused to be organized the defendant Howard Parish and Associates, Inc., as a Washington corporation and provided the financing to this corporation to enable it to purchase and remodel a building which was thereafter leased and used as a plant and office by Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc. All of the stock of Howard Parish and Associates, Inc., except for qualifying shares, was held by Unitypo, Inc.

[Union's Management of Newspaper]

The overall management of Columbia Basin News was conducted through the years by Howard Parish until December 31, 1958. At that time the I. T. U. replaced Parish as manager of Columbia Basin News with Edward Byrne, who had formerly been publisher of I. T. U. and Unitypo, Inc., papers at Colorado Springs, Colorado, and Jamestown, New York. At the same time James Bryce and Charles Parker, who had been one of the original incorporators, resigned as directors and officers of Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., and were succeeded by Byrne as Vice-President and director, and Frank Cummings as Secretary-Treasurer and director. Frank Cummings is also Secretary-Treasurer of Local 831 of I. T. U. Parish still remains as a director, but has nothing to do with the management and Columbia Basin News has in effect become an I. T. U. operated paper. Funds for the operation of the News are supplied by the I. T. U. in the form of special strike assistance to Local 831, which in turn delivers the funds to the Columbia Basin News. Since I. T. U. has taken over the management of the Columbia Basin News the amount of the losses has decreased, but nevertheless the newspaper continues to operate at a loss. From January 1, 1959, up to the date of trial, the deficits in the operation of the Columbia Basin News, which have been made up by the I. T. U. through special assistance to Local 831, total $40,000.00.

In the years after Unitypo, Inc., commenced financing Columbia Basin News, Parish and Bryce wrote many letters and reports to the Board of Directors of Unitypo, Inc., and the Executive Council of the I. T. U., reporting on the progress of Columbia Basin News and containing references to "driving Lee and the Scott Publishing Company to the wall", "forcing a merger", "beating Lee", and so on. Plaintiff regards these letters and reports as showing an intent and purpose on the part of Parish and Bryce to drive the Tri-City Herald out of business in order to create a monopoly for the Columbia Basin News, and as a communication of such intent to the I. T. U. and Unitypo, Inc. While again such communications would be consistent with such a purpose, if the purpose was otherwise shown to exist, they appear to the Court to be merely communications on the part of Parish and Bryce in the nature of a sales pitch to their financial angel in an effort to keep the money coming, and were no doubt received in that spirit by the I. T. U. and Unitypo, Inc. Because of the policy of I. T. U. above referred to, and the purposes for which Unitypo, Inc., was created, it is unlikely that such sales pitches were required in order to retain the financial support of the Columbia Basin News by Unitypo, Inc. The record shows that in other areas throughout the United States and Canada I. T. U. and Unitypo, Inc., have expended considerable sums for the purpose of keeping a competing newspaper in operation.

[Lack of Unlawful Intent—"Slow" Financial Aid]

A further indication of the lack of the intent and purpose on the part of Parish, Bryce and Columbia Basin News on the one hand and Unitypo, Inc., and I. T. U. on the other to destroy the Tri-City Herald so as to create a monopoly for Columbia Basin News, lies in the method in which the money was expended. While the $1,178,000.00 that has been spent by Unitypo, Inc., in support of the Columbia Basin News up to January 1, 1959, is a considerable amount of money, it was expended over a period of almost nine years in amounts sufficient to meet the operating deficits as they occurred. It would seem that if there was a purpose and intent to drive the Tri-City Herald out of the business and such a large amount of money was available for that purpose, success would be much more likely to be achieved by spending the money in a relatively short time to cut subscription rates and circulation rates to such a point that the Tri-City Herald would have been unable to compete.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[No Offer to Buy Established Paper]

Another indication of the absence of such intent, particularly on the part of I. T. U. and Unitypo, Inc., lies in the fact that when Clarence Martin, the I. T. U. attorney, initially came to the area to investigate the situation, he reported to the I. T. U. and Unitypo, Inc., "Parish does not believe he has Lee worn down enough yet to buy him out at a reasonable price, but is encouraged by Lee's having asked Bryce for a conference. (Lee probably wants to buy out the Columbia Basin News, but apparently neither Lee nor Parish can get money enough together to buy out the other)." Despite the tremendous financial resources of I. T. U. and Unitypo, Inc., no offer was ever made to furnish Parish or Columbia Basin News or anyone else with sufficient funds to buy out the Tri-City Herald, nor was a request for such ever made by Parish, Bryce or Columbia Basin News. Had the purpose and intent to create a monopoly in the area existed, it could have been realized by the purchase of the Tri-City Herald at a considerably lower figure than has been expended to date.

Likewise significant as to the intent and purpose of Unitypo, Inc., and I. T. U. was the question which was put to the Board of Directors and Executive Council each time they were requested to vote upon another loan for Columbia Basin News, which was in effect "shall we advance additional money to continue publication of the Columbia Basin News?"

[Offer to Resume Wage Negotiations]

The record also shows that periodically through the years, notices were sent by the Local Union of the I. T. U. to the Tri-City Herald offering to resume negotiations. Again such offers are not consistent with an intent to drive the Tri-City Herald out of business, because at any time Scott Publishing Company could have entered a contract with the Local Union and any damage being done to it competitive-wise, by virtue of the strike or lockout, would have come to an end.

[No Unlawful Intent]

In view of all these circumstances, the Court finds that the intent and purpose of Unitypo, Inc., and I. T. U., in first assisting financially the Columbia Basin News and later taking over its publication, was simply to keep in operation in the Tri-City area a newspaper to compete with the Tri-City Herald, and was not to drive the Tri-City Herald out of business for the purpose of establishing a monopoly. The Court further finds that the purpose and intent of Parish, Bryce and Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., at all times was to establish a newspaper in competition with the Tri-City Herald, and that accepting whatever financial assistance Unitypo, Inc., or I. T. U. were willing to furnish is not inconsistent with that intent and purpose.

[Advertising Rates Not Unreasonably Low]

When Columbia Basin News commenced daily publication after the strike or lockout against Tri-City Herald began, a very bitter competitive struggle developed between the News and the Herald. As has been mentioned, the management of Columbia Basin News was very inept to say the least, whether because Parish, with all his experience in the newspaper business regarded Lee and Philip, the guiding lights of Scott Publishing Company, as unworthy competitors or otherwise, does not appear. In any event advertising rates were set and a rate card published which proved to be totally unrealistic considered in the light of the circulation of the Columbia Basin News. As a result it was found necessary to sell advertising at rates that were generally below those on the published rate card. Such rates, while lower than those advertised on the rate card, were not unreasonably low as compared to the advertising rates of Tri-City Herald when the circulation of the two newspapers was considered. Despite the fact that the rates initially established proved to be unrealistic, it was not until March 1, 1951, that the management of Columbia Basin News revised its rate cards and established rates more in accordance with reality. Thereafter the rates charged advertisers did not substantially deviate from the rates published on the rate card. Newspaper advertising rates are based on the amount of advertising done by the advertiser, the more advertising inches used, the lower is the rate per inch. After the establishment of the March 1, 1951, rate card, the only sales of advertising to advertisers at a rate lower than the minimum rate shown on the rate card were to advertisers using more space than the maximum shown on the rate card and the reduction was relatively the same based on inches used as shown on the rate card.

["Combination" Advertising]

In January, 1952, Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., commenced the publication of a weekly free distribution newspaper known as the Columbia Basin News' Shopper. The Shopper contained little else other than advertising, but did have some editorial content. By the Shopper, Columbia Basin News attempted to provide blanket coverage of the area, that is they endeavored to see that every home in the Tri-Cities received either the News or the Shopper, and combination advertising in the News and the Shopper was sold upon that basis. The publication of such a free distribution advertising edition is not uncommon in the newspaper business.

C. C. Anderson Company, one of a national chain of stores, was the largest single advertiser in the area. Because of personal differences between the then manager of the C. C. Anderson store and Glenn Lee, the publisher of the Tri-City Herald, so long as there was another daily newspaper in the area, the manager of C. C. Anderson would not have placed any advertising in the Tri-City Herald and would have advertised in any event in the Columbia Basin News exclusively. Because the C. C. Anderson advertising was placed generally on Fridays and resulted in an unbalanced daily page production for the Columbia Basin News, Columbia Basin Publishers, Inc., agreed to give C. C. Anderson five years of free advertising in the Shopper in consideration of Anderson's advertising in the Columbia Basin News being spread over five days, and in consideration of the fact that C. C. Anderson was the largest single advertiser in the Columbia Basin News.

In any event the Court finds that none of the rates charged any advertiser by Columbia Basin News were unreasonably low as compared to the rates charged advertisers by the Tri-City Herald when considered in the light of the relative circulation of the two newspapers.

["Cooperative" Advertising—"Double" Bills]

Another practice engaged in by Columbia Basin News, with respect to national cooperative advertising is complained of by plaintiff. In cooperative advertising, a national advertiser, either a manufacturer or distributor of a given product, will cooperate with a local retailer in local advertising. An advertisement will be inserted in a local newspaper advertising the product and the manufacturer or distributor will reimburse the local retailer who inserts the ad for a portion of the cost of the ad. In cooperative advertising Columbia Basin News would issue double bills, one bill to the local retail merchant at his contract rate, based on the number of inches of advertising that he used in the Columbia Basin News, and this was the bill which the local retail advertiser would actually pay to Columbia Basin News. Columbia Basin News issued a second bill to the local merchant to be submitted to the national advertiser for reimbursement at the open rate which in most instances would be higher than the local merchant's contract rate. In this way the local merchant would receive reimbursement for a higher proportion of the bill for the given ad than the national advertiser had agreed to pay.

[Practices Not Unlawful—Competitive Purpose]

However, as has been pointed out, there was a bitter competitive struggle between the Columbia Basin News and the Tri-City Herald. Almost all of the devices, including the cooperative advertising practice, the publication of the Columbia Basin News' Shopper, the giving of more favorable rates to larger advertisers, and the free distribution of newspapers, used by Columbia Basin News in this competitive struggle and of which plaintiff complains, were at one time or another throughout the period here in question used by the Tri-City Herald in this competitive struggle. In addition, Tri-City Herald used devices such as rebates to advertisers and payments of commissions to local advertising agencies on local display advertising to attract advertising, which were not used by Columbia Basin News. Plaintiff concedes that it engaged in some of the same practices as Columbia Basin News, but contends it has not done so to the same extent. The record bears this out, but it must be remembered that Columbia Basin News was in the position of the challenger seeking to become established in the field as against Tri-City Herald, already thoroughly established. Mention is made of the practices engaged in by the Tri-City Herald in the struggle, not because these practices would constitute a defense to Columbia Basin News' practices if they constituted a violation of the law, but merely to point up the fact that there was a bitter competitive struggle going on and that whatever was done by either party in that struggle was done for the purpose of competing and not pursuant to a conspiracy to monopolize.

[Plaintiff's Losses—Causation]

Immediately after the strike or lockout commenced at Tri-City Herald and Columbia Basin News went daily, the Tri-City Herald lost both advertising and circulation revenue. When the strike started, Tri-City Herald's costs increased by virtue of the high wages and overtime paid to the non-union labor imported to keep the paper in publication when the regular employees ceased their employment. However, as employees were trained and as the equipment which they had brought in was utilized, their costs returned to normal and below what they had been before the strike commenced. By September, 1950, cuts, which personnel who had remained on the job had voluntarily taken because of the financial problem created by the strike or lockout, were restored, and raises were granted officers the following year and the financial condition of the Tri-City Herald and Scott Publishing Company has continued to improve. Their growth has not been as rapid as it otherwise would have been, but any slowing of its growth has been due to the strike or lockout and also due to the competition afforded by Columbia Basin News and not to any conspiracy on the part of these defendants or any of them to drive the Tri-City Herald and Scott Publishing Company out of business and monopolize the newspaper publishing business in the Tri-City area. At any rate, the Tri-City Herald at all times material has been and continues to be the dominant newspaper in the Tri-City area.

[No Exclusive Dealing Agreements]

No advertising was sold in the Columbia Basin News or the Columbia Basin News Shopper, and no rates for advertising in either or both were fixed, upon any understanding or agreement that the advertiser would not advertise in the Tri-City Herald or any other advertising media in the area.

[No Intent to Monopolize]

The advertising and subscription rates of Columbia Basin News were not established at a level where they would tend to operate as a means or method to achieve a monopoly by excluding the Tri-City Herald from the newspaper publishing business in the Tri-City area and there was no intent on the part of the defendants, either individually or in combination to so exclude the Tri-City Herald from the newspaper publishing business in the Tri-City area.

[Sherman Act]

Section 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. 1) provides:

> "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, is declared to be illegal; * * *."

Section 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. 2) provides:

> "Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. * * *."

[Intent]

Before there is a violation of these sections, there must be a contract, combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade, or a monopoly, or an attempt to monopolize or a combination or conspiracy to monopolize. If an actual restraint of trade results from a combination, or if monopoly is achieved by an individual acting alone or in combination with others, the intent is immaterial, or may be inferred. U. S. v. Patten, 226 U. S. 525; U. S. v. Masonite Corp. [1940-1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,209], 316 U. S. 265, 275; U. S. v. Griffith [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,246], 334 U. S. 100; U. S. v. Columbia Steel Co., et al. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,260], 334 U. S. 495. However, where no restraint of trade or monopoly results from the acts and conduct complained of, then the acts or conduct complained of must be accompanied by a specific intent to restrain trade or monopolize before there is a violation of Sections 1 or 2. Swift &

Co. v. U. S., 196 U. S. 375, 396. U. S. v. Columbia Steel Co., et al., supra, at 525.

In this case, the evidence does not show either an actual restraint of trade or monopoly, or the specific intent on the part of any of the defendants, either individually or in combination, to restrain trade or create a monopoly in the daily newspaper business in the Tri-City area.

[Robinson-Patman and Clayton Acts]

Plaintiff also alleges violations of Section 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U. S. C. 13(a)), and Section 3 of the Clayton Act (15 U. S. C. 14), by defendants in the sale of advertising.

[No Price Discrimination or Exclusive Dealing]

Section 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act prohibits discrimination in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them.

Section 3 of the Clayton Act makes it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, for use, consumption or resale within the United States or any place within the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares or merchandise, machinery, supplies or other commodities of a competitor of the lessor or seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

[Effect on Competition]

While there is considerable doubt in the Court's mind whether newspaper advertising is a "commodity" within the meaning of the Robinson-Patman Act, or "goods, wares, merchandise or other commodity" within the meaning of the Clayton Act, decision of that question is unnecessary in this case in view of the Court's finding that there were no price discriminations by Columbia Basin News in the sale of advertising which had the effect of lessening competition or tended to create a monopoly or injure, destroy or prevent competition; and that there were no sales of advertising, or prices fixed for advertising, upon any agreement or understanding that the purchaser would not advertise in the Tri-City Herald.

[Judgment for Defendants]

It is the conclusion of the Court that plaintiff shall recover nothing in this action and that judgment shall be entered in favor of defendants for their costs. This opinion constitutes the Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law in this case, and counsel for defendants are directed to prepare, serve on counsel for plaintiff, and lodge with the Clerk a form of judgment in accordance with this opinion, within 15 days from date of receipt of a copy of this opinion, and counsel for plaintiff is granted 15 days after service upon it of such form of judgment within which to lodge with the Clerk in writing any objections which it may have to the form of such judgment.

[¶ 69,590] In the Matter of Grand Jury Proceedings: Motion to Quash Subpoena Duces Tecum Served upon Johnson & Johnson.

In the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. M. 11-188. Filed December 22, 1959.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Grand Jury Proceedings—Production of Records Under Subpoena Duces Tecum—Reasonableness of Government's Demands—Requiring Multiple Searches of Company's Files.—The Government, having caused the issuance of three prior subpoenas duces tecum, each of which necessitated a complete search of a company's files, is not entitled to a fourth subpoena that would require another such search of those files. Such multiplicity of demands would be justified if the material furnished in response to one demand gave a "lead" to other material which the Government could not have anticipated. Here, however, the new demand was based upon information received from a source independent of the company. It would be intolerable for the Government to issue a new subpoena every time its investigators discovered a complaint with respect to some newly discovered practice. Thus, the present subpoena was modified so as to eliminate the type of demand that asks for "all . . . correspondence . . . and all other writings of any kind . . . relative to . . .," but did not quash the demand for specifically described basic documents. Where such documents are sought, the element of burdensomeness of search is absent.

Memorandum

[Reasonableness of Subpoena]

Dimock, District Judge [In full text]: This is a motion by a corporation known as Johnson & Johnson, hereinafter called the company, for an order quashing and vacating a Grand Jury subpoena duces tecum on the ground that it is unreasonable, unduly burdensome and oppressive and constitutes an abuse of the process of the courts and is an illegal search and seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and a violation of Rule 17(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The subpoena in question is the fourth subpoena duces tecum served on the company since February 1958. The original subpoena was most exhaustive. It had eleven major subdivisions. As an example, subdivision 7 is quoted below:

> "VII. All correspondence, telegrams, memoranda, bulletins, policy letters, salesmen's reports, records of telephone conversations and conferences, inter-office communications, minutes of meetings of the Board of Directors or of any committee, and all other writings of any kind, written or received from January 1, 1950 to the date of service of this subpoena, in the possession or control of your company, its officers, directors, agents or representatives, relating to first-aid or baby toiletry articles and referring or relating to:
> (a) the discontinuance of sales by your company to any particular customer, or the contemplation of such a refusal;
> (b) the withholding or the contemplation of the withholding of a promotional discount or allowance by your company to particular customers;
> (c) the discontinuance or the contemplation of the discontinuance of a promotional allowance by your company to particular customers;
> (d) the lack of promotional activity of any of your products by particular customers of your company;
> (e) the purchase, or carrying or displaying of a competitive line or product by particular customers of your company;
> (f) the failure of particular customers to comply with any requirements of your company that would entitle such customers to a promotional discount or allowance;
> (g) the refusal or failure of particular customers or prospective customers to enter into a written contract or agreement with your company relative to the sale or distribution of first-aid and/or baby toiletry products, including any such contract or agreement relating to promotional discounts or allowances;
> (h) oral agreements between your company and particular customers relating to discounts and promotional allowances granted by your company.
> (i) Any requirement or policy of your company that its customers carry or purchase a minimum variety of your products, or any such requirement or policy relating to promotional discounts or allowances."

[Required Search]

The first subpoena duces tecum was followed by another with five subdivisions, again calling for all correspondence, et cetera on various subjects. The third subpoena had five subdivisions and again called for all correspondence on various subjects. Each of these subpoenas necessitated a search of the files of four regional sales offices, nineteen divisional sales offices and thirty-eight managerial and executive offices, together with numerous files of the company's law department. Each search involved the examination of the contents of approximately 620 file drawers and in excess of 2,400,000 pieces of paper.

["Piecemeal" Demands—Justification]

The company's principal complaint is that the piecemeal character of the demands upon it has rendered compliance with the subpoenas unduly burdensome. Unquestionably, unless this multiplicity of demands is justified by the fact that the material furnished in response to one demand gave a lead to other classes of material which the Government could not have anticipated, the case presents a picture of pure harassment. I shall proceed to consider whether such justification exists.

The general subject matter of the inquiry appeared to be a line of commerce concerned with "first-aid articles and baby toiletries". The Government makes no attempt to submit such justification with respect to this fourth subpoena except in the case of one its demands, that contained in paragraph 4. That paragraph reads as follows:

> "4. All contracts, agreements, correspondence, memoranda, minutes of meetings, and all other writings of any kind, written or received from January 1, 1950 to the date of service of this subpoena, in the possession or control of your company, its officers, directors, agents, or representatives, relative to the supplying of permanent display racks by your company, directly or indirectly, to retailers for their use in displaying first aid and baby toiletry articles, including those documents, relating or referring to any conditions, requirements, or suggested uses attendant to such permanent display racks."

In justification of this new demand the Government submits an affidavit stating that, from a source independent of the company, the Government learned "subsequent to the issuance of other subpoenas" that the company furnishes permanent display racks to some retailers and that it does so allegedly on certain restrictive conditions relative to the use of such racks. Under the circumstances, the explanation is insufficient. When it comes to the service of the fourth subpoena duces tecum, it is incumbent upon the Government to explain why it was necessary to cause the three earlier complete searches of the company's files before the information was received from a source independent of the company which indicated the desirability of a further complete search. The company is obviously the target or one of the targets of the investigation and, since the Government was not entitled to a complete discovery of the company's files for the purpose of determining whether there has been a violation of law, see Judge McGohey's opinion in In the Matter of the Grand Jury Investigation (General Motors Corporation) [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,409], M-11-188, filed July 17, 1959, the investigation must have been based on complaints. It would be intolerable for the Government to issue a new subpoena duces tecum every time its investigators discovered a complaint with respect to some newly considered practice.

The real thrust of the Government's argument is not, however, justification for the requirement of a fourth search of all of the company's files. The Government places its principal reliance upon the claim that the second and third subpoenas did not and the fourth subpoena does not require a complete search of the company's files. With respect to this claim the Government can put forward nothing but inferences. These are met by affidavit that the searches were required with respect to the second and third subpoenas and will be required if the fourth subpoena remains in force. The Government's inferences are based upon its assumptions of what the company's filing system is. The company's statements are statements of fact and they are uncontradicted except insofar as the Government's inferences and assumptions do so.

[Subpoena Modified]

I am not disposed, however, to quash the entire subpoena. What has necessitated these three searches of these vast files is the type of demand that asks for "all * * * correspondence * * * and all other writings of any kind * * * relative to * * *". Where specifically described basic documents are wanted the element of burdensomeness of search is absent. While it is true that in many cases it would seem that the Government might have asked for some of these papers in one of the Grand Jury's earlier demands, that is not sufficient reason for excusing the company from an easily complied with requirement.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

Thus I require the company to comply with so much of paragraph 1 of the subpoena as seeks all patent licensing agreements, agreements assigning rights based on patents or patent applications and all other agreements relating to patents or patent applications, to which the company was a party, and which relate to first-aid or baby toiletry articles, including any of the elements thereof.

The company need not, however, produce any writings of a date more than ten years prior to the service of the subpoena except those of an executory character which are still in force. See Application of Linen Supply Cos., D. C. S. D. N. Y. [1953 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,621], 15 F. R. D. 115.

Under paragraph 2 the company must produce all minutes of meetings held within ten years prior to the date of the service of the subpoena relating to the acquisition, or the attempted acquisition, by the company of the stocks or assets of any other company engaged in the manufacture, distribution, or selling of first-aid or baby toiletry articles.

In response to paragraph 3, the company must supply all minutes of meetings of the Board of Directors, executive boards, or any other board or committee of the company, and all surveys where the meeting was held or the survey written or received from January 1, 1950 to the date of the service of the subpoena, relating or referring to the importance of "facings" and "rack space" as factors in sales of merchandise.

Paragraph 4 of the subpoena has already been referred to. It opens a new subject, the supplying of permanent display racks to retailers for displaying first-aid and baby toiletry articles. I am not disposed to foreclose the subject simply because the demand is belated but I do not know how to give the Government anything under it without causing another complete search of the files. A requirement of the production of all contracts relating to this subject might well necessitate the production of thousands of writings gathered from the nineteen divisional sales offices. The company will merely be required, therefore, to produce minutes of meetings of the Board of Directors, executive boards, or any other board or committee of the company, relative to the supplying of such permanent display racks by the company directly or indirectly to retailers for their use in displaying first-aid and baby toiletry articles, including any conditions, requirements, or suggested uses attendant on such permanent display racks.

Paragraph 5 of the subpoena reads as follows:

> "5. Such documents in the possession or control of your company, its officers, directors, agents, or representatives, or, in lieu thereof, a certified statement prepared therefrom, as will show the number and nature of contents conducted by your company for salesmen employed by distributors or retailers of first aid and baby toiletry articles from January 1, 1956 to the date of service of this subpoena."

There has been no specific objection by the company to this paragraph and I therefore direct that it be complied with as it stands.

The subpoena duces tecum is modified in accordance with the foregoing.

In the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. No. 16,095. Dated December 28, 1959; amended January 25, 1960.

Appeal from the United States District Court, Southern District of California, Central Division. HARRY C. WESTOVER, District Judge.

Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts

Private Enforcement and Procedure—Suit for Civil Damages—Trial of Cause—Separate Issues—Subject Matter Jurisdiction—Right to Jury Trial.—In a treble damage action, where the plaintiffs had demanded a jury trial and the plaintiffs and defendants had agreed that the issue of "subject matter jurisdiction" should be tried separately and ahead of other issues in the case, the trial court should not have assumed the jury function and decided that the plaintiffs failed to establish that the defendants' business was in or directly affected interstate trade or commerce. The trial court took from the jury the determination of the basic issue in the case; its assumption of the jury's prerogative was erroneous. While a trial court has the right to order separate trials for separate issues in the same case, the switching of a separated issue in a jury case from the jury to the court is not sanctioned. A safe practice would be never to separate the subject matter jurisdiction issue for separate trial in cases where the factual merits of the case must be considered in deciding the separated issue.

See Private Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 9014.

Combinations and Conspiracies—Interstate Trade or Commerce—Local Restraints—Effect on Interstate Commerce.—The dismissal of a retail grocers' treble damage action on the ground that they failed to establish that the defendants' business of producing and marketing bread was in or directly affected interstate trade or commerce was reversed. Any restraint which is unreasonable per se, such as the price fixing and the special discounts allegedly involved in the instant case, is actionable if it interferes with the natural flow of an appreciable amount of interstate commerce. "That wholly local business restraints can produce effects condemned by the Sherman Act is no longer open to question." A stipulation showed that large and continuous shipments of flour and bread-making machinery from out of state were received by the defendants, and that some flour used by the defendants was purchased directly and some was contracted for out of state.

[Nature of Action]

STEPHENS, Circuit Judge [In full text]: The plaintiffs in this case are several, but by no means all of the Los Angeles retail grocers who purchase bread for resale from defendants who make it. The plaintiffs are suing the defendants for treble damages alleging that defendants have conspired to violate and have violated United States anti-trust statutes, by acts tending to create a monopoly through the fixing of sales prices, giving special discounts and other discriminations against them. (The Sherman Act, §§ 1 and 2, Title 15, U. S. C. A.; the Robinson-Patman Act, § 13, Title 15, U. S. C. A; The Clayton Act, § 2, Title 13(a).)

[Subject Matter Jurisdiction]

A session of court with counsel was held preliminarily in which it was agreed that time could be saved by trying the issue of "subject matter jurisdiction" separately[1] and ahead of other issues in the case, and it was agreed that counsel would attempt the

[1] The court clearly possessed jurisdiction of the case which it recognized early in the proceedings, when it denied the defendants' first motion to dismiss the complaint. Jurisdiction depends upon facts pleaded, not facts proved. See Montana-Dakota Utilities Co. v. Northwestern Public Service Co., 341 U. S. 246, 249; Brewer v. Hoxie School District # 46, 8th Cir., 238 F. 2d 91, 95-98; Phelan v. Taitano, 9th Cir., 233 F. 2d 117; and West Coast Exploration Co. v. McKay, DC Cir., 213 F. 2d 582.

The theory that the existence of an effect on interstate commerce is a jurisdictional fact, enabling the judge to determine the issue for himself—see e. g., Gilbert v. David, 235 U. S. 56; and Stauffer v. Exley, 9th Cir., 184 F. 2d 962,—will in practice deprive plaintiffs of their right to a jury trial. See Beacon Theatres v. Westover, 359 U. S. 500; Bertha Bldg. Corp. v. National Theatres Corp., 2nd Cir. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,860], 248 F. 2d 833, cert. den. 356 U. S. 936; and Ring v. Spina, 2nd Cir. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,224], 166 F. 2d 546. Anything which may appear in Taylor v. Hubble, 9th Cir., 188 F. 2d 106, should be read in the light of Byrd v. Blue Ridge Elec. Co-op, 356 U. S. 525.

formulation of a written stipulation of fact relevant to this special issue. Such a stipulation was agreed to and the court accepted it. See reference to the stipulation regarding the alleged conspiracy in Footnote.[3] The defendants offered nothing in addition. The plaintiffs objected to going forward upon the ground that a jury should be empaneled. They had demanded a jury, the defendants had not. The court then ruled that, as a matter of law, the plaintiffs' case was not within the reach of the anti-trust statutes; or to put it in another way, defendants' businesses were neither in nor did they affect interstate commerce. Accordingly, after making full Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, the court "Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed:

1. That plaintiffs' complaint herein is dismissed for lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter thereof.

2. That defendants' counterclaim herein, and each of them, are dismissed for lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter thereof." Defendants were awarded costs.

[Issues]

The plaintiffs are appealing and contend that the judgment must be reversed because they had a clear constitutional right to a trial to court and jury on every issue of the case. Plaintiffs also claim the judgment must be reversed for another reason—that even if they are wrong and the court alone, without the aid of a jury, had a right to rule on the subject matter jurisdiction issue as a matter of law, the court's conclusions were not supported by either fact or law in holding that subject matter jurisdiction had not been shown.

[Right to Jury Trial]

In the consideration of these points, we must first note that the trial court in proper circumstances, has the right to order separate trials for separate issues in the same case, F. R. C. P. 42(b). We also assume that when this is done in a non-jury case or one in which a jury has been waived, the judge has the power and the duty to receive all proper evidence offered and determine the questions of law and fact which are involved in the separated issue or issues. The rule however, as it seems to us does not sanction the switching of the separated issue in a jury case from the jury to the judge. It may be that this can be done in cases where the very stating of the separated issue shows it to be so frivolous that but the one view is entertainable by reasonable minded persons. The issue in this case is not of that quality. It seems to us that a safe practice would be never to separate the subject matter jurisdiction issue for separate trial in cases where the factual merits of the case must be considered in deciding the separated issue.

Separate trials for the determination of diversity and venue may be resorted to very properly. See Gilbert v. David, 235 U. S. 56. Also see Bertha Bldg. Corp. v. National Theatres Corp., 2nd Cir. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,860]; 248 F. 2d 833, cert. den. 356 U. S. 936, in which the statute of limitations is involved.

Mr. Justice Black in Beacon Theatres v. Westover, 359 U. S. 500 at 501 says, "Maintenance of the jury as a fact-finding body is of such importance and occupies so firm a place in our history and jurisprudence that any seeming curtailment of the right to a jury trial should be scrutinized with the utmost care," quoting from Dimick v. Schiedt, 293 U. S. 474-486 See Byrd v. Blue Ridge Co-op, 356 U. S. 525. The trial judge in our case was of the opinion and found from the written stipulation and concession by plaintiffs that defendants were not in interstate commerce and that (we quote from his opinion) "In the case at bar, after a full hearing on the question of the interstate commerce phase of the case, we are of the opinion that plaintiffs have failed to establish defendants' business of producing and marketing bread is in or directly affects trade and commerce among the several states as alleged in the complaint." Thus the court took from the jury the determination of the basic issue in the case. We hold that the judgment must be reversed because of the court's assumption of the jury's prerogative.

[3] The stipulation shows that large and continuous shipments of flour and some bread-making machinery from out of state are received by defendants, which flour becomes the basic ingredient of the bread manufactured by defendants. Some of such flour is purchased directly by the defendants and some is contracted for out of state through other wholesale dealers in flour. The damages prayed for are bottomed upon an alleged conspiracy by and between defendants to create a phase of monopoly in the bread market of the Los Angeles area.

[Interstate Commerce]

And whether we are right or wrong in this, we hold that the judgment must be reversed because the court was clearly wrong in the conclusions he arrived at upon the separate issue.

It is fair to the court to say that it was greatly influenced by our opinion and decision in the Klor case [1958 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,007] which was reversed by the Supreme Court. Klor's Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores [1959 TRADE CASES ¶ 69,316], 359 U. S. 207. In this cited case, it is held that any restraint which is unreasonable per se, such as the price fixing and the special discounts allegedly here involved is actionable if it interferes ". . . with the 'natural flow' of an appreciable amount of interstate commerce." This case was decided by the Supreme Court after the instant case was dismissed by Judge Westover, as was Beacon Theatres v. Westover, supra. In United States v. Employing Plasterers' Assn. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,692], 347 U. S. 186, the court stated, "That wholly local business restraints can produce effects condemned by the Sherman Act is no longer open to question." And see, Las Vegas Merchant Plumbers' Assn. v. United States, 9th Cir. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,673], 210 F. 2d 732. As the court said in Mandeville Island Farms, Inc. v. American Crystal Sugar Co. [1948-1949 TRADE CASES ¶ 62,291], 334 U. S. 219 at 232, it is no longer necessary ". . . to search for some sharp point or line where interstate commerce ends and intrastate commerce begins. . . . [T]he exact location of this line makes no difference, if the forbidden effects flow across it to the injury of interstate commerce. . . ." See also Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. United States [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,691]; 356 U. S. 1, 5, and United States v. McKesson & Robbins [1956 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,368], 351 U. S. 305, 310. In Klor's v. Broadway-Hale Stores, supra at 213, the court stated:

> ". . . [T]he Sherman Act has consistently been read to forbid all contracts and combinations 'which "tend to create a monopoly,"' whether 'the tendency is a creeping one' or 'one that proceeds at full gallop.' International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392, 396."

The judgment appealed from is reversed and the case is remanded for trial in accordance with this opinion.[3]

Sherman Antitrust Act

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Prior Consent Decree as Bar.—A consent decree entered in a civil suit brought by the United States, charging price fixing in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, would not constitute a bar to criminal prosecution under the same Act even if the issues were precisely the same.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8029.010.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Consent Decrees—Bar to Criminal Proceedings.—A consent decree did not by implication prohibit the Government from instituting criminal proceedings for price fixing activities which the consent decree enjoined, by reason of the express reservation in the decree of the Government's rights to bring subsequent proceedings based upon other activities of the defendant, such as acquisition of competing interests.

See Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure, Vol. 2, ¶ 8341.

Department of Justice Enforcement and Procedure—Criminal Prosecutions—Bill of Particulars.—The Government's opposition to requests for particulars as to identity of persons on the ground that "a conspirator knows with whom he conspires" was improper because it assumed the guilt of the defendant. Opposition to other requests on the ground that the particulars would involve a disclosure of the Government's case was held to be inappropriate in the normal antitrust case. Matters alleged in the indictment in general terms were ordered to be reduced to specifics with precision and completeness; also, the Government was ordered to give particulars as to the time period of the alleged agreements and concert of action, the effects of the alleged conspiracy, and the illegal acts claimed to have been committed within the judicial district. Motions for other particulars as to the effects of the alleged conspiracy, the identity of various acts or documents, persons, and instances of denial of opportunity to purchasers were denied; requests for repetitive particulars were also denied.

Opinion

Motions to Dismiss Indictments

Dimock, District Judge [In full text]: Defendant, Western Newspaper Union, hereinafter WNU, moves to dismiss the indictment in each one of these cases. The only other defendants, J. M. Huber Corporation, in Cr. 159-149, and American Smelting & Refining Co., in Cr. 159-150, have pleaded nolo contendere, so that in each case the only remaining defendant is WNU.

Each indictment charges "an unlawful combination and conspiracy in restraint of * * * interstate trade and commerce in violation of section 1 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, entitled 'An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce Against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies,' as amended, 26 Stat. 209, 15 U. S. C. Section 1, commonly known as the Sherman Act."

The motions to dismiss are based upon the existence of a consent decree in the case of United States of America v. Western Newspaper Union, et al. [1953 Trade Cases ¶ 67,557], Civil No. 87-60, entered in this court on August 18, 1953. The worst that WNU can say about the indictments is a claim that the Government is now bringing criminal proceedings in which it seeks to convict WNU of a crime where the issue is the same as that determined adversely to WNU by the consent decree. It is doubtful whether this claim that the issue is the same as one determined by the consent decree can be supported but WNU argues that, under certain circumstances, the consent decree would constitute a bar even if the issues were not precisely the same as those created by the indictment. Since my conclusion is that even were the issues precisely the same the consent decree would not be a bar to criminal prosecution, I need consider no other question.

[Civil and Criminal Remedies Concurrent]

The Sherman Act plainly contemplates concurrent civil and criminal proceedings based upon the same state of facts. Section 1 makes contracts, combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade misdemeanors and provides for their punishment. Section 2 makes monopolies and attempts to monopolize and combinations and conspiracies to monopolize misdemeanors and provides for their punishment. Section 4 provides for such civil proceedings as those in which the consent decree was entered. It gives jurisdiction to the District Courts to prevent and restrain violations of sections 1-7, and makes it the duty of the several United States Attorneys in their respective districts under the direction of the Attorney General to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. The Act bears no indication that Congress intended the civil and criminal remedies to be alternatives. Indeed, on the face of the Act, it appears that the remedies are complementary. No reason is suggested why conduct, which has been proved to violate the statute and thus merit an injunction against it, should by virtue of that injunction be absolved from criminal consequences despite the Government's ability to prove it by the requisite degree of proof for a criminal conviction.

[Consent Decree No Bar]

In what I have just said, I have dealt with the ordinary decree entered after trial. Certainly a consent decree such as that here relied upon as a bar would have no more or less conclusive effect.

This is evidently a case of first impression. It is settled that an existing judgment in a criminal case does not prevent the bringing of a subsequent civil case by the Government. See, as to a judgment of acquittal, United States v. Real Estate Boards, 339 U. S. 485, 493-94, and, as to conviction, Local 167 v. United States [1932-1939 TRADE CASES ¶ 55,043], 291 U. S. 293, and United States v. National City Lines, D. C. N. D. Ill. [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,654], 118 F. Supp. 465. The Government need not rely upon the threat of a second criminal prosecution as a deterrent but may ask the Court for an injunction forbidding future violations. No reason is perceived why, when an injunction forbidding future violations has been obtained, the Government should not be allowed to press for punishment for past violations.

[No Bar Implied by Terms of Decree]

Defendant argues that the consent decree here involved by its terms prevents criminal prosecution. For this it relies on a provision of the consent decree that it shall not operate as a bar or estoppel against any suit or proceeding based upon any acquisition by any defendant of any of the capital stock, physical assets, business or good will of any person engaged in the manufacture, sale or distribution of printing supplies, printing machinery or printers' services. Defendant argues that the injunctive provisions of the consent decree deal solely with price fixing and that the subject matter of the indictment is similarly confined. He says that, by the express reservation of the Government's rights to bring proceedings based upon acquisition of competing interests, there is a negative implication that the Government may not bring a proceeding based upon price fixing. Passing the question of the propriety of an agreement by the Government not to prosecute for crime, the provision under consideration is not susceptible of that construction. The consent decree provides:

> "Now, Therefore, before any testimony has been taken herein, and without trial or adjudication of any issue of fact or law herein, and upon consent of all parties hereto, it is hereby
> "Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed, as follows:"

The only conclusions in the judgment are that the court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties and that the complaint states a cause of action against the defendants under section 2 of the Sherman Act. All of the other provisions are merely injunctive or disclaimers. A decree which disclaims any adjudication except that the court has jurisdiction of the controversy and of the parties and that the complaint states a cause of action under section 2 of the Sherman Act, is so far from operating as a bar or estoppel that a disclaimer of that effect as against any suit or proceeding based upon an acquisition of competing business interests must be regarded as no more than the result of an excess of caution. I have concluded above that under the statute the Government may, upon a basis of the same conduct in each case, obtain an injunction and after the injunction has been obtained institute a proceeding by indictment. The question now raised is whether this court in the consent decree by implication prohibited the institution of such criminal proceedings. The circumstances are simply too weak to support the implication of an injunction against the Government in a decree enjoining defendants. The motions to dismiss the indictments are denied.

Motions for Bills of Particulars

Defendant moves also for bills of particulars. The indictments in each case are substantially identical except that the indictment in No. 159-149 charges a combination by WNU with J. M. Huber Corporation in connection with the sale of ink and the indictment in No. 159-150 charges a combination of WNU with American Smelting & Refining Company in connection with the sale of typemetals. WNU is alleged to be in the business of selling both ink and typemetals. Since the indictments are substantially identical, mutatis mutandis, the demands for particulars are substantially identical except that the demand in the case involving the American Smelting & Refining Company seeks particulars in one respect not covered by the other demand. I shall therefore deal with the demand in that case, No. 159-150.

© 1960, Commerce Clearing House, Inc.

[Conspiracy Not to Be Assumed]

The Government strenuously opposes most of the requests. The principal ground of opposition is one which long ago ought to have been laid at rest. I quote an example: "It seems too obvious for argument that a conspirator knows with whom he conspires." I can do no better than to repeat the comment made by the then District Judge Whittaker in United States v. Smith, D. C. W. D. Mo., 16 F. R. D. 372, 375:

> "Not is it any answer to a motion for a bill of particulars for the government to say: 'The defendant knows what he did, and, therefore, has all the information necessary.' This argument could be valid only if the defendant be presumed to be guilty. . . . Being presumed to be innocent, it must be assumed 'that he is ignorant of the facts on which the pleader founds his charges.' "

It must never be forgotten that what is sought by a bill of particulars is not what actually happened but what the opponent claims happened.

[Disclosure of Government's Case]

Another objection urged throughout by the Government is that to furnish the particulars requested would involve a disclosure of the Government's case. It is true that, in the average criminal case where a defendant is fighting for his life or liberty against the charge that he has committed some crime of violence, to disclose the Government's case in advance might make it too easy for the defendant to concoct an alibi or a fictitious defense. That consideration, however, is rarely present in the normal antitrust case. The question is usually one as to the inferences to be drawn from conceded facts. Complicated matters like economic theories are more likely to be under consideration than the simple matter of whether the defendant was the man who struck the blow. The expense in time and money of antitrust cases has been a byword and from all sides the courts are being urged to simplify them. In the case at bar the Government has had access to all of the defendants' files in the course of the civil litigation that ended in the consent decree. There is no reason in the world why the Government should not with precision state exactly what it charges constituted the crime for which it now prosecutes the defendants. That is not to say that the rule against the requirement of the disclosure of the Government's evidence should be abandoned in this or in any other case nor is it to say that the courts should fashion a practice under which the defendant in a criminal case may demand that the Government answer interrogatories. Insofar, however, as matters are alleged in the indictment in general terms, those general terms must be reduced to specifics with precision and completeness.

With those general observations, I shall proceed to details.

What I have said leads to my granting of particulars in response to requests A(1) and A(3). Request A(2) deals only with the point which I have already resolved against defendant that it may not be prosecuted criminally for an offense which has been the basis of its consent to a decree against it. Accordingly the request is denied.

Paragraph 11 in the indictment reads as follows:

> "11. The aforesaid combination and conspiracy has consisted of a continuing agreement and concert of action between ASARCO, WNU, and other persons to the grand jury unknown, the substantial terms of which have been and are that they agree to fix, maintain and stabilize the selling prices at which typemetals are sold to ultimate consumers or users."

[Identity of Persons]

Request B(1) asks for the identity of those claimed to have performed acts "pursuant to the continuing agreement and concert of action" et cetera. This is certainly too broad and is disapproved. Defendant is being prosecuted for engaging in a combination and conspiracy, not for making sales pursuant to such a combination and conspiracy. The combination and conspiracy might be proved by evidence of acts attributable thereto but still the gist of the charge would be the combination and conspiracy. To require a statement of every act done which the Government claims was performed pursuant thereto might require the specification of thousands of orders for small amounts of typemetals.

[Repetitive Requests]

Requests B(2) and B(3) seek the usual details which would be required under the old practice in civil cases with respect to an agreement, i.e., whether express or implied, whether in writing or oral, if in writing, a copy thereof, and if oral, the substance thereof, by whom and to whom spoken and the time and place of the conversation. Request B(4) asks for the substance of the continuing agreement insofar as it was claimed to be implied. Requests B(2), B(3) and this part of B(4) should be complied with and the answers given with particularity and detail. Indeed, if these requests are answered with particularity and detail, there will be no need to answer the succeeding requests numbers B(6), B(7), B(8), B(10) and B(12) and those requests are therefore denied not because they are improper but because to answer them would require a repetition of the material furnished pursuant to requests B(2), B(3), and part of B(4).

[Identity of Acts or Documents]

The last part of the request B(4) asks for the identity of the acts or documents from which the supposed implied continuing agreement is implied and asks the names of the persons who performed the acts and the dates of the occurrences. That seems to me a mere request for evidence. It seeks the circumstantial evidence from which the Government says that the continuing agreement should be implied. It need not be answered.

Request B(5) asks with respect to "concert of action" the same particulars as asked in the first part of B(4) above with respect to "continuing agreement". If anything different is meant by the two expressions the request is proper.

[Time of Agreement and Action]

Request B(9) would be proper except for the fact that it asks some details which will have been furnished pursuant to demands such as numbers B(2), B(3) and B(4). Therefore request B(9) is allowed only to the extent of requiring a statement of the time period in which the alleged continuing agreement and concert of action were operative in each geographical area.

Request B(11) does not seek an amplification of anything alleged in the indictment but is rather a substitute for the interrogatory practice which does not obtain in criminal cases and is denied.

[Effects of Combination]

Paragraph 13 of the indictment states the alleged effects of the combination and conspiracy. It states as such an effect that the prices at which typemetals are sold to ultimate consumers or users have been fixed and competition between the defendants has been suppressed and eliminated. Request C(1) begins by asking whether competition was suppressed by the establishment of uniform prices in any geographical area and, if so, it asks the Government to specify each such area, price and the time during which such price was in effect. Since the Government has chosen to allege this effect in the indictment, it must be assumed that it expects to prove the allegation. The allegation thus assumes importance and the requests in the first two sentences of C(1) are no more than those which will give an identifying description of the effects alleged and are therefore allowed. The balance of C(1), however, asks for matters which will be furnished under such requests as B(2), B(3) and B(4), or else seeks matters which could only be obtained by the non-permissible interrogatory method and need not be answered.

Requests C(2) and C(3) ask for details as to matters alleged in the indictments to which the defendant is entitled.

One of the allegations of paragraph 13 is subdivision (c) which says that one of the effects of the combination and conspiracy was that purchasers, ultimate consumers and users of typemetals have been denied the opportunity to purchase typemetals in a free and competitive market. In request C(4) defendant asks for a statement of each instance in which purchasers or ultimate consumers and users of ink have been denied such an opportunity. The indictment's allegation was an allegation only of a general condition. To ask for each manifestation of that general condition is absurd.

Paragraph 13 of the indictment states that it lists various restraints as effects of the combination and conspiracy "among others". Request C(5) asks whether there have been other restraints than those listed in paragraph 13 and, if so, asks a statement of the way in which they did restrain trade and commerce. As I have said, the allegation of the effects of the combination and conspiracy is an unnecessary one. Thus the use of the words "among others" does not indicate to me that the Government intends to offer evidence of effects other than the general ones alleged but rather that the Government does not wish to be understood as alleging that the listed effects were the only ones. Request C(5) need not be answered.

[Acts Charged Within District]

Paragraph 14 of the indictment alleges facts with respect to jurisdiction and venue. This is an important matter and defendant is entitled to have the particulars with respect to the connection of the acts charged with the Southern District of New York. The information required by request D(1) must be furnished.

Request D(2) is "State what illegal acts are claimed to have been committed by the defendants in the Southern District of New York and give the date of each such act". To answer such a broad request might lead far afield of anything which would be the subject of evidence so that the request should be amended and answer given to it in the amended form: "State the illegal acts committed by the defendants in the Southern District of New York as to which the Government will offer evidence and give the date of each such act."

In accordance with defendant's motions the court directs that, as to any items among the requests concerning which the Government shall state in its bill of particulars that its knowledge or information is incomplete, the Government shall set forth in its bill of particulars whatever knowledge or information it may have and shall furnish further particulars within ten days after it shall have obtained further knowledge or information and, in any event, not later than thirty days before the trial.

Settle order on notice.

MARKEWICH, Justice [In full text]: Motion to dismiss the first, second, and third counterclaims in the defendant's answer pursuant to Rule 109, subdivisions 4 and 5, Rules of Civil Practice, on the ground that each of the counterclaims is not one which may be properly interposed in the action and that each of the counterclaims does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is granted. None of these counterclaims show on their face that they existed prior to the assignment of the claim and on and before notice of the assignment. These facts are essential to a valid counterclaim. The affidavit submitted by defendant has been disregarded as unavailable on motions under Rule 109, Rules of Civil Practice, attacking defenses and counterclaims for insufficiency on their face (Levan v. Am. Safety Table Co., 222 App. Div. 110). The second and third counterclaims are defective on the face thereof on the further ground that they assert no rights against the plaintiff. Each is directed against others, not parties to the action. The statement in the memorandum of plaintiff is that no judgment is sought against plaintiff but only setoffs against its claim is ineffective in the face of the answer. The third counterclaim is insufficient and should be dismissed because a state court has no subject matter jurisdiction to give affirmative relief for alleged violations of the Clayton Act (U. S. Code, title 15, section 15). That branch of the motion to strike out the first, third, fourth, and fifth defenses pleaded in defendant's answer pursuant to Rule 109, subdivision 6, of the Rules of Civil Practice for insufficiency is granted. The first defense is predicated upon an alleged advance of $9,500. The word "advance" lacks legal significance and defendant should allege facts upon which a legal obligation can rest. The third, fourth, and fifth defenses based upon alleged violations of the Clayton Act are insufficient (Bruce's Juices v. American Can Co. [1946-1947 TRADE CASES ¶ 57,553], 330 U. S. 743; American Woolen Co., Inc. v. Miller-Schulman Corp'n [1954 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,895], 206 Misc. 1005). That branch of the motion that seeks to strike out all matter contained in paragraph 17 of the answer pursuant to Rule 103 of the Rules of Civil Practice is granted and the allegations are stricken as irrelevant and immaterial to the second defense of an alleged breach of warranty. Defendant may serve an amended answer within twenty days after service of a copy of this order with notice of entry.

Sherman Antitrust Act and McCarran Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Fixing Prices in Insurance Industry—Antitrust Exemption Conferred by McCarran-Ferguson Act—Conspiracy Effectuated by "Boycott"—Refusal to Deal Except at Fixed Price.—The McCarran-Ferguson Act precludes a Sherman Act suit involving a state-regulated phase of the insurance industry unless the offending conduct constitutes "boycott, coercion, or intimidation." Where price fixing conspiracies are effectuated by such means, they are not within that antitrust exemption. Thus, an amended complaint charging insurance companies with concertedly decreasing the rate of commissions paid to automobile insurance agents, and with using "boycott, coercion or intimidation" to effectuate their "refusal to deal except at the agreed price," sufficiently stated a cause of action under the Sherman Act. There is no distinction between an absolute refusal to deal, or the inducement of others to refuse absolutely to deal, and a partial refusal to deal except at a fixed price.

Order Denying Motions Under F. R. C. P. 12(b)(1), 12(b)(6), 12(e), 12(f) and to Dismiss for Failure to Comply with Court Order

ALBERT C. WOLLENBERG, District Judge [In full text]: On May 20, 1959, this court granted defendants' motions under F. R. C. P. 12(b)(6) to dismiss the original complaint. The court held that § 2(b) of the McCarran Act [15 USCA § 1012(b)] precluded a Sherman Antitrust Act suit involving California insurance agents' commissions except on the narrow grounds stated in § 3 (b) of the McCarran Act [15 USCA § 1013(b)]. Thereafter, and within the time specified by the court, plaintiffs filed their amended complaint which now is the subject of the present motions. First the court will consider the motions under F. R. C. P. 12(b)(1) to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter.

[Motions to Dismiss—Jurisdiction]

The defendants contend that price-fixing conspiracies effectuated by the methods stated in § 3(b) of the McCarran Act are within the antitrust immunity provisions of § 2(b) of said Act. Section 3(b) precludes a Sherman Act suit involving a state-regulated phase of the insurance industry unless the offending conduct constitutes "boycott, coercion, or intimidation." 15 USCA § 1013(b). The defendants argue, among other things, that every price-fixing conspiracy necessarily involves economic pressures not to do business except at the agreed price. Defendants conclude, therefore, that Congress obviously did not intend § 3(b) to apply to what is necessarily involved in every price-fixing agreement. Plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue that the result urged by defendants is contrary to Congressional intent expressed in § 3(b), since it would give insurance companies federal antitrust immunity from price-fixing conspiracies effectuated by "boycott, coercion or intimidation."

The court recognizes that both contentions are extreme in result. Plaintiffs' position renders § 2(b) of the McCarran Act, which attempts to severely restrict application of the Sherman Act, meaningless. Defendants' theory renders § 3(b) largely ineffective. There is nothing in the legislative history to suggest the result urged by either plaintiffs or defendants. Thus, giving the wording of the statute its plain meaning, the court concludes that plaintiffs' interpretation is correct.

In addition, the defendants contend that the terms in § 3(b) are directed to a concerted absolute refusal or the inducement of others to refuse absolutely to deal. Thus, the defendants distinguish between an absolute refusal and a refusal except at a fixed price. The distinction is without substance. There is no reason to hold that § 3(b) withholds immunity in case of an actual total boycott, but grants antitrust immunity for a threatened total or partial boycott. Section 3(b) permits a Sherman Act suit in a state regulated phase of the insurance industry if conduct amounts to boycott, coercion or intimidation. These are the methods to effectuate the refusal to deal except at the agreed price.

Therefore, the motions under F. R. C. P. 12(b)(1) must be, and the same are hereby denied.

[Motions to Dismiss—Sufficiency of Complaint]

The court will now consider the motions addressed to the sufficiency of the amended complaint [F. R. C. P. 12(b)(6); 12(e); 12(f)] and its compliance with this court's previous order. The complaint sufficiently alleges a boycott. It alleges, inter alia, that the defendants (a) induced other insurance companies to refrain from doing business with plaintiffs except at the agreed commission and (b) conspired to refuse to do business except at said rates.

The motions under 12(b)(6), 12(e) and 12(f) are hereby denied.

The motions to dimiss for failure to comply with the court's previous order are hereby denied.

Sherman Antitrust Act

Combinations and Conspiracies—Patent Licensing—Tying Provisions.—Provisions in a patent licensing agreement requiring that a patented aerator be sold only in conjunction with a faucet and that it be exported only with the consent of the patentee were not illegal per se; consequently, summary judgment was denied.

Memorandum on Motion of Chicago Faucet Company for Summary Judgment on Counter-claim of Aghnides

Edwin A. Robson, District Judge: [In full text]: Chicago Faucet Company moves for summary judgment on the counterclaim of Aghnides on the ground that the License Agreement of January 1, 1945, contains provisions in violation of the antitrust laws in that they require the aerator licensed thereunder to be sold only in conjunction with a faucet and prohibit the exportation of aerators except with the consent of the patentee.

The court concludes that the motion for summary judgment is ill-founded because these license provisions are not illegal per se. They are not of the character heretofore condemned by the courts as unlawful tying agreements.[1] Nor is the instant restriction on the exportation of the aerator illegal per se.[2]

The motion for summary judgment is denied.
